¹ Aman has been described elsewhere as an Agagite or a Bugacan, neither of which terms can be explained with certainty. Macedonia would be regarded as a natural enemy of Persia at any time from 480 B.C. onwards.

² This verse, like the notice in 12. 6 which connects Aman with the disloyal chamberlains, suggests the existence of a fuller version of the story, from which our narrative was abridged.

18 which were sent out by Aman under our name are to be left unheeded.¹ He, the author of this plot, hangs now on a gibbet, here at the gates of Susan, with all his kindred; to God, not to us, thanks are due 19 that he has received his deserts. The decree we are now sending you, giving the Jews liberty to follow their own laws, is to 20 be posted up in every city of the realm; and you must furnish them with the means to make an end of all those who would have compassed their murder, on the thirteenth day of Adar, the last month of the year.
 21 Here is a day marked down for mourning and lament, turned by God Almighty into a day of triumph for them; you too must 22 keep it as one of the year's holidays, and observe it with due rejoicing; so making it 23 known to posterity that Persia's loyal subjects are well rewarded for their loyalty, and that all who plot against her sovereignty atone for their crime with death.
 24 Be there province or city that will not take its part in this observance, let it be laid waste with fire and sword; man nor beast shall tread its ways hereafter; to warn men what doom they suffer, that set edict of ours at defiance.

¹ Literally, 'are cancelled', but this seems to have been technically impossible; cf. note on 8. 8. 'Left unheeded' is the sense of the Septuagint Greek.

THE BOOK OF JOB

THERE was a man dwelling in the land of Hus once, Job was the name of him, that was true and honest; ever he feared God, and 1 kept far from wrong-doing. Seven sons he 2 had, and three daughters; and for wealth, he had seven thousand sheep, three thousand camels, five hundred yoke of oxen, five hundred she-asses, and servants a many; in all the East none was Job's rival.
3 And this custom his sons had in feasting, each invited the rest in turn; at such times they would send for their three sisters to 4 eat and drink beside them. And ever when their week of feasting was over, Job would send for them,¹ and have them rid of all defilement; next morning, it was his first care to offer burnt-sacrifice for each of them. Who knows, thought he, but they may have committed some fault, these children of mine? Who knows but they may have slighted God in their secret thoughts? Never would he let the day pass without burnt-sacrifice.

5 One day, when the heavenly powers stood waiting upon the Lord's presence, and among them, man's Enemy, the Lord asked him, where he had been? Roaming about the earth, said he, to and fro about 6 the earth. Why then, the Lord said, thou hast seen a servant of mine called Job. Here is a true man, an honest man, none like him on earth; ever he fears his God, and keeps far from wrong-doing. Job 7 fears his God, the Enemy answered, and 8 loses nothing by it. Sheltered his life by thy protection, sheltered his home, his property; thy blessing on all he undertakes; worldly goods that still go on in-9 creasing; he loses nothing. One little touch of thy hand, assailing all that wealth of his! Then see how he will turn and 10 blaspheme thee. Be it so, the Lord answered; with all his possessions do what thou wilt, so thou leave himself unharmed. And with that, the Enemy left the Lord's presence, and withdrew.

And now it was the turn of Job's children to sit over their feasting and their wine at the house of the eldest brother. That day, a messenger brought Job news 11 of his oxen and asses. The oxen were a-ploughing, said he, and the asses grazing near them, when on a sudden a band of 12 Sabæans swept down on them, and carried all away. As for thy men, the Sabæans put them to the sword, and none lives to tell the tale but I. Even as he spoke, another 13 messenger came in with news of the sheep, how God's lightning had fallen, devouring sheep and shepherd, so that none was left to tell the tale but he. And upon the heels 14 of that, in came a third to say that robbers from Chaldæa, in three several bands, had closed in upon the camels and driven them away, killing the men who tended them, so that none was left to tell the tale but he. And before this one had finished his story, 15 a fourth messenger came in. I come, said he, from thy eldest son's house, where but now thy sons and daughters sat at their feasting and their wine. All on a sudden, 16 came a tempestuous wind from across the desert, and beat so on every corner of the house that it fell in, crushing thy children to death amid the ruins of it; none lives to tell the tale but I.

Then rose up Job, and rent his garments 17 about him; and he shaved his head bare, and fell down to earth to do reverence. Naked I came, said he, when I left my 18 mother's womb, and whence I came, naked I must go. The Lord gave, the Lord has taken away; nothing is here befallen but what was the Lord's will; blessed be the name of the Lord.² In all this, Job guarded 19 his lips well, nor challenged with human folly God's wisdom.³

¹ Or possibly, 'Job would send them a message'.

² The words 'Nothing is here befallen but what was the Lord's will' are found in the Septuagint Greek and in the Latin, but not in the Hebrew text.

³ Literally, in the Latin, 'nor said anything foolish against God'. The sense of the Hebrew text seems to be, 'nor charged God with senseless procedure'.

2 Once again the heavenly powers came to wait upon the Lord's presence; and there, waiting with the rest of them, was the Enemy of man. And of his travels he still said the same; he had been roaming about the earth, to and fro about the earth.

3 Why then, the Lord said, thou hast seen for thyself that this servant of mine, Job, has not his like on earth; a man so true and honest, ever fearing his God, and keeping far from wrong-doing. And still he maintains his innocence.¹ Shame it is that thou hast set me on to do him a mischief, and all to no purpose. Nay, answered the Enemy, skin must suffer before skin grieves.² Nothing a man owns, but he will part with it to keep his skin whole. That hand of thine, let it fall on bone of his, flesh of his; see if he does not turn and blaspheme thee. And thereupon said the Lord to man's Enemy, Have what power over him thou wilt, so his life be kept safe in him. And with that, the Enemy left the Lord's presence, and withdrew.

And cruelly he smote Job; smote him with the foul scab from head to foot, so that he was fain to sit him down on the dung-hill, and scratch himself with a shard where he itched. Little comfort his own wife gave him; What, she said, still maintaining thy innocence? Better thou shouldst renounce God, and have done with living. Spoken like a foolish wife, Job answered. What, should we accept the good fortune God sends us, and not the ill? So well, even now, did Job guard his lips.

11 News of the calamity that had befallen him reached three of his friends, Eliphaz the Themanite, Baldad the Suhite, and Sophar the Naamathite. From their far homes all, by agreement made, came to visit him, and give him comfort. Scarcely, upon a distant view, could they recognize him; loud they cried out, and sore they wept, tore their garments about them and threw the dust over their heads heaven-high. And for seven days and seven nights they sat there on the ground beside him, and no word spoken; here, they saw plainly, was overmastering grief.

3 At last, Job himself broke into utterance, and fell to cursing the day on which he was born. And this was his plaint: Blotted out for ever be the day of my birth; that night, too, which gave word that a human life had been conceived in the womb! Plunged be that day in darkness; may God on high forget it, and grant it never shine of sun; shades, like the shades of death, claim it for their own; deep gloom lie heavy on it, and wrap it all in desolation. Shrouded be that night in a black storm, let it not be reckoned among the days of the year, nor marked in the moon's calendar; a night doomed to exile, a night that never wakes the sound of praise. Wizards that can overcast the sun, and rouse old Chaos from his lair, on that night lay your ban; blacken its starlight, let it wait for the morning light, and see it never, nor break of rising dawn; the night that should have closed the doors of the womb against me, shut these eyes forever to sights of woe!

Had but the womb been the tomb of me, had I died at birth, had no lap ever cherished me, no breast suckled me, all would be rest now, all would be silence. Deeply I would take my repose, with the old kings and senators, that once restored cities for their whim,³ the chieftains that had such wealth of gold, houses full of silver; with babe still-born and babe unborn, hidden away in the sunless grave. There the unquietness of the wicked is stilled, and the weary are at rest; untroubled the thrall sleeps, his tyrant's bidding cannot reach him now; master and slave are there, and the slave masterless.

Why should they see the light, that groan to see it; why should they live, that must live in bitterness of soul? Why should they be like treasure-seekers, longing for the death that still cheats them, a grave the prize they covet? Such men as I, that must tread blindfold in a maze of God's making! Ever as I sit down to meat the sighs come, grief floods over me unrestrained. Must I have nothing left to daunt me? Must each calamity be felt as soon as feared? And still I kept my own counsel, still patient and silent I, till my angry mood overcame me at last.¹

¹ This may mean that he continued to shew correct behaviour (cf. 1. 22), but more probably that he would not admit he had done anything to deserve his sufferings (cf. 27. 6, where the same words are used, and the argument of the book generally).

² Literally, 'Skin on behalf of skin'. The rendering given assumes that a proverb, couched in elliptical language, is best interpreted by reference to the context.

³ 'Restored cities' is literally 'built up waste places', a phrase occurring in Is. 58. 12 and 61. 4, where the meaning is clear enough.

4 Thereupon Eliphaz the Themanite made answer: Speak we, it may be thou wilt take our words amiss, yet speech will out. Well thou knewest how to teach others, strengthen the drooping hands, give courage to the waverer, support to flagging knees, by counsel of thine. Now the blow has fallen on thyself, and thy strength is gone; the nearer neighbourhood of misfortune unmans thee. No more we hear now of that fear of God, that life perfectly lived, which once gave thee confidence, gave thee strength to endure! And, sure enough, ruin never fell yet on the innocent; never yet was an upright soul lost to memory.² The men that traffic in wrong-doing, that sow a crop of mischief they themselves must reap at last, these I have seen undone; one breath, one blast of the divine anger withers them quite, and they are gone.

Roar lion and growl lioness, the fangs of the lion-cubs will yet be shattered. For lack of prey, the tiger goes his way at last, the young lions wander wide.³

Listen; here is a secret that was made known to me; it was but the breath of a whisper overheard. It was the hour when night visions breed disquiet, as men lie chained by sleep; fear took hold of me, a fit of trembling that thrilled my whole frame, and made every hair bristle. All at once a spirit came beside me and stopped; there it stood, no face I knew, yet I could see the form of it, and catch its voice, light as a rustling breeze. Can man have right on his side, the voice asked, when he is matched with God? Can a mortal creature shew blameless in its Creator's presence? Nay, in his own retinue God finds loyalty wanting; angels may err. What, then, of ¹⁹ Man, earth-bound in his house of clay, eaten away by the moth of time? What of ²⁰ Man, cut down between morn and eve, doomed to perish unregarded, even the ²¹ straggler marching on at last?⁴ Will he not die before he learns wisdom?

5 Who will listen to thy plaint against God? Wilt thou turn to one of his angels for redress? Impatience is a great ² murderer of fools; in their simpleness of heart, they repine at the injury, to their ruin. Never yet did I see a fool secure in ³ his possessions but I prophesied disaster, there and then, for his fair prospects. And still would I see his children bereft of hope, ⁴ ground down by false judgement, and none to bring redress; his harvest a prey for ⁵ hungry neighbours, himself for the armed robber, his wealth drunk up by thirsty mouths.⁵

Never was ill without a cause; never did mischief spring up self-sown. Man's bent is for mischief, as sure as birds will fly.⁶

Wiser counsels for me; to the Lord himself my plaint shall be made, of God himself I will seek audience. His magnificent ⁸ counsels none may fathom, none reckon up his marvellous deeds. His to grant the parched earth rain, watering the countryside; his to exalt men of low esteem, to ¹¹ comfort the mourner with new hope. Through him the crafty schemer is ¹² baulked of his aims; cunning overreaches itself, and knavish plots are scattered to the winds; wise fools, that blink in daylight, ¹⁴ and grope their way blindly at full noon!

So, from their slander and their violence, he rescues the poor and the un-befriended; now, misery, take heart, let ¹⁶ malice stand dumb with confusion!

Happy the man, whom God chastens for ¹⁷ his faults! The correction he sends thee

¹ The Hebrew text is ordinarily understood as meaning, 'I have no ease, no quiet, no rest; nothing but turmoil is my lot'.

² The argument here may be understood in either of two ways; it may be, 'You, Job, are innocent, therefore you cannot be wholly condemned to misfortune', or it may be, 'You, Job, are condemned to misfortune, therefore you cannot be wholly innocent'. Perhaps both lines of thought were in the speaker's mind.

³ These two sentences are evidently proverbs, and it is difficult to determine their relevance here with certainty. 'Lioness' and 'tiger' in the Latin version should be 'lion' according to the Hebrew text; five different words are here used to describe the same animal.

⁴ 'Even the straggler marching on at last'. Some think we should read, by a very slight alteration in the text, 'when their tent-peg is taken out', a metaphorical description of Man's impermanency.

⁵ The text and interpretation of this verse are uncertain in the Hebrew. ⁶ 'Mischief'; literally, in the Latin version, 'trouble', but the context seems to shew that the other meaning of the Hebrew noun is to be preferred. The troubles man undergoes do not spring up haphazard; they are the fruit of his proneness to sin. 'As sure as birds will fly'; the Hebrew text probably means 'as sure as sparks will fly upwards'.

18 never, on thy life, refuse. Wounds he, it is 19 but to heal; the same hand, which smote, shall medicine thee. So in six perils thou shalt go unharmed, and find yet one deli-20 verance more; hunger shall not starve 21 thee, sword wound thee, slander find thee 22 out, havoc reach thee; rapine and dearth thou shalt defy. And besides all this, ravening beasts shall not daunt thee; 23 friendly soil for thee are the desert rocks,
 and the wild things are in league with thee; 24 secure thou shalt keep thy tent, or visit thy fair lands, and nought shall go amiss. Be sure that thy posterity will increase; like 26 the green grass thy race shall flourish; and when go to the grave thou must, it shall be with strength undiminished, like ripe corn 27 at harvest-home. Here are thoughts tested and found true; well for thee if thou wilt heed them, and ponder them in thy heart.

2 6 But Job answered: Oh that I had such a pair of scales as might weigh provocation of mine against the ills I suffer!¹ 3 The sand on the shore of ocean could not match the burden of them, and do you wonder that my utterance is all reproach?
 4 Deep the Lord's arrows rankle in me, draining my life; all his terrors are arrayed 5 against me. Brays the wild ass, be sure he lacks pasture; lows the ox, he stands before 6 an empty crib. Would you have me relish food unseasoned, lick my lips over the 7 taste that brings death? The food I had no stomach for, in my hard straits eat I must.²

8 Might it be granted, this is the boon I long for, this the request I would make of 9 God, that he would finish what he has begun, crush me altogether, strike a full 10 blow and make an end of me! Consolation enough, if he will but torment me to my death; no repining, then, against his will!
 11 In what strength should I hold out? In 12 what hope repose? Have I the endurance 13 of flint? Is my flesh brass? Help in myself is none; human aid keeps its distance from 14 me now. Nay, who defies the Lord's vengeance more surely than friend who re-15 fuses compassion to a friend? See how the men that are my brothers have failed me, fickle as the mountain brooks that run headlong down their ravines; first shrivelled with frost, then piled high with snow, then, when the snows melt, gone, vanished away at the first touch of the heat! This way and that their winding channels turn, but all to no purpose, all are lost to view.³ They must take heed, now, that would pass by Thema, and travel into Saba; they must wait awhile on their journey. Some hope I had in my friends, but all is disappointment; with eyes that will not meet mine, they come to visit me.⁴

Ay, you have come, but finding me so sorely smitten you dread my company. It was little enough I asked; I never bade you diminish your own wealth by bringing gifts to me, never begged your aid to rid me of some enemy that was too strong for me. Come, be my instructors; I will hear you out in silence; tell me what is the fault I have committed, all unknowing? Ill fare the claims of truth with such as you; not one of you can shew me in the wrong, yet for very love of reproof you must be re-proving still, all your words wasted on the air. Is it well done, to make a prey of the defenceless, to conspire against the good name of your friend? Browbeat me, then, at your pleasure; try if close scrutiny can prove me false; only let there be no contentiousness in your pleadings; in all honesty bring your complaint. You will not fasten guilt on any word of mine;
 reckless utterance never these lips shall frame.

7 What is man's life on earth but a campaigning? Like a hired drudge, he passes his time away; nor ever was slave so weary, longing for the shade, or drudge so weary, waiting to earn his hire, as I have been, counting these months of emptiness, these nights that never brought rest. Lie I down to sleep, I weary to be up with the day; comes the day, I weary for the evening, comfortless until dark. Overgrown my flesh with worms, matted with dust;
 my skin dried up and shrivelled. Frail as ¹ 'Provocation of mine'; it is not certain whether this means 'wrong-doing by which I have provoked God to punish me', or 'the sense of provocation which I feel'. The Vulgate gives the latter sense.

² In verses 6 and 7, the sense of the original is very doubtful. ³ The Latin version of verses 16-18, taken by itself, yields no tolerable sense. The rendering given above interprets it in the light of the Hebrew text, which differs considerably. ⁴ The sense of the Hebrew text is that the travellers (not the friends) come hopefully looking for the streams, and are disappointed.

the weaver's thread my years vanish away, spent without hope.

Bethink thee, Lord, it is but a breath, this life of mine, and I shall look on this fair world but once; when that is done, men will see me no more, and thou as nothing. Like a cloud disligned in passing, man goes to his grave never to return; never again the home-coming, never shall tidings of him reach the haunts he knew. And should I utter no word? Nay, the crushed spirit will find a voice, the embittered heart will not keep its own counsel. Am I a raging sea, a ravening monster, that thou guardest me so close? When I would find rest on my pillow, take refuge in night thoughts, what dreams thou sendest to daunt me, what sights of terror to unman me!

The rope for me! Death only will content this frame. To despair I yield myself, I will live on no more; loose thy hold of me; this life of mine is but the shadow of a life. Why is it that thou wilt make so noble a thing of man, wilt pay so much heed to him? Never a day dawns but thou wilt surprise him at his post; never a moment when thou art not making proof of him. Nay, gaze on me no more; leave me, though it were but for a breathing-space, to myself! If sinned I have, does human act of mine claim thy watchful regard? Must my path always cross thine, my life always be a burden to me?¹ Would it cost thee much to forgive sin of mine, pass over fault of mine, when I, so soon, shall be lying in the dust, missing at my post, as thou makest thy rounds at dawn?

8 Then answered Baldad the Suhite: What, still at thy old complaining; blustering still, like a high wind, on and on? Can sentence undeserved come from God, unjust award from the Almighty? What if these children of thine committed some fault, and he allowed justice to take its course? For thyself, thou hast but to keep early tryst with God, make thy plea to his omnipotence. Then, if thou comest before him innocent and upright, he will give thee audience betimes; he will establish thee in thy possessions again, as one that enjoys his favour. A poor thing thy old prosperity will seem, matched with the abundance he gives thee now.

Ask counsel of the ages that are long past; let the experience of former men overrule thee. How blind are we, creatures of a day, whose time on earth passes like a shadow! Those fathers of ours will be thy best teachers, and this is the advice their wisdom offers thee: Never yet grew bulrush without moisture, nor reed-bed that lacked water; fade it must, no leaf so soon, in its first flower, before men have time to gather it. So frail their happiness, who leave God unremembered; so fade the hopes of false hearts. Little shall their recklessness avail them; in threads of gossamer they put their trust. Vain his reliance on the house he has built, vainly he seeks to underpin it. Here is a plant that seems well-watered enough, spreads abroad its early shoots, but only till the sun rises; wrapped about stones are the roots of it, and stones all its dwelling-place; yonder sun must needs drain its life, and the garden will keep no memory of its passage. So brief its pride; they are waiting even now underground, the shoots that will fill its place.

Trust me, God will not cast off the innocent, will not lend his aid to the malice of their enemies. Ere long, he will teach those lips to smile, that mouth to sing praise; brief shall be the triumph of thy foes, brief the security of the wrongdoer.

9 But Job answered: No need to teach me that; how should a man win his suit, matched against God? Who would go to law, where one plea on this side is arrayed against a thousand on that? His all-knowing mind, his all-conquering arms, what man ever throve yet that defied them? God, the unseen power that can thrust mountains this way and that, uproot them in his anger, can move earth from its place, and set all its pillars quaking, can prevent, with a word, the sun's rising, or imprison, under his royal seal, the very stars? He it was, and no other, that spread out heaven to be his covering, made ocean a floor under his feet; that created Arc-turus, and Orion, and the Hyades, and the

¹ The Hebrew tradition is that the text originally ran, 'Must I always be a burden to thee?' but was altered by the copyists as a disrespectful phrase.

10 nooks of the south;¹ great wonders he 11 does, beyond all our understanding and all our reckoning. Hidden from my sight, 12 hidden from my thought, he comes and goes; comes suddenly, and how should I 13 defend my doings? goes suddenly, and how should I question his? There is no 14 braving the anger of such a God, when even the Titanic powers obey him;² and what am I that I should use phrases of studied eloquence for my pleading?

15 Nay, though I had right on my side, I would not plead against him as an adversary, I would sue to him for mercy as 16 a judge. What though I should cry upon him, and he should answer my summons?
 Well I know he would listen to no plead-17 ings of mine; his storms would overwhelm me, faster than ever the unmerited blows 18 would fall; never a breathing-space, never 19 a draught but of gall! Nought avails might, when a giant threatens me; nought avails right, when none dares to support 20 my quarrel. Would I plead in defence, he turns my own words against me; be I never so upright, he will prove me hypocrite.
 21 And innocent I am, but of that I take regard no longer; I am awear of life itself.

22 Still unchanged is the burden of my complaint; innocent and guilty, he sweeps 23 all away.³ If his scourge must fall, should not a single blow suffice? Why does he look on and laugh, when the unoffending, 24 too, must suffer? So the whole world is given up into the power of wrong-doers; he blinds the eyes of justice. He is answerable for it; who else?

25 Swift as a royal courier my days pass, 26 and joyless each one, like a pinnace gliding down stream,⁴ or an eagle swooping on its 27 prey. Ere now, I have been minded to put away such talk as this, wear a sad face and 28 live on the rack no more; still would I have pains to daunt me; still thou wouldst hold 29 me guilty, wouldst not spare. Blamed I must be, in spite of all; vain was my 30 striving, vainly I washed me in water pure 31 as snow, kept my hands shining clean; thy condemnation must roll me in the mire again, till the very clothes I wear shun the touch of me! I cannot meet him in judgement as man to man, claim an impartial hearing for my plea; there can be no arbiter between us, to claim jurisdiction over both. Let him lay by his rod, let his terrors cease to daunt me; then I will speak out bravely to his face; it is fear that holds me dumb.

10 Oh, I am weary of life; I will speak out, come what may; my soul is too embittered for silence. I will protest against God's sentence, demand to know why his judgement is so cruel. Is it well done in thee to play the tyrant, to spurn me, the creature of thy own hands, to smile on the ill designs of the godless? Are those eyes of thine human after all; is thy sight, too, blinded, like the sight of men? Hast thou a mortal's span of life, a destiny brief as ours, that thou must search for faults in me, labour to convict me of wrong done, when thou knowest full well that I am innocent, knowest that I am in thy power beyond hope of rescue?

It was thy hand that made me, no part of me but is thy fashioning; and wilt thou cast me aside all in a moment? Thou the craftsman, though of clay thy handiwork, and must all be ground to dust again?
 Milk of thy milking, cheese of thy pressing,
 were flesh and skin that clothed me, bone and sinew that built up my frame; the life given by thee, by thee was spared; thy vigilance was all my safety. Only in thy heart the memory of this is stored, but I know thou hast not forgotten. And was it thy purpose to spare me for a little, if I sinned, but absolve me never? Woe to me, if I rebelled against thee! And if I remained innocent, what then? Why, I would be drowned in misery and despair till I could lift up my head no more! Or if I did, that were pride in me, to be hunted down as a lioness is hunted; thou wouldst devise fresh miracles of torment; wouldst bring fresh witnesses against me, redouble

¹ 'The nooks of the south'; this is presumably some astronomical allusion to which we have lost the key.

² 'The Titanic powers'; literally, in the Latin version 'those who hold up the earth'. The Hebrew text is generally understood as referring to the powers of Chaos over which, by an allegory, Almighty God is pictured as triumphing at the Creation.

³ The Hebrew text of this verse opens with the words, 'It is one thing', a phrase which is generally interpreted, 'It is all one' (whether I live or die; or perhaps, whether a man is guilty or innocent). But there is no evidence that this English idiom was familiar to the Hebrew mind.

⁴ Literally, in the Latin version, 'ships carrying fruit'; the phrase in the Hebrew text is usually rendered, 'skiffs made of papyrus'.

thy avenging strokes, array against me a new host of punishments.

Why didst thou ever take me from the womb; why could I not perish there, never to meet men's eyes; a being without being, carried from womb to tomb? Brief, brief is my span of days; for a little leave me to myself, to find some comfort in my misery. Soon I must go to a land whence there is no returning, a land of darkness, death's shadow over it; a land of gloomy night, where death's shadow lies over all, and no peace haunts it, only everlasting dread.

11 Then answered Sopbar the Naamathite: Ready to speak should be ready to listen; glibness will not make an innocent man of thee. Must all keep silence till thou hast done; shall none make answer to thy raillery? Still thou wilt have it that all thy dealings¹ are upright, that thy heart, as God sees it, is pure. Would he but speak one word in thy ear, make thee his confidant! Would he but reveal to thee the secrets of his wisdom, in its ordered variety! Then wouldst thou learn that the penalty he is exacting of thee is less, far less, than thy sins deserve. What, wouldst thou search out the ways of God, have knowledge unconfined of his omnipotence? High as heaven is that wisdom, and thy reach so small; deep as hell itself, and thy thought so shallow! Far as earth it stretches, wide as ocean; will he sweep them all away, or confine them all in a little space, there is no gainsaying him. He knows the false hearts of men, sees wickedness there, and wouldst thou have him overlook it? Poor fools, that will have a mind of their own, and think they were born free as the wild ass!

But see, thy heart once guided aright, thy hands outspread to him in prayer, thou hast but to cleanse thy hands of their wrong-doing, rid thy dwelling-place of the guilt that defies it. Then thou mayst lift up thy head again, free from reproach, waver no more, tremble no more. These miseries of thine shall be forgotten, or remembered gratefully, like floods that are overpast. Radiance of noon shall dispel twilight, dawn shall rise where darkness seemed to envelop thee; fresh confidence shall be thine, fresh hope; hidden away in safety² thou shalt sleep secure; and that rest of thine, none shall disturb, suitors a many shall come to court thy favour.

The godless another doom awaits; their eyes shall grow faint with watching, and no rescue shall ever reach them; no other prospect they have but despair.

12 But Job answered: Strange, that you alone should have the gift of reason; that when you die, wisdom must die too! Well, I too have my thoughts; I am yet a match for you; this knowledge you bring me is knowledge common to all. For all his friends' raillery, a man such as I will still cry upon God, and have him answer the summons;³ the simplicity of the upright was ever a laughing-stock, and indeed, it is but a rushlight, despised by shrewd and prosperous folk, but it waits its turn.⁴ Meanwhile, see how well the robbers store their houses, braving God's anger, and yet in all things he lets them have their way! Dost thou doubt it? The very beasts will tell thee, the birds in air will be thy counsellors; the secret is known in every cranny of the earth, the fish in the sea will make it known to thee; none doubts, I tell thee, that all this is the Lord's doing; all living things that breathe, all the spirits of all mankind, lie in the hollow of his hand. As surely as the ear judges words, and the mouth relishes the taste of food, so surely is there truth in ancient sayings; it is time brings experience.

All God's doing; his are the wisdom and the power; to him belong prudence in act and discernment. The ruins he makes, 14

¹ 'Thy dealings'; the Hebrew text gives 'thy doctrine', but this is not in point. Job has claimed to be innocent, not to be infallible. It seems possible that there is some corruption in the text; meanwhile, the Latin word used occasionally has the sense of 'dealings' in general; cf. 'he had dealings with Joab, son of Sarvia' in III Kg. 1. 7; 'the God we have to deal with' in Heb. 4. 13. So also, 'what she has done' in Esther 1. 17. ² 'Hidden away in safety'; literally 'dug in'. It can hardly be supposed that the Latin version intends an allusion to burial. ³ The translation given here, as in 5. 1, 9. 16 and 13. 22, assumes that a judicial process is meant; Job will (as it were) call God to account at law for his injustice. Commentators ordinarily understand 'cry upon' and 'answer' in the sense of granting relief. ⁴ Two words in the Hebrew text here are susceptible of other interpretations than those given by the Latin version; and its sense is probably better rendered 'The shrewd and prosperous make light of a man's ruin, when his feet are just ready to stumble'.

none can rebuild, his imprisonment none 15 can escape; withholds he the rain, all is dried up; sends he rain, it floods all the 16 ground. Yes, he is strong, he is wise; reads 17 the knave's heart as easily as the fool's. He can thwart the counsellor, bemuse the 18 judge, exchange the king's baldrick for the 19 rope of a prisoner, lead the priest away 20 ungowned, dispossess the noble, bewitch the lips that never erred, rob the elder of 21 his prudence, bring princes into contempt, 22 unman the strong.¹ Things deep hidden in darkness he reveals, kindles the light 23 where death's shadow lay, brings growth or ruin to a people, and what he has ruined 24 restores. The hearts of chieftains he be-wilders, leading them by false paths to vain 25 ends, till all light fails, and they grope about in darkness, wander aimless like a drunkard after his wine.

13 Eyes nor ears nor wits are wanting to me, and I know all this as well 2 as you, but I am still a match for you. Or 3 rather, it is to God, the omnipotent, I will 4 speak; with him I remonstrate; but first I would prove you what you are, unskilful 5 plasterers all of you, that follow false rules of your craft. Would you but hold your 6 tongues once for all! It were your best wisdom. Listen while I refute you; mark 7 well what are my pleadings. Do you think God stands in need of your shifts, your 8 lying advocacy? Are you God's hired par-9 tisans, resolved to acquit him? Why then, beware of his own infallible scrutiny; think you he will be blinded, as men are blinded, 10 by your sophistries? Nay, he himself will be the first to blame you for wrongful at-11 tachment to his cause; your turn, then, to fear every movement of his, to cower 12 before his terrors! Your wise memories will vanish into dust, your pride will prove to be a thing of clay.

13 Nay, hold your tongues for a little, while 14 I say out my mind. Do not ask why I set my teeth so firmly,² take my life in my hand; let him slay me if he will! I await his decree;³ needs must that I should make my defence before him, and spare me he will; let the guilty shun his presence, not I.

 Nay, hear me out; let me open my mind in full; should I stand my trial, I know that I must be found innocent! Only let me meet my accuser! Why must I die unheard?⁴

But two rights I claim, if I am to face thee openly; withdraw thy chastising hand, and daunt me with thy terrors no longer. Then, if thou wilt call me in question, I will make reply; or let me speak, and be thou ready with thy answer. Tell me, what are all these transgressions, these faults thou findest in me? What crime, what wrong-doing is mine? Why is it that thou turnest thy back on me, and wilt treat me as an enemy? As well wrestle with a flying leaf, chase a wisp of straw, as keep this jealous record against me, tax me with the offences of my youth! To hold me so close a prisoner, watch me wherever I go, track my foot-prints, when I am no better than rotting carrion, than a garment fretted away by the moth!

14 So frail man's life, woman-born, so full of trouble, brief as a flower that blooms and withers, fugitive as a shadow, changing all the while; and is he worth that watchfulness of thine, must thou needs call him to account? (Who can cleanse what is born of tainted stock, save thou alone, who alone hast being?⁵) Brief, brief are man's days; thou keepest count of the months left to him, thou dost appoint for him the bound he may not pass. And wilt thou not leave him undisturbed for a little,
 till the welcome day comes when drudgery is at an end?

Were he but as the trees are! A tree has hope to live by: pollarded, it still grows green, and fresh branches spring from it.
 Root and stock old and withered, down in the dusty earth, but at the breath of water

¹ The Latin version has 'relieve the oppressed', which is quite out of keeping with the context.
² Literally 'tear (in the Hebrew text, carry) my flesh in my teeth'; evidently this was a proverbial way of expressing rashness, like that in the second half of the verse. ³ Literally, 'even if he slays me, I will hope in him'. But the true sense of the verse is hard to determine; there are two traditions of the Hebrew text, one reading 'I will wait for him' and the other 'I will not wait'. ⁴ It is possible to interpret the Hebrew text as meaning, 'Who is there that will accuse me? If anybody can, then I will remain silent and go to my death'; but this fits the context less naturally. ⁵ In the Hebrew text, this verse reads simply, 'Who can bring the clean from the unclean? Not one'; there is no agreement either as to the meaning of the phrase or as to its relevance in the discussion, and some think it has been accidentally misplaced.

it revives, and the leaves come, as they came when it first was planted. For us mortal men, death; a stripping, and a breathing out of the soul, and all is over. Where is the sea, when its waters dry up, the river when its bed is empty? So man falls asleep, never to rise again while heaven endures; from that sleep there is no waking, there is no rousing him. Ah, if the grave were only a place of shelter, where thou wouldst hide me away until thy anger was spent, with a time appointed when thou wouldst bethink thyself of me again!¹ Ah, if the dead might live again! Then I could wait willingly enough, all the time of my campaigning, till I were relieved at my post; thou wouldst summon me at last, and I would answer thy summons, thy creature, safe in thy loving hand!²

So jealous a record thou keepest of every step I take, and hast thou never a blind eye for my faults? Instead, must thou seal up every wrong-doing of mine, as in a casket; embalm the memory of my transgressions?³

Nay there is no help for it; mountain-side or cliff that begins to crumble scales away and vanishes at last, water hollows into the hard rock, and floods wear away the firm ground at last, and thou hast made no less inevitable man's doom. His brief mastery thou takest away for ever; the lively hue changes, and he is gone. His children rise to honour, sink to shame, and he none the wiser; nothing man feels save the pains that rack him in life, the griefs that fret his soul.⁴

15 Then answered Eliphaz the Themanite: This is not a wise man's way, to answer with windy sophistries, as if thou hadst the sirocco in thy blood, ill matched for the contest, prating to thy hurt. Worse, if thou hadst thy way, all reverence should be abolished, all devotion at an end. Thy tongue takes its instructions from a sinful heart; this is rebel speech. No need for me to prove thee a guilty man, thy words prove it; thy own lips arraign thee.

Tell me, was thine some primeval birth; wast thou made before the hills? Hast thou overheard the secrets of God's council-chamber, that thou thinkest him no match for thee in wisdom? What knowledge hast thou but we share it, what discernment greater than ours? We too have ancients among us, grey-headed men that have seen more days than any father of thine. It should be no great matter for God to comfort thee, if thy untimely speech did not forbid it; what mean these transports, why does that eye roll so wildly? What pride is this that would cross God himself, moving thee to rash utterance? It is not in man to live a life all blameless; never son of woman yet found acquittal. Fickle natures God finds among his very angels; the purity of heaven itself does not suffice him; what of man, the abominable, the defiled, athirst ever for wrong-doing?

Listen, while I tell thee my mind; thou shalt hear what my own eyes have witnessed; thou shalt hear what wise men have said, making known the tradition of their fathers, that dwelt ever in their own land, and held no commerce with strangers.

Proudly though he carry himself all his days, the godless man is on the rack; how long will his tyrannous reign last? All the while, terror whispers in his ear; danger there is none, but he sees plots everywhere. Treads he by dark ways, he never hopes to see light again, swords here, swords there to threaten him; ventures he out in search of food,⁶ he doubts not his last hour is at hand; dangers threaten him, difficulties hedge him round, as though he were a king making ready for battle. And all because

¹ Cf. Gen. 8. 1. ² The unfulfilled condition here expressed is represented in the Latin version as if it were something which is actually to happen, but such a rendering is plainly out of harmony with the context.

³ There has been much discussion over the meaning of these two verses, and over the position which they occupy in the argument. Some think they are part of the unfulfilled condition which goes before, and that the hiding away of man's sin is represented as something desirable; others, that they express the actual condition of things, and that man's sins are represented as treasured up against him, i.e., remaining unforgiven. Once again the suspicion arises that they really belong to a different context.

⁴ The words 'in life' do not occur in the Hebrew text, and some think that the verse refers to the (entirely self-regarding) unhappiness of the soul after death.

⁵ The Hebrew text here is usually understood as meaning, 'Art thou not content with God's consolations, his word spoken gently to thee?'

⁶ The Hebrew text here may be corrupt, and has to be rendered with considerable interpolations: 'He (imagines himself at some future time) wandering (to look) for food, (and saying to himself) Where (is any to be found)?' In any case, it is probable that Eliphaz is still describing the tortures of a bad conscience, not some actual punishment of the wicked.

he chose God for his enemy, matched himself against omnipotence; head high in air he made the onslaught, proud of his strong sinews, like a bull with hanging dewlap and well-covered flanks.¹

Now he is like some plant that grows² amid deserted streets, upon houses uninhabited that lie in ruins; no root shall he strike into the earth, of true wealth or abiding prosperity; never leave the shadows, but he is withered up by the heat or carried away by the blast. Let no fond hope delude him that he can buy off his doom; fall he must before his time; withered every branch, despoiled the vine with clusters yet unripe, shed the olive's flower. Barren, barren the schemer's plot; the house of the bribe-taker shall burn about his ears. Vainly engendered, borne in the womb, brought forth, their load of misery and infamy and shame.

16 But Job answered: Old tales and cold comfort; you are all alike. Words are but wind; there is no end to them, and they cost thee nothing. Believe me, I could do as well, were you in my case, talk the language of consolation, and mock you all the while, speak of encouragement; my lips should tremble with a show of pity.³ But here is grief words cannot assuage, nor silence banish; grief that bows me down till my whole frame is lifeless; those furrowed cheeks are the witness of it. And now a false accuser dares me to my face and baits me!⁴ One that vents all his spite against me, gnashes his teeth malignantly, watches me with fierce eyes like an enemy. Mouths that deride me, hands that smite me on the cheek in reproof, hearts that delight in my anguish, to what ill neighbourhood God has condemned me, what tyrants hold me in their grip!

So free from care my life was, and now, suddenly as though a wild beast had fastened on me, dashed me to the ground, he has broken that life to pieces. I am a mark for his archery, his arrows are all about me; still they pierce me to the marrow, drain my life,⁵ wound upon wound; giant hands assail me. No wonder if I go clad in sackcloth, disfigured with ashes, if my face is swollen with weeping, and on my eyelids the darkness falls.

Such is the reward of a guiltless life, of prayer offered without stain. I charge thee, earth, to leave my blood unburied, never to muffle the echoes of my protest; there is one in high heaven that knows the truth and must bear witness. Friends, prate on, these tears of mine issue their challenge to a God! Ah, could but a mortal bring God to justice, as man impleads man! Mortal am I; swiftly my years pass, and by the road I tread there is no returning.

17 Broken my will to live, shortened my days, the grave my only prospect; my eye lingers on sights of bitterness, never through my fault!⁶ Lord, wouldst thou but vindicate me, and set me right with thee! I care not who else is for or against me.⁷ For these, at least, I care not; thou hast robbed their hearts of all discernment, and they shall have no cause for boasting. Small thanks a man has for counting out the spoils, while his children go hungry!⁸

¹ The words 'like a bull' are not in the original; but the Hebrew notion of fat as a symbol of arrogance cannot well be reproduced in English without the use of simile.

² In the original, simply 'he dwells'. Some have imagined that the wicked man lives among the ruins of his victims' estates; others, that he is represented as daring God's vengeance by rebuilding accursed cities (cf. Jos. 6. 26). But in view of the plant-metaphors which follow, it seems more probable that Eliphaz is comparing the wicked to an ill-rooted plant, like Baldad in 8. 11-19.

³ Both in the Hebrew text and in the Latin version, the exact train of thought may be variously interpreted. Verses 8 and 9 are also of doubtful sense in the Hebrew.

⁴ 'And now a false accuser dares me to my face and baits me'; according to some the meaning is, 'My leanness gives open proof of it', which corresponds well with the former half of the verse. For those who adopt this rendering, it is possible to understand the verbs in verse 10 as referring to God himself. The 'false accuser' can hardly refer to God; and only by a strong rhetorical exaggeration could it refer to Eliphaz. It seems more likely that in this section Job is thinking of his spiritual enemies, perhaps as he has seen them in night visions (7. 14).

⁵ 'Still they pierce me to the marrow, drain my life'; literally, 'without respite he wounds my loins (in the Hebrew, kidneys), and pours out my bowels (in the Hebrew, gall) upon the ground'.

⁶ The Hebrew text here is generally understood as meaning, 'There are mockers at my side, and my eye dwells on their provocations'.

⁷ Literally, in the Latin version, 'Deliver me, Lord, and set me close to thee, and let who will fight against me'; in the Hebrew text, 'Go bail for me, Lord; who (else) will be my security?'

⁸ Literally, 'He promises spoils to his companions, and the eyes of his children will languish'. The Hebrew text is very obscure, and is thought by many to be corrupt; the copyist may have been baffled by the unexpected appearance of a proverb, perhaps on the subject of boasting.

A public by-word God has made me, a warning in all men's sight, my eyes grown dim, my whole frame wasted away, in my resentment. Here is sore bewilderment for honest hearts; angrily do innocent men complain, to see knaves prosper, will the just be true to their resolve any longer? Will they be encouraged to keep their hands clean?¹ Nay, sirs, return to the charge as often as you will; I do not look to find a wise man among you.

Swift pass my days, my mind distracted with whirling thoughts, that make night into day for me, as through the hours of darkness I await the dawn. Waiting for what? The grave is my destined home; among the shadows I must make my bed at last; only from corruption I claim a father's welcome, mother's and sister's greeting the worms shall offer me; what hope is this? Wait I patiently or impatiently, who cares? Into the deep pit I must go down, all of me; even there, in the dust, shall I find rest?²

18 Then answered Baldad the Suhite: Ah, you word-mongers, you have never had enough! First grasp our meaning, and we might argue to some purpose; but no, to men like thee we are worthless as dumb beasts.³ See with what fury he rends his own bosom! Must earth be dispeopled, must the rocks be torn from their place, to gratify one man's despairing mood?

Nay, the hopes of the wicked man are a light that shall be put out; a very will of the wisp; darkness shall fall over his dwelling-place, and the lamp that shone there will shine no more. The boldness of his own stride takes him prisoner; his own devices recoil against him; into the trap he walks, struggles vainly with its meshes;

now he is laid by the heels! Mounts ever higher his burning thirst.⁴ The ground sown with snares, pit-falls about his path, fears attend him everywhere, catch everywhere at his feet.

His strength brought low by famine, hunger gnawing at his sides and wasting all his beauty, death in its primal guise shall devour those limbs.⁵ Gone the security of his home, now its master lies under the heels of tyrant death; in his house strangers⁶ shall dwell, on his lands brimstone be scattered, root never grow beneath nor harvest rise from it.⁷ Gone the fame of him, gone the name of him, from street and country-side,⁸ eclipsed in utter darkness, lost to the world. Root nor branch of his posterity shall remain among his folk, vanished every trace of him from the lands he knew. That doom with terror and amazement high and low shall witness.⁹ Here (they will say) was a home of wrong-doing; he who lived here, lived a stranger to God.

19 But Job answered: What, will you torment me still? Every word of yours a fresh weight to crush me? How many times is this you have fallen on me, trampled me down without ruth? If, unaware, I have committed some fault, it concerns none but myself; not for you to claim authority over me, bring home to me my disgrace!

How to make you understand that God has misjudged me, caught me in his toils! If I cry out upon my wrongs, there is none to hear me, none to take cognisance of my plea; my path hedged in, so that there is no escape, my direction lost, and I benighted. By him discredited, dis-crowned, by him left defenceless on every side, I go my ways; a tree torn up by the

¹ This verse fits best into the context if it is understood as a question; those who take it as a statement regard it as an allusion to Job himself.

² The Hebrew text here is largely different and wholly obscure. ³ Job is here addressed in the plural. Some picture the scene of the whole book as a kind of public debate (cf. 32. 2) and suppose that the audience was divided in its sympathies. But it seems more likely that 'you' means 'thou and people like thee'; 'you critics of Providence'. ⁴ The word rendered 'thirst' in the Latin is of uncertain meaning.

⁵ Literally, 'first-born death', in the Hebrew text; 'the first-born of death'. This is usually interpreted of fever or some other kind of disease, but without evidence. The context here would suggest rather starvation. ⁶ Literally, in the Latin version, 'the dead man's fellows'. The phrase in the Hebrew text is of doubtful meaning; some think that weeds are referred to. ⁷ 'On his lands'; the Latin version repeats 'in his house', but two different words are used in the Hebrew text; and the latter is a more general word for the place where a man lives.

⁸ Or possibly 'from him', cf. verse 19. ⁹ v. 12-17. The verbs of this passage are represented by the Latin, unsuitably, as expressing a wish.

¹⁰ 'High and low'; literally, 'the last and the first', which may also be explained as meaning 'later generations and earlier generations'. Some interpret the Hebrew text as meaning 'men of the west and men of the east'.

11 roots has more to hope for than I. Against 12 me all his anger is aroused; I am that 13 enemy against whom he musters all his 14 forces, to ride over me, to beleaguer my 15 dwelling place. Sundered am I from my 16 brethren, a stranger to all that knew me, 17 forsaken by my kindred, by my friends 18 forgotten. Guests that dwell in my house, 19 ay, and the very serving-women, stare at 20 me, the alien, the unknown; my servants 21 do not come at my call, I must speak them 22 fair; my wife shuns the breath of me, to 23 my own flesh and blood¹ I am a suppliant.
 24 The very innocents² despise me, jeer at 25 me when my back is turned; no counsellor 26 so trusted but he is weary of me, no friend 27 so loved but he abandons me now. And I 28 so wasted! Skin clinging to bone, save 29 where the lips cover my teeth, is all that is left of me.³

21 Friends, friends, do you at least have 22 pity, now when God's hand has fallen on 23 me! Would you take part in God's hue and 24 cry against me, slander me to your hearts' 25 content?⁴ Could but these words of mine 26 be written down in a book, graven with a 27 pen of iron upon tablets of lead, chiselled 28 on hard flint!⁵

25 This at least I know, that one lives on 26 who will vindicate me, rising up from 27 the dust when the last day comes.⁶ Once 28 more my skin shall clothe me, and in 29 my flesh I shall have sight of God.⁷ I myself, with my own eyes; it will not be something other than myself that sees him. Deep in my heart is this hope reposed.⁸

28 You that would raise the hue and cry, 29 finding matter of complaint against me, should rather take flight yourselves, the sword at your heels; the sword that avenges wrong, proof to you that justice shall be done.

20 Then answered Sophar the Naamathite: Strange hesitation thy words breed in me; my thoughts veer to and fro. Not deaf am I to thy pleadings, but there is a voice in my heart gives me pause. Certain it is that never since man found a place on earth did the wrong-doer win lasting triumph; only for a brief moment does knavery bring him content.

Let his pride overtop heaven itself, his head be lifted high as the clouds, he is for the dung-hill at last; none knows what has become of him. Vanished and gone like a dream, the phantom of yesternight, unmarked by human eyes, lost to the scenes he knew! Crushing poverty shall be his children's lot; his acts shall yield their own harvest of shame, all the lusty vigour of his frame doomed, like himself, to silence and the dust. Sweet in the mouth is the taste of evil-doing; how the tongue cherishes it! How he treasures it, loth to lose the secret pleasure of his palate! But once let that food reach his belly, not the gall of adders is so venomous. The wealth he loved to swallow, disgorge he must; God will make his belly return it; poisonous as the asp's head or the viper's tongue were those juices he sucked, when he thought to enjoy streams of plenty; honey and cream should have been his in rich abundance.

Endlessly he shall pay for the wrong he did, plagued in the measure of his own false dealings. He who oppressed and robbed the poor shall never prosper with his ill-gotten fortunes; he, the insatiable, will not keep what he so coveted; he, that never had a crust to spare, will be stripped now of all his goods. Once so full fed, now he goes in need; stands in doubt, with distress crowding in on every side; ah for a meal to fill his belly with! But no, God's angry vengeance is let loose on him, raining

¹ Literally, 'the sons of my womb'. This may be taken as meaning 'sons of my body' (Job's description of his loneliness being only rhetorical; cp. I. 19), or as meaning 'sons of the same mother as myself'.

² In the Latin version, 'fools', in the Hebrew text, 'little children'. ³ The Hebrew text appears to run: 'To my skin, to my flesh, my bones cling; I have escaped by the skin of my teeth'. It is difficult to see how the English phrase (derived from this passage) fits in here.

⁴ 'Slander me'; literally, 'eat my flesh', an idiom well known in Aramaic, found also in Hebrew here and in Ps. 26. 2. ⁵ The word celte, said to mean 'a chisel', does not occur anywhere else in Latin literature, and is thought by some to be a copyist's error in our Bibles for certe: 'Upon tablets of lead, or perhaps upon flint'.

In the Hebrew text, there is possibly an allusion to the filling in of sculptured letters with lead. ⁶ In the Hebrew text, it is the Vindicator himself, not Job, who will 'stand up over the dust hereafter'.

⁷ The first part of this verse is unintelligible in the Hebrew text; it appears to mean 'And after (or, afterwards) they will strip my skin, this'. Probably the reading is corrupt, but the other versions do not bear out the sense given by the Latin. ⁸ In my flesh; literally, 'from my flesh', which some would interpret as meanings, 'deprived of my flesh'. ⁹ v. 27. 'Something other than myself'; literally, 'a stranger'. The end of the verse, in the Hebrew text, reads 'My inmost thoughts die away in my bosom'.

down all its weapons; shuns he the steel, to the bow of bronze he falls a prey. Bright and bitter the drawn sword threatens;
 about him, dread warriors come and go.¹ He hides away, where thick darkness broods over him;² straightway a fire no human hand has kindled threatens to devour him; woe betide any that would take refuge in that dwelling! Heaven will reveal the story of his crimes, earth itself rise in revolt against him; all the promise of his race will be laid bare and torn away, in that hour of the Lord's vengeance.³

Such is the lot God sends to the wicked, such their divinely appointed doom.

21 But Job answered: Listen, do but listen to me, and then, if you will,
 repent of your charity; let me have my say, and then mock on. It is not as if I bear a grudge against man; I have better reason than that to be indignant. Mark my complaint well, and you shall be astonished, hold your breath⁴ in amazement, as I too tremble with dismay at the thought of it.

How is it that godless men live on, meet with advancement, enjoy their riches undisturbed? Long they live, to see their posterity thrive about them, kinsmen and grandsons thronging all around. Safe and sound their dwelling-place; God's scourge passes them by; never bull of theirs failed to gender, cow to calve; blithe as lambs the little children go out to play; everywhere is tambour and harp-playing, everywhere the pipe's merry note. So, full of ease, their life passes, and they go down at last without a struggle to the grave.

And these are the men who bade God keep his distance from them, refused to learn his will;⁵ what right had he, the Omnipotent, to their obedience, what advantage would they gain by offering prayer to him? These are the godless folk whose counsel I must shun because they cannot command their own good fortune! Tell ¹⁷ me, how often in very deed are the hopes of the wicked extinguished, engulfed by the flood? Does God's vengeance often deal out misfortune to them, sweeping ¹⁸ them away like chaff before the wind, ashes beneath the storm?

But perhaps God is reserving for ¹⁹
 the children punishment of their father's sins?
 Nay, let the sinner himself feel the retribution when it comes; his own eyes must see ²⁰ the blow fall, his own lips drink in the divine vengeance! Little he cares what befalls his posterity after he is gone, though ²¹ halved be the time of its continuance.

The God that passes judgement on ²² angels needs none to instruct him!⁶ Here ²³ is one man goes to his death sound and strong, rich and happy, well covered with ²⁴ flesh, his bones full of marrow; another, ²⁵ all misery and poverty, and he, no less than ²⁶
 the other, has dust for bed, worms for coverlet.

Spare me those thoughts I know already, ²⁷ those reasons that would crush me! What ²⁸ becomes of the tyrant's palace, of the evildoer's home, at last? Ask any wayfarer ²⁹ (you say) that knows them, and you shall hear the same account of the matter: The ³⁰ rogue's villainy is being reserved for future punishment, he is being slowly drawn on to his doom. Fools, how can anyone bring ³¹ home his guilt to him now, punish the wrong he did? He is being slowly drawn ³² on to his tomb, where he shall wait on in the ranks of the dead; made welcome in the ³³ dark valley,⁷ whither all men shall follow, as numberless that went before him.

Vain is all your consolation, while the ³⁴ answer you give me matches so ill with truth.

22 Then answered Eliphaz the The-manite: A man cannot hope to ² plead God, even a man of perfect wis-

¹ This sentence has, in the original, no subject. The Hebrew text is usually interpreted as referring to the act of drawing the arrow out of a wound. ² Literally, 'all darkness is concealed in his hidden things'.

³ 'The promise of his race'; literally, 'the bud of his house', a phrase not elsewhere paralleled. 'Be laid bare'; in the Hebrew text, 'go into exile'. ⁴ Literally, 'put your hands on your mouths'.

⁵ vv. 14-33. The interpretation here given to this passage is designed to make Job's remarks consistent with each other and with his general line of argument. Several of them would appear at first sight (especially as read in the Latin version) to favour the notion that God inflicts signal punishment on evil-doers. But it seems clear that these do not reflect Job's own sentiments; they are an ironical presentation of his opponents' point of view, e.g., verse 16 and the first half of verse 19.

⁶ It is hard to see how this verse fits into the context, and some think it has been misplaced. The idea seems to be that Job's comforters are offering an apology for the Providential order such as God himself would not approve of.

⁷ The Latin here gives the strange rendering, 'the gravel of Cocytus'. In pagan mythology, Cocytus was a river flowing through the underworld.

3 dom. Just though thou be, how is God the 4 better for knowing thou art just? Can 5 stainless life of thine advantage him? Or 6 dost thou think that fear of thee will per-7 suade him to appear in court, and prove 8 thee in the wrong?¹ Must he browbeat 9 thee over a long record of guilt,² over many 10 heinous deeds done; remind thee of the 11 usurer's pledge needlessly taken, of thy 12 brother left to go naked while thou hadst 13 his garment by thee, of water grudged to 14 thirsty men, bread refused to the hungry?
 15 Must he tell the story of a rich tyrant that 16 had lands and held to them; of widows sent 17 away without redress, orphans left without 18 support, through thy means? Must he say, 19 that is why thou art caught in the snare, 20 dismayed by sudden peril, left benighted 21 when thou thoughtest to see day, over-22 whelmed by the unexpected flood?

23 Bethink thee, God is high as heaven 24 itself, reaches beyond the uttermost star.
 25 Wouldst thou tell us that he has no know-26 ledge of what passes, that he issues his de-27 cree blindly, gives no heed to our mortal 28 doings, there where he walks above hea-29 ven's vault, all wrapped in cloud? That 30 were to follow old paths of error, trodden 31 long ago by impious feet. Snatched away 32 before their time were the men that rea-33 soned so; a flood engulfed the solid ground 34 beneath them. These, beyond doubt, were 35 men who bade God keep his distance from 36 them, thought the Omnipotent could give 37 them no aid, when he had filled their abode 38 with blessings! Not for nothing do I shun 39 their counsels! Here was a sight to make 40 the just triumphant, make innocent folk 41 laugh aloud in scorn, to see how their proud hopes vanished, and all that was left of them perished in the flames.³

Fall in with the Lord's ways, and be his friend; thou shalt be well rewarded. Let his lips be thy oracle, his words written on thy heart. Turn back to the Almighty for thy healing, and rid thy dwelling-place of guilt. Firm rock thou shalt have for shifting dust, and for firm rock streams of gold;
 the Almighty himself will be thy shield, and silver thou shalt never lack.⁴ In those omnipotent arms thou shalt rest content, thy face upturned towards God himself, thy prayer heard as soon as offered, thy vows paid as soon as due; all thy desire thou shalt have, and all thy paths will be sunshine. He that was once brought low shall be high in renown; the downcast eye shall win deliverance.

But the innocent shall be kept safe; in a pair of clean hands there was safety ever.⁵

23 But Job answered: And still I repine bitterly as ever, no groaning too heavy for the wounds I bear. Ah, if I could but find my way to God, reach his very throne, in reproachful accents plead my suit before him, and learn what he would say in his defence, grasp the meaning of it! Will he match his strength with mine, use all his majestic power to crush me? The justice of my cause once made known to him, I should triumph at last.

But no; travel I east or west, I find no trace of him, turn I north or south, I have no skill to catch sight of him. And he, all the while, keeps watch over my doings, tests me like gold the fire assays; he knows how close I have kept to the path he traced

¹ vv. 2-4. The Hebrew text is ordinarily understood as meaning: 'Can a man render useful service (by living an innocent life) to God? Is a wise man of service to him (or perhaps, to himself)? Can the Almighty take any pleasure in the fact that thou art upright, is it any gain to him if thou followest honest paths? Is it because of thy fear of him that he finds fault with thee, comes to court as thy adversary?' But, although this apparently gives a satisfactory account of the various sentences, it leaves an unbridgeable gulf in logic between verse 3 and verse 4. The Latin version yields a greatly preferable sense: 'God cannot be expected to answer Job's summons to trial, since he has no motive, whether of interest or of fear, for doing so.'

² The Latin version begins the sentence with the words 'Is it not rather because of . . .'. But this seems due to an erroneous apprehension of the Hebrew original. The Hebrew text reads simply, 'Are not thy wickednesses many and thy faults endless?' This is generally understood as a charge brought by Eliphaz against Job; but such a sudden attack on Job's character would be out of keeping with the rest of the chapter, and indeed of the book. Verses 5-11 fall better into place if they are understood as an imaginary address by Almighty God to an imaginary sinner (cf. Ps. 49. 16-21).

³ vv. 15-20. Some definite historical situation seems to be envisaged, but it cannot be identified with certainty. The Deluge has been suggested in view of verse 16, the destruction of Sodom in view of verse 20; the death of Core and his companions (Num. 16) is also a possible solution.

⁴ vv. 24, 25. The Hebrew text here is usually interpreted, 'Put (thy) gold-ore upon the dust, and thy (gold of) Ophir upon the rocks of the valleys; then the Almighty will be thy gold-ore . . .', &c. The Latin version has probably failed to recognize the word for gold-ore, rendering it in one verse 'flint-stone' and in the other 'against thy enemy'. But it is doubtful whether our present Hebrew text is genuine; it is not easy to see why Eliphaz should encourage a man who has just lost all his possessions to throw away his gold.

⁵ vv. 29, 30. The sense of the Hebrew text here is doubtful.

for me, swerving never aside, true to every command of his, every utterance of his cherished in my heart. But what of that? He reigns without a rival, none can cross his purposes; he does what likes him best. His will once fully accomplished in me, he has many another like purpose to fulfil. What wonder if I am all adread in his presence, if the thought of him racks me with terror? It is God that melts my heart with fear, his omnipotence that daunts me; that thought unmans me, not the surrounding darkness, not the mists which hide my view.¹

24 Since he, who is omnipotent, determines every event, how is it that those who know him wait in vain for his doom to fall?²

Here are men that alter their neighbour's landmark, drive stolen cattle to pasture, rob the orphan of his ass, take the widow's ox in pawn, shoulder the poor aside, conspire to oppress the friendless; leave others to make their living as best they may, like the wild ass in the desert, waking betimes to scrape food for hungry mouths at home. Reap they the field that is none of theirs, strip they the vineyard wrongfully seized from its owner; let men go bare, their garments snatched away, defenceless against cold and rain on the mountain-side, so that they are fain to hug the rocks for lack of shelter. Their violence robs the helpless children, despoils the poor and simple; back and side must go bare, and never a stalk left for hungry men to glean; nor any vintager of theirs lies down between the rows at noon, but goes thirsty!³ A cry goes up from the city streets, where wounded men lie groaning; tell me, does not God allow it to pass unheeded?⁴

How they shun the light, these rebels who ignore God's precepts, leave his paths untrodden! The murderer must be stirring before daybreak, to catch his helpless prey, or prowl, as the thieves prowl, at night. For darkness, too, the adulterer⁵ waits, no eye must scan his muffled features; under cover of darkness he will break into the house, to keep the tryst made yesterday; no daylight for him. To him, the first flush of dawn is death's shadow; deep gloom is the sunshine he walks by.

Light as foam on the waters, nor light the doom, surely, that awaits him on earth; not for him the vineyard's sunny slope! Swift as snow melts under the noon-day heat, let his guilty soul pass to the grave, unpitied, with worms for its boon-companions, forgotten, overthrown like an unfruitful tree! The childless woman was his prey;⁶ in vain the widow looked to him for mercy; now, surely, God has pulled the tyrant down; firm he has stood, but now he despairs of life itself! Time for repentance God gave him, by his pride misused, but ever on his doings kept a watchful eye; now, their brief renown over, such men must pass, as all things pass, into the dust, be carried off, swept away like ears of corn!⁶

But no, never the day comes! Who dares give me the lie, challenge me in God's sight?⁷

25 Then answered Baldad the Suhite: Ay, but what power, ay, but what terrors he wields, who reigns peacefully, there in high heaven! He, the lord of countless armies, he, whose light dazzles every eye! And shall man, born of woman, win his suit, prove his innocence, when he is matched with God? Dim shews the moon, tarnished the stars, under his eye; and what is man but waste and worm in his presence?

26 But Job answered: Bravely spoken, for a cause that so much needed it! That arm of thine ever upheld the weak.

¹ v. 17. The Hebrew text is here obscure, and perhaps corrupt. ² Literally, 'Times are not hidden from the omnipotent, but those who know him are ignorant of his days'.

³ vv. 2-11. The Latin version is here in disagreement, occasionally, with the Hebrew text, which is itself very difficult. It is not always easy to see whether the subject of a particular sentence is the wicked, or their victims.

⁴ It seems necessary to understand the end of this verse as a question; otherwise the Latin faulty contradicts the meaning, both of the Hebrew text and of the Septuagint Greek, nor can we easily suppose it to have been Job's opinion. ⁵ 'Was his prey'; the Latin word used can mean either 'fed' or 'fed upon'.

⁶ vv. 18-24. These verses, with their threat of calamity to the wicked, should perhaps be understood as an ideal consummation which, as verse 25 points out, does not seem to be verified in fact. Their exact sense is largely open to dispute.

⁷ The meaning of the Hebrew text is probably, 'reduce my words to nothingness'.

3 Brave advice offered in that great discernment of thine, to one who so lacks wisdom!
 4 A fine lesson thou hast read him, the God who gave thee breath!
 5 Sure enough, there is none but trembles before him; even the old heroes, and those who share their dwelling-place under the lower depths; bare to his eyes is the place of shadows, oblivion lies revealed. He it was spread out the northern skies over emptiness, poised earth on nothing; cloud-bound he holds the rain, that else would spill on earth all at once, veiled and shut in with cloud his unseen throne. While day and night last, the waters keep the bounds he has decreed for them; the very pillars of heaven tremble awe-struck at his will. His the power, his the wisdom, that drew the seas together all in a moment, and the rebellious dragon struck down; his the spirit that clothed the heavens, his the hand that drew yonder writhing serpent from the womb.¹ Here is but a small part of his doings, here is but the whisper of his voice; who dares to contemplate the thunder of his full magnificence?

2 27 And thus Job continued to lay bare his thought: As sure as he is a living God, he, the omnipotent, who so refuses me justice, who makes my lot in life so bitter; while life is in me, while he still grants me breath, never shall these lips justify the wrong, never this tongue utter the lie! Gain your point with me you shall not; I will die sooner than abandon my plea of innocence. That claim, once made, I will not forgo; not one act in all my life bids conscience reproach me. Count him a knave that is my enemy, every detractor of mine a friend of wrong!²

(What is the sinner's hope worth after all his greedy getting, when God takes the life away from him?)³ In that hour of need, his cry for reprieve will go unheard; he cannot go on for ever basking in the Almighty's favour, calling God to his aid. Now be God's hand laid bare, now let me acknowledge openly the counsels of omnipotence! Not one of you but knows the truth of it already; yet one and all you must be urging a false plea, without the need for it!

What spoil, after all, does God grant to the wicked? From his almighty hand, what abiding possession does the man of violence receive? Sons beget he never so many, what avails it, when the sword overtakes them, and their children in turn must go wanting bread, when the plague gives all the rest of his line their burial, and never a widow to bemoan them? What avails it, to heap up silver like the sand, buy fine clothes, too, and think such treasures cheap as dirt, if more upright men than he, more innocent than he, must have the wearing of those clothes, share out that silver at last? Light as the moth he builds; not so frail a shelter the vineyard-watcher weaves about him. Rich he is laid to rest, but nothing takes with him; rich he shall wake no more.⁴ Helpless in the flood, driven in darkness by the storm, carried off, as if sirocco or whirlwind had swept him away, he is routed before the pitiless onslaught, hands clapped in triumph, tongues hissing in derision as he goes.)

¹ 'Drew... from the womb'; in the present Hebrew text, 'pierced through'; see Is. 51. 9, where the same verb is used. Here, as in that passage, the power of the sea is allegorically described as a proud monster, the darkness of night (perhaps) as a writhing serpent.

² This verse may be taken, instead, with what follows, and interpreted as meaning, 'May the sinner, the wrong-doer, fare as I would have my own enemies and detractors fare'.

³ vs. 8-23. These verses, or most of them, are thought by some scholars to have been accidentally misplaced, belonging properly to Baldad's speech in ch. 25, or to some other utterance by Job's interlocutors. It is undeniable that upon first reading they seem to tell against, not for, the point of view Job has hitherto supported; and it is curious that Job should be the speaker all through chapters 26-31 inclusive. If our present text is accurate, the following observations may be made on it. Verses 8-24 are probably concerned only with what happens after the sinner's death; Job's complaint has been that the sinner is not punished during life. Possibly, then, Job's speculations here take on a new turn. Still maintaining that virtue is not rewarded or vice punished in this life (and therefore that his own sufferings do not prove him guilty) he asks what is the value of the brief prosperity which ends with the sinner's lifetime (cf. Lk. 12. 16-21). The secret of life must, after all, be something other than the acquisition of worldly advantage. What that secret is, he proceeds to examine in the next chapter.

⁴ Literally, in the Latin version, 'The rich man when he goes to sleep will take nothing with him; he will open his eyes and find nothing'. The Hebrew text seems to mean, 'Rich he shall lie down, and it shall not continue (or, he shall never lie down again); he will open his eyes, and—nothing'. Conceivably this refers to a situation in which ruin comes upon the sinner in a single night. But more probably it refers to his death, and the words 'he will open his eyes' are only figurative.

28 Where, then, does wisdom lie? ¹ Easy to trace where the veins of silver run, where gold-ore is refined, where iron is dug from the depths of earth, and rocks must be melted to yield copper. See how man has done away with the darkness, has pierced into the very heart of things, into caves under ground, black as death's shadow! Where yonder ravine cuts them off from the shepherd-folk, the miners toil, forgotten; lost to all track, far from the haunts of men.² That earth, from whose surface our bread comes to us, must be probed by fire beneath, till the rocks yield sapphires, and the clods gold. Here are passages no bird discovers in its flight, no vulture's eye has seen; that never gave roving merchant³ shelter, or the lioness a lair. Boldly man matches himself against the flint, uproots the mountain, cuts channels through the rock, where things of price have dazzled his eye; narrowly he scans the river's depths, and brings to light all they hide. But wisdom, tell me where to search for wisdom; tell me in what cache discernment lies?

How should man set a price on it? This earth our pleasant home, yields no return of it; Not here, cries the abyss beneath us, and the sea echoes, Not here. Not for pure gold is it bartered, or weighed against silver in the balance; not the bright wares of the Indies, nor jewel of sardonyx, nor sapphire can vie with it; it is not to be matched with treasures of glass or gold, rivalled by all the goldsmith's workmanship. Do not talk of coral or of crystal;⁴ for wisdom you must make deeper search still; with wisdom the topaz from Ethiopia and the finest gold-leaf cannot compare.

Whence, then, does wisdom come to us; where is discernment to be found? That is the secret kept hidden from beast on earth and bird in heaven; the shadow-world of death claims no more than to have heard the rumour of it. Only God knows the way to it, only God can tell where it lies, he whose view reaches to the world's ²⁴ end, sees all that passes under the wide heavens. He, when first he took scale and ²⁵ measuring-line to set wind and water their task, when he appointed a time for the ²⁶ rain's abating, and a track for the whistling storm, descried wisdom already; traced ²⁷ its plan, and set all in order, and mastered it.

To man, he has told this much, that ²⁸ wisdom is fearing the Lord; there lies discernment, in refusing the evil path.

29 And thus Job continued to lay ² bare his thought: Alas for the changes the months have brought with them! Alas for the old days, when God was my protector, when his light shone ³ above me, its rays guiding me through the darkness! Days of ripe manhood, when ⁴ God was my home's familiar guest, he, the ⁵ Almighty, at my side! I had my children still about me; the milk frothed in pools at ⁶ my feet, no rock so hard but my olives bathed it in oil. Went I to the city gate, ⁷ there was my seat ready for me in the open square; rose the young men to make place ⁸ for me, rose the aged to do me honour; nobles fell silent, and waited, finger on lip, ⁹ words failed the chieftains, and counsel ¹⁰ they gave no more.

None heard the fame of me then, but ¹¹ called me a happy man; none watched my doings then, but spoke in my praise. Poor ¹² man nor helpless orphan cried to me in vain; how they blessed me, souls reprieved ¹³ from instant peril; with what comfort the widow's heart rejoiced! Dutiful obser- ¹⁴ vance was still the vesture I wore, my robe and crown integrity; in me, the blind ¹⁵ found sight, the lame strength, the poor a ¹⁶ father. None so ready to give the stranger's cause a hearing, break open the fangs of the ¹⁷ wrong-doer and snatch the prey from his teeth.

¹ These five words do not occur in the original; they are supplied here so as to explain the course of the argument; cf. verse 12. ² In the Hebrew text, this verse runs 'The ravine divides (or, he divides the ravine) from the company of a foreign resident the forgotten ones from the foot they have languished from mankind they have wandered (or, tottered)'. The Latin version gives, 'The torrent divides from the exiled people those whom the foot of the poor man has forgotten, those who are far from the beaten track'. The guess of modern scholars which would identify the ravine as a pit-shaft, and sees a reference to miners swinging to and fro in hanging cages, does justice neither to the usage of words nor to the requirements of the context. The text is probably corrupt, but we may presume that it refers to the remoteness and hiddenness of mining operations, not to contemporary conditions of labour. ³ 'Roving merchant'; the word is of doubtful meaning in the original, and perhaps refers to wild beasts. ⁴ Literally, in the Latin version, 'things high and things jutting out'. In the Hebrew text, the second half of the verse refers to a third kind of jewel, perhaps pearls.

18 Here, thought I, I have built myself a nest to die in; here, like some palm-tree, 19 I shall defy the years, palm-tree that spreads out its roots to the river-bank, on 20 whose leaves lodges the dew; my fame never diminishing, never worn out the bow 21 I bear. How eagerly men hung upon my words, intent to learn what counsel I would 22 give, nor ventured to speak when I had done! A gracious influence my words fell, 23 like autumn rain or the spring showers on 24 lips athirst. Were they faint-hearted, they found me smiling still, and the encouragement of my glance never failed them.
 25 Deigned I to be their leader, the first place was mine; yet ever when I sat like a king with his retinue about him, I would comfort the mourner's tears.

30 And now? Now I am a laughingstock, even to younger men; a flock of such base breed as theirs sheep-dog 2 of mine never tended! So profitless their puny strength, I would have let them die 3 before ever they came to maturity.¹ Starve-ling creatures, they should browse in the waste, unkempt, haggard and woe-begone, 4 cropping mallow and tree-bark and juni-5 per-root for their diet, and making great hue and cry after such dainties, as they 6 pluck them from the hill-slopes! Barren ravine and cave and rock their dwelling-7 place, they were glad of so much shelter;
 a bramble thicket should be their welcome 8 refuge. A senseless and a nameless breed, 9 earth is well rid of them. O that I should be a song and a by-word on such lips as 10 these! That they loathe and shun me, and make bold to spit in my face, being what 11 they are! Now God has made me a mark for his archery, now he has put a bit in my 12 mouth; when my fair spring was overcast by calamity,² every passer-by might throw me down; like a flood they swept over 13 me, trampled down my path, took me unawares and overcame me, when there was 14 none to bring rescue. One breach made, one gate forced, they might fall upon me all at once, and add their weight to my misery.

All that I was, is gone, the ambition, the happiness that was mine swept away like clouds before the storm; my heart is dead within me, a prey to long despairs. By night, anguish racks my frame; sleepless the cares that consume me, their poison³ seems to eat away the very garments I wear, clings fast about me like the collar of my coat. No better I than mud in the streets, little thought of as dust or ashes;
 unheard I cry to thee, unregarded I stand in thy presence; so hardened is thy heart, so pitilessly thy blows fall upon me. Didst thou exalt me, lift me so high in air, only to hurl me down in ruin? I know well enough that thou wilt bring me to the grave at last;
 it is the home thou hast appointed for all living men; but surely thou dost not exert thy power only to destroy, surely thou hast mercy on the fallen? I myself know what it is to pity the afflicted, to shed tears over human need! But no, hope I for better things, I hope in vain; ever deeper the darkness shews to eyes straining for the light. Still my heart is in turmoil, greeted still by fresh despairs; I go mourning, my face blacker than ever the sun's heat made it, rise up in public, and claim audience for my wrongs; crying so dismally as if I had jackals⁴ for my brothers, ostriches for my company. And all the while, fever to dis-colour this flesh, to shrivel this frame!
 What wonder if all, with me, is mourning and lament, if the music of harp and flute is heard no more?

31 And this was a man that had bound his eyes over by covenant; never should even his fancy dwell upon the thought of a maid! Well I knew that God Almighty in high heaven would have neither part nor lot with me else; ruin for the sinner his doom is, disinheritance for the wrong-doer. Tell me, does not this God watch over every path I take, trace my footsteps one by one? Walk I by crooked ways, run I eagerly after false dealing, he can weigh my offence with true scales; let God himself bear witness to my innocence! Have I strayed from my

¹ Literally, 'they were thought unworthy of life itself'. Throughout this chapter, and notably in verses 5, 7, 11-13, 20, 24, the Vulgate differs considerably from the Hebrew, which is often difficult and perhaps corrupt.

² Literally, 'calamities arose at the right hand of me sprouting'. The Hebrew text is usually interpreted as meaning, 'the rabble rose up to attack me on my right hand'.³ Literally, 'their multitude'; the sense of the Hebrew text is quite uncertain here.

⁴ 'Jackals'; in the Latin text literally 'dragons'.

course; has my heart followed the lure of my eyes; are my hands stained with wrong? Then let another man enjoy the harvest I have sowed, then let my race be doomed to extinction! Have wives of woman entangled my heart; did I lie in wait under my neighbour's window? Then be my own wife another's whore, strangers be her bedfellows! That were sin in me, and foul wrong done; that fire, once lighted, will rage till all is consumed, never a crop shall escape it.

Did I refuse justice to man-servant of mine or woman-servant, when they had complaint to bring? Then it shall go hard with me when it is God's turn to pronounce judgement; how shall I meet his scrutiny, who fashioned in the womb this one and that, man and master alike? Did I deny some poor man the alms he craved, keep the widow waiting for her pittance, sit over my meal alone, and never an orphan boy to share it? That were an ill return for the loving care that has borne me company as I grew up from childhood, ever since I left my mother's womb.¹ Did I spurn the naked that were ready to perish of cold, too poor to find clothing; did I never earn thanks, from the back that went bare till fleece of my flock warmed it? Did I threaten the friendless, whenever I could secure judgement against them in the market-place? Then let shoulder of mine hang from shoulder-blade, every bone in my arm broken! Nay, but God's terrors overwhelmed, his majesty overbore me.

In wealth did I put my trust, hail the bright gold as my life's protector; doted I upon my great riches, upon all my toil had earned? When I gazed on the sun in its splendour, on the moon in her royal progress, did these things steal my heart away, so that mouth kissed hand in adoration? That were great wrong done, to deny the God who is higher than all. Did I triumph over a fallen foe, rejoice at his ruin; lend my lips to ill uses, cursing my enemy's life away? Rather, it was of myself men were fain to speak evil, men of my own household, and to their hearts' content.² Never had the stranger to lodge in the open, my doors were open to every wayfarer that passed.

Men are frail; does sin lie on my conscience undisclosed, does the memory of guilt rankle in my bosom? Was I daunted by fear of the throng, of my neighbours' contemptuous looks? Did I hold my tongue,³ and keep within doors? O that my cause might be tried; that he, the Almighty, would grant my request, that he, my judge, would write my record down; how proudly I would bear it with me, shoulder-high, wear it as a crown! I would proclaim it wherever I went, fit for a king's eyes to read. Can these lands of mine bear testimony against me, can their furrows tell a sad tale of harvests enjoyed, and no price paid for them, of labourers cruelly treated? Then thistles for wheat, thorns for barley may it yield me.

Ended herewith are the sayings of Job.

32 So they answered Job no more, those others, a man persuaded of his own innocence. But there was one who stood by in anger and thought scorn of them, Eliu the Buzite, son of Barachel, of Ram's kindred. Angry he was with Job, for claiming that God did him an injury, and thought scorn of those friends of his, that could find no reasonable answer, but were content to find Job a guilty man. Eliu, then, waited till Job had finished speaking; was he not younger than the rest? But when he found that the other three had no answer to give, he could contain himself no longer.

Thus, then, spoke Eliu the Buzite, son of Barachel: Late in time was I born, and you are older men than I; with bowed head I kept my own counsel, ready to listen, while old age spoke, and learn from you the garnered wisdom of years. But I see now that man speaks by inspiration; only the breath of the most High can grant discernment; long life does not make men wise, it is not always the aged that give true

¹ Literally, 'For mercy grew up with me from my childhood, and came out of my mother's womb with me'; the sense may be that Job himself was always a merciful man, but the parenthesis is awkward. There is no mention of mercy in the Hebrew text.

² Literally, 'If the folk of my tabernacle did not say, Who will give us of his flesh, that we may be glutted?' This is usually interpreted, in various ways, as if 'his flesh' could mean 'the dishes of meat which he provides', but this is very improbable. For 'eating a man's flesh' in the sense of traducing him, see 19. 22 above.

³ Literally, according to the Latin version, 'And did I not rather hold my tongue', but this obscures the sense of the passage.

10 award. So it is that I would fain have you 11 listen while I make known my thought to you. I have waited long on your words, 12 heard you out, while you searched about for reasons, attentive enough, while I still hoped to hear the truth from you; but no, not one of you has convinced Job, or an-13 swered his riddle. Do not flatter yourselves that you have tracked down the truth; God must put him down, not man.¹ Not against 14 me has he drawn up these pleadings of his;
 not with your shiftless answers will I meet him.

15 What, all abashed, these wise men, no answer ready, the words driven from their 16 lips? I have had enough of waiting for them to speak, and seeing them stand 17 dumb; I will take my turn at pleading, tell 18 out my thoughts. I am full of matter, in 19 labour with ripe utterance; fresh wine that has no vent will burst even a new wine-20 skin. Speak I must, if I would get relief, 21 unburden my lips of their answer. Human respect shall not daunt me; how should I 22 match man with God?² Uncertain my span of days; what if he should call me suddenly to account, he, my Creator?

3 33 Listen, then, Job, to my remonstrances, and hear me out; flows my speech free, tongue and throat are 3 loosed; here be plain words, uttered in all 4 honesty. A creature I; God's spirit made me, the breath of omnipotence woke me to 5 life; if answer thou hast, thou canst meet 6 me fearlessly, since God made us both, and 7 we were fashioned of one clay; here are no terrors to daunt thee, no threats to over-bear thee.

8 Openly thou hast said, with my own ears 9 to witness it, Innocent though I be of all 10 wrong, free from the stain of guilt, God has picked a quarrel with me; that is the reason, and no other, why he treats me as 11 an enemy, holds me so close a prisoner, and 12 watches me wherever I go. But there is no substance in thy plea; I tell thee, man cannot be matched with God. What, wouldst thou complain that he does not meet these charges of thine? Know, then, that God warns us once, but does not repeat his warning.³ Sometimes in visions of the night, when deep sleep falls upon men as they lie abed, he speaks words of revelation, to teach them the lesson they need.

 This is one means by which he will turn a man away from his designs, purge him of his pride; and so the grave is disappointed, the sword misses its prey. Or else he will use the pains of the sick-bed for a man's correction, and leave his whole frame wasted with disease.

Evil days, when he sickens at the thought of food, of all the dainties he once loved so well; when the flesh pines and the bones have nought to cover them, when death encroaches on life, and the powers of darkness daunt his spirits! Then it is an angel's⁴ task, as many angels there be, to interpret his need, and shew him where man's good lies; and the word of mercy will be spoken, Let be, the grave is not for him; I have found the secret of his ransoming;⁵ enough, now, torment has racked him, let him return to the vigour of his youth! So, God's pardon wooed and won, the sick man stands in his presence once more, all thankfulness, restored to favour. He turns to the bystanders and makes acknowledgement, A sinner I, no doubt but I have greatly offended, my punishment was less than I deserved! Now God has reprieved me from death's exile,
 I am to live still, and see the light.

Such mercy, not once or twice, God shews to man, rescuing him from the grave, rekindling the lamp of life for him.
 Listen to me, then, Job, and hear me out;
 make answer to me, if answer thou canst, for I would fain see thee acquitted. If an-12 swer thou hast none, listen to me in silence
 while I unfold the truth.⁶

¹ Literally, 'Lest perhaps you should say, We have found wisdom; God not man, has cast him away'. It is not clear whether the wisdom is that of Job or his friends, nor whether the second half of the verse is part of their supposed utterance.

² According to the Hebrew text, 'I cannot give flattering titles to men', a phrase which is repeated in the next verse, where the Latin has 'I do not know how long I shall last'.

³ The Hebrew text is usually interpreted as meaning, 'God warns us once and a second time (or, warns us in one of two ways) without our perceiving it'.

⁴ The word used in the Hebrew text may also be rendered, 'a messenger's'.

⁵ It is not certain here whether it is the angel that speaks, or God himself. In the Hebrew text, the first half of verse 25 reads 'Tender let his flesh be as the flesh of a child'.

⁶ vv. 27-33. Eliu does not, like the three friends, suspect Job of some special fault which has called down God's punishment upon him. He explains human suffering as sent by God not for vengeance but for correction. Only, since we are all sinners, we have to confess that our suffering was (incidentally) deserved.

34 And Eliu spoke on: A word for the wise; listen, you that are the world's sages; for food, the discerning palate, for wisdom, the discerning ear. Award we must give, this way or that; of two ways we must choose the better. Here is Job telling us that he is innocent, that God denies him his rights, judges him falsely, and plies him with punishment undeserved. Are there many such, many that thirst so greedily for the opportunity to cavil? What is this but to take part with wrong-doers, range himself among the impious, when he complains that there is no pleasing God, however ready a man is to do his will?

Listen to me, then, discerning hearts! From God, the Almighty, far removed is all wickedness, is every thought of wrong; he treats men only as they deserve, giving due reward to each. What, should Almighty God pervert justice by condemning the innocent? Is the care of the wide earth entrusted to some other; is not the maker of the world himself the world's judge? He has but to turn his thought towards men, reclaiming the spirit he once breathed into them, and all life would fail everywhere; mankind would return to its dust.

Is Job wise? Then let him listen to these words of mine, heed well my warning. Can there be healing,¹ where there is no love of right? Wouldst thou find fault with him whose justice runs so deep? He it is that says Traitor to a crowned king, and finds princes themselves guilty of rebellion. Nothing cares he for royal dignity, nor takes the oppressor's part against the friendless; are not all alike his creatures? Suddenly death falls; there is a stir among the people at midnight, and they pass by to see the tyrant carried out, and yet no hand laid on him!² Still God's eye watches over men, whatever they do, wherever they take their path; darkness is none, though it were the shadow of death itself, that can hide the wrong-doer; not at a time of his own choosing man meets God in judgement. A whole world of men he will destroy, and put others in their place; weary of their ill deeds, he bids darkness fall, and there is an end of them. In some place where many triumph at the sight, he beats down the rebels³ that hitherto of set purpose defied him, recked nothing of his commandments, till at last the despairing cry of poor folk unbefriended reached his ears. So long as he grants prosperity, redress there is none; it is when he frowns upon man or nation that no eye can meet him. Yet for a people's sins, he will appoint a false-hearted king to rule them.

Such is the testimony I give to God; now let us hear thine; shew me my error, and if thou canst prove that I have spoken amiss, I will speak no more. Perhaps thou thinkest it part of the punishment God asks of thee, hearing what it pains thee to hear? But it was thou, not I, wert the first to speak. If thou hast better advice to offer, say on.⁴

O for wise tongues to speak, for discerning ears to listen to me! This Job has spoken as fools do; no word of his that echoes true doctrine! Father,⁵ let Job be tried still, tried to the uttermost; have no patience with a man so perverse, that sets a crown on his sins by blasphemy! For a while, let us see all ease denied him; and let him cite God to judgement if he will!

35 And Eliu spoke on: What substance is there in this contention of thine, when thou claimest to have right on thy side against God? He cares nothing (so runs thy complaint) for man's good deeds; they are of no advantage to him, that he should care for sin of mine!⁶ Here is my answer, to thee, Job, and to thy friends alike. Look heavenward, mark how the skies tower above thee, and read thy

¹ Rather, according to the Hebrew text, 'governance'; Eliu's argument seems to be that right itself can have no other source than him who is the world's supreme Ruler. ² Literally, 'In a moment they shall die, and at midnight the people shall be stirred up, and they shall carry away the violent man without a hand'.

³ Literally, 'He smites them as if they were wicked in the dwelling-place of those who see'; it is probable that the text here is corrupt. ⁴ vv. 31-33. It is not easy to be certain what is the sense of the Latin version here. The Hebrew text differs from it considerably; but the interpretations given of this are so forced and so various as to make it doubtful whether the true reading has been preserved.

⁵ 'Father'; the Hebrew word so rendered in the Latin can also be interpreted, 'I would that . . .'. ⁶ Literally, 'For thou hast said, Thou (God) takest no pleasure in the right, or what advantage will it be to thee if I sin?'—it seems necessary to suppose that there is an ellipsis in the thought of the sentence here. The sense of the Hebrew text is doubtful.

6 lesson there. Multiply thy wrong-doing as 7 thou wilt, no sin of thine can harm or touch 8 him; be honest as the day, no gift thou 9 makest him, he is none the richer for thy 10 pains. Only to thy fellow man thy malice 11 does a hurt; only Adam's children profit 12 by thy uprightness.

13 . . . Cries and groans there are in plenty 14 when oppression abounds, when tyranny 15 holds unchecked sway;¹ Where is God?
 16 men ask; yet never did they seek to find him when he brought triumph in the hour of distress, the God who teaches them such lessons as he never gave to beast or bird.
 Only then, only when the wicked lord it over them, men cry out, but their cry goes unheard; should God concern himself with these random complaints, he, the Almighty, examine their pleadings one by one? Nay, when he seems to take no heed, submit thyself to his judgement and await his hour; thy present sufferings do not be-token his anger, he is not taking vengeance to the full.

16 See, then, how all Job's utterance misses the mark; glib words with no tincture of knowledge!

2 36 And still Eliu would have his say:
 3 Bear with me a little while I de-4 clare my thought to thee; I have more to 5 say yet on God's behalf. From a deep 6 source I will draw my reasons, proving 7 him, my Maker, to be just; here is no de-8 lusive eloquence, the full truth shall be 9 made known to thee. He, the all-powerful, 10 does not grudge men power; it is only to 11 the wicked he denies his aid; the friendless 12 shall have redress. Never from the just is his favour withdrawn; a royal throne is theirs for ever, so high he exalts them. If he should leave them in chains, caught in the toils of sore need, it is but to apprise them of their own ill deeds, their own tyrannous deeds; he will speak home to them for their correction, warn them to turn back from their guilty ways. Hear they and heed, they shall live long in ease and renown; if hear they will not, it is the sword's point for them, to their last gasp fools still. It is the cunning, the false-hearted, that are God's sworn enemies;

 from them no cry comes when the chains close about them; the storm sweeps them away, forgotten in death as the temple minions are forgotten;² it is the friendless he rescues in their need, speaks home to them through the afflictions they endure.
 From the pit's mouth, where the ground seems lost under thy feet, he will bring thee out into full freedom; thou shalt take thy ease at a table loaded with dainties.

Is sentence passed on thee such as rebels undergo? Thou shalt have justice yet, and a true award. Never let the thought that God is angry lure thee into tyranny and corruption; lay aside thy greatness, forbear to oppress, away with the body-guard which attends thee; put an end to the dark time when nations must march under thy orders. Do not yield to the rebellious mood thou hast cherished since affliction came upon thee.³

God, that is so great and powerful, man's sovereign teacher, how should anyone fathom his designs, or charge him with injustice? Bethink thee, how high beyond thy thought are those creatures of his which men praise; how mortals see, but see, like mortals, from afar. Truly there is no measuring God's greatness, no reckoning his length of days. He hoards up the raindrops, or showers them down in full flood from the cloud-fountains that curtain us overhead. With those clouds, when it is his pleasure, he spreads his pavilion, flashes his lightning on high, brings darkness on the depths of the sea. Has he not a whole world to rule, a whole race of mortals to supply with food? Now he hides the light away with the shadow of his hand, now he bids it shine out again, as if to shew a friend at his side that he is the owner of it, that he can reach its high fastness when he will.

37 What wonder if my heart trembles and fails me at the thought?
 Listen to the bruit of it, the voice that speaks amid such terrors, the dread accents

¹ At verse 9, there is such a sudden break in the argument of the chapter that it is difficult to believe the text has come down to us without omission. In the following verse, 'brought triumph in the hour of darkness' is literally 'gave songs in the night'.

² It is doubtful whether the second half of this verse has been correctly transmitted to us. If it has, the enemies of God are perhaps compared to the temple-prostitutes of heathen worship as persons unlikely to beget any posterity.

³ cc. 16-21.

Throughout this passage, both the Hebrew text and the Latin version are hopelessly obscure.

3 of that utterance! Under what part of 4 heaven, into what corner of earth does he not look, do not his lightnings flash? Then what a crash resounds, the magnificent peal of his thunder; a voice heard, and 5 none can tell whence it comes! God's voice in the thunder, a marvel worthy of him, whose deeds are so great and so un-searchable.

6 He it is that bids the snows fall over earth, and winter shower, and his fierce 7 storms of rain. No hand of man but is shut up close now under his seal, that owns him 8 Master-workman of all; cowers the beast in its lair, or lurks in its cave; from his treasure-house in the north, tempest comes 10 and cold. At God's breath the frost binds fast, till he bids the waters flow again in plenty. And now the crops must have rain; 11 far and wide the clouds scatter their rays of hope; this way and that they turn at the guidance of his will, to do their appointed 13 task on earth, among distant tribes, or here in his own land, let his mercy bid them appear where it may.

14 Matter enough, Job, for thy heeding!
 Halt where thou standest, and consider the 15 marvellous acts of God. Canst thou tell us when it was God bade the rain bring hope 16 to us from those clouds of his, tell us the course of their journeyings? Is thy know-17 ledge so perfect? See if thy garments do not cling warm about thee when the south 18 wind cheers the earth! And was it with help of thine God fashioned the heavens, 19 firm as cast bronze? Tell us, what words we shall use to him, we, shut up in our 20 darkness? What messenger shall deliver my complaint to him, a human messenger that will bring on himself only ruin?

21 Light fails men's eyes; all of a sudden,
 the air is thick with clouds; then a breath 22 of passing wind has driven them away! As well search for the treasures of the north, as for the majestic praise which is God's 23 due; find speech worthy of it we cannot, so great he is in strength, so prudent in counsel, so faithful in right dealing, past 24 all that tongue can tell. Well may men fear him; none that think themselves wise but will tremble to meet his look.

38 Then, from the midst of a whirlwind, the Lord gave Job his an-2 swer: Here is one that must ever be clouding the truth of things with words ill 3 considered! Strip, then, and enter the lists; it is my turn to ask questions now, 4 thine to answer them. From what vantage-point wast thou watching, when I laid the foundations of the earth? Tell me, whence 5 comes this sure knowledge of thine? Tell me, since thou art so wise, was it thou or I designed earth's plan, measuring it out 6 with the line? How came its base to stand so firm; who laid its corner-stone? To me, 7 that day, all the morning stars sang together, all the powers of heaven uttered their joyful praise. Was it thou or I shut in 8 the sea behind bars? No sooner had it broken forth from the womb than I dressed 9 it in swaddling-clothes of dark mist, set it 10 within bounds of my own choosing, made fast with bolt and bar; Thus far thou shalt 11 come, said I, and no further; here let thy swelling waves spend their force.

Dost thou, a mortal, take command of 12 the day's breaking, and shew the dawn its appointed post, twitching away earth's 13 coverlet, scaring away the ill-doers? The dawn, that stamps its image on the clay of earth; stands there, flung over it like a gar-15 ment,² taking away from the ill-doers the darkness that is their light, so that all their power goes for nothing. Didst thou ever 16 make thy way into the sea's depths, walk at thy ease through its hidden caverns?
 When did the gates of death open to thee, 17 and give thee sight of its gloomy threshold?
 Nay, hast thou viewed the whole surface 18 of earth itself? Tell me, if such knowledge is thine, all its secrets; where the light 19 dwells, where darkness finds its home; hast thou followed either of these to the 20 end of its journey, tracked it to its lair?
 Didst thou foresee the time of thy own 21 birth, couldst thou foretell the years of life that lay before thee?

Hast thou found thy way in to see the 22 chambers where snow and hail lie stored, my armoury against the times of stress, 23 when there are wars to be fought, battles to be won? Tell me by what means the 24

¹ According to the Hebrew text, this verse should begin, 'He loads the clouds with moisture'. 'Their rays of hope'; literally, 'their brightness', which is usually interpreted of the lightning, but the allusion seems out of place here, and also in verse 15 below. Throughout this passage, verses 3-12, the Hebrew text is difficult of interpretation. ² The grammar of the Hebrew text is obscure; it runs, literally, 'It turns about as clay (of?) the signet-ring; they stand like a garment'.

light is scattered over earth, the heat dif-25 fused; tell me what power carved out a channel for the tempestuous rain, a vent 26 for the echoing thunderstorm, that they should fall on some lonely desert where 27 foot of man never trod, water those trackless wastes, and make the green grass 28 spring? What sire gendered the rain, or the drops of dew; what mother's womb 29 bore the ice, the frost that comes from heaven to make water hard as stone, imprison the depths beneath its surface?

31 Is it at thy command the glittering bright Pleiads cluster so close, and Orion's 32 circlet spreads so wide? Dost thou tell the day star when to shine out, the evening star when to rise over the sons of earth?¹ 33 Is it thine to understand the motions of the heavens, and rule earth by their influence?
 34 Can thy voice reach the clouds, and bid 35 their showers fall on thee; canst thou send out lightnings that will do thy errand, and 36 come back to await thy pleasure? What power gives either man's heart its pre-science, or the cock its sure instinct,² 37 knows all the motions of heaven, and lulls the music of the spheres?³ When was it 38 that earth's dust was piled, and the solid ground was built up?

39 Is it thou or I that finds the lioness her prey, to satisfy those hungry whelps of 40 hers, where they lie in rocky caves, their lurking-places? Which of us feeds the 41 ravens? Is it not to God their nestlings cry so shrilly, homeless for want of food?

39 Not thine to know when the wild goats give birth on their high crags, to watch the hinds in their throes; 2 count the months while they carry their young, and know the time of their delivery.
 3 Without thy aid they travail; born of those 4 pangs, the calves are soon weaned, and make for the pastures, go out to return no 5 more. Who gives the wild ass untram-6 melled liberty to roam the wilderness, and 7 make the salt plains his dwelling-place; to spurn the din of cities, no driver crying 8 after him, and look about him at the slopes where he feeds, all that green world his pasturage? Canst thou tame the wild ox⁴ 9 to thy service, feed him at thy stall, bind 10 him to the plough with thongs and lead him out to break clods in the valley?

 Wouldst thou trust that great strength of 11 his to do thy work for thee, bring in thy 12 harvest and fill thy threshing-floor?

Here is the ostrich, of one feather with 13
 heron and hawk, yet she will leave her eggs 14 on the bare earth; and canst thou give warmth to the dust to hatch them?⁵ Heed- 15 less, though foot of man should trample or wild beast devour them, she steels herself 16
 to pity as if the brood was none of hers;
 throws away all her hopes in causeless alarm. God's will it was to deny her sense; 17 wisdom she might have none, though she 18 were swift, at need, to hoist her wings aloft, mocking the pains of horse and rider.

Ay, and what of the horse? Is it of thy 19 gift his great strength comes, was it thou didst caparison with him terrors?⁶ Thou 20 wilt not scare him away like a locust;
 fiercely he breathes, deeply he paws the 21 ground, bravely he prances, as he goes out to meet the shock of battle. Fear cannot 22 daunt him, nor the sword drive him back;
 clang quiver, let shield and spear dazzle as 23
 they may, he swallows up the intervening 24 distance, all heat and rage. Little reck's he of the trumpeter's blast; echoes exultantly 25
 the bugle's note, while he scents from afar
 the combat, hears the shouting of captains, and the din of armies.

Is it of thy devising the hawk grows full- 26 fledged, in time to spread her wings for the southward journey? Is it at thy bidding 27 the eagle soars, to make her eyrie in the heights, cave and crag and inaccessible rock 28 her familiar home, whence her far-seeing 29 eyes look round, searching for prey?
 Blood-thirsty her brood, and where the 30 carcase waits, waits she.

All this the Lord said to Job, and added 31 besides, What is this? One that would 32 match himself with God, so easily put down! Nay, God thou didst challenge,

¹ The constellations mentioned cannot be identified with certainty.

here by 'heart' and 'the cock' are variously interpreted by Hebrew scholars.

² The two words represented here by 'heart' and 'the cock' are variously interpreted by Hebrew scholars. ³ In the Hebrew text, 'Who is wise enough to count the stars, or can lay down the water-skins (or perhaps, the lutes) of heaven?' ⁴ Literally, in the Latin version, 'rhinoceros' here, and elsewhere 'unicorn'. The word occurs frequently in Scripture, but the exact meaning of it remains in dispute. ⁵ ov. 13, 14. The Latin here does not tally with the Hebrew text, the sense of which is by no means certain. ⁶ Literally, 'clothe his neck with neighings (or perhaps, with thunders)'.

33 God thou must refute. And thus Job made 34 the Lord answer: So vain a pleader, I have no suit to make; finger on lip I will listen.
35 Once and again I have spoken the word I would fain unsay; more I dare not.¹

40 And once more, from the midst of a whirlwind, the Lord gave Job his 2 answer: Strip, then, and enter the lists; it is my turn to ask questions, thine to impart 3 knowledge. My awards thou wouldst fain reverse; wouldst prove me unjust, to prove 4 thyself innocent; why then, let us see thee shew strength like the strength of God, let us hear thee thunder as God thunders.
5 Come, deck thyself with glory, up with thee to the heights; shew all thy splendours, robe thyself in dazzling array!
6 Scatter the proud in that indignation of thine, with thy frown abase the tyrant; 7 here is an oppressor for thee to thwart;
here is one that defies thee, crush him!
8 Bury them in the dust, one and all, hide 9 them from sight, deep in the abyss; then I will acknowledge thee for one whose own strength can bring him victory.

10 Here is Behemoth,² my creature as thou 1 art, fed on the same grass the oxen eat; yet what strength in his loins, what lustihood 2 in the navel of his belly! Stiff as cedar-wood his tail, close-knit the sinews of his 3 groin, bones like pipes of bronze, gristle 4 like plates of steel! None of God's works can vie with him, the maker of such a beast 5 has his sword ready for use;³ whole mountain-sides, the playground of his fellow 6 beasts, he will lay under tribute,⁴ as he lies there under the close covert of the marsh-7 reeds, thick boughs for his shadow, among 8 the willows by the stream. The flooded river he drinks unconcerned; Jordan itself 9 would have no terrors for that gaping mouth. Like a lure it would charm his eye, though it should pierce his nostrils with sharp stakes.⁵

Or Leviathan, wilt thou find a hook that 20 will draw him to land, a line that will hold his tongue fast? Canst thou ring him, or 21 pierce his jaw with a clasp? Will he importune thee with entreaties, or cajole thee with blandishments, till thou makest a 22 covenant that binds him to be thy servant for ever? Wilt thou make a plaything of 23 him, as if he were a tame bird, chain him up to make sport for thy maid-servants?
Is he to be divided up among fellow fisher-24 men, sold piece-meal to the merchants? Is that skin a spoil for the net, that head for 25 the fishermen's cabins? Do but try conclusions with him, and see if the memory of the combat does not keep thee dumb!
Fond hope, that must be dashed to the 26 ground for all to see it!

41 It is in mercy that I forbear to make him a plague for mankind.
But indeed, there is no resisting me, nor 2 can any deserve my thanks by lending me the aid I lacked; nothing on earth but is at my disposal. I give him no quarter, for all 3 his boastful, all his flattering words.⁶

Who can strip the skin of him, who can 4 penetrate into the cavern of his mouth, forcing the gates that guard it, the terrors 5 of his teeth? The body of him is like 6 shields of cast metal, scale pressing on scale, so close to one another as to leave no 7 vent between; so well joined that nothing 8 will part them. Let him but sneeze, the 9 fire flashes out; let him open his eyes, it is like the glimmer of dawn; flames come 10 from his jaws, bright as a burning torch, smoke from his nostrils, thick as the fumes 11 of a seething pot; his very breath will set 12 coals aflame, such fire issues from that mouth. What strength dwells in that neck 13

¹ vv. 31-35. In the Hebrew text, these are marked as the first five verses of chapter 40.

² Behemoth is usually identified with the hippopotamus, sometimes with the elephant; Leviathan with the crocodile, sometimes with the whale. But both may be allegorical representations of the hostile powers overcome by the Creator.

³ Literally, 'He is the beginning of the works of God; he who made him will bring near his sword', a phrase variously interpreted by commentators.

⁴ The Latin version represents the mountains as giving Behemoth grass, but the word used in the Hebrew text means produce of any kind, and it seems possible, in view of what follows, that mountain streams are referred to.

⁵ This seems to be the best way of taking the Latin; exactly the same expression is used in Judith 10. 17, and the river forms the natural subject of the sentence. The Hebrew text runs: 'By his eyes he captures him, by snares he pierces his nostrils'; and the words are commonly taken, not without hesitation, as alluding to the difficulty, or perhaps the ease, with which the animal is caught.

⁶ vv. 1-3. The Latin version here differs widely from the Hebrew text, which itself gives a questionable sense. If we follow the Latin it seems impossible to suppose that any creature in the natural order, such as the crocodile, is envisaged. But indeed there are many allusions in this chapter which cannot, without considerable ingenuity, be referred to the crocodile.

14 of his, what terrors play about him! Firm-set are the folds of his flesh, unyielding though a thunder-bolt should strike them;¹ 15 firm-set, too, is the heart of him, firm as 16 ever stone was, or smith's anvil. Rises he up, angels themselves are afraid, and take 17 sanctuary in their dread.² Sword-thrust, nor spear, nor breast-plate can hold their 18 own against him; to him, steel is but chaff, 19 bronze but touch-wood, nor fears he the 20 archer; sling-stones he counts as straw, as straw the hammer-blow, laughs at the 21 brandished spear. Sunlight flashes beneath him as he goes, a path of gold through 22 the slime;³ he makes the deep sea boil like 23 a pot where ointment simmers; how it shines in his wake, as though ocean itself had grown hoary with age!
 24 He has not his like among the strong 25 things of earth, that fearless nature, that heaven-confronting eye. Over all the pride of earth he reigns supreme.

42 And thus Job answered the Lord: 2 I acknowledge it, thou canst do all thou wilt, and no thought is too difficult 3 for thee. Here indeed is one that clouds over the truth with his ignorance! I have spoken as fools speak, of things far beyond 4 my ken. Henceforth it is my turn to speak, thine to listen; my turn to ask questions, 5 thine to impart knowledge! I have heard thy voice now; nay, more, I have had sight 6 of thee; now I am all remorse, I do penance in dust and ashes.⁴ 7 And now, his converse with Job finished, the Lord said to Eliphaz the Themanite, You have earned my displeasure, thou and these two friends of thine, by speaking amiss of me as my servant Job never did.

 To Job you must go for your ransoming, with seven bulls and seven rams to offer in burnt-sacrifice; he, my servant, shall intercede for you, and for his sake your folly shall be pardoned, that spoke amiss of me when he spoke the truth.

So away they went, Eliphaz the The-manite, Baldad the Suhite, and Sopbar the Naamathite, and did the Lord's bidding.
 For Job's sake the Lord pardoned them;
 and, as he prayed for these friends of his,
 the Lord relented at the sight of his penitence. So he gave back to Job twice over all that he had lost. Clansmen and clans-women and all his old acquaintances gathered about him now, and sat down as guests in his house, and made great ado bemoaning all the afflictions the Lord had sent him; not one of them but gave him presents, a sheep and a gold ear-ring apiece. A richer man the Lord made Job now than ever he had been in old days;
 fourteen thousand sheep he had, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she-asses. Seven 13 sons he had, and three daughters, the first he called Fair as the Day, and the second Sweet as Cassia, and the third Dark Eyelids.⁵ Nowhere might women be found 15 fair as Job's daughters, and each had the same patrimony as her brothers.

Job himself lived on for a hundred and 16 forty years, to see sons and grandsons and a new generation yet of his descendants; so he died at last as old men die, that have taken their full toll of the years.

¹ There is no reference to a thunder-bolt in the Hebrew text. In the following verse, it has 'nether mill-stone' instead of 'smith's anvil'. ² 'Take sanctuary'; literally, in the Latin version, 'purify themselves'. The Hebrew word used is commonly interpreted as meaning 'are bewildered' in this context; and the Hebrew word rendered 'angels' perhaps only means 'strong men'. ³ The Hebrew text is different here, and apparently compares the scales of Leviathan to potsherds. ⁴ The text of this passage is not above suspicion. Neither the beginning of verse 3 nor the end of verse 4 can be said to suit Job's own position; even if we regard them as quotations (the one from 38. 2 and the other from 40. 2) they have no obvious relation to the context. Nor is the sense of the contrast in verse 5 by any means clear. ⁵ 'Cassia'; an aromatic bark, perhaps cinnamon. 'Dark Eye-lids'; literally 'Pot of Antimony', which was used as a cosmetic.

THE BOOK OF PSALMS

1

BLESSED is the man who does not guide his steps by ill counsel, or turn aside where sinners walk, or, where scornful souls gather, sit down to rest; the man whose heart is set on the law of the Lord, on that law, day and night, his thoughts still dwell. He stands firm as a tree planted by running water, ready to yield its fruit when the season comes, not a leaf faded; all that he does will prosper. Not such, nor such the wicked; the wicked are like chaff the wind sweeps away. Not for the wicked, when judgement comes, to rise up and plead their cause; sinners will have no part in the reunion of the just. They walk, the just, under the Lord's protection; the path of the wicked, how soon is it lost to sight!

2

WHAT means this turmoil among the nations? Why do the peoples cherish vain dreams? See how the kings of the earth stand in array, how its rulers make common cause, against the Lord, and against the King he has anointed, crying, Let us break away from their bondage, rid ourselves of the toils! He who dwells in heaven is laughing at their threats, the Lord makes light of them; and at last, in his displeasure, he will speak out, his anger quelling them: Here, on mount Sion, my sanctuary, I enthrone a king of my own choice.

Mine to proclaim the Lord's edict; how he told me, Thou art my son; I have begotten thee this day. Ask thy will of me, and thou shalt have the nations for thy patrimony; the very ends of the world for thy domain. Thou shalt herd them like sheep¹ with a crook of iron, break them in pieces like earthenware. Princes, take warning; learn your lesson, you that rule the world. Tremble, and serve the Lord, rejoicing in his presence, but with awe in your hearts. Kiss the rod,² do not brave his anger, and go astray from the sure path. When the fire of his vengeance blazes out suddenly, happy are they who find their refuge in him.

¹ 'Herd them like sheep'; or, according to another reading, 'shatter them'.

² The word given in the Hebrew text should mean either 'purity', or 'the Son'.
³ All these titles prefixed to various psalms are very obscure, and there is little agreement about their meaning except that they refer to the musical and liturgical setting.

3

(A psalm David wrote, when he fled before his son Absalom.)

SEE how they surround me, Lord, my adversaries, how many rise up in arms against me; everywhere voices taunting me, His God cannot save him now. Yet, Lord, thou art my champion, thou art the pride that keeps my head erect. I have but to cry out to the Lord, and my voice reaches his mountain sanctuary, and there finds hearing. Safe in God's hand I lay down, and slept, and have awoken; and now, though thousands of the people set upon me from every side, I will not be afraid of them. Bestir thyself, Lord; my God, save me; thine to smite my enemies on the cheek, thine to break the fangs of malice. From the Lord all deliverance comes; let thy blessing, Lord, rest upon thy people.

4

(To the choir-master. On stringed instruments. A psalm. Of David.)

WHEN I call on thy name, listen to me, O God, and grant redress; still, in time of trouble, thou hast brought me relief; have pity on me now, and hear my prayer. Great ones of the world, will your hearts always be hardened,¹ will you never cease setting 4 your heart on shadows, following a lie? To the souls he loves, be sure the Lord shews wondrous favour; whenever I call on his 5 name, the Lord will hear me. Tremble, and sin no more; take thought, as you lie 6 awake, in the silence of your hearts. Offer sacrifices with due observance, and put 7 your trust in the Lord. There are many that cry out for a sight of better times; do thou, then, Lord, shew us the sunshine of 8 thy favour. Never did rich harvests of corn and wine bring gladness like the glad-9 ness thou puttest into my heart. Even as I lie down, sleep comes, and with sleep tranquillity; what need, Lord, of aught but thyself to bring me confidence?

5

(To the choir-master. On the flute.
 A psalm. Of David.)

2 LORD, listen to my plea, let me not sigh 3 in vain; pay heed to my cry of petition, my King, my God. To thee, Lord, my prayer goes up, early to win thy audience; 4 early in the morning I lay my petition 5 before thee and await thy pleasure. No evil thing claims thy divine assent; with 6 thee baseness cannot dwell; nor rebellion hold its ground at thy coming. Thou hatest 7 the wrongdoer, and wilt bring the liar to destruction; blood-thirsty and treacherous 8 men the Lord holds in abhorrence. I, then, encompassed by thy mercy, will betake myself to thy house, and in reverence of thee bow down before thy sanctuary.
 9 Lord, do thou lead me with faithful care; clear show the path, while I walk 10 beset by enemies. In their speech no truth can be found; their hearts are all treachery, their mouths gaping tombs; flattering is 11 ever on their lips. Thy scourge, O God!
 Cheat them of their hopes, cast them out in all their wickedness; have they not 12 defied thee? But for all those who trust in thee there is joy and everlasting triumph;
 welcome protection they have from thee, 13 true lovers of thy name. Lord, thou givest thy benediction to the just; thou dost throw thy loving-kindness about us like a shield.

¹ Our Hebrew text has, 'Will my honour always be turned into reproach?'

6

(To the choir-master. On stringed instruments.
 Over the octave. A psalm. Of David.)

LORD, when thou dost reprove me, let it not be in anger; when thou dost chastise me, let it not be in displeasure. Lord, pity me; I have no strength left; Lord, heal me; my limbs tremble; my spirits are altogether broken; Lord, wilt thou never be content? Lord, turn back, and grant a wretched soul relief; as thou art ever merciful, save me. When death comes, there is no more remembering thee; none can praise thee in the tomb. I am spent with sighing; every night I lie weeping on my bed, till the tears drench my pillow. Grief has dimmed my eyes, faded their lustre now, so many are the adversaries that surround me. Depart from me, all you that traffic in iniquity; the Lord has heard my cry of distress. Here was a prayer divinely heard, a boon divinely granted. All my enemies will be abashed and terrified;
 taken aback, all in a moment, and put to shame.

7

(A lament of David's, which he sang to the Lord because of Chus, the Benjaminite.)

O LORD my God, my confidence is in thee;
 save me from all my pursuers, and grant me deliverance: else must I fall a helpless prey to the lion, be torn in pieces, with none to bring me aid. O Lord my God, if I too have been at fault, if these hands are stained with guilt; if I have been a false friend, and not rather spared even those that wronged me, then indeed let some enemy overtake me with his relentless pursuit, trample me to earth, and level my pride with the dust! Lord, rise up in thy anger, countervail the malice of my enemies; bestir thyself, O Lord my God, in defence of the laws thou thyself hast given us. All the nations will gather about thee, if thou wilt come back to thy throne and rule them, the Lord judging the nations!
 Give me redress, Lord, in my uprightness, in all the innocence of my heart. Surely thou wilt put an end to the wrong-doing of the wicked, and prosper the innocent; no thought or desire of ours can escape the scrutiny of thy divine justice. From the Lord, refuge of true hearts, my protection comes. God judges ever true; day by day his indignation mounts up; if they do not repent, his sword will flash bright; he has bent and aimed his bow; deadly are the weapons he is preparing for them; he has barbed his arrows with fire. Here was a heart pregnant with malice, that conceived only spite, and gave birth only to empty promise! Here was one who dug a pit and sunk it deep, and fell into a snare of his own setting! All his spite will recoil on himself, all his violence will fall on his own head. I will ever thank the Lord for his just retribution, singing praises to the name of the Lord, the most High.

8

(To the choir-master. To the mood of the song,
The Wine-presses. A psalm. Of David.)

O LORD, our Master, how the majesty of thy name fills all the earth! Thy greatness is high above heaven itself. Thou hast made the lips of children, of infants at the breast,¹ vocal with praise, to confound thy enemies; to silence malicious and revengeful tongues. I look up at those heavens of thine, the work of thy hands, at the moon and the stars, which thou hast set in their places; what is man that thou shouldst remember him? What is Adam's breed, that it should claim thy care? Thou hast placed him only a little below the angels,² crowning him with glory and honour, and bidding him rule over the works of thy hands. Thou hast put them all under his dominion, the sheep and the cattle, and the wild beasts besides; the birds in the sky, and the fish in the sea, that travel by the sea's paths. O Lord, our Master, how the majesty of thy name fills all the earth!

9

(To the choir-master. To the mood of the song, Mut Labben. A psalm. Of David.)

LORD, I give thee all the thanks of my heart, recounting thy wonderful doings;

glad and triumphant in thee, I will sing psalms to thy name, O God most high. See how my enemies turn back, how they faint and melt away at the sight of thee! Thou hast given me redress and maintained my cause; thou art there on thy throne, seeing justice done. Thou hast checked the heathen in their course; thou hast brought the wicked to nothing, blotting out their name for all time. Spent is the enemy's power, doomed to everlasting ruin; the memory of them has died with the fall of their cities. But the Lord abides for ever on the throne of judgement he has prepared, still judging the world rightly, still awarding each people its due; the Lord is a stronghold to the oppressed, a stronghold in time of peril. Those who acknowledge thy name, Lord, can trust thee; never was man forsaken that had recourse to thee.

Sing, then, to the Lord, who dwells in Sion, tell the Gentiles of his great deeds;
how he, the avenger of blood, cares for the afflicted, does not forget them when they cry to him. Have pity on me, Lord, look upon all that I suffer at my enemies' hands;
thou who didst ever rescue me from the gate of death, to proclaim thy praises at the gate of thy loved Sion, to exult in thy saving power. The heathen have been caught in their own deadly devices; their feet have been trapped in the very toils they had laid; now it will be seen how the Lord defends the right, how the wicked contrive their own undoing. To the place of death the wicked must return, heathens that have no thought of God. He does not forget the helpless; their time will come; the patience of the afflicted will not go for nothing.
Bestir thyself, Lord, let not human strength prevail; let the heathen stand upon their trial before thee; let the heathen, too, feel thy terrors, and learn they are but men.

(Here, in the Hebrew text, Psalm 10 begins.)

Lord,³ why dost thou stand far off? In days of affliction, why dost thou make no sign? The hearts of the oppressed burn

¹ Some would interpret the Hebrew here, 'thou hast founded strength through the lips of children and infants at the breast'. ² The Hebrew can also be translated 'below God'. ³ The numbering of the Psalms here corresponds with that of the Vulgate. In the Hebrew text, which is followed by some modern versions, verses 22-39 of this Psalm are treated as a separate psalm and numbered 10; while Psalms 146 and 147 are given as one psalm. Thus the Vulgate numbers 10 to 147 correspond to 11-147 of the alternative reckoning.

within them, so triumphant is the schemer that has entrapped them; so proud of his wicked end achieved, still robbing men, blaspheming and despising the Lord. God there is none to punish me, the sinner thinks in his pride, and makes that thought his rule; still, as he goes on prospering, he banishes thy laws from his mind, and makes light of his enemies. Endless time, he thinks, cannot shake his untroubled existence. His mouth overflows with curses, and calumny, and deceit; his tongue is a storehouse of dissension and mischief. Ambushed he lies at the village gate, to kill unawares the man who never wronged him; his eyes are continually on his prey; like a lion in its lair, he watches from his hiding-place, to surprise his defenceless foe, safe in the net. So he catches him in the toils; stands there bowing and scraping,¹ till the prey falls by his onset. Why not? he thinks to himself, God has forgotten about it; God still turns his face away, and sees nothing.

O Lord God, bestir thyself, lift up thy hand; do not forget the helpless. Why is the sinner allowed to defy God, to think he will never exact punishment? But in truth thou seest it; thou hast eyes for misery and distress, and wilt take them into thy keeping. The destitute are cast on no care but thine; to thee only the orphan looks for redress. Break down the power of the wicked oppressor, punish his ill-doing, and let him be seen no more. The Lord will reign for ever and ever, while you, the heathen, will vanish from the land he loves. The sighing of the defenceless has found audience; thou wilt heed them and bring courage to their hearts, wilt give redress to the fatherless and the persecuted; mortal man shall make himself feared no longer.

10

(11)

(To the choir-master. Of David.)

2 MY trust is in the Lord; how is it that you say to me, Escape, like a frightened sparrow, to the hill-side? Escape; the rebels have strung their bows, have arrows ready on the string, to shoot from their hiding-places at an unoffending heart; they have thrown down all thou hadst built; what hope, now, for the just man?

Is not the Lord in his holy shrine, the same Lord whose throne is in heaven, whose eye watches, whose glance can appraise, the deeds of men? Innocent or sinful, he reads every heart, and the friends of wrong-doing are his enemies. Pitiessly his weapons rain down upon the offenders; burning coals, and brimstone, and scorching wind; such is the draught he brews for them. The Lord is just, and just are the deeds he loves; none but upright souls shall enjoy his presence.

11

(12)

(To the choir-master. Over the octave.
A psalm. Of David.)

LORD, come to my rescue; piety is dead, in a base world, true hearts have grown rare. None but exchanges empty forms of speech with his neighbour; everywhere false hearts and treacherous lips. Those treacherous lips, that tongue with high-sounding phrases; Lord, rid the earth of them! With our tongues, they say, we can do great things; our lips are good friends to us; we own no master. Now, says the Lord, I will bestir myself, on behalf of the helpless who are so ill used, of the poor who cry out so bitterly; I will win them the redress they long for. The promises of the Lord are true metal, like silver that is tested in the crucible, the stains of earth gone, seven times refined. Yes, Lord, thou wilt watch over us, and keep us ever safe from these evil days.

See how the wicked come and go all around us, how they rise to greatness, this base breed of men!

12

(13)

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David.)

LORD, must I still go all unremembered, must thy look still be turned away from me? Each day brings a fresh load of care, fresh misery to my heart; must I be ever the sport of my enemies? Look upon me,

¹ v. 31. This seems the most natural way of taking a much-disputed sentence.

O Lord my God, and listen to me; give light to these eyes, before they close in death; do not let my enemies claim the mastery, my persecutors' triumph over my fall! I cast myself on thy mercy; soon may this heart boast of redress granted, sing in praise of the Lord, my benefactor.

13 (14)

(To the choir-master. Of David.)

THERE is no God above us, is the fond thought of reckless hearts; warped natures everywhere and hateful lives! There is not an innocent man among them. The Lord looks down from heaven at the race of men, to find one soul that reflects, and makes God its aim; but no, all have missed the mark and rebelled against him; an innocent man is nowhere to be found. What, can they learn nothing, all these traffickers in iniquity, who feed themselves fat on this people of mine, as if it were bread for their eating, and never invoke the Lord's name? What wonder if fear unmans them, when the Lord takes the part of the innocent? Easily you thought to outwit the friendless; see, the Lord is his refuge! Oh, that it might dawn over Sion, Israel's deliverance! Day of gladness for Jacob, day of Israel's triumph, when the Lord restores the fortunes of his own people.¹

14 (15)

(A psalm. Of David.)

WHO is it, Lord, that will make his home in thy tabernacle, rest on the mountain where thy sanctuary is? One that guides his steps without fault, and gives to all their due; one whose heart is all honest purpose, who utters no treacherous word, never defrauds a friend, or slanders a neighbour. He scorns the reprobate, keeping his reverence for such as fear God, and is true, come what may, to his pledged word; lends without usury, and takes no bribe to condemn the innocent. He who so lives will stand firm for ever.

¹ This psalm is a curious literary problem; the whole of it can be found elsewhere in the Bible. Verses 1 and 2, with the first sentence of verse 3, and verses 4-7, reappear in Psalm 52, with some variation in verse 6. The remainder of verse 3 is found in the Greek and Latin versions, but not in the Hebrew text. It corresponds exactly with Rom. 3. 10-18, and appears to be a cento of Scriptural quotations taken from the following sources: Ps. 5. 10, 139. 4, 9, 28, 1s. 59. 7, Ps. 35. 2

15 (16)

(A miktam. Of David.)

KEEP me safe, Lord; I put my trust in thee. The Lord, whom I own as my God, confess that in him is all my good! There are faithful souls in this land of his; wondrous delight he gives me in their companionship. What do they do but lay up fresh store of sorrows, that betake themselves to alien gods? Not with these will I pour out the blood of sacrifice; I will not take forbidden names on my lips. No, it is the Lord I claim for my prize, the Lord who fills my cup; thou, and no other, wilt assure my inheritance to me. Portion is none were more to my liking; welcome the lot's choice!

Blessed be the Lord, who schools me; late into the night my inmost thoughts chasten me. Always I can keep the Lord within sight; always he is at my right hand, to make me stand firm. Glad and merry am I, heart and soul of me; my body, too, shall rest in confidence that thou wilt not leave my soul in the place of death, or allow thy faithful servant to see corruption. Thou wilt shew me the way of life, make me full of gladness in thy presence; at thy right hand are delights that will endure for ever.

16 (17)

(A prayer. Of David.)

LORD, to my just complaint give ear; do not spurn my cry for aid. Listen to this prayer of mine; they are no treacherous lips that make it. At thy judgement seat I claim award; unerring thy scrutiny. Wilt thou read my heart, drawing near in the darkness to test me as if by fire, thou wilt find no treachery in me. Never have these lips been led astray by man's evil example; still to thy law's pattern thy warnings kept me true; still in thy paths my steps were firmly planted, my feet did not stumble.

And now I cry to thee, the God who ever hearest me; turn thy ear towards me, and listen to my plea. Thy mercy, thy signal mercy shew; none ever sought sanctuary

8 at thy right hand in vain. Protect me as thou wouldst the apple of thy own eye;
hide me under the shelter of thy wings, 9 safe from the evil-doers who wrong me.

See how my enemies close about me 10 mercilessly, their hearts shut to pity, a boast on their lips! Even now their 11 stealthy tread closes in on me, as they watch their opportunity to bring me 12 down; treacherous as a lion that is eager for its prey, a young lion that waits hidden in its lair.

13 Bestir thyself, Lord; forestall him and throw him to the ground; bare thy sword, 14 and save me from the evil-doer, raise thy hand, to rescue me from the hands of mortal men! Mortal men indeed, that have all their portion here on earth; whose desires thou dost satisfy with treasures from thy store, so that their children, too, live in abundance, and leave riches for new 15 heirs to enjoy. As for me, I will come with upright heart into thy presence, and when I wake up, I shall be well content with thy likeness.

17

(18)

(To the choir-master. Of David, the servant of the Lord. He addressed to the Lord the words of this song, on the day when God delivered him from the hand of Saul, and from the hands of all his enemies; as follows:¹)

SHALL I not love thee, Lord, my only 3 defender? The Lord is my rock-fastness, my stronghold, my rescuer; to God, my hiding-place, I flee for safety; he is my shield, my weapon of deliverance, my re-4 fuge. Praised be the Lord! When I invoke his name, I am secure from my enemies.
5 All about me surged the waves of death, deep flowed the perilous tide, to daunt me; 6 the grave had caught me in its toils, deadly snares had trapped my feet. One cry to the 7 Lord, in my affliction, one word of summons to my God, and he, from his sanctuary, listened to my voice; the complaint
I made before him found a hearing.

8 Earth thereupon shivered and shook, the very foundations of the hills quailed and 9 quaked at his anger; at the fiery smoke that breathed from his mouth and nostrils, 10 kindling coals to flame. He bade heaven stoop, and came down to earth, with a dark cloud at his feet; he came, cherubmounted, borne up on the wings of the wind, shrouded in darkness, canopied with black rain-storm and deep mist. Then, while coals were kindled at the brightness as he came, the Lord sent his thunder from heaven, the most High let his voice be heard. How they scattered when he rained down his arrows on them, how they fled in confusion before the volleys of his lightning! The sea's bed came to light, the very foundations of the world were laid bare, when thou didst threaten them, Lord, when thou didst blow upon them with the breath of thy anger. Then he reached down from heaven, caught hold of me, rescued me from that flood, saved me from triumphant malice, from the enemies that held me at their mercy. Evil days, when they faced me at every turn! Yet the Lord stood by me, and brought me out into freedom again; his great love befriended me.

So, for my faithfulness, the Lord would requite me, as he sees me guiltless in act, he would make return. Have I not kept true to the Lord's paths? Have I not been ever loyal to my God? No law of his, but I have kept it before my eyes; no task he laid upon me have I refused; ever stainless in his presence, ever watchful to keep myself clear of guilt, ever faithful, ever guiltless in act, the Lord has required me.
Lovingly wilt thou treat those who love thee, with the loyal keep troth; pure of heart the pure of heart shall find thee, the cunning thou wilt overreach. To humble folk thou wilt bring deliverance; the proud, with their haughty looks, thou wilt bring down to earth. It is thou, Lord, that keepest the lamp of my hopes still burning;
shinest on the darkness about me, O my God. In thy strength I will engage a host of the enemy, in my God's strength I shall leap over all their defences.

Such is my God, unsullied in his dealings; his promises are like metal tested in the fire; he is the sure defence of all who trust in him. Who but the Lord is God?
What other refuge can there be, except our God? It is he that girds me with strength, bids me go on my way untroubled. He makes me sure-footed as the deer, and gives me the freedom of the hills; these hands, through him, are skilled in battle, these arms are a match for any bow of bronze. Thy saving power, Lord, is my defence, thy right hand supports me; thy tender care fosters me. Through thee, my steps are untrammelled as I go, my tread never falters; I can overtake the enemies I pursue, and never turn home till I have made an end of them; I can beat them to their knees, and hurl them down at my feet. Thou girdest me about with a warrior's strength; whatever power challenges me, thou dost subdue before me, putting my enemies to flight, and throwing all their malice into confusion. Loudly they cry out to the Lord, bereft of aid, but he makes no answer to their cries. I can crush them to pieces, like the dust which the wind blows along; I can trample them down like mire from the streets.

¹ The whole of this psalm has been preserved for us independently among the records of King David's reign, with slight variations (1 Kg. 22).

Nor was it enough, of domestic broils to rid me; a world should be my vassal; new realms should pay me homage, quick to do my bidding. See where they come, the alien born, come slinking out of their strongholds, pale of cheek, to cringe before me. Blessed be the living Lord who is my refuge, praised be the God who delivers me! It is thou, my God, that bringest me redress, that bendest peoples to my will, that savest me from the spite of my enemies: so that I am high above the reach of their assaults, proof against their violence. Then, Lord, I will give thee thanks in the hearing of all the nations, singing in praise of thy name; victory thy mercy grants to the King thou hast anointed, to David, and David's line for ever.

18 (19)

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David.)

SEE how the skies proclaim God's glory, how the vault of heaven betrays his craftsmanship! Each day echoes its secret to the next, each night passes on to the next its revelation of knowledge; no word, no accent of theirs that does not make itself heard,¹ till their utterance fills every land, till their message reaches the ends of the world. In these, he has made a pavilion for the sun, which comes out as a bridegroom comes from his bed, and exults like some great runner who sees the track before him. Here, at one end of heaven, is its starting-place, and its course reaches to the other; none can escape its burning heat.

The Lord's perfect law, how it brings the soul back to life; the Lord's unchallengeable decrees, how they make the simple learned! How plain are the duties which the Lord enjoins, the treasure of man's heart; how clear is the commandment the Lord gives, the enlightenment of man's eyes! How sacred a thing is the fear of the Lord, which is binding for ever; how unerring are the awards which the Lord makes, one and all giving proof of their justice! All these are more precious than gold, than a hoard of pure gold, sweeter than the honey, dripping from its comb. By these I, thy servant, live, observing them how jealously! And yet, who knows his own frailties? If I have sinned unwittingly, do thou absolve me. Keep me ever thy own servant, far from pride; so long as this does not lord it over me, I will yet be without fault, I will yet be innocent of the great sin. Every word on my lips, every thought in my heart, what thou wouldst have it be, O Lord, my defender, my redeemer!

19 (20)

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David.)

THE Lord listen to thee in thy time of need, the power of Jacob's God be thy protection! May he send thee aid from his holy place, watch over thee, there on mount Sion; may he remember all thy offerings, and find savour in thy burnt-sacrifice. May he grant thee what thy heart desires, crown thy hopes with fulfilment. So may we rejoice at thy deliverance, rallied in the name of the Lord our God; abundantly may he grant thy prayer. Shall I doubt that the Lord protects the king he has anointed, will listen to him from his sanctuary in heaven? Is not his right hand strong to save? Let others talk of horses and chariots; our refuge is the

¹ The meaning of the Hebrew text here is quite uncertain.

9 name of the Lord our God. Stumbled and fallen they, while we stand firm on our 10 feet. O Lord, save the king,¹ and hear us in the hour when we call upon thee.

20

(21)

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David.)

2 WELL may the king rejoice, Lord, in thy protection, well may he triumph in thy 3 saving power! Never a wish in his heart hast thou disappointed, never a prayer on 4 his lips denied. With happy auguries thou dost meet him on his way, dost set a crown 5 of pure gold on his head. Prays he for life?
Long continuance of his reign thou dost 6 grant him; to last unailing till the end of time. Great is the renown thy protection has won for him; glory and high honour 7 thou hast made his. An everlasting monument of thy goodness, comforted by the 8 smile of thy favour, he stands firm, trusting in the Lord; the favour of the most High is with him.

9 Ay, but thy enemies—they shall feel thy power; that right hand will not leave their 10 malice unpunished. At thy frown, they will wither away like grass in the oven;
whirled away by the Lord's anger, burnt 11 up in its flames. Thou wilt rid the land of their breed, their race will vanish from the 12 world of men. See how all their false designs against thee, all their plots come to 13 nothing! Thou wilt rout them; bent is thy bow to meet their onslaught.²

14 Stand high above us, Lord, in thy protecting strength; our song, our psalm, shall be of thy greatness.

21

(22)

(To the choir-master. Melody, The hind at dawn.
A psalm. Of David.)

2 MY God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Loudly I call, but my prayer cannot 3 reach thee. Thou dost not answer, my God, when I cry out to thee day and night, 4 thou dost not heed.³ Thou art there none the less, dwelling in the holy place; Israel's 5 ancient boast. It was in thee that our fathers trusted, and thou didst reward

their trust by delivering them; they cried 6 to thee, and rescue came; no need to be 7 ashamed of such trust as theirs. But I, 8 poor worm, have no manhood left; I am 9 a by-word to all, the laughing-stock of the 10 rabble. All those who catch sight of me 11 fall to mocking; mouthing out insults, 12 while they toss their heads in scorn, He 13 committed himself to the Lord, why does 14 not the Lord come to his rescue, and set 15 his favourite free? 16

What hand but thine drew me out from 17 my mother's womb? Who else was my 18 refuge when I hung at the breast? From 19 the hour of my birth, thou art my guar- 20
dian; since I left my mother's womb, thou 21 art my God! Do not leave me now, when 22 trouble is close at hand; stand near, when 23 I have none to help me. My enemies ring 24 me round, packed close as a herd of oxen, 25 strong as bulls from Basan; so might a lion 26 threaten me with its jaws, roaring for its prey. I am spent as spilt water, all my bones out of joint, my heart turned to molten wax within me; parched is my throat, like clay in the baking, and my tongue sticks fast in my mouth; thou hast laid me in the dust, to die. Prowling about me like a pack of dogs, their wicked conspiracy hedges me in; they have torn holes in my hands and feet; I can count my bones one by one; and they stand there watching me, gazing at me in triumph.
They divide my spoils among them, cast lots for my garments. Then, Lord, do not stand at a distance; if thou wouldst aid me, come speedily to my side. Only life is left me; save that from the sword, from the power of these dogs; rescue me from the very mouth of the lion, the very horns of the wild oxen that have brought me thus low.

Then I will proclaim thy renown to my 23 brethren; where thy people gather, I will 24 join in singing thy praise, Praise the Lord, 25 all you that are his worshippers; honour 26 to him from the sons of Jacob, reverence to him from Israel's race! He has not scorned or slighted the appeal of the friendless, nor turned his face away from me; my cry for help did not go unheeded. Take what I owe thee, my song of praise before a great

¹ Some would understand the Hebrew text as meaning, 'O Lord, our King, save us'.² Verses 9-13 are perhaps addressed to God, more probably to the psalmist himself.

³ The Hebrew text here has the difficult phrase 'and (there is) no silence for me'.

assembly. I will pay my vows to the Lord 27 in the sight of his worshippers; the poor shall eat now, and have their fill, those who look for the Lord will cry out in praise of him, Refreshed be your hearts eternally!
 28 The furthest dwellers on earth will be-think themselves of the Lord, and come back to him; all the races of the heathen 29 will worship before him; to the Lord royalty belongs, the whole world's homage 30 is his due. Him shall they worship, him only, that are laid to rest in the earth, even 31 from their dust they shall adore. I, too, shall live on in his presence,¹ and beget children to serve him; these to a later age 32 shall speak of the Lord's name; these to a race that must yet be born shall tell the story of his faithfulness, Hear what the Lord did.

22

(23)

(A psalm. Of David.)

THE Lord is my shepherd; how can I lack 2 anything? He gives me a resting-place where there is green pasture, leads me out 3 to the cool water's brink, refreshed and content. As in honour pledged, by sure 4 paths he leads me; dark be the valley about my path, hurt I fear none while he is with me; thy rod, thy crook are my comfort.
 5 Envious my foes watch, while thou dost spread a banquet for me; richly thou dost anoint my head with oil, well filled my 6 cup. All my life thy loving favour pursues me; through the long years the Lord's house shall be my dwelling-place.

23

(24)

(Of David. A psalm.)

THE Lord owns earth, and all earth's fulness, the round world, and all its in-2 habitants. Who else has built it out from the sea, poised it on the hidden streams?
 3 Who dares climb the mountain of the 4 Lord, and appear in his sanctuary? The guiltless in act, the pure in heart; one who never set his heart on lying tales, or swore 5 treacherously to his neighbour. His to receive a blessing from the Lord, mercy

6 from God, his sure defender; his the true breed that still looks, still longs for the presence of the God of Jacob.

Swing back, doors, higher yet; reach 7 higher, immemorial gates, to let the King enter in triumph! Who is this great King?
 8 Who but the Lord, mighty and strong, the Lord mighty in battle? Swing back, doors, 9 higher yet; reach higher, immemorial gates, to let the King enter in triumph!
 10 Who is this great King? It is the Lord of Armies that comes here on his way triumphant.

24

(25)

(Of David.)

ALL my heart goes out to thee, O Lord my God. Belie not the trust I have in 2 thee, let not my enemies boast of my downfall. Can any that trust in thee be dis-3 appointed, as they are disappointed who lightly break their troth? Direct my way, 4 Lord, as thou wilt, teach me thy own paths.
 Ever let thy truth guide and teach me, 5 O God my deliverer, my abiding hope.
 Forget not, Lord, thy pity, thy mercies of 6 long ago. Give heed no more to the sins and frailties of my youth, but think mer-7 cifully of me, as thou, Lord, art ever gracious. How gracious is the Lord, how 8 faithful, guiding our strayed feet back to the path! In his own laws he will train the 9 humble, in his own paths the humble he will guide. Jealous be thy keeping of cove-10 nant and ordinance, and the Lord's dealings will be ever gracious, ever faithful with thee. Kindly be thy judgement of my 11 sin, for thy own honour's sake, my grievous sin.

Let a man but fear the Lord, what path 12 to choose he doubts no longer. Much joy 13 he shall have of his lands and to his heirs leave them. No stranger the Lord is, no 14 secret his covenant, to his true worshippers. On the Lord I fix my eyes con-15 tinually, trusting him to save my feet from the snare. Pity me, Lord, as thou seest me 16 friendless and forlorn. Quit my heart of 17 its burden, deliver me from my distress.
 Restless and forlorn, I claim thy pity, 18 to my sins be merciful. See how many are 19 my foes, and how bitter is the grudge they

¹ 'I, too, shall live on in his presence'; according to the Hebrew text, this should be 'and their souls have no life', belonging to verse 30 as part of the description that verse gives of the unfortunate.

20 bear me. Take my soul into thy keeping; 21 come to my rescue, do not let me be disappointed of my trust in thee. Upright-22 nesses and purity be my shield, as I wait patiently, Lord, for thy help. When wilt thou deliver Israel, my God, from all his troubles?

25 (26)

(Of David.)

LORD, be thou my judge; have I not guided my steps clear of wrong? Have I trusted in the Lord, only to stumble on my 2 path? Test me, Lord, put me to the proof; assay my inmost desires and thoughts.
 3 Ever I keep thy mercies in mind, ever thy 4 faithfulness bears me company. I have not consorted with false men, or joined in plot-5 ting evil; I have shunned the company of the wicked, never sat at my ease with 6 sinners. With the pure in heart I will wash my hands clean, and take my place among 7 them at thy altar, there making thy praises known, telling the story of all thy won-8 derful deeds. How well, Lord, I love the house where thou dwellest, the shrine of 9 thy glory! Lord, never count this soul for lost with the wicked, this life among the 10 blood-thirsty; hands ever stained with 11 guilt, palms ever itching for a bribe! Be it mine to guide my steps clear of wrong; 12 deliver me in thy mercy. On sure ground my feet are set; where his people gather I will join in blessing the Lord's name.

26 (27)

(Of David.)

THE Lord is my light and my deliverance; whom have I to fear? The Lord watches over my life; whom shall I hold in dread?
 2 Vainly the malicious close about me, as if they would tear me in pieces, vainly my enemies threaten me; all at once they 3 stumble and fall. Though a whole host were arrayed against me, my heart would be undaunted; though an armed onset should threaten me, still I would not lose 4 my confidence. One request I have ever made of the Lord, let me claim it still, to dwell in the Lord's house my whole life long, resting content in the Lord's good-5 ness, gazing at his temple. In his royal tent he hides me, in the inmost recess of his royal tent, safe from peril. On a rock fastness he lifts me high up; my head rises high above the enemies that encompass me. I will make an offering of triumphant music in this tabernacle of his, singing and praising the Lord.

Listen to my voice, Lord, when I cry to thee; hear and spare. True to my heart's promise, I have eyes only for thee; I long, Lord, for thy presence. Do not hide thy face, do not turn away from thy servant in anger, but give me still thy aid; do not forsake me, do not neglect me, O God, my defender. Father and mother may neglect me, but the Lord takes me into his care.
 Lord, shew me the way thou hast chosen for me, guide me along the sure path, beset as I am with enemies; do not give me over to the will of my oppressors, when false witnesses stand up to accuse me, breathe out threats against me. My faith is, I will yet live to see the Lord's mercies. Wait patiently for the Lord to help thee; be brave, and let thy heart take comfort; wait patiently for the Lord.

27 (28)

(Of David.)

TO thee, my Lord, my refuge, I cry aloud, do not leave my cry unanswered; listen to me, or I am no better than a dead man, sinking to the grave. Listen Lord, to my plea as I call upon thee, as I raise my hands in prayer towards thy holy temple. Do not summon me, with the wicked, before thy judgement-seat; with men who traffic in iniquity, men who talk of peace to their neighbours, while their hearts are full of malice. For them, the reward of their own acts, their own evil ways; as they did, be it done to them, in their own coin repaid. Of the Lord's acts, the Lord's ways, they took no heed; ruin be theirs, ruin irreparable.

Blessed be the Lord's name, my plea is heard; the Lord is my strength and shield.
 Trusting in him, I found redress; there is triumph in my heart, on my lips the song of praise. The Lord defends his own people, protects the king he has anointed.
 Lord, save thy people, bless thy own chosen race; be their shepherd, evermore in thy arms upholding them.

28 (29)

(A psalm. Of David.)

SONS of God, make your offering to the Lord; an offering to the Lord of honour and glory, an offering to the Lord of the glory that befits his name; worship the Lord, in holy vesture habited. The voice of the Lord is heard over the waters, when the glorious God thunders, the Lord, thundering over swollen waters; the Lord's voice in its power, the Lord's voice in its majesty. The Lord's voice, that breaks the cedars; the Lord breaks the cedars of Lebanon; bids Lebanon and Sarion leap high as a bullock leaps, breed of the wild ox. The Lord's voice kindles flashing fire; the Lord's voice makes the wilderness rock: the Lord, rocking the wilderness of Cades. The Lord's voice sets the oak-trees a-swaying, strips the deep forest bare. Meanwhile, in his sanctuary, there is no sound but tells of his glory. Out of a raging flood, the Lord makes a dwelling-place; the Lord sits enthroned as a king for ever. And this Lord will give strength to his people; the Lord will give his people his own blessing of peace.

29 (30)

(A psalm. A hymn for the feast of the temple's dedication. Of David.)

PRAISE to thee, Lord, thou hast taken me under thy protection, and balked my enemies of their will; I cried out to the Lord my God, and thou didst grant me recovery. So didst thou bring me back, Lord, from the place of shadows, rescue me from the very edge of the grave. Sing praise to the Lord, then, faithful souls, invoke his name with thankfulness. For a moment lasts his anger, for a life-time his love; sorrow is but the guest of a night, and joy comes in the morning.

I, too, had thought, in time of ease, Nothing can shake me now; such power and state, Lord, had thy mercy granted me. Then thou didst turn thy face away from me, and I was at peace no more. Lord, I was fain to plead with thee, cry upon God for pity: How will it profit thee to take my life? I can but go down into the grave; and will this dust give thanks to thee, or acknowledge, there, thy faithfulness? Listen, Lord, and spare; Lord, let thy aid befriend me. With that, thou didst turn my sadness into rejoicing, thou hast undone the sackcloth I wore, and girded me about with gladness. So may this heart never tire of singing praises; O Lord my God, I will give thanks to thee for ever.

30 (31)

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David.)

TO thee, O Lord, I look for refuge, never let me be ashamed of my trust; in thy faithful care, deliver me. Grant me audience, and make haste to rescue me; my hill-fastness, my stronghold of defence, to save me from peril. Thou dost strengthen and defend me; thou, for thy own honour, dost guide and escort me; by thee protected, I shall escape from the snare that lies hidden in my path. Into thy hands I commend my spirit; thou, God ever faithful, wilt claim me for thyself. Let fools provoke thee by the worship of false gods; for me, no refuge but the Lord. I will triumph and exult in thy mercy; it was thou didst pity my weakness, and save me when I was hard besteed; before the enemy's toils could close around me, the open plain lay at my feet.

And now, Lord, have compassion on my distress; vexation has dimmed my eyes, frets me away, soul and body. My life is all grief, my years are but sighs; for very misery,¹ my strength ebbs away, my frame is wasted. Openly my foes deride me; even to my neighbours I am a thing of utter scorn; my friends are adread, and the passer-by shuns my contact; I am lost to memory, like a dead man, discarded like a broken pitcher. On every side their busy whispering comes to my ears; peril all around, so powerful the conspiracy that threatens my life. And still, Lord, my trust in thee is not shaken; still I cry, Thou art my God, my fate is in thy hand; save me from the enemy's power, save me from my pursuers! Smile on thy servant once more, and deliver me in thy mercy; Lord,

¹ In the Hebrew text 'through my sin'.

do not let me plead in vain. Disappoint the wicked of their hopes, hurl them down 19 thwarted into the abyss; let silence fall on those treacherous lips, that spoke maliciously of the innocent in the days of their pride and scorn!

20 What treasures of loving-kindness, Lord, dost thou store up for the men who fear thee, rewarding their confidence for all 21 the world to see! Thy presence is a sanctuary, to hide them away from the world's malice; thy tabernacle a refuge from its noisy debate. Blessed be the Lord; so 22 wondrous is his mercy, so strong the wall of his protection. I thought, bewildered, that thy watchful care had lost sight of me; but I cried out to thee, and thou thereupon 23 didst listen to my plea. Love the Lord well, you who worship him; the Lord keeps faith with his servants, and repays the actions of the proud above measure.
 24 Take heart, keep high your courage, all you that wait patiently for the Lord.

31

(32)

(Of David. A maskil.)

BLESSED are they who have their faults forgiven, their transgressions buried deep; blessed is the man who is not guilty in the Lord's reckoning, the heart that hides no 2 treason. While I kept my own secret, evermore I went sighing, so wasted my frame 3 away, bowed down day and night by thy chastisement; still my strength ebbed, faint as in mid-summer heat. At last I made my transgression known to thee, and hid my sin no longer; Fault of mine, said I, I here confess to the Lord; and with that,
 4 thou didst remit the guilt of my sin. Let every devout soul, then, turn to thee in prayer when hard times befall; rise the floods never so high, they shall have no 5 power to reach it. Thou art my hiding-place, when I am sore bestead; songs of triumph are all about me, and thou my deliverer.

6 Friend, let me counsel thee, trace for thee the path thy feet should tread; let my 7 prudence watch over thee. Do not be like the horse and the mule, senseless creatures which will not come near thee unless their 8 spirit is tamed by bit and bridle. Again and again the sinner must feel the lash; he who trusts in the Lord finds nothing but mercy all around him. Just souls, be glad, and rejoice in the Lord; true hearts, make your boast in him.

32

(33)

TRIUMPH, just souls, in the Lord; true hearts, it is yours to praise him. Give thanks to the Lord with the viol's music, praise him with a harp of ten strings. For him let a new song be sung; give him of your best, sound the harp and cry out lustily. The Lord's word is true, he is faithful in all his dealings; faithfulness he loves, and the just award, the whole earth overflows with the Lord's goodness. It was the Lord's word that made the heavens, the breath of his lips that peopled them; he it is who stores up the waters of the sea as in a cistern, treasures up all its waves. Let the whole earth hold the Lord in dread, let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him; he spoke, and they were made, he gave his command, and their frame was fashioned. At the Lord's bidding, a nation's purposes come to nothing, a people's designs are thwarted; his own designs stand firm for ever; generation after generation, his will does not swerve.

Blessed the nation that calls the Lord its own God, the people he has chosen out to be his! Looking down from heaven, he watches all mankind, his dwelling-place has the whole world in view; he has fashioned each man's nature, and weighs the actions of each. There is no protection for kings in powerful armies, for warriors in abundant prowess; nor shall horses bring thee the mastery, brute strength that cannot save. It is the Lord, watching over those who fear him and trust in his mercy, that will protect their lives, will feed them in time of famine. Patiently we wait for the Lord's help; he is our strength and our shield; in him our hearts find contentment, in his holy name we trust. Lord, let thy mercy rest upon us, who put all our confidence in thee.

33 (34)

(Of David, when he feigned madness at the court of Abimelech, so that Abimelech sent him away, and he escaped.¹)

At all times I will bless the Lord; his praise shall be on my lips continually. Be all my boasting in the Lord; listen to me, humble souls, and rejoice. Come, sing the Lord's praise with me, let us extol his name together. Did I not look to the Lord, and find a hearing; did he not deliver me from all my terrors? Ever look to him, and in him find happiness; here is no room for downcast looks. Friendless folk may still call upon the Lord and gain his ear, and be rescued from all their afflictions. Guardian of those who fear the Lord, his angel encamps at their side, and brings deliverance. How gracious the Lord is! Taste and prove it; blessed is the man that learns to trust in him. It is for you, his chosen servants, to fear the Lord; those who fear him never go wanting. Justly do the proud fall into hunger and want;² blessing they lack not that look to him.

Know, then, my children, what the fear of the Lord is; come and listen to my teaching. Long life, and prosperous days, who would have these for the asking? My counsel is, keep thy tongue clear of harm, and thy lips free from every treacherous word. Naught of evil cherish thou, but rather do good; let peace be all thy quest and aim. On the upright the Lord's eye ever looks favourably; his ears are open to their pleading. Perilous is his frown for the wrong-doers; he will soon make their name vanish from the earth. Roused by the cry of the innocent, the Lord sets them free from all their afflictions. So near is he to patient hearts, so ready to defend the humbled spirit. Though a hundred trials beset the innocent, the Lord will bring him safely through them all. Under the Lord's keeping, every bone of his is safe; not one of them shall suffer harm. Villainy hastes to its own undoing; the enemies of innocence will bear their punishment.

The Lord will claim his servant as his own; they go unproved that put their trust in him.

34 (35)

(Of David.)

LORD, espouse my quarrel; disarm the enemies who rise in arms against me; grip target and shield, bestir thyself in my defence. With poised lance, bar the way against my pursuers; whisper in my heart, I am here to save thee. For my mortal enemies, shame and disappointment; for my ill-wishers one and all, ruin and remorse; chaff before the wind, with the angel of the Lord to scatter them, benighted and bemired on their way, with the angel of the Lord in pursuit! Wantonly they have spread their nets for me, wantonly they have dug the cruel snare; now let sudden doom overtake them, their own nets enmesh, their own snare entrap them! Mine to triumph in the Lord, to boast of the aid he brings me; this be the cry of my whole being, There is none like thee, Lord; who else rescues the afflicted from the hand of tyranny, the poor, the destitute, from his oppressors? See how perjured witnesses have come forward, to browbeat me over charges of which I know nothing; how they have repaid my kindness with cruelty, and left me friendless! Time was, when these were sick;³ what did I then? Sackcloth was my wear; rigorously I kept fast, prayed from my heart's depths. I went my way sadly, as one that mourns for brother or friend, bowed with grief, as one that bewails a mother's loss. And now it was my turn to reel under fortune's blows; what did they? Gleeful they met, and plotted to attack me unawares; tore at me without ceasing, baited and mocked me, gnashing their teeth in hatred. Lord, wilt thou look on unheeding still? Wilt thou leave my life at the mercy of these roaring lions? Let me live to praise and thank thee before the multitude that throngs thy courts. No more the leer of triumph in the eye of yonder treacherous foe, that wantonly assails me!

In all their whispering, never a word of peace; they will still be plotting against the land's repose. See how they mop and mow at me, crying out, Joy, joy that we should have lived to see this! Thou too, Lord, ¹ See I Kg. 21. 10 and following.² For 'the proud', the Hebrew text has 'the young lions'³ 'When these were sick', as if King David were recalling his earlier kindness to these enemies of his.

hast seen it, do not pass it by in silence; 23 Lord, do not abandon me. Bestir thyself and take my part, give me speedy redress, 24 my Lord and my God. As thou art just,
 O Lord my God, give thy award for me, 25 never let them triumph over me; never let them think, All goes well, and boast that 26 they have made a prey of me. Disappoint them, fill them with confusion, the men who delight in my misfortune; cover them with shame and self-reproach, the enemies 27 that triumph over me. Joy and gladness be theirs, who applaud my innocence; Praise to the Lord! be their cry, the Lord who 28 defends his servant. And all day long, for thy just awarding, this tongue shall make known thy praise.

35 (36)

(To the choir-master. Of David, the Lord's servant.)

2 DEEP in his heart the sinner hears the whispering of evil, and loses sight of the 3 fear of God; flatters himself with the thought that his misdoings go undis-4 covered, earn no reproof. No word on his lips but is cruel and false; never a wise 5 thought, a kindly deed. He lies awake plotting mischief, and lends himself to every evil course, never weary of wrongdoing.
 6 Lord, thy mercy is high as heaven; thy 7 faithfulness reaches to the clouds; thy justice stands firm as the everlasting hills,¹ the wisdom of thy decrees is deep as the 8 abyss. Lord, thou dost give protection to man and beast, so rich is thy divine mercy;
 under the shelter of those wings the frail 9 children of earth will find confidence. With thy rich store thou wilt nourish them, bid them drink deep at thy fountain of con-10 tentment. In thee is the source of all life; thy brightness breaks on our eyes like 11 dawn. Still let thy mercy dwell with those who acknowledge thee, thy favour with 12 upright hearts; do not suffer the proud to trample on me, the wicked to dispossess 13 me. See what a fall awaits the wrongdoers, how they are cast down to earth, and can keep their feet no more!

36

(37)

(Of David.)

ART thou impatient, friend, when the wicked thrive; dost thou envy the lot of evil-doers? they will soon fade like the grass, like the green leaf wither away. Be content to trust in the Lord and do good;
 live on thy land, and take thy ease, all thy longing fixed in the Lord; so he will give thee what thy heart desires. Commit thy life to the Lord, and trust in him; he will prosper thee, making thy honesty clear as the day, the justice of thy cause bright as the sun at noon. Dumb and patient, to the Lord's mercy look thou, never fretting over the man that has his own way, and thrives by villainy. End thy complaints, forgo displeasure, do not fret thyself into an evil mood; the evil-minded will be dispossessed, and patient souls, that wait for the Lord, succeed them. Forbear yet a little, and the sinner will be seen no more;
 thou wilt search in vain to find him, while patient souls are the land's heirs, enjoying great peace.

Gnashing his teeth with envy, the wrong-doer plots against the innocent, and cannot see his own turn coming; but the Lord sees it, and laughs at his malice.
 How they draw the sword, how they bend the bow, these sinners, to bring ruin on helpless poverty, to murder the upright;
 swords that will pierce their own hearts, bows that will break in pieces! Innocence, ill endowed, has the better of the wicked in their abundance; soon fails the strength of their arms, and still the Lord has the just in his keeping. Jealously the Lord watches over the lives of the guiltless, they will hold their lands for ever, undismayed by adversity, in time of famine well content.
 Knavery will yet come to an end; like the spring's finery they will die, the Lord's enemies, vanish away like smoke. Let the sinner borrow, and never repay, still the good man will be a generous giver;² win
 the Lord's blessing, and the land is thine, his ban is death. Man's feet stand firm, if the Lord is with him to prosper his journey; he may stumble but never fall, with the Lord's hand in his. Now youth is past, and I have grown old; yet never did I see the good man forsaken, or his children begging their bread; still he lends without stint, and men call down blessings on his posterity. Offend no more, rather do good, and be at rest continually; the Lord is ever just, and will not abandon his faithful servants. Perish the sinner, forgotten be the name of the evil-doer, but these will hold their land, and live on it always at rest.

¹ Literally 'the hills of God', a Hebrew form of speech for what is magnificent in nature. ² It is difficult to see the connexion between this verse and the next, unless we suppose that it indicates a reversal of fortunes, in which the wicked will always be defaulting borrowers, and good men will be in a position to help them.

Right reason is on the good man's lips, well weighed are all his counsels; his steps never falter, because the law of God rules in his heart. Sinners lie in wait, plotting against the life of the innocent; but the Lord will never leave him in their power, never find him guilty when he is arraigned. Trust the Lord, and follow the path he has chosen; so he will set thee up in possession of thy land, and thou wilt live to see the wicked come to ruin. Until yesterday, I saw the evil-doer throned high as the branching cedars; then, when I passed by, he was there no longer, and I looked in vain to find him. Virtuous men and innocent mark thou well; he that lives peaceably will leave a race behind him, while sinners are rooted out every one, and their graceless names forgotten. When affliction comes, the Lord is the refuge and defence of the innocent; the Lord will aid and deliver them, rescue and preserve them from the power of wickedness, because they put their trust in him.

37 (38)

(A psalm. Of David. For a memorial.)

THY reproof, Lord, not thy vengeance; thy chastisement, not thy condemnation! Thy arrows pierce me, thy hand presses me hard; thy anger has driven away all health from my body, never a bone sound in it, so grievous are my sins. My own wrong-doing towers high above me, hangs on me like a heavy burden; my wounds fester and rankle, with my own folly to blame. Beaten down, bowed to the earth, I go mourning all day long, my whole frame afire, my whole body diseased; so spent, so crushed, I groan aloud in the weariness of my heart. Thou, Lord, knowest all my longings, no complaint of mine escapes thee; restless my heart, gone my strength; the very light that shone in my eyes is mine no longer.

Friends and neighbours that meet me keep their distance from a doomed man; old companions shun me. Ill-wishers that grudge me life itself lay snares about me, threaten me with ruin; relentlessly their malice plots against me. And I, all the while, am deaf to their threats, dumb before my accusers; mine the unheeding ear, and the tongue that utters no defence. On thee, Lord, my hopes are set; thou, O Lord my God, wilt listen to me. Such is the prayer I make, Do not let my enemies triumph over me, boast of my downfall. Fall full well I may; misery clouds my view; I am ever ready to publish my guilt, ever anxious over my sin. Unprovoked, their malice still prevails; so many that bear me a grudge so wantonly, rewarding good with evil, and for the very righteousness of my cause assailing me. Do not fail me, O Lord my God, do not forsake me; hasten to my defence, O Lord, my only refuge.

38 (39)

(To the choir-master, Idithun. A psalm. Of David.)

IT was my resolve to live watchfully, and never use my tongue amiss; still, while I was in the presence of sinners, I kept my mouth gagged, dumb and patient, impotent for good. But indignation came back, and my heart burned within me, the fire kindled by my thoughts, so that at last I kept silence no longer.

Lord, warn me of my end, and how few my days are; teach me to know my own insufficiency. See how thou hast measured my years with a brief span, how my life is nothing in thy reckoning! Nay, what is any man living but a breath that passes? Truly man walks the world like a shadow; with what vain anxiety he hoards up riches, when he cannot tell who will have the counting of them! What hope then is mine, Lord? In thee alone I trust. Clear me of that manifold guilt which makes me the laughing-stock of fools, tongue-tied and uncomplaining, because I know that my troubles come from thee; spare me this

12 punishment; I faint under thy powerful 13 hand. When thou dost chasten man to 14 punish his sins, gone is all he loved, as if the moth had fretted it away; a breath that 15 passes, and no more. Listen, Lord, to my 16 prayer, let my cry reach thy hearing, and 17 my tears win answer. What am I in thy 18 sight but a passer-by, a wanderer, as all 19 my fathers were? Thy frown relax, give me some breath of comfort, before I go away and am known no more.

39 (40)

(To the choir-master. Of David. A psalm.)

2 PATIENTLY I waited for the Lord's help, 3 and at last he turned his look towards me; 4 he listened to my plea, drew me up out of a deadly pit, where the mire had settled deep, and gave me a foothold on the rock, 5 with firm ground to tread. He has framed a new music on my lips, a song of praise to our God, to fill all that stand by with reverence, and with trust in the Lord.
 6 Happy is the man whose trust is there bestowed, who shuns the rites of strange 7 gods, the lure of lies. O Lord my God, how long is the story of thy marvellous deeds! Was ever care like thine? How should I tell the tale of those mercies, past 8 all numbering? No sacrifice, no offering was thy demand; enough that thou hast given me an ear ready to listen.¹ Thou hast not found any pleasure in burnt-sacrifices, 9 in sacrifices for sin. See then, I said, I am coming to fulfil what is written of me, where the book lies unrolled; to do thy will, O my God, is all my desire, to carry out that law of thine which is written in 10 my heart. And I told the story of thy just dealings before a great throng; be witness, 11 Lord, that I do not seal my lips. Thy just dealings are no secret hidden away in my heart; I boast of thy faithful protection, proclaim that mercy, that faithfulness of thine for all to hear it.

12 Lord, do not withhold thy pity from me;
 let thy mercy and faithfulness be now, as 13 ever, my shield. I am beset with evils past numbering, overtaken by my sins; they fill my prospect, countless as the hairs on my 14 head; my courage fails me. Deign, Lord, to set me free; Lord, give heed and help.

¹ The Septuagint Greek has 'thou hast prepared a body for me'; cf. Heb. 10. 5.² Jn. 13. 18.

Disappointment and shame be theirs, who lay plots against my life; may they slink away covered with confusion, who now rejoice over my downfall. Joy, joy! is their 16 cry; dumb-stricken let them stand, their 17 hopes belied. Rejoicing and triumph for all the souls that look to thee; Praise to the Lord, will ever be their song, who now long for thy aid. I, so helpless, so destitute, 18 and the Lord is concerned for me! Thou art my champion and my refuge; do not linger, my God, do not linger on the way.

40 (41)

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David.)

BLESSED is that man who takes thought for the poor and the destitute; the Lord will keep him safe in time of trouble. The Lord will watch over him, and give him long life and happiness on earth, and baulk his enemies of their will. The Lord will sustain him when he lies bed-ridden, turn all to health in his sickness.

Lord have mercy on me, is my prayer;
 bring healing to a soul that has sinned against thee. Bitterly my enemies taunt 6 me; How long, they ask, ere he will die, and his name be forgotten? When one comes to visit me, he comes with smooth words, his heart full of malice, ready to go out and plot against me. There they stand, my enemies, talking of me in whispers, devising hurt; Here is a foul plague loosed 7 on him; he will leave his bed no more.
 Why, the very man I trusted most, my own intimate friend, who shared my bread, has lifted his heel to trip me up.² Lord, have 8 mercy on me; give me back health, and let me requite them! Proof of thy favour, my enemies are baulked of their triumph; thou dost befriended my innocence; nevermore wilt thou banish me from thy presence.

Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, from the beginning to the end of time, Amen, Amen.

41 (42)

(To the choir-master. A maskil.
Of the sons of Core.)

O GOD, my whole soul longs for thee, as a deer for running water; my whole soul

43

(44)

(To the choir-master. Of the sons of Core.
A maskil.)

thirsts for God, the living God; shall I never again make my pilgrimage into 4 God's presence? Morning and evening, my diet still of tears! Daily I must listen to the taunt, Where is thy God now?
5 Memories come back to me yet, melting the heart; how once I would join with the throng, leading the way to God's house, amid cries of joy and thanksgiving, and all 6 the bustle of holiday. Soul, art thou still downcast? Wilt thou never be at peace?
Wait for God's help; I will not cease to cry out in thankfulness, My champion and my God.

7 In my sad mood I will think of thee, here in this land of Jordan and Hermon, here on 8 Misar mountain. One depth makes answer to another¹ amid the roar of the floods thou sendest; wave after wave, crest after 9 crest overwhelms me. Would he but lighten the day with his mercy, what praise would I sing at evening to the Lord God 10 who is life for me! Thou art my stronghold, I cry out to him still; hast thou never a thought for me? Must I go mourning, with enemies pressing me hard; racked by the ceaseless taunts of my persecutors, 11 Where is thy God now? Soul, art thou still downcast? Wilt thou never be at peace?
Wait for God's help; I will not cease to cry
out in thankfulness, My champion and my God.

42

(43)

O GOD, sustain my cause; give me redress against a race that knows no piety; save me 2 from a treacherous foe and cruel. Thou, O God, art all my strength; why hast thou cast me off? Must I go mourning, with 3 enemies pressing me hard? The light of thy presence, the fulfilment of thy promise, let these be my escort, bringing me safe to thy holy mountain, to the tabernacle 4 where thou dwellest. There I will go up to the altar of God, the giver of triumphant happiness; thou art my own God, with the 5 harp I hymn thy praise. Soul, art thou still downcast? Wilt thou never be at peace?
Wait for God's help; I will not cease to cry
out in thankfulness, My champion and my God.²

¹ These 'depths' are ordinarily understood as being waterfalls; but the second part of the verse would seem to be a metaphor derived from storms at sea. Cf. Jon. 2. 4. ² The repetition here of the refrain used in Psalm 41 makes it probable that these two were originally a single psalm.

he know of it? He can read the secrets of 23 men's hearts. No, it is for thy sake that we face death at every moment, reckoned no 24 better than sheep marked down for slaughter. Bestir thyself, Lord, why dost thou sleep on? Awake, do not banish us from 25 thy presence for ever. How canst thou turn thy face away, without a thought for 26 our need and our affliction? Our pride is bowed in the dust; prostrate, we cannot 27 lift ourselves from the ground. Arise, Lord, and help us; in thy mercy, claim us for thy own.

bring; the noblest of its citizens will be courting thy favour. She comes, the 14 princess, all fair to see, her robe of golden cloth, a robe of rich embroidery, to meet 15 the King. The maidens of her court follow her into thy presence, all rejoicing, all 16 triumphant, as they enter the king's palace! Thou shalt have sons worthy of 17 thy own fathers, and divide a world between them for their domains. While time 18 lasts, mine it is to keep thy name in remembrance; age after age, nations will do thee honour.

44 (45)

(To the choir-master. Melody: The Lilies. Of the sons of Core. A maskil. A love-song.)

2 JOYFUL the thoughts that well up from my heart, the King's honour for my theme;
 my tongue flows readily as the pen of a 3 swift writer. Thine is more than mortal beauty, thy lips overflow with gracious utterance; the blessings God has granted 4 thee can never fail. Gird on thy sword at thy side, great warrior, gird thyself with 5 all thy majesty and all thy beauty; ride on triumphant, in the name of faithfulness and justice. Dread counsel thy own might 6 shall give thee; so sharp are thy arrows, subduing nations to thy will, daunting the 7 hearts of the king's enemies. Thy throne, O God, endures for ever and ever, the sceptre of thy royalty is a rod that rules 8 true;¹ thou hast been a friend to right, an enemy to wrong, and God, thy own God, has given thee an unction to bring thee 9 pride beyond any of thy fellows. Thy garments are scented with myrrh, and aloe, and cassia; from ivory palaces there are 10 harps sounding in thy honour. Daughters of kings come out to meet thee; at thy right hand stands the queen, in Ophir gold 11 arrayed. (Listen, my daughter, and consider my words attentively; thou art to forget, henceforward, thy own nation, and 12 the house of thy father; thy beauty, now, is all for the king's delight; he is thy Lord, 13 and worship belongs to him.) The people of Tyre, too, will have its presents to 45 (46)

(To the choir-master. Of the sons of Core.
 Melody: The Virgins. A song.)

GOD is our refuge and stronghold; sovereign aid he has brought us in the hour of 2 peril. Not for us to be afraid, though earth 3 should tumble about us, and the hills be carried away into the depths of the sea. See 4 how its waters rage and roar, how the hills tremble before its might! The Lord of 5 hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge.

But the city of God, enriched with 5 flowing waters, is the chosen sanctuary of the most High,² God dwells within her, 6 and she stands unmoved; with break of dawn³ he will grant her deliverance. Na-7 tions may be in turmoil, and thrones totter, earth shrink away before his voice; but the 8 Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge. Come near, and see God's 9 acts, his marvellous acts done on earth;
 how he puts an end to wars all over the 10 world, the bow shivered, the lances shat-11 tered, the shields burnt to ashes! Wait quietly, and you shall have proof that I am 12 God, claiming empire among the nations, claiming empire over the world. The Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge.

¹ 'Thy throne, O God'; various other ways of taking these words have been suggested, as, for example, 'God is (the support of) thy throne'. None of these has met with general acceptance. This verse and the following are applied to our Lord in the Epistle to the Hebrews (1, 8). ² There may be a reference here to II Par. 32, 4. ³ Literally 'very early in the morning'; which sense may be intended if those scholars are right who connect this psalm with the defeat of Sennacherib (cf. IV Kg. 19, 35).

46 (47)

(To the choir-master. Of the sons of Core. A psalm.)

2 CLAP your hands, all you nations, in 3 applause; acclaim your God with cries of 4 rejoicing. The Lord is high above us, and 5 worthy of dread; he is the sovereign Ruler 6 of all the earth; he has tamed the nations 7 to our will, bowed the Gentiles at our feet, 8 claimed us for his own portion, Jacob the 9 fair, the well beloved. God goes up, loud 10 are the cries of victory; the Lord goes up, 11 loudly the trumpets peal. A psalm, a psalm 12 for our God, a psalm, a psalm for our 13 King! God is King of all the earth; sound 14 the hymn of praise! God reigns over the 15 heathen, God sits enthroned in holiness.
 16 The rulers of the nations throw in their lot 17 with us, that worship Abraham's God; 18 a God so high, he has all earth's princes 19 for his vassals.

47 (48)

(A song. A psalm. Of the sons of Core.)

2 THE Lord is great, great honour is his due, 3 here in the city where he, our God, dwells.
 4 Fair rises the peak of his holy mountain, 5 the pride of the whole world, and the true 6 pole of earth, mount Zion, the city of the 7 great King; within those walls, God has 8 proved himself a sure defence. See, how 9 the kings of the earth have made common 10 cause, and met there in arms! At the sight 11 of her all was bewilderment, and con-12 fusion, and dismay; fear took hold of them, 13 sudden as the throes of a woman in travail; 14 not more ruinously on ocean-going ships 15 falls the east wind. Here, in this city of the 16 Lord of hosts, the city of our own God, we 17 have proved the tale long since told us, that 18 God upholds her for all eternity; sheltered 19 in thy temple, we give thanks for our de-20 liverance. O God, wherever thy name is 21 known on earth, thy praise is told, ever just 22 in thy dealings; well may the hill of Zion 23 rejoice, well may the townships of Juda 24 triumph, at the decrees which thou, Lord, 25 hast executed. Walk about Zion, make the 26 round of her towers, and count the number 27 of them; mark well the defences that are 28 hers, pass all her strongholds in review; 29 then give word to the next generation, 30 Such is the God, who is our God for ever 31 and ever; our Shepherd eternally.

48 (49)

(To the choir-master. Of the sons of Core.

A psalm.)

1 LISTEN, you nations far and wide; let all 2 the world give hearing, poor clods of earth, 3 and men nobly born, for rich and poor the 4 same lesson. Here are wise words, 5 thoughts of a discerning heart; mine to 6 overhear mysteries, and reveal, with the 7 harp's music, things of deep import.

8 What need have I to be afraid in troubled 9 times, when malice dogs my heels and 10 overtakes me, malice of foes who trust in 11 their own strength, and boast of their great 12 possessions? No man can deliver himself 13 from his human lot, paying a ransom-price 14 to God; too great is the cost of a man's 15 soul; never will the means be his to prolong 16 his days eternally and escape death. True 17 it is, wise men die; but reckless fools perish 18 no less; their riches will go to others, and 19 the grave will be their everlasting home.
 20 Age after age, they will live on there, under 21 the fields they once called their own. Short 22 is man's enjoyment of earthly goods; 23 match him with the brute beasts, and he is 24 no better than they.

25 Fatal path, that ensnares the reckless!
 26 Pitiful end of the men that love life! There 27 they lie in the world beneath, huddled like 28 sheep, with death for their shepherd, the 29 just for their masters; soon, soon their 30 image fades, the grave for its tenement.
 31 But my life God will rescue from the 32 power of that lower darkness, a life that 33 finds acceptance with him. Do not be 34 disturbed, then, when a man grows rich, 35 and there is no end to his household's 36 magnificence; he cannot take all that with 37 him when he dies, magnificence will not 38 follow him to the grave. While life lasts, he 39 calls himself happy: None but will envy 40 my success; but soon he will be made one 41 with the line of his fathers, never again to 42 see the light. Short is man's careless en-43 joyment of earthly goods; match him with 44 the brute beasts, and he is no better than 45 they.

49 (50)

1 IT is the Lord God that speaks; his mes-2 sage goes out to all the earth, from the sun's 3 rise to its setting. Out of Zion, in perfect

3 beauty, God comes, revealed; he will keep silence no longer. Before him goes a raging fire; there is a whirling storm round about 4 him. So, from on high, he summons heaven and earth to witness the judgment 5 pronounced on his people: Muster in my presence my faithful servants, who honour 6 my covenant still with sacrifice. The heavens themselves pronounce him just, God who is our judge.

7 Listen, my people, to these words of mine, listen, Israel, to the protestation I make thee; I, the God thou ownest as God.
8 I do not find fault with thee over thy sacrifices; why, all day long thy burnt-9 offerings smoke before me. But the gifts I accept are not cattle from thy stock, or 10 buck-goats from thy folds; I own already every wild beast in the forest, the hills are mine, and the herds that people them.
11 There is no bird flies in heaven, no life stirs 12 in the country-side, but I know of it. If I am hungry, I will not complain of it to thee, I, who am master of earth and all that 13 earth contains. Wouldst thou have me eat bull's flesh, and drink the blood of goats?
14 The sacrifice thou must offer to God is a sacrifice of praise, so wilt thou perform thy 15 vows to the most High. So, when thou criest to me in time of trouble, I will deliver thee;
then thou shalt honour me as thou wilt.

16 But thus, to the sinner, God speaks: How is it that thou canst repeat my commandments by rote, and boast of my covenant with thee, and thou, all the while, hast no love for the amendment of thy ways, casting every warning of mine to the 17 winds? Swift thou art to welcome the thief who crosses thy path, to throw in thy lot 18 with the adulterers. Malice wells up from thy lips, and thy tongue is a ready engine 20 of deceit; thou wilt sit there in conclave, speaking evil of thy brother, traducing thy 21 own mother's son. Such were thy ways, and should I make no sign? Should I let thee think I am such as thou? Here is thy reproof; here is thy indictment made plain 22 to thee. Think well on this, you that forget God, or his hand will fall suddenly, and 23 there will be no delivering you. He honours me truly, who offers me a sacrifice of praise; live aright, and you shall see the saving power of God.

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David, when the prophet Nathan came to reproach him for his adultery with Bethsabee.)

HAVE mercy on me, O God, as thou art 3 ever rich in mercy; in the abundance of thy compassion, blot out the record of my misdeeds. Wash me clean, cleaner yet, 4 from my guilt, purge me of my sin, the guilt which I freely acknowledge, the sin which is never lost to my sight. Thee only 5 my sins have offended; it is thy will I have disobeyed; thy sentence was deserved, and 6 still when thou givest award thou hast right on thy side. For indeed, I was born in sin; guilt was with me already when my mother conceived me. But thou art a lover 7 of faithfulness, and now, deep in my heart, thy wisdom has instructed me. Sprinkle 8 me with a wand of hyssop, and I shall be clean; washed, I shall be whiter than snow; 9 tidings send me of good news and rejoicing, and the body that lies in the dust shall thrill with pride.

Turn thy eyes away from my sins, blot 11 out the record of my guilt; my God, bring a clean heart to birth within me; breathe 12 new life, true life, into my being. Do not banish me from thy presence, do not take 13 thy holy spirit away from me; give me back the comfort of thy saving power, and 14 strengthen me in generous resolve. So will I teach the wicked to follow thy paths;
sinners shall come back to thy obedience.
15 My God, my divine Deliverer, save me from the guilt of bloodshed! This tongue shall boast of thy mercies; O Lord, thou 16 wilt open my lips, and my mouth shall tell of thy praise. Thou hast no mind for sacri-17 fice, burnt-offerings, if I brought them, thou wouldst refuse; here, O God, is my 18 sacrifice, a broken spirit; a heart that is humbled and contrite thou, O God, wilt never disdain. Lord, in thy great love send 19 prosperity to Sion, so that the walls of Jerusalem may rise again. Then indeed 20 thou wilt take pleasure in solemn sacrifice, in gift and burnt-offering; then indeed 21 bullocks will be laid upon thy altar.¹

¹ If this verse is part of the original psalm, it seems to imply that the sacrifice of beasts, though of no avail in reparation for grievous sin (verse 18), was a legitimate form of thanksgiving ceremony. (Cf. Ps. 49. 15).

51 (52)

(To the choir-master. A maskil. Of David, when Doeg, the Edomite, came and told Saul, David went into Abimelech's house.)

WILT thou still take pride, infamous tyrant, in thy power to harm? Evermore thou settest thy heart on mischief; thy words are razor-edged, and thou a traitor. Cruelty, never kindness, is thy study, treason, never honest speech; well thy false lips love the word that brings men to ruin. And will not God destroy thee utterly, root thee up, drive thee from thy home, till thy stock is known among living men no more? Honest folk will watch, and wonder, and taunt him then; So much for the man who would have none of God's help, but relied on his store of riches, and found his strength in knavery? And I? rooted like a fruitful olive-tree in the house of my God, I will trust for ever in his divine mercy; I will give thee eternal thanks for all thou hast done, and boast, as men should ever boast, of thy name, the faithful for my company.

52 (53)

(To the choir-master. The Melody, Mahalat. A maskil. Of David.)

THERE is no God above us, is the fond thought of reckless hearts. Warped natures everywhere and hateful lives, there is not an innocent man among them. God looks down from heaven at the race of men, to find one soul that reflects, and goes in search of him; but no, all have missed the mark and rebelled against him; an innocent man is nowhere to be found. What, can they learn nothing, all these traffickers in iniquity, who feed themselves fat on this people of mine, as if it were bread for their eating, and never invoke God's name? What wonder if fear unmans them, where they have no cause for fear? Where are the foes that hemmed thee round?¹ God has scattered their bones far and wide, forgotten as his enemies must ever be. Oh, may Zion bring deliverance to Israel! Day of gladness for Jacob, day of Israel's triumph, when God restores the fortunes of his own people.

53 (54)

(To the choir-master. For stringed instruments. A maskil. Of David, when the men of Ziph told Saul that David was in hiding among them.)

LORD, by the virtue of thy name deliver me, let thy sovereign power grant me redress; give a hearing, Lord, to my plea; let me speak, and know thou art listening. Scornful foes take arms against me, fierce foes that grudge me life itself, with no thought of God to check them. Ah, but God is here to help me; the Lord has my safety in his keeping. Let the blow recoil on my persecutors; ever faithful to thy word, do thou overthrow them. So will I joyfully offer thee sacrifice, and praise thy name, Lord, as praised it must ever be; who else has delivered me from all peril, and let me see the downfall of my enemies?

54 (55)

(To the choir-master. For stringed instruments. A maskil. Of David.)

GIVE audience to my prayer, O God; do not spurn this plea of mine; hear and grant relief. No rest I find in my distress, daunted ever by the hue and cry of godless enemies, whose malicious spite would compass my ruin. My heart is full of whirling thoughts; the fear of death stands over me; trembling and terrified, I see perils closing round me. Had I but wings, I cry, as a dove has wings, to fly away and find rest! Far would I flee; the wilderness should be my shelter, so I might find speedy refuge from the whirlwind and the storm.

Plunge them deep, Lord, in ruin, bring dissension into their councils! Do I not see, already, violence and sedition in the city? Day and night they make the round of its walls, and all the while there is wrong and oppression at the heart of it, its treacherous heart; cruelty and cunning walk

¹ vs. 1-7. See notes on Ps. 13. In the part common to the two psalms, this one uses 'God' where the earlier psalm uses 'the Lord', but otherwise there is no substantial variation except in verse 6. ² Some think that this verse was inserted to celebrate the destruction of Sennacherib's army (IV Kg. 19. 35).

13 ever in its streets. Had some enemy decried me, I could have borne it patiently;
some open ill-wisher, I could have sheltered 14 myself from his attack. But thou, 15 my second self, my familiar friend! How pleasant was the companionship we shared, thou and I; how lovingly we walked as 16 fellow pilgrims in the house of God! May death overtake them, may the abyss swallow them up alive, their homes, their hearts so tainted with evil!

17 Still I will call upon God, and the Lord 18 will save; still at evening and morn and noon I will cry aloud and make my plea known; he will not be deaf to my appeal.
19 He will win my soul peace, will rescue me from attack, when many take part against 20 me. He, the God who reigned before time was, will listen to me, will bring them low.
Never a change of heart, never the fear of 21 God; not one but will turn against his 22 friend, break his pledged word. Smooth as butter their looks, when their hearts are all hatred; soft as oil their speech, yet never was drawn sword so deadly.

23 Cast the burden of thy cares upon the Lord, and he will sustain thee; never will he let thee stumble, his servant if thou be.
24 These, O God, thou wilt sink in a pit of ruin; the blood-thirsty, the treacherous, will not live out half their days; but I, Lord, will put my trust in thee.

55

(56)

(To the choir-master. Melody: Yonat Elem Re-hoqim. Of David. A miktam. When the Philistines had him in their hands at Gath.)

2 HAVE mercy on me, O God, downtrodden 3 evermore by man's cruel oppression; evermore my enemies tread me under foot, so 4 many there are to make war upon me. In thee, the most High, I will put my trust 5 when peril overtakes me. I claim God's promise; my trust is in God, no mortal 6 threat can daunt me. Evermore they traduce me, have no thought but for my 7 undoing; conspire in secret, watching my 8 steps as they plot against my life! O God, requite their treachery; trample on the 9 Gentiles in thy anger. My wandering life none knows as thou; no tear of mine but 10 thou dost hoard and record it. One cry raised to thee, and my enemies are driven back; shall I doubt God is on my side?

I claim God's promise; my trust is in God, man's threats cannot daunt me. The vows which thou claimest from me, O God, my sacrifice of praise shall fulfil; hast thou not saved my life from every peril, my feet from every slip? And shall I not enjoy God's favour, while the light of life is with me?

56

(57)

(To the choir-master. Melody: Do not destroy.
Of David. A miktam. When he took refuge from Saul in a cave.)

HAVE mercy on me, O God, have mercy on me; here is a soul that puts its trust in thee, I will take refuge under the shelter of thy wings, till the storms pass by. I will cry out to the most high God, the God who has ever befriended me: may he send aid now from heaven to deliver me, and bring confusion on my oppressors; his mercy, his faithfulness be my speed! Fallen among lions I, that hungrily eat men's flesh; here are envious teeth that bite deeper than spear or arrow, tongues sharp as any sword. O God, mount high above the heavens, till thy glory overshadows the whole earth. See where they have laid a snare for my feet, to bring me low, dug a pit in my path; may it be their own undoing! A true heart, my God, a heart true to thy service; its song, its music are for thee! Wake, my soul, wake, echoes of harp and viol; dawn shall find me watching; so will I give thee thanks, Lord, for all the world to hear it, sing psalms while the Gentiles listen, of thy mercy, high as heaven itself, of thy faithfulness, that reaches to the clouds. O God, mount high above the heavens, till thy glory overshadows the whole earth.

57

(58)

(To the choir-master. Melody: Do not destroy.
Of David. A miktam.)

NOBLES all, are they honest words you utter? And you, common folk, do you make just award? See how you devise treachery in your hearts, deal out to this land nothing but oppression! Sinners that left the womb only to go a-straying; renegades and liars their mothers bore them! They are venomous as serpents, as the asp that turns a deaf ear and will not listen to the snake-charmer's music, skilful player though he be. My God, break their cruel fangs; Lord, shatter their jaws, strong as the jaws of lions. Like spilt water let them run to waste, shoot none but harmless arrows; melt into nothing, the snail's way, perish like the untimely birth that sees never the light of the sun. Green stalks the whirlwind carries away, while yonder pot still waits for fuel! The innocent man will triumph at the sight of their punishment, as he dips his hands in the blood of the evil-doer; Sure enough, men will say, innocence has its reward, sure enough, there is a God who grants redress here on earth.

58 (59)

(To the choir-master. Melody: Do not destroy. Of David. A miktam. When Saul had his house watched, so as to put him to death.)

O God, deliver me from my enemies, rescue me from their assaults; thwart their treacherous designs, disappoint their lust for blood. See how they plot against my life, how strong is their confederacy! Yet never, Lord, through any fault or offence of mine; unprovoked, they rush to the attack. Bestir thyself, come to my side and witness my wrongs. Lord of hosts, God of Israel, awake; a world chastise, and shew the treacherous no mercy. See how they come back at nightfall, like yelping dogs, to prowl about the city! Tongues that boast, lips that rail, as if none could hear them; and all the while thou, Lord, makest light of them, thou, in whose esteem all the nations are as nothing. To thee I look, the God who strengthens me, the God who watches over me; my God, and all my hope of mercy.

With that divine aid, may I triumph over my enemies. Smite them down, my God, before they compass the overthrow of my people; let that power of thine overawe and crush them, my protector, my Master! Down with the guilty tongues, the boastful lips; let their own pride ensnare them, their cursing and their lies. Ruinous, 14 ruinous be thy vengeance, overwhelming them; shew them that there is a God who rules over Jacob, rules over the utmost ends of the earth. Back come they at night- 15 fall, like yelping dogs, and prowl about the city; far and wide they will roam in search 16 of their prey, and snarl with rage when they go unfed at last.¹ And I, ere long, 17 will be proclaiming thy greatness, will be triumphing in the mercy thou hast shewn me, thou, my stronghold and my refuge in my hour of peril. To thee I will sing, the 18 God who strengthens me, the God who watches over me, my God, and all my hope of mercy.

59 (60)

(To the choir-master. Melody: Lily of the Law. A miktam. Of David. To be used for teaching. This was when he marched against the Syrians of Naharaim and Soba, and Joab on his way home defeated the men of Edom in the Valley of Salt, twelve thousand of them.)

Too long, O God, hast thou disowned us, 3 and scattered our armies in flight; thy wrath forgo, and bring us back to our own. Heal the wounds of the land thou hast 4 shaken and torn asunder, the land that trembles still. Heavy the burden thou 5 didst lay on us; such a draught thou didst brew for us as made our senses reel. But 6 now thou hast set up a standard to rally thy faithful servants, and to protect them from the archers' onset; now bring aid to the 7 men thou lovest, give our prayer answer, and lift thy right hand to save.

God's word came to us from his sanc- 8 tuary, in triumph I will divide up Sichern, and parcel out the valley of Tents; to me 9 Galaad, to me Manasses belongs; Ephraim is my helmet, Juda the staff I bear. Now 10 Moab, too, shall be my drudge; over Edom I will claim my right; I will lead the Philistines away in triumph.² Such was 11 the oracle;³ but now who is to lead me on my march against this fortress, who is to find an entrance for me into Edom, when 12 thou, O God, hast disowned us, and wilt not go into battle with our armies? It is 13

¹ vs. 15, 16. The enemies of the Psalmist, who are patrolling the city to keep him in, will find that he has escaped, and will be scattered far and wide in their disappointed search for him. ² vs. 8-10. This would seem to be a quotation from some old prophecy, referring to the conquest of Chanaan. 'Claim my right' is literally 'cast out my shoe'; cf. Ruth 4. 7. ³ The words 'such was the oracle' are not expressed in the original.

14 thou that must deliver us from peril; vain 15 is the help of man. Only through God can we fight victoriously; only he can trample our oppressors in the dust.

60

(61)

(To the choir-master. For stringed instruments.
 Of David.)

2 LISTEN, Lord, to this cry of appeal; do 3 not let my prayer go unheeded, though it be from the ends of the earth that I call upon thee. When my heart misgives me, 4 thou wilt set me high up on a rock, thou wilt bring me repose; thou, my only hope, 5 my strong tower against the assault of my enemies. Oh let me dwell for ever in thy 6 tabernacle, let me take refuge under the shelter of thy wings! Lord, thou hast 7 listened to my prayer, a domain thou hast given me where thy name is held in awe.
 8 Year upon year do thou add to the king's reign; while generations come and go, may 9 his life still last. For ever may he reign under God's favour; let mercy and faith-10 fulness be his escort. Eternally I will sing thy praises, day after day perform my vows.

61

(62)

(To the choir-master. Melody: Idithun. A psalm.
 Of David.)

2 NO rest has my soul but in God's hands; 3 to him I look for deliverance. I have no other stronghold, no other deliverer but him; safe in his protection, I fear no deadly 4 fall. Still one man my enemies single out for their onslaught, not gaping hedge or ruinous wall more ripe for overthrow; 5 from my safe fastness they would fain dislodge me, ready liars that speak me fair, 6 but ever with a curse in their hearts. Yet even now, my soul, leave thyself in God's 7 hands; all my trust is in him. He is my stronghold and my deliverer, my protector, that makes me stand unmoved.
 8 God is all my defence and all my boast;
 my rock-fastness, my refuge is in God.
 9 Israelites, put ever your trust in him, and lay the homage of your hearts at his feet; God is our defence.
 10 Man is a breath that passes; in Adam's sons there is no trust; high in the scales they rise, weighed all together and lighter than a breath. Put your faith in extortion no more, boast no more of plunder; set never your heed on mounting store of riches. Not once, but twice I have heard God's voice of warning; all power is God's.

 To thee, Lord, mercy belongs; thou wilt repay every man the reward of his deeds.

62

(63)

(A psalm. Of David. This was when he was in the desert of Judæa.)

O GOD, thou art my God; how eager my quest for thee, body athirst and soul longing for thee, like some parched wilderness, where stream is none! So in the holy place, I contemplate thee, ready for the revelation of thy greatness, thy glory. To win thy favour is dearer to me than life itself; my songs of praise can no more be withheld.
 So, all my life long, I will bless thee, holding up my hands in honour of thy name;
 my heart filled, as with some rich feast, my mouth, in joyful accents, singing thy praise. My thoughts shall go out to thee at dawn, as I lie awake remembering thee, and the protection thou hast given me.
 Gladly I take shelter under thy wings, cling close to thee, borne up by thy protecting hand. In vain do my enemies plot against my life, soon to be swallowed up in the depths of earth, a prey to the sword, carrion for jackals! The king shall triumph in God's protection, blessed as they are ever blessed who take their vows in his name; silence shall fall on the lips that muttered treason.

63

(64)

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David.)

O GOD, listen to my prayer when I plead with thee, save me from the threats of my mortal foe. Thine to defend me from this conspiracy of malice, this throng of evil-doers; the tongues that wound like a sharpened sword, the poisoned words aimed at me, like arrows. Stealthily they attack the innocent: suddenly, from a safe vantage-point, they wound him. See them pledged to an infamous resolve, plotting to lay snares for me, sure that they will go unseen! With what care they hatch their designs, planning treason double-dyed!

Let the thoughts of man's heart be deep as 8 they will, yet God has arrows, too, to smite them with, sudden wounds to deal them; 9 all their conspiring plays them false.
 Scornfully the onlookers shake their heads, > awe-stricken every one; who but will acclaim God's power, who but will ponder 1 his great acts? Honest men will rejoice and put their trust in the Lord; upright hearts will not boast in vain.

64

(65)

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David.
 A song.)

O GOD, thou shalt yet have praise in Sion; to thee let the vow be paid, hearer of prayer. To thee all mankind must look for pardon, weighed down by its sinfulness till thou dost forgive. Blessed the man on whom thy choice falls, whom thou takest to dwell with thee in thy own domain! Fill these hearts with love of thy house, with 1 awe of thy holy temple. Wonderful the miracles thou shewest when in mercy thou dost hear us, O God our Saviour; at the bounds of earth, far over the seas, in thee 1 we hope. What power girds thee about!
 In thy strength the mountains stand firm; 3 thou dost calm the raging of the sea, raging sea-billows, ay, and the turmoil of angry > nations. Thy portents strike terror at the world's end, fill the lands of sunrise and > sunset with rejoicing. And now thou hast brought relief to this land of ours, hast watered and greatly enriched it; deep flows the channel whence thy divine providence grants us food; long time thou dost prepare 1 it, watering the furrow, loosening the clods, multiplying, with soft showers, 2 the grain. Thy bounty it is that crowns the year; where thy feet have passed, 3 the stream of plenty flows; flows through the desert pastures, till all the hill-sides 4 are gaily clad, herds throng the fields, and the valleys stand deep in corn; the shout of joy everywhere, everywhere the hymn of praise.

65

(66)

(To the choir-master. A song. A psalm.)

LET the whole world keep holiday in 2 God's presence, sing praise to his name, pay homage to his glory! Cry out to God, 3 What dread, Lord, thy acts inspire! How great is that might of thine, which makes thy enemies cringe before thee! Let the 4 whole earth worship thee, sing of thee, sing praises to thy name. Come near, and 5 see what God does, how wonderful he is in his dealings with human kind, how he 6 turns the sea into land, and lets men cross a river dry-shod; ours to rejoice in his mercy. In that power of his he reigns for 7 ever, and has eyes for what the Gentiles do; let rebellious souls tame their pride.

 Bless the name of our God, you Gentiles, 8 echo the sound of his praise.

God's will is we should live yet; he does 9 not suffer our steps to falter. Yes, Lord, 10 thou hast put us to the proof, tested us as men test silver in the fire; led us into a 11
 snare, and bowed our backs with trouble, while human masters rode us down; our 12 way led through fire and water, yet in the end thou hast granted us relief. See, I 13 come into thy house with burnt-offerings, to pay thee all the vows these lips have 14 framed, this mouth has uttered, when trouble came upon me. Fat burnt- 15 offerings of sheep shall be thine, and the smoke of ram's flesh; bullocks and goats shall be thy sacrifice. Come and give ear, 16 all you who worship God, while I tell of the great mercies he has shewn me; how 17 this voice of mine cried out to him, this tongue did him honour. Would God listen 18 to me, if my heart were set on wrong? And God has listened to me; given heed to my 19 cry for succour. Blessed be God, who does not reject my prayer, does not withhold 20 his mercy from me.

66

(67)

(To the choir-master. For stringed instruments.
 A psalm. A song.)

MAY God be merciful to us, and bless us; 2
 may he grant us the favour of his smile.
 Make known thy will, O God, wide as 3 earth; make known among all nations thy saving power. Honour to thee, O God, 4 from the nations, honour from all the nations! The Gentiles, too, may rejoice and 5 be glad; a whole world abides thy judgement, and the Gentiles, too, obey on earth thy sovereignty. Honour to thee, O God, 6 from the nations, honour from all the nations! The land has yielded its harvest; 7 such bounty God, our own God, affords. 8 God grant us ever his blessing, and may earth, far and wide, do him reverence.

67

(68)

(To the choir-master. Of David. A psalm.
 A song.)

2 LET God bestir himself, needs must his foes be scattered, their malice take flight 3 before his coming. Vanish the wicked at God's presence as the smoke vanishes, as 4 wax melts at the fire, while the just keep holiday and rejoice at the sight of him, glad 5 and content. Sing, then, in God's honour, praise his name with a psalm; a royal progress through the wilderness for the God whose name tells of omnipotence!
 6 Triumph in his presence; he is a father to the orphan, and gives the widow redress, this God who dwells apart in holiness.
 7 This is the God who makes a home for the outcast, restores the captives to a land of plenty, leaves none but the rebels to find their abode in the wilderness.
 8 O God, when thou didst go forth at the head of thy people, on that royal progress 9 of thine through the desert, how the earth trembled, how the sky broke at God's coming, how even Sinai shook, when the 10 God of Israel came! And on this thy own land, O God, thou sendest rain abundantly;
 all parched it lies, and thou dost bring it 11 relief. Pasture-land of thy own flock; and shouldst thou not make bounteous provision here, O God, for thy pensioners?
 12 Word has come from the Lord, good 13 news borne on a multitude of lips: Routed the kings, routed their armies; they have left their spoils for housewives to carry 14 away; never shone silver so bright on a dove's feathers, never gold so fair on a dove's wings; and you, all the while, rest-15 ing quiet among the sheep-folds! White fell the snows on Salmon, when the Almighty put kings to rout.¹ 16 Basan's hills are high, Basan's hills are rugged; must you turn your eyes, rugged hills, towards God's mountain, and envy what you see? The mountain where God loves and will ever love to dwell. See where God comes, with chariots innumerable for his escort; thousands upon thousands;

 comes from Sinai to this his sanctuary.
 Thou dost mount up on high, thou dost capture thy spoil, and men must be thy tribute,² will they or no, yonder heathen must have the Lord God for their neighbour. Blessed be the Lord now and ever, the God who bears our burdens, and wins us the victory. Our God is a God of deliverance; the Lord is our Master, that saves men from peril of death. God will smite the heads of his enemies, smite the proud locks of the men who live at ease in their wickedness. I will restore my people, the Lord says; I will restore them to their land, from Basan, from the shore of the high seas. Soon the blood of thy enemies will stain thy feet, never a jackal that follows thee but shall lick its prey. Thou comest, O God, a mark for all eyes; he comes, my God and my king, to visit his sanctuary.
 Before him go the singers, and the minstrels follow, while the maids play on their tambours between: Give praise to the Lord God in this solemn assembly, sons of Israel! Here is Benjamin, youngest of the tribes, that marches in the van; here are the chieftains of Juda with their companies, chieftains, too, from Zabulon, chieftains from Nephtali.

Shew thy power, O God, shew thy Divine power, perfect thy own achievement for us; to honour thy temple at Jerusalem, kings shall bring gifts before thee. Tame the wild beasts of the marshes, fierce bulls that lord it over the peaceful herd of nations; down fall they, bringing silver pieces for their ransom. Scatter the nations that delight in war, till Egypt sends hither her princes, till Ethiopia makes her peace with God. Kingdoms of the earth, raise your voices in God's honour, sing a psalm to the Lord; a psalm to God, who mounts on the heavens, the immemorial heavens, and utters his word in a voice of thunder. Pay honour to God, the God whose splendour rests over Israel, who

¹ The early part of this psalm clearly refers to the victory of Barac over King Sisera; verses 8 and 9 being actually repeated from Jg. 5. 4 and 5, and verse 14 from Jg. 5. 16. ² St Paul in Eph. 4. 5, apparently using some other text, has 'gave gifts to men' instead of 'men must be thy tribute'.

holds dominion high among the clouds.
 6 Awe dwells about him in his holy place!
 The God of Israel gives his people strength and courage; blessed be God!

trouble, give a speedy answer to my prayer.
 Draw near in my distress, and grant deli- 19 verance; relieve me, so hard pressed by my enemies. Lord, thou knowest how 20 they reproach me, how I blush with shame; thou seest how many are my persecutors. Heart-broken with that shame, 21 I pine away, looking round for pity, where pity is none, for comfort, where there is no comfort to be found. They gave me gall to 22 eat, and when I was thirsty they gave me vinegar to drink.¹ Let their feast be turned 23 into a trap, a net to catch them and theirs,² ever the blind eye be theirs, ever the 24 halting loin. Pour out thy anger upon 25 them, let them be overtaken by the tide of thy vengeance; let their dwelling-place be 26 deserted, their tents for ever uninhabited.³ Who is it they persecute? A man already 27 afflicted by thee; hard was my hurt to bear, and these have added to it. Do thou add 28 guilt to guilt in their reckoning; let them never claim thy acquittal; let their names 29 be blotted out from the record of the living, and never be written among the just.

68 (69)

(To the choir-master. Melody: The Lilies.
 Of David.)

2 O GOD, save me; see how the waters close 3 about me, shoulder-high! I am like one who sticks fast in deep mire, with no ground under his feet, one who has ventured out into mid-ocean, to be drowned 4 by the storm. Hoarse my throat with crying wearily for help; my eyes ache with 5 looking up for mercy to my God. Countless as the hairs on my head are my wanton enemies, I am no match for the oppressors that wrong me. Should I make amends to 6 them, I, that never robbed them? O God, thou knowest my rash doings, no fault of 7 mine is hidden from thy sight. Master, Lord of hosts, shall ill fortune of mine bring shame to those who trust in thee, make men repent of looking for aid to thee, 8 the God of Israel? It is for thy sake that I have met with reproach, that I have so 9 often blushed with confusion, an outcast among my own brethren, a stranger to my 10 own mother's children. Was it not jealousy for the honour of thy house that consumed me; was it not uttered against thee, the reproach I bore?

See how friendless I am, and how dis- 30 tressed! Let thy help, O God, sustain me.
 I will sing in praise of God's name, herald 31
 it gratefully; a more acceptable sacrifice, 32 this, to the Lord than any young bullock, for all its promise of horn and hoof. Here 33 is a sight to make the afflicted rejoice; to cheer men's spirits in their quest for God.
 The Lord listens to the prayer of the desti- 34 tute; he does not forget his servants in their chains. To him be praise from sky, earth 35 and sea, and from all the creatures that move about them. God will grant deli- 36 verance to Sion; the cities of Juda will rise from their ruins, inhabited now and held firmly in possession, an inheritance for the 37 race that serves him, a home for all true lovers of his name.

1 What more could I do? I humbled myself before them by fasting; and that, 12 too, was matter for finding fault; I dressed in sackcloth, and they made a by-word of 13 me. Idlers in the market-place taunt me; the drunkards make a song of me over 14 their wine. To thee, Lord, I make my prayer; never man more needed thy good will. Listen to me, O God, full of mercy as thou art, faithful as thou art to thy 15 promise of aid. Save me from sinking in the mire, rescue me from my enemies, from the deep waters that surround me; 16 let me not sink under the flood, swallowed up in its depths, and the well's mouth 17 close above me. Listen to me, Lord, of thy gracious mercy, look down upon me in the 18 abundance of thy pity; do not turn thy face away from thy servant in this time of 69 (70)

(To the choir-master. Of David.
 A commemoration.⁴)

DEIGN, O God, to set me free; Lord, 2 make haste to help me. Disappoint them, 3 put them to the blush, the enemies who plot against my life! Baffled let them go

¹ Mt. 27. 48. ² Rom. 11. 9. ³ Ac. 1. 20.

⁴ This psalm is nearly a repetition of Ps. 39. 14-18.

their way, that rejoice at my ill fortune; 4 slink away in confusion, that crowded over 5 me so loud! Triumphant joy be theirs, who long for thee; Praise to the Lord, be 6 ever their song, who look eagerly now for thy succour. Thou seest me helpless and destitute; my God, help me. Thou art my champion and my deliverer; Lord, do not delay thy coming.

70 (71)

To thee, O God, I turn for succour; may 2 I never be disappointed! Rescue and deliver me, faithful as thou art; listen to my 3 cry for succour. Let me find in thee a rock-fastness, a citadel of defence; I have no other stronghold, no other refuge, but 4 thee. Rescue me, O God, from the power of the wicked, from the grasp of lawlessness 5 and oppression; thou, my God and Master, the hope and confidence of my youth.
 6 Thou hast upheld me from birth, thou hast guarded me ever since I left my mother's 7 womb; ever in thee was my trust. Men stare at me now as a strange portent,¹ so signal the protection thou hast given me.
 8 And evermore praise was on my lips, my constant theme thy glory.

9 Do not cast me off now, in my old age; slowly my strength ebbs, do not thou for-10 sake me. A mark thou seest me for envious eyes and tongues; they conspire together, 11 and whisper, God has abandoned him;
 now is the time to overtake and seize him; 12 no one can bring him rescue now. O God, do not keep thy distance from me; hasten, 13 my God, to aid me. Defeat their plot against my life, and bring it to nothing; cover my ill-wishers with confusion and shame.

14 Still will I hope on, praising thee ever 15 more and more. Day in, day out, these lips shall tell of thy faithfulness, of thy saving power, and find no end to them; 16 thy divine wonders, thy matchless justice, 17 Lord, they shall proclaim. It is thou, O God, that hast inspired me ever since the days of my youth, and still I am found 18 telling the tale of thy wonders. O God, do not fail me, now when I am old and grey-headed, till I have made known the proofs of thy power to this, to all the generations that will follow; that faithfulness of thine which reaches up, O God, to the heavens, so signally made manifest. There is none like thee, O God, none like thee. Ah, how often thou hast burdened me with bitter trouble! And still thou wouldst relent, and give me back life, and bring me up again from the very depths of the earth. Lift my head high; turn back, and comfort me. So true to thy word, and shall I not give thee thanks with psalm-music, praise thee on the harp, O God, the Holy One of Israel?

 Gladly these lips will sing of thee, this heart, which owes thee its deliverance.
 Day in, day out, I will repeat the story of thy faithfulness, what shame fell, what confusion, on the men who sought to wrong me.

71 (72)

(Of Solomon.)

GRANT to the king, O God, thy own skill in judgement; the inheritor of a throne, may he be just, as thou art just; may he give thy people right awards, and to thy poor, redress. Such the harvest his subjects shall reap, peace on every mountain, justice on every hill-side. Watch and ward he will keep over the friendless, protect the children of the poor, and crush the oppressor. Ageless as sun or moon he shall endure; kindly as the rain that drops on the meadow grass, as the showers that water the earth. Justice in his days shall thrive, and the blessings of peace; and may those days last till the moon shines no more.

From sea to sea, from the great river to the ends of earth, his sway shall reach. In his presence rebels shall bend the knee, all his enemies will be humbled in the dust;
 gifts shall flow in from the lords of Tharsis and the islanders, tribute from the kings of Arabia and of Saba; all kings must needs bring their homage, all nations serve him.
 He will give the poor redress when they cry to him, destitute folk, with none to befriend them; in their need and helplessness, they shall have his compassion. Their lives he will take into his keeping, set them

¹ It is not clear in what sense the Psalmist was a portent or sign to his contemporaries, but the context suggests that he may be referring to his great age, and God's long preservation of him.

free from the power of wrong and oppression, dearly avenge their blood. Long life shall be his, and gold from Arabia shall be given him; men will pray for him continually, bless his name evermore. The land shall have good store of corn, high up the hill-sides, rustling like the woods of Lebanon; shall multiply its citizens like grass on the ground. For ever let his name be used in blessing, a name to endure while the sun gives light; in him all the tribes of the earth shall be enriched, all the nations shall extol him.

Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who does wonderful deeds as none else, and blessed for ever be his glorious name; all the earth shall be filled with his glory, Amen, Amen.

72

(73)

(A psalm. Of Asaph.)

WHAT bounty God shews, what divine bounty, to the upright, to the pure of heart! Yet I was near losing my foothold, felt the ground sink under my steps, such heart-burning had I at seeing the good fortune of sinners that defy his law; for them, never a pang; healthy and sleek their bodies shew. Not for these to share man's common lot of trouble; the plagues which afflict human kind still pass them by. No wonder if pride clings to them like a necklace, if they flaunt, like fine clothes, their wrong-doing. From those pampered hearts what malice proceeds, what vile schemes are hatched! Ever jeering, ever talking maliciously, throned on high they preach injustice; their clamour reaches heaven, and their false tales win currency on earth.

Enviously the men of my own race look on, to see them draining life's cup to the full; Can God, they ask, be aware of this? Does the most High know of all that passes? Look at these sinners, how they live at peace, how they rise to greatness! Why then, thought I, it is to no purpose that I have kept my heart true, and washed my hands clean in pureness of living; still, all the while, I am plagued for it, and no morning comes but my scourging is renewed. Was I to share their thoughts? Nay, that were to put the whole company of thy children in the wrong. I set myself to read the riddle, but it proved a hard search, until I betook myself to God's sanctuary, and considered, there, what becomes of such men at last. The truth is, thou art making a slippery path for their feet, ready to plunge them in ruin; in a moment they are fallen, in a storm of terrors vanished and gone. And thou, Lord, dost rise up and brush aside all their imaginings, as a waking man his dream.

What if my mind was full of bitterness, what if I was pierced to the heart? I was all dumbness, I was all ignorance, standing there like a brute beast in thy presence. Yet ever thou art at my side, ever holdest me by my right hand. Thine to guide me with thy counsel, thine to welcome me into glory at last. What else does heaven hold for me, but thyself? What charm for me has earth, here at thy side? What though flesh of mine, heart of mine, should waste away? Still God will be my heart's stronghold, eternally my inheritance. Lost others may be, who desert thy cause, lost are all those who break their troth with thee; I know no other content but clinging to God, putting my trust in the Lord, my Master; within the gates of royal Sion I will be the herald of thy praise.

73

(74)

(A maskil. Of Asaph.)

O GOD, hast thou altogether abandoned us? Sheep of thy own pasturing, must we feel the fires of thy vengeance? Bethink thee of the company thou hast gathered, long ago; of the tribe thou hast chosen to be thy domain; of mount Sion, where thou hast thy dwelling-place. Hither turn thy steps, where all is ruin irretrievable; see what havoc thy enemies have wrought in the holy place, how their malice has raged in thy very precincts,¹ setting up its emblems for a trophy of conquest. Blow after blow, like woodmen in the forest, they have plied their axes, brought it down,

¹ Literally, 'thy solemn feast'.

- 7 with pick and mallet, to the ground. They have set fire to thy sanctuary, sullied the dwelling-place of thy glory in the dust.
- 8 They think to destroy us like one man, sweep away every shrine of God in the land. Our own emblems are nowhere to be seen; there are no prophets left now, none can tell how long we must endure.
- 10 O God, shall our enemy taunt us everlastingly, shall blasphemy still defy thy name? Why dost thou withhold thy hand? That right hand of thine, must it always lie idle in thy bosom?
- 12 Mine is a King who reigned before time was; here on earth he was the means to bring deliverance. What power but thine could sunder the shifting sea, crush the power of the monster beneath its waters; shatter Leviathan's power, and give him up as prey to the sea-beasts?¹ Thou didst open up fountains and streams of water; thou, too, madest the swollen rivers run dry. Thine is the day, thine the night; moon and sun are of thy appointment; thou hast fixed all the bounds of earth, madest the summer, madest the cool of the year.
- 18 Wilt thou take no heed, when thy enemies taunt thee, and in their recklessness set the divine name at defiance? Must the dove be the vulture's prey? Souls unbefriended, but for thee, wilt thou leave us quite forgotten? Bethink thee of thy covenant; everywhere oppression lurks, or walks openly through the fields. Do not let the humble go away disappointed; teach the poor and the helpless to exalt thy name. Bestir thyself, O God, to vindicate thy own cause; do not forget the taunts which reckless men hurl at thee, day after day; do not overlook them, the triumphant shouts of thy enemies, the ever growing clamour that here defies thee.

74

(75)

(To the choir-master. Melody: Do not destroy.
A psalm. Of Asaph. A song.)

- 2 WE praise thee, O God, and, praising thee, call upon thy name, tell the story of thy wondrous deeds. When the time is ripe, I will judge strictly; earth rocks to its fall, and all that dwell on it; I alone support its fabric.² Rebel no more, I cry to the rebels, Abate your pride, to the transgressors; would they match themselves against the most High, hurl defiance at God? Look east, look west, it will avail you nothing; no help comes from the desert, or the high hills; it is God who rules all, humbling one man and exalting another. In the Lord's hand foams a full cup of spiced wine; he holds it to men's lips, that must empty it to the dregs, sinners everywhere must drink them. Evermore will I triumph, singing praises to the God of Jacob; mine to crush the pride of every sinner, and raise high the courage of the just.

75

(76)

(To the choir-master. For stringed instruments.
A psalm. Of Asaph. A song.)

It is in Juda God makes himself known, in Israel that his name is extolled; there, in Salem, he makes his abode, dwells in Sion. It was there he broke the archers' volleys, broke shield, and sword, and battle array. How princely was thy dawning over the everlasting hills! Brave hearts, foiled of their purpose, they slept their long sleep; lay there, no hand stirring, the warriors in their pride; lay there, chariots and horsemen, overthrown, God of Jacob, at thy word of rebuke.

Who can resist thee, so terrible, so sudden in thy anger? Loud rings in heaven the doom thou utterest; earth trembles and is silent when God rouses himself to execute his sentence, giving redress to those who are scorned on earth. Its madness tamed, Edom shall do thee honour; to thee the spared remnant of Emath shall keep holiday. To the Lord your God let vows be made and paid; bring gifts from every side to God, the terrible; he it is that cows the hearts of princes, feared among all the kings of the earth.

¹ vs. 12-15. Some think these verses refer to the escape of Israel from Egypt and the miracles done in the wilderness, Leviathan (perhaps the crocodile) being used as a symbol of Egypt. Others think the whole is an allegorical account of the Creation.

² vs. 3, 4. It is not clear whether the speaker is God or man, nor whether he is still the speaker in verses 5 sqq. The two verses are ordinarily interpreted as God's own utterance, but a comparison of verse 10 below suggests that an earthly judge may be intended.

76

(77)

(To the choir-master. Melody: Idithun.
Of Asaph. A psalm.)

A CRY to my God in loud appeal, a cry to my God, to win his hearing! To the Lord I look when distress comes upon me; in his presence I lift up my hands amid the darkness, never wearied; grief like mine there is no comforting. Of God I bethink me, yet sighing still; of God I muse, yet ever faint-hearted. Sleepless that thought holds me, yet bewildered and dumb. I reflect upon days long past, the immemorial years possess my mind; deep musings occupy my thoughts at midnight, never will my mind be at rest. Can it be that God will always leave us forsaken, will never shew us again his old kindness? Can his favour desert us altogether, his promise be set aside eternally? Can God forget to be gracious, can anger move him to withhold his mercy? For me, I tell myself, this sorrow was reserved; the most High has altered the fashion of his dealings with men.

To remember all the Lord has done, to recall those wonderful acts of thine, long ago! To ponder over all thy doings, pass thy wonders in review! Thy path, O God, is hedged about with holiness; what god is great as our God is great? Thy own wonderful acts acclaim thy Deity; even to the Gentiles thou wouldst make thy power known, by forcing them to set free thy people, the sons of Jacob and of Joseph. The waters saw thee, O God, the waters trembled at the sight of thee, moved to their inmost depths; how the waves roared, how the clouds volleyed rain, what echoes from their midst! To and fro thy arrows passed, thy crackling thunders rolled, till all the world shone with thy lightning, and the troubled earth shook. Thy way led through the sea, the deep tide made a road for thee, and none may read the traces of thy passage, where thou, with Moses and Aaron for thy shepherds, didst bring thy people out on their journey.

77

(78)

(A maskil. Of Asaph.)

LISTEN, my people, to this testament of mine, do not turn a deaf ear to the words I utter; I speak to you with mysteries for my theme, read the riddles of long ago. It is a story often heard, well known among us; have not our fathers told it to us? And shall we keep it back from their children, from the generation which follows? Speak we of God's praise, of his great power, of the wonderful deeds he did. He gave Jacob a rule to live by, framed for Israel a law, commanding our fathers to hand on the message, so that a new generation might learn it; sons would be born to take their place, and teach it to their own sons after them. They were to put their trust in God, ever remembering his divine dealings with them, ever loyal to his commands; they were not to be like their fathers, a stubborn and defiant breed, a generation of false aims, of a spirit that broke faith with God.

So it was that the sons of Ephraim, bow in hand,¹ were routed in the day of battle. They were false to God's covenant, refused to follow his law, as if they had forgotten all his mercies, all those wonderful deeds of his they had witnessed. Had not their fathers seen wonders enough in Egypt, on the plains of Tanis, when he parted the sea to let them pass through it, making its waters stand firm as a mound of earth; when he led them with a cloud by day, with glowing fire all through the night? He pierced the rock, too, in the desert, and slaked their thirst as if from some deep pool, bidding the very stones yield water, till fountains gushed from them, abundant as rivers.

And still they went on offending him, there in the wilderness, rebelling against the most High, challenging God in their thoughts to give them the food they craved for. Defiantly they asked, Can God spread a table for us in the wilderness? True, he smote the rock, and made water flow from it, till the stream ran in flood, but can he give bread too, and provide meat for his people? All this the Lord heard, and his ¹ 'Ephraim' is probably used here to represent the people of Israel, as often in the prophets, who contrast it with 'Juda' (cf. verse 67). The reference may be to the refusal to invade Palestine (Num. 14), but the chronology of this psalm is difficult to disentangle.

indignation blazed out; its mounting fires Jacob had fed, its fury must break on 22 Israel. What, had they no faith in God, no 23 trust in his power to save? He laid his command upon the clouds above them, 24 threw open the doors of heaven, and rained down manna for them to eat. The bread of 25 heaven was his gift to them; man should eat the food of angels,¹ and so their want 26 should be supplied abundantly. Next, he summoned his east wind from the sky: it was his power brought the southern gale, 27 raining down meat on them thick as dust, birds on the wing, plentiful as the sea-sand.
 28 Into their very camp it fell, close about their 29 tents; and they ate, and took their fill. All 30 they asked, he granted them; and now, their craving still unsatisfied, while the 31 food was yet in their mouths, God's anger against them reached its height, and slew their lordliest, brought them low, all the flower of Israel.

32 Yet, with all this, they continued to offend him; all his wonderful deeds left 33 them faithless still. And ever he took away their lives untimely, hurried their days to 34 an end. When he threatened them with death, they would search after him, feel 35 their need of God once more; they would remind themselves that it was God who had protected them, his almighty power 36 that had delivered them. But still they were lying lips, they were false tongues 37 that spoke to him; their hearts were not true to him, no loyalty bound them to his 38 covenant. Yet, such is his mercy, he would still pardon their faults, and spare them from destruction; again and again he 39 curbed his indignation, to his vengeance would not give place. He would not forget that they were flesh and blood, no better 40 than a breath of wind, that passes by and never returns. How often the desert saw them in revolt against him, how often, in those solitudes, they defied his anger!
 41 Always new challenges to God's power, new rebellions against the Holy One of Israel.

42 Had they forgotten all he did for them, that day when he set them free from the 43 power of their oppressor, all those miracles among the men of Egypt, those portents 44 in the plain of Tanis, when he turned all their streams, all their channels into blood, so that they could not drink? He sent out 45 flies, to their ruin, frogs to bring devastation on them, gave all their harvest over to 46 the caterpillar, their tillage to the locust, sent hail on their vineyards, frost on their 47 mulberry-trees, let the hail have its way 48 with their cattle, the lightning with their flocks. He let his anger loose on them in 49 all its vehemence; what rage, what fury, what havoc, as the angels of destruction thronged about them! So, the way made 50 ready for his vengeance, he took toll of their lives, doomed even their cattle to the pestilence; on every first-born creature in 51 Egypt, on the first-fruits of increase in all the dwellings of Cham, his stroke fell.

 Then, like a shepherd, he set his own 52 people on their way, led them, his own flock, through the wilderness; guided 53 them in safety, free from all alarm, while the sea closed over their enemy. So he 54 brought them to that holy land of his, the mountain slopes he took, with his own right hand for title; so he drove out the 55 heathen at their onset, parcelled out the land to them by lot, to each his own inheritance, bidding the tribes of Israel dwell where the heathen had dwelt before them.

These were the men who defied the 56 most high God, and rebelled against him;
 would not observe his decrees, but turned 57 away and broke faith with him as their fathers had done, like a bow that plays the archer false; made mountain shrines, to 58 court his anger, carved images, to awake his jealousy! The Lord heard the bruit of 59 it, and burned with anger, cast Israel away in bitter scorn; he forsook his tabernacle 60 in Silo, that tabernacle where once he dwelt among men. Plunder, now, in the 61 enemy's hands, the ark that is shrine of his strength and majesty; he would leave his 62 people at the mercy of the sword, disdain his own inheritance. Their young men fed 63 the flames, and the maidens must go unwed; their priests fell by the sword, and 64 never a widow left to mourn for them.

Then suddenly, like a man that wakes 65 up from sleep, like some warrior that lay, till now, bemused with wine, the Lord 66 roused himself; he smote his enemies as they turned to flee,² branded them for ever

¹ Literally 'of the strong'; but the Angels are probably meant; cf. Wisd. 16. 10.
 'in their buttocks' (1 Kg. 5. 9).

² Or possibly with shame. But he refused, now, to make his dwelling with Joseph, it was not the tribe of Ephraim he would choose; he chose the tribe of Juda, and the hill of Zion, there to bestow his love. And there he built his sanctuary, immovable as heaven or earth, his own unchanging handiwork. He chose David, too, for his servant; took him away from herding the sheep; bade him leave off following the ewes that were in milk, and be the shepherd of Jacob's sons, his own people, of Israel, his own domain. His was the loyal heart that should tend them, his the skilful hand that should be their guide.

78 (79)

(A psalm. Of Asaph.)

O GOD, the heathen have broken into thy inheritance; they have profaned the temple, thy sanctuary, and left Jerusalem in ruins. They have thrown the corpses of thy servants to feed all the birds of heaven; wild beasts prey on the carrion of the just; blood has flowed like water on every side of Jerusalem, and there was none to bury the dead. What a triumph was this for the nations that dwell around us; how have our neighbours mocked and derided us! Lord, must we always taste thy vengeance, must thy jealous anger still burn unquenched? Pour out this indignation of thine upon the nations that do not acknowledge thee, on the kingdoms that never invoke thy name; see how they have made Jacob their prey, and left his dwelling-place in ruins! Forget the long record of our sins, and haste in mercy to our side; never was need so sore as this.

O God, our Saviour, help us; deliver us, Lord, for the glory of thy name, pardon our sins for the sake of thy own renown! Shall the heathen ask, What has become of their God? Shall our eyes never witness thy vengeance upon the Gentiles, that open vengeance thou wilt take for thy servants' blood? Could but the groaning of the captive reach thy presence! Thy arm has not lost its strength; from our bonds deliver us, a race doomed to die. Pour out seven-fold retribution into the laps of our neighbours, for all the insults, Lord, which they have put upon thee; and we, thy own people, sheep of thy pasturing, will give thee thanks for ever, echo, from one generation to the next, the story of thy renown.

79 (80)

(To the choir-master. Melody: The Lily of the Law. Of Asaph. A psalm.)

GIVE audience, thou that art the guide of Israel, that ledest Joseph with a shepherd's care. Thou who art enthroned above the Cherubim, reveal thyself to Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasses; exert thy sovereign strength, and come to our aid. O God, restore us to our own; smile upon us, and we shall find deliverance. Lord God of hosts, wilt thou always turn away in anger from thy servants' prayer; daily wilt thou allot us, for food, for drink, only the full measure of our tears? Thou hast made us a coveted prize to our neighbours, enemies mock at our ill fortune! O God of hosts, restore us to our own; smile upon us, and we shall find deliverance. Long ago, thou didst bring a vine out of Egypt, rooting out the heathen to plant it here; thou didst prepare the way for its spreading, and it took root where thou hadst planted it, filled the whole land. How it overshadowed the hills, how the cedars, divinely tall, were overtopped by its branches! It spread out its tendrils to the sea, its shoots as far as the great river. Why is it that in these days thou hast levelled its wall, for every passer-by to rob it of its fruit? See how the wild boar ravages it, how it gives pasture to every beast that roams! God of hosts, relent, look down from heaven, look to this vine, that needs thy care. Revive the stock which thy own hand has planted, branches that by thee thrive, and thrive for thee. Death be in thy frown for the men that have cut it down and burned it. Thy chosen friends, a race¹ by thee thriving, and thriving for thee, O let thy hand protect them still! Henceforth we will never forsake thee; grant us life, and we will live only to invoke thy name. Lord God of hosts, restore us to our own; smile upon us, and we shall find deliverance.

¹ Literally, 'the man of thy right hand, the son of man whom thou hast strengthened for thyself'. This probably refers to Israel personified.

80 (81)

(To the choir-master. Melody: The Winepresses. Of Asaph.)

2 REJOICE we all in honour of the God who aids us; cry out with gladness to the God 3 of Jacob. Ring psaltery, and tambour, beat the harp, sweetly sounding, and the 4 zither! A new month, and a full moon; blow the trumpet loud, to grace our festi-5 val! Duty demands it of Israel; the God 6 of Jacob has decreed it, made it a law for Joseph, since the day he left Egypt, and gained the further shore. In a tongue un-7 known the message came to me; I have eased his shoulder of the burden, freed his 8 hands from the slavery of the hod! Such deliverance I brought, when thou didst cry out to me in thy misery; gave thee audience under a canopy of cloud, and tested thee at the Waters of Rebellion.
9 Give heed, my people, to this warning of mine; Israel, wouldst thou but listen!
10 Then let no strange worship find a home with thee; never let thy knees be bowed to an alien God; am not I the Lord thy God, 11 I, who rescued thee from Egypt? Open thy mouth wide, and thou shalt have thy 12 fill. So I spoke, but my people would not listen; Israel went on unheeding, till I was fain to give their hard hearts free play, let 13 them follow their own devices. Ah, if my people did but listen to me! Did Israel but 14 take me for their guide! How lightly, then, would I bring their enemies low, smite 15 down their persecutors! The very men that were once the Lord's enemies would be cringing at his feet; such, for ever, 16 should be their destiny; Israel should have full ears of wheat to nourish them, and 17 honey dripping from the rock to their heart's content.

81 (82)

(A psalm. Of Asaph.)

SEE, where he stands, the Ruler of all, among the rulers¹ assembled, comes forward to pronounce judgement on the 2 rulers themselves! Will you never cease perverting justice, espousing the cause of the wicked? Come, give redress to the poor and the friendless, do right to the afflicted and the destitute; to you need and poverty look for deliverance, rescue them from the hand of wickedness. But no, ignorant and unperceiving, they grope their way in darkness; see how unstable are the props of earth! Gods you are,

I myself have declared it; favoured children, every one of you, of the most High;²
yet the doom of mortals awaits you, you shall fall with the fall of human princes.
Bestir thyself, Lord, bring the world to judgement; all the nations are thy own domain.

82 (83)

(A song. A psalm. Of Asaph.)

BE silent, Lord, no longer. O God, do not keep still now, do not hold back now!
What turmoil among thy enemies; how their malice lifts its head! Busily they plot against thy people, compass the ruin of the men thou hast in thy keeping. Come, they whisper, let us put an end to their sovereignty, so that the very name of Israel will be remembered no more. All are agreed, all alike are ranged in confederacy against thee; here Edom lies encamped, there Ismael; Moab, too, and the Agarenes; Gabal, Ammon and Amelec, the Philistines, and the folk that dwell at Tyre.
Even Assyria has made common cause with them, lends her aid to these children of Lot.³

Do to these what thou didst to Midian, to Sisara and Jabin at the brook of Cison;
the men who died at Endor, rotted there like dung on the ground.⁴ May their princes fare as Oreb fared, and Zeb; may the doom of Zebec and Salmana be the doom of all their chieftains. And did they think to make God's chosen portion their spoil? My God, send them whirling this way and that, like leaves, like straws before the wind. See how the fire burns up the forest, how its flames scorch the mountainside! So let the fury of thy onset rout them, thy fury dismay them. Let their cheeks blush crimson with shame, Lord,

¹ Literally 'gods' as in verse 6, the Divine name being specially applied in this way to judges (cf. Ex. 21. 6).

² Jn. 10. 34.

³ vv. 7-9. It is not certain what was the occasion of this psalm. The names given suggest a simultaneous attack on the Jews by all their neighbours; the children of Lot are the Moabites and the Ammonites (Gen. 19. 37).

⁴ vv. 10-12. See Jg. 4; 7. 25; 8.

till they come to sue for thy favour; confusion and dismay be theirs for ever, for ever let them be abashed and brought to nothing, till they, too, know the meaning of the divine name, acknowledge thee as the most high God, the Overlord of earth.

ing away the record of their sins, all thy anger calmed, thy fierce displeasure forgotten! And now, God of our deliverance, do thou restore us; no longer let us see thy frown. Wouldst thou always be indignant with us? Must thy resentment smoulder on, age after age? Wilt thou never relent, O God, and give fresh life, to rejoice the spirits of thy people? Shew us thy mercy, Lord; grant us thy deliverance!

83 (84)

(To the choir-master. Melody: The Winepresses. Of the sons of Core. A psalm.)

LORD of hosts, how I love thy dwelling-place! For the courts of the Lord's house, my soul faints with longing. The living God! at his name my heart, my whole being thrills with joy. Where else should the sparrow find a home, the swallow a nest for her brood, but at thy altar, Lord of hosts, my king and my God? How blessed, Lord, are those who dwell in thy house! They will be ever praising thee. How blessed is the man who finds his strength in thee! Where there are hearts set on pilgrimage, the parched ravine turns into a water-course at their coming, new-clad by the bounty of returning rain. So, at each stage refreshed, they will reach Sion, and have sight there of the God who is above all gods.

Let me listen, now, to the voice of the Lord God; it is a message of peace he sends to his people; to his loyal servants, that come back, now, with all their heart to him. For us, his worshippers, deliverance is close at hand; in this land of ours, the divine glory is to find a home. See, where mercy and faithfulness meet in one; how justice and peace are united in one embrace! Faithfulness grows up out of the earth, and from heaven, redress looks down.² The Lord, now, will grant us his blessing, to make our land yield its harvest; justice will go on before him, deliverance follow where his feet tread.

85 (86)

(A prayer. Of David.)

Lord of hosts, listen to my prayer; God of Israel, grant me audience! God, ever our protector, do not disregard us now; look favourably upon him whom thou hast anointed!¹ Willingly would I give a thousand of my days for one spent in thy courts! Willingly reach but the threshold of my God's house, so I might dwell no more in the abode of sinners! Sun to enlighten, shield to protect us, the Lord God has favour, has honour to bestow. To innocent lives he will never refuse his bounty; Lord of hosts, blessed is the man who puts his confidence in thee.

TURN thy ear, Lord, and listen to me in my helplessness and my need. Protect a life dedicated to thyself; rescue a servant of thine that puts his trust in thee. In thee, my own God; have mercy, O Lord, for mercy I plead continually; comfort thy servant's heart, this heart that aspires, Lord, to thee. Who is so kind and forgiving, Lord, as thou art, who so rich in mercy to all who invoke him? Give a hearing, then, Lord, to my prayer; listen to my plea when I cry out to thee in a time of sore distress, counting on thy audience. There is none like thee, Lord, among the gods; none can do as thou doest. Lord, all the nations thou hast made must needs come and worship thee, honouring thy name, so great thou art, so marvellous in thy doings, thou who alone art God.

84 (85)

(To the choir-master. Of the sons of Core. A psalm.)

WHAT blessings, Lord, thou hast granted to this land of thine, restoring Jacob's fortunes, pardoning thy people's guilt, bury-

Guide me, Lord, thy own way, thy faithful care my escort; be all my heart's

¹ It is not certain whether King David, or the people of Israel, is here referred to as the anointed (or Christ) of God. ² ev. 11, 12. These verses perhaps imply that God's fidelity to his promises and God's mercy have combined to restore the Jewish people; that his justice, satisfied with the expiation of their sins, no longer grudges them peace and well-being; that loyalty to the old covenant is once more a native growth in the land of Israel, and that God looks down to reward it. But the picture may be a more general one.

12 direction reverence for thy name. O Lord my God, with all my heart I will praise thee, eternally hold thy name in honour 13 for the greatness of the mercy thou hast shewed me, in rescuing me thus from the 14 lowest depths of hell. And now, O God, see how scornful foes have set upon me, how their dread conspiracy threatens my life, with no thought of thee to restrain it!
 15 But thou, Lord, art a Lord of mercy and pity, patient, full of compassion, true to 16 thy promise. Look upon me and be merciful to me; rescue, with thy sovereign aid, one whose mother bore him to thy service!
 17 Shew me some token of thy favour; let my enemies see, abashed, how thou, Lord, dost help me, how thou, Lord, dost comfort
 me.

86

(87)

(Of the sons of Core. A psalm. A song.)

HIS own building amidst the inviolate 2 hills, dearer to the Lord are Sion walls 3 than any other home in Israel. How high 4 a boast, city of God, is made for thee, Mine it is to reckon the folk of Egypt, of Babylon, too, among my citizens! Philistines, Tyrians, Ethiopians, all must claim Sion 5 as their birthplace; None was ever born, the proverb shall run, that did not take his birth from her; it was the most High, none 6 other, that founded her. This was their birthplace, the Lord shall write over the 7 muster-roll of the nations; nor any but shall tell her praises with song and dance, each claiming from her its only origin.¹

87

(88)

(A song. A psalm. Of the sons of Core. To the choir-master. Melody: Mahalat. For singing. A maskil. Of Heman the Ezrahite.)

2 LORD God, day and night I cry bitterly 3 to thee; let my prayer reach thy presence, 4 give audience to my entreaty, for indeed my heart is full of trouble. My life sinks 5 ever closer to the grave; I count as one of those who go down into the abyss, like one 6 powerless. As well lie among the dead, men laid low in the grave, men thou re-memberest no longer, cast away, now, 7 from thy protecting hand. Such is the place where thou hast laid me, in a deep 8 pit where the dark waters swirl; heavily thy anger weighs down on me, and thou dost overwhelm me with its full flood.

 Thou hast estranged all my acquaintance from me, so that they treat me as a thing accursed; I lie in a prison whence there is no escape, my eyes grow dim with tears.
 On thee I call, to thee stretch out my hands, each day that passes.

Not for the dead thy wonderful power is shewn; not for pale shadows to return and give thee thanks. There in the grave, how shall they recount thy mercies; how shall they tell of thy faithfulness, now that life is gone? How can there be talk of thy marvels in a world of darkness, of thy favour in a land where all is forgotten? To prayer, Lord, fall I lustily; it shall reach thee, while there is yet time. Why dost thou reject my plea, Lord, and turn thy face away from me? Ever since youth, misery and mortal sickness have been my lot; wearily I have borne thy visitations; I am overwhelmed with thy anger, dismayed by thy threats, that still cut me off like a flood, all at once surrounding me.
 Friends and neighbours gone, a world of shadows is all my company.

88

(89)

(A maskil. Of Ethan the Ezrahite.)

HERE is a song to put the Lord's mercies on record for ever; ages will pass, and still these words of mine shall proclaim thy faithfulness. Charter of everlasting mercy thy own lips have given; there, in the heavens, thy faithful promise rests: I have made a sworn covenant with my chosen servant David: To all time I will make thy posterity continue, age after age I will bid thy throne endure.

And are not those heavens, Lord, witnesses of thy wonderful power, of thy faithfulness, before the court of the holy ones? Who is there above the clouds to rival the Lord; where is the Lord's like among all the sons of God? How is God feared, in that assembly of the holy ones;
 how great he is, how high in reverence above all that stand about him! Lord God of hosts, who can compare with thee; in the power, Lord, that is thine, in the faithfulness that everywhere attends thee? It

¹ The Latin version here rendered involves several corrections of the Hebrew text, which is very obscure.

is thou that dost curb the pride of the sea, 1 and calm the tumult of its waves; wounded lies Rahab¹ at thy feet, by the strong arm 2 that has routed thy enemies. Thine are the heavens, thine the earth; author, thou, of 3 the world and all it holds. The north wind and the south are of thy fashioning; thy name wakes the glad echoes of Thabor and 4 Hermon. God of the strong arm, the sure, the uplifted hand, right and justice are the pillars of thy throne; mercy and faithful-5 ness the heralds of thy coming.

Happy is the people that knows well the shout of praise, that lives, Lord, in the smile of thy protection! Evermore they take pride in thy name, rejoice over thy just dealings. What else but thy glory inspires their strength? What else but thy favour bids us lift our heads? From the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, that royal protection comes which is our shield.

Long ago, in a vision, thou didst make a promise to thy faithful servants. Thou saidst, I have crowned you a warrior king, chosen out among the common folk a man to honour. Here was my servant David; on him my consecrating oil has been poured. My hand shall never leave him unprotected, my arm shall give him courage; no enemy shall take him unaware, no envious rival have power, 1 henceforth, to crush him; beaten down, every foe, at his onset, baffled, all their ill will. My faithfulness and mercy shall go with him; by my favour he shall rise to pre-eminence. I will make his power rest on the sea; to the streams of the great river his hand shall reach out.² Thou art my Father, he will cry out to me, thou art my God, my stronghold and my refuge; and I will acknowledge him as my first-born, overlord to all the kings of earth. I will continue my favour towards him for ever, my covenant with him shall remain unbroken; I will give him a posterity that never fails, a throne enduring as heaven itself. Do his children forsake my law, to follow paths not mine; do they violate my decrees, leave my will undone? Then they shall feel the rod for their transgressions, I will scourge them for their sin, but I will not cancel my gracious promise to him;

never will I be guilty of unfaithfulness, never will I violate my covenant, or alter 35 the decree once spoken. Pledged stands 36 my inviolable word, I will never be false to David; his posterity shall continue for 37 ever, his royalty, too, shall last on in my presence like the sun; like the moon's 38 eternal orb, that bears witness in heaven unalterable.

And now? Now thou hast only loathing and scorn for us; heavy thy hand falls on him thou hast anointed. Spurned lies the 40 covenant thou didst make with thy servant, thou hast dishonoured his royalty in the dust, broken down all the walls about him, 41 and made a ruin of his stronghold, till he is 42 plundered by every passer-by, a laughingstock to all his neighbours. Thou hast 43 granted aid to the attacking armies, triumph to all his enemies, foiling the 44 thrust of his sword, and denying him thy succour in battle. Thou hast robbed him 45 of the bright glory³ that once was his; thou hast cast down his throne to earth, cut his 46 manhood short before its time; confusion overwhelms him.

Lord, wilt thou always turn thy face away so obdurately, will the flame of thy anger never be quenched? Remember how 48 frail a thing I am, how brief a destiny thou hast granted to all Adam's sons. Where is 49 the man that can live on, and leave death untasted; can ransom his life from the power of the world beneath? Lord, where 50 are those mercies of an earlier time, prom-51 ised so faithfully to David? Remember how a world's taunts assail thy people, and 52 this one heart must bear them all; shall they hurl taunts, Lord, these, thy enemies, after the man thou thyself hast anointed?

Blessed be the Lord for ever. Amen. 53

89

(90)

(A prayer. Of Moses, the man of God.)

LORD, thou hast been our refuge from generation to generation. Before the hills 2 came to birth, before the whole frame of the world was engendered, from eternity to eternity, O God, thou art. And wilt thou 3 bring man to dust again, that thou sayest, Return, children of Adam, to what you

¹ 'Insolence' in the original is 'Rahab', either referring to Egypt (as in 86. 4), or personifying the principle of Chaos destroyed by the Creation (73. 13). ² 'The great river' is Euphrates, as in 71. 8, 79. 12.

³ Literally, 'purification'.

4 were? In thy sight, a thousand years are but as yesterday, that has come and gone, 5 or as one of the night-watches. Swiftly thou bearest our lives away, as a waking 6 dream, or the green grass that blooms fresh with the morning; night finds it 7 faded and dead. Still thy anger takes toll 8 of us, thy displeasure denies us rest, so jealous thy scrutiny of our wrong-doing, so clear our hidden sins shew in the light 9 of thy presence. Day after day vanishes, and still thy anger lasts; swift as a breath 10 our lives pass away. What is our span of days? Seventy years it lasts, eighty years, if lusty folk we be; for the more part, toil and frustration; years that vanish in a 11 moment, and we are gone. Alas, that so few heed thy vengeance, measure thy anger 12 by the reverence we owe thee! Teach us to count every passing day, till our hearts find wisdom.

13 Relent, Lord; must it be for ever? Be 14 gracious to thy servants. For us thy timely mercies, for us abiding happiness and con-15 tent; happiness that shall atone for the time when thou didst afflict us, for the long 16 years of ill fortune. Let these eyes see thy purpose accomplished, to our own sons 17 reveal thy glory; the favour of the Lord our God smile on us! Prosper our doings, Lord, prosper our doings yet.

90

(91)

CONTENT if thou be to live with the most High for thy defence, under his Almighty 2 shadow abiding still, him thy refuge, him thy stronghold thou mayst call, thy own 3 God, in whom is all thy trust. He it is will rescue thee from every treacherous lure, 4 every destroying plague. His wings for refuge, nestle thou shalt under his care, 5 his faithfulness thy watch and ward. Nothing shalt thou have to fear from nightly 6 terrors, from the arrow that flies by daylight, from pestilence that walks to and fro 7 under the noon. Though a thousand fall at thy side, ten thousand at thy right hand, it shall never come next or near thee; 8 rather, thy eyes shall look about thee, and see the reward of sinners.

9 He, the Lord, is thy refuge; thou hast found a stronghold in the most High.

There is no harm that can befall thee, no plague that shall come near thy dwelling.
 He has given charge to his angels con-11 cerning thee, to watch over thee where-soever thou goest; they will hold thee up 12 with their hands lest thou shouldst chance to trip on a stone. Thou shalt tread safely 13 on asp and adder, crush lion and serpent under thy feet.

He trusts in me, mine it is to rescue him;
 he acknowledges my name, from me he shall have protection; when he calls upon me, I will listen, in affliction I am at his side, to bring him safety and honour.
 Length of days he shall have to content 14 him, and find in me deliverance.

91

(92)

(A psalm. A song. On the sabbath day.)

SWEET it is to praise the Lord, to sing, 2 most high God, in honour of thy name;
 to proclaim thy mercy and faithfulness at 3 daybreak and at the fall of night. Here is a theme for ten-stringed harp and viol, for 4 music of voice and zither; so delightful, Lord, is all thou doest, so thrills my heart 5 at the sight of all thou hast made. How magnificent is thy creation, Lord, how 6 unfathomable are thy purposes! And still, too dull to learn, too slow to grasp his 7 lesson, the wrong-doer goes on in his busy wickedness. Still he thrives, makes a brave 8 show like the grass in spring, yet is he doomed to perish eternally, whilst thou, 9 Lord, art for ever exalted on high.
 Vanished away thy enemies, Lord, van-10 ished away, and all their busy wickedness scattered to the winds!

Strength thy power gives me, that gives 11 strength to the wild oxen; refreshes me as with the touch of pure oil. Blessed are 12 these eyes with the sight of my enemies' downfall, these ears with the tidings of in-13 solvent malice defeated. The innocent man will flourish as the palm-tree flourishes;
 he will grow to greatness as the cedars 14 grow on Lebanon. Planted in the temple of the Lord, growing up in the very courts of our God's house, the innocent will 15 flourish in a green old age, all freshness and vigour still; theirs to proclaim how 16 just is the Lord my refuge, his dealings how clear of wrong.

92 (93)

THE Lord reigns as king, robed in majesty; royalty the Lord has for robe and girdle. He it was that founded the solid earth, to abide immovable. Firm stood thy throne ere ever the world began; from all eternity, thou art. Loud the rivers echo, Lord, loud the rivers echo, crashing down in flood. Magnificent the roar of eddying waters; magnificent the sea's rage; magnificent above these, the Lord reigns in heaven. How faithful, Lord, are thy promises! Holy is thy house, and must needs be holy until the end of time.

wrong-doers? It is the Lord that helps me; but for that, the grave would soon be my resting-place. Still, when my foothold seems lost, thy mercy, Lord, holds me up; amid all the thronging cares that fill my heart, my soul finds comfort in thy consolation. What part have these unjust judges with thee, that make mischief in the name of law? Let them harry the just as they will, pass sentence of death upon the innocent, the Lord will be my defence, in my God I shall find a rock-fastness still. He will punish the wrong, destroy them in their wickedness; doubt not the Lord our God will destroy them.

93 (94)

IN thy divine vengeance, Lord, in thy divine vengeance stand revealed! Judge of the world, mount thy throne, and give the proud their deserts! Must it be the sinners still, Lord, the sinners still that triumph? Shall there be no end to the prating, the rebellious talk, the boastfulness of wrong-doers? See, Lord, how they crush down thy people, afflict the land of thy choice, murder the widow and the stranger, slay the orphan! And they think, The Lord will never see it, the God of Israel pays no heed. Pay heed, rather, yourselves, dull hearts that count among my people; fools, learn your lesson ere it is too late. Is he deaf, the God who implanted hearing in us; is he blind, the God who gave us eyes to see? He who gives nations their schooling, who taught man all that man knows, will he not call you to account? The Lord looks into men's hearts, and finds there illusion.

Happy, Lord, is the man whom thou dost chasten, reading him the lesson of thy law! For him, thou wilt lighten the time of adversity, digging a pit all the while to entrap the sinner. God will not abandon his people, will not desert his chosen land; ere long his justice will reappear in judgement, claiming all upright hearts for its own. Who takes my part against the oppressor? Who rallies to my side against the COME, friends, rejoice we in the Lord's honour; cry we out merrily to God, our strength and deliverer; with praises court his presence, singing a joyful psalm! A high God is the Lord, a king high above all the gods;¹ beneath his hand lie the depths of earth, his are the mountain peaks; his the ocean, for who but he created it? What other power fashioned the dry land? Come in, then, fall we down in worship, bowing the knee before God who made us. Who but the Lord is our God? And what are we, but folk of his pasturing, sheep that follow his beckoning hand?

Would you but listen to his voice to-day! Do not harden your hearts, as they were hardened once at Meriba, at Massa in the wilderness.² Your fathers put me to the test, challenged me, as if they lacked proof of my power, for forty years together; from that generation I turned away in loathing;³ These, I said, are ever wayward hearts, these have never learned to obey me. And I took an oath in anger, They shall never attain my rest.⁴

95 (96)

SING the Lord a new song;⁵ in the Lord's honour, let the whole earth make melody!

¹ The Gallican Psalter, which is used in the liturgical recitation of the psalm, adds at the end of this verse 'God will not abandon his people' (cf. 93. 14). ² Ex. 17. 7. ³ The Gallican Psalter has, 'When I lived close to that generation'. ⁴ vs. 8-11. See Heb. 3. 7-19. ⁵ This psalm is to be found in a slightly altered form in I Par. 16 (verses 23 and following).

2 Sing to the Lord, and bless his name; never cease to bear record of his power to 3 save. Publish his glory among the heathen; his wonderful acts for all the world to hear.
 4 How great is the Lord, how worthy of honour! What other god is to be feared as 5 he? They are but fancied gods the heathen call divine; the Lord, not they, made the 6 heavens. Honour and beauty are his escort; worship and magnificence the attendants of his shrine.
 7 Tribes of the heathen, make your offering to the Lord, an offering to the Lord of 8 glory and homage, an offering of glory to the Lord's name; bring sacrifice, come 9 into his courts, worship the Lord in holy array. Before the Lord's presence let the 10 whole earth bow in reverence; tell the heathen, The Lord is king now, he has put the world in order, never to be thrown into confusion more; he gives the nations a just 11 award. Rejoice, heaven, and let earth be glad; let the sea, and all the sea contains, 12 give thunderous applause. The fields, and all the burden they bear, full of expectancancy; no tree in the forest but will rejoice 13 to greet its Lord's coming. He comes to rule the earth; brings the world justice, to every race of men its promised award.

96 (97)

THE Lord reigns as king; let earth be glad of it, let the isles, the many isles, rejoice!
 2 See where he sits, clouds and darkness about him, justice and right the pillars of 3 his throne; see where he comes, fire sweeping on before him, burning up his enemies 4 all around. In the flash of his lightning, how shines the world revealed, how earth trem-5 bles at the sight! The hills melt like wax at the presence of the Lord; his presence, 6 whom all the earth obeys. The very heavens proclaim his faithfulness; no nation 7 but has sight of his glory. Shame upon the men that worship carved images, and make their boast of false gods! him only all the powers of heaven, prostrate, adore.
 8 Glad news for Sion, rejoicing for Juda's townships, when thy judgements, Lord, 9 are made known; art thou not sovereign Lord of earth, beyond measure exalted 10 above all gods? They are the Lord's friends, who were never friends to wrong;

souls that are true to him he guards ever,
 rescues them from the power of evil-doers.
 Dawn of hope for the innocent, dawn of gladness for honest hearts! Rejoice and triumph, just souls, in the Lord, of his holy name publish everywhere the renown.

97 (98)

(A psalm.)

SING the Lord a new song, a song of wonder at his doings; how his own right hand, his own holy arm, brought him victory. The Lord has given proof of his saving power, has vindicated his just dealings, for all the nations to see; has remembered his gracious promise, and kept faith with the house of Israel; no corner of the world but has witnessed how our God can save. In God's honour let all the earth keep holiday; let all be mirth and rejoicing and festal melody! Praise the Lord with the harp, with harp and psalter's music;
 with trumpets of metal, and the music of the braying horn! Keep holiday in the presence of the Lord, our King; the sea astir, and all that the sea holds, the world astir, and all that dwell on it; the rivers echoing their applause, the hills, too, rejoicing to see the Lord come. He comes to judge the earth; brings the world justice, to every race of men its due award.

98 (99)

THE Lord is king, the nations are adread;
 he is throned above the Cherubim, and earth trembles before him. Great is the Lord who dwells in Sion, sovereign ruler of all peoples! Let them all praise that great name of thine, a name terrible and holy. He reigns in might, that right loves, to all assuring redress, giving the sons of Jacob doom and award. Praise, then, the Lord our God, and bow down before his footstool; that, too, is holy. Remember Moses and Aaron, and all those priests of his, Samuel and those others who called on his name, how the Lord listened when they called upon him. His voice came to them from the pillar of cloud; so it was they heard the decrees, the command he gave them. And thou, O Lord our God, didst listen to them, and they found thee

a God of pardon; yet every fault of theirs thou wert quick to punish. Praise the Lord our God, and do worship on the holy mountain where he dwells; the Lord our God is holy.

99 (100)

(A psalm. For thanksgiving.)

LET the whole earth keep holiday in God's honour; pay to the Lord the homage of your rejoicing, appear in his presence with glad hearts. Learn that it is the Lord, no other, who is God; his we are, he it was that made us; we are his own people, sheep of his own pasturing. Pass through these gates, enter these courts of his, with hymns of praise, give him thanks, and bless his name. Gracious is the Lord, everlasting his mercy; age after age, he is faithful to his promise still.

100 (101)

(Of David. A psalm.)

OF mercy and of justice my song shall be; a psalm in thy honour, Lord, from one that would guide his steps ever more perfectly. Ah, when wilt thou grant me thy presence?¹ Here in my house I would live with stainless heart; no ill purpose clouding my view, the transgressors of the law my enemies. None such will I have at my side; here treachery shall find no place, knavery no countenance; of whispered calumny, death shall be the reward; on scornful looks and proud thoughts I will have no mercy. To plain, honest folk in the land I will look for my company; my servants shall be such as follow the path of innocence. No welcome here for schemers, no standing in my presence for men who talk deceitfully. Mine, as the days pass, to root out from the land every guilty soul, till I purge the Lord's city of all evil-doing.

101 (102)

(A prayer for the friendless man, when he is troubled, and is pouring out his griefs before the Lord.)

O LORD, hear my prayer, and let my cry come unto thee. Do not turn thy face away from me, but lend me thy ear in time of affliction; give me swift audience whenever I call upon thee. See how this life of mine passes away like smoke, how this frame wastes like a tinder! Drained of strength, like grass the sun scorches, I leave my food untasted, forgotten; I am spent with sighing, till my skin clings to my bones. I am no better than a pelican out in the desert, an owl on some ruined dwelling; I keep mournful watch, lonely as a single sparrow on the house top. Still my enemies taunt me, in their mad rage make a by-word of me. Ashes are all my food, I drink nothing but what comes to me mingled with my tears; I shrink before thy vengeful anger, so low thou hast brought me, who didst once lift me so high. Like a tapering shadow my days dwindle, wasting away, like grass in the sun!

Lord, thou endurest for ever, thy name, age after age, is not forgotten; surely thou wilt bestir thyself, and give Zion redress! It is time, now, to take pity on her, the hour has come. See how thy servants love her even in ruin, how they water her dust with their tears! Will not the heathen learn reverence, Lord, for thy glorious name, all those monarchs of the earth, when they hear that the Lord has built Zion anew; that he has revealed himself there in glory, has given heed to the prayer of the afflicted, neglects their appeal no more? Such legend inscribe we for a later age to read it; a new people will arise, to praise the Lord; the Lord, who looks down from his sanctuary on high, viewing earth from heaven, who has listened to the groans of the prisoners, delivered a race that was doomed to die. There will be talk of the Lord's name in Sion, of his praise in Jerusalem, when peoples and kings meet there to pay him their homage.

Here, on my journey, he has brought my strength to an end, cut short my days. What, my God, wilt thou snatch me away, my life half done? Age after age thy years endure; it was thou, Lord, that didst lay the foundations of earth when time began, it was thy hand that built the heavens. They will perish, but thou wilt remain; they will all be like a cloak that grows threadbare, and thou wilt lay them aside

¹ This is thought by some commentators to mean the coming of the Ark to Jerusalem (II Kg. 6).

like a garment, and exchange them for 28 new; thou art unchanging, thy years can 29 never fail. The posterity of thy servants shall yet hold their lands in peace, their race shall live on in thy keeping.

102

(Of David.)

(103)

BLESS the Lord, my soul, unite, all my 2 powers, to bless that holy name. Bless the 3 Lord, my soul, remembering all he has 4 done for thee, how he pardons all thy sins, 5 heals all thy mortal ills, rescues thy life from deadly peril, crowns thee with the 6 blessings of his mercy; how he contents all thy desire for good, restores thy youth, 7 as the eagle's plumage is restored. The Lord's acts are acts of justice, every 8 wronged soul he offers redress. The Lord, who told Moses his secrets, who shewed
 the sons of Israel his power!

9 How pitying and gracious the Lord is, 10 how patient, how rich in mercy! He will not always be finding fault, his frown does 11 not last for ever; he does not treat us as our sins deserve, does not exact the penalty 12 of our wrong-doing. High as heaven above the earth towers his mercy for the men that 13 fear him; far as the east is from the west, 14 he clears away our guilt from us. For his own worshippers, the Lord has a father's 15 pity; does he not know the stuff of which we are made, can he forget that we are only 16 dust? Man's life is like the grass, he blooms and dies like a flower in the fields; 17 once the hot wind has passed over, it has gone, forgotten by the place where it grew.
 18 But the Lord's worshippers know no beginning or end of his mercy; he will keep 19 faith with their children's children, do they but hold fast by his covenant, and live 20 mindful of his law. The Lord has set up his throne in heaven, rules with universal 21 sway. Bless the Lord, all you angels of his; angels of sovereign strength, that carry out his commandment, attentive to the word 22 he utters; bless the Lord, all you hosts of his, the servants that perform his will; 23 bless the Lord, all you creatures of his, in every corner of his dominion; and thou, my soul, bless the Lord.

103

(104)

BLESS the Lord, my soul; O Lord my God, what magnificence is thine! Glory and beauty are thy clothing. The light is 2 a garment thou dost wrap about thee, the heavens a curtain thy hand unfolds. The 3 waters of heaven are thy ante-chamber, the clouds thy chariot; on the wings of the wind thou dost come and go. Thou wilt 4 have thy angels be like the winds,¹ the servants that wait on thee like a flame of fire.

The earth thou hast planted on its own 5 firm base, undisturbed for all time. The 6 deep once covered it, like a cloak; the waters stood high above the mountains,² then covered before thy rebuking word, 7 fled away at thy voice of thunder, leaving 8 the mountain heights to rise, the valleys to sink into their appointed place! And to 9 these waters thou hast given a frontier they may not pass; never must they flow back, and cover the earth again. Yet there shall 10 be torrents flooding the glens, watercourses among the hills that give drink to 11 every wild beast; here the wild asses may slake their thirst. The birds of heaven, too, 12 will roost beside them; vocal is every bough with their music.

From thy high dwelling-place thou dost 13 send rain upon the hills; thy hand gives earth all her plenty. Grass must grow for 14 the cattle; for man, too, she must put forth her shoots, if he is to bring corn out from her bosom; if there is to be wine that will 15 rejoice man's heart, oil to make his face shine, and bread that will keep man's strength from failing. Moisture there must 16 be for the forest trees, for the cedars of Lebanon, trees of the Lord's own planting.
 Here it is the birds build their nests; 17
 the stork makes its home in the fir-branches;
 finds refuge there such as the goats find in 18 the high hills, the coney in its cave.

He has given us the moon for our 19 calendar; the sun knows well the hour of his setting. Thou dost decree darkness, 20 and the night falls; in the night all the forest is astir with prowling beasts; the 21 young lions go roaring after their prey, God's pensioners, asking for their food.
 Then the sun rises, and they slink away to 22 lie down in their dens, while man goes 23

¹ Some would render 'Thou makest the winds thy messengers', but the second half of the verse is against this. ² See Gen. 1. 9.

abroad to toil and drudge till the evening. What diversity, Lord, in thy creatures! What wisdom has designed them all! There is nothing on earth but gives proof of thy creative power.

There lies the vast ocean, stretching wide on every hand; this, too, is peopled with living things past number, great creatures and small; the ships pass them on their course. Leviathan himself is among them; him, too, thou hast created to roam there at his pleasure.¹ And all look to thee to send them their food at the appointed time; it is through thy gift they find it, thy hand opens, and all are filled with content. But see, thou hidest thy face, and they are dismayed; thou takest their life from them, and they breathe no more, go back to the dust they came from. Then thou sendest forth thy spirit, and there is fresh creation; thou dost repeople the face of earth.

Glory be to the Lord for ever; still let him take delight in his creatures. One glance from him makes earth tremble; at his touch, the mountains are wreathed in smoke. While life lasts, I will sing in the Lord's honour; my praise shall be his while I have breath to praise him; oh, may this prayer with him find acceptance, in whom is all my content! Perish all sinners from the land, let the wrong-doers be forgotten! But thou, my soul, bless the Lord. Alleluia.

104 (105)

PRaise the Lord, and call upon his name; tell the story of his doings for all the nations to hear; greet him with song and psalm, recount his acts of miracle. Triumph in that holy name; let every heart that longs for the Lord rejoice. On the Lord, on the Lord's greatness still let your hearts dwell, on the Lord's presence be your hearts set. Remember the marvellous acts he did, his miracles, his sentences of doom; are you not the posterity of Abraham, his own servant, sons of that Jacob on whom his choice fell? And he, the Lord, is our own God, wide though his writ runs through all the world. He keeps in everlasting memory that covenant of his, that promise which a thousand ages might not cancel. He gave Abraham a promise, bound himself to Isaac by an oath; by that law Jacob should live, his Israel, bound to him with an eternal covenant. To thee, he said, I will give the land of Chanaan, a portion allotted to thee and thine. So few they were in number, only a handful, living there as strangers! And ever they passed on from country to country, the guests of king or people; but he suffered none to harm them;² to kings themselves the warning came; Lay no hand on them, never hurt them, servants anointed and true spokesmen of mine.

And now he brought famine on the land, cutting off all their supply of bread. But he had sent an envoy to prepare the way for them, that very Joseph, who was sold as a slave. Fetters held his feet, the yoke galled his neck, but he proved a true prophet at last, the Lord's accomplished word to vindicate him.³ Then the king sent to release him; the proud ruler of many peoples set him free, and appointed him master of his household, lord of all the possessions that were his. Joseph should teach his courtiers to be as Joseph was, should train his aged counsellors in wisdom. So it was that Israel came into Egypt, that Jacob dwelt as an alien in the country of Cham.

Time passed, and he gave his people great increase of numbers, till it out-matched its rivals. And in these he wrought a change of heart; they grew weary of his people's presence, devised ruin for his worshippers. And now he sent his servant Moses, and Aaron, the man of his choice, to bring about those signs, those miracles of his which the country of Cham would witness. Dark night he sent to benight them, and still his warnings went unheeded.⁴ He turned their supply of water into blood, killing all the fish; frogs swarmed out of the ground, even in their royal palaces; at his word, flies attacked them, and gnats all their land over; hail was the rain he gave them, and it brought fire that burned up their countryside; he shattered their vines and fig-trees, broke

¹ It is possible to read another sense; namely, that God has made the whale (or whatever creature Leviathan represents) as a jest for his own enjoyment.

² See Gen. 12, 17.

³ See Gen. 40, 41.

⁴ The Hebrew text gives 'And they (? Moses and Aaron) heeded his words'.

down all the wood that grew in their domains. He gave the word, and locusts came, grasshoppers, too, past all numbering, eating up all the grass they had, eating up all the crops their land yielded. Then, his hand fell upon Egypt's first-born, on the first-fruits of all they had engendered; and so he brought his people out, enriched with silver and gold, no foot that stumbled among all their tribes.

Glad indeed was Egypt at their going, such fear of them had overtaken it. He spread out a cloud to cover them, that turned to fire in the darkness, lighting their journey. Quails came, when they asked for food; he satisfied their desire, too, with bread from heaven, and pierced the rock so that water flowed down, running streams in the wilderness. So well did he remember that holy promise of his, made to his servant Abraham; in joy and triumph he led them out, his chosen people, and gave them the lands of the heathen for their own. There, on soil Gentile hands had tilled, his commandments should be kept sacred, his law should reign. Alleluia.

105

(106)

(Alleluia.)

PRAISE the Lord, the Lord is gracious; his mercy endures for ever; what tongue can recount all the great deeds of the Lord, can echo all his praise? Blessed are they who abide ever by his decrees, ever do the right! Remember me, Lord, with loving thoughts towards thy people, come and strengthen me with thy aid, to witness the prosperity of thy chosen servants, to rejoice with thy people that rejoices, to share the glory of thy own domain.

We have taken part in our fathers' sins; we are guilty men, rebels against thee. So it was with our fathers in Egypt; unremarked, thy wonderful doings, unremembered, thy abundant mercies; even at the Red Sea they must prove rebellious. Yet, for his own honour, to make known his power, he delivered them, checking the Red Sea, so that it dried up, and leading them through its depths as safely as if they trod the desert sands. From a cruel tyrant's grasp he rescued them, claimed them for his own; and the water overwhelmed their pursuers, till not one of them was left. They believed, then, in his promises, sang songs, then, in his honour, but soon they forgot what he had done, and could not wait upon his will. They must needs give way to their cravings in the wilderness, challenge God's power, there in the desert, till he granted their will, then sent a wasting sickness to plague them. Faction raised its head in the camp against Moses, against Aaron, the Lord's chosen priest; and now earth gaped, swallowing up Dathan, overwhelming Abiron and his conspiracy; fire broke out in their company, and the rebels perished by its flames. They made a calf, too, at Horeb, casting a golden image and worshipping it, as if they would exchange the glory that dwelt among them for the semblance of a bullock at grass. So little they remembered the God who had delivered them, those portents of his in Egypt, strange things seen in the land of Cham, terrible things down by the Red Sea! What wonder if he threatened to make an end of them? But Moses, the man of his choice, stood in the breach to confront his anger, to ward off destruction.

And now they poured scorn on the land of their desire, distrusting his promise; the camp was all disaffection. So the Lord, finding they would not listen to his voice, lifted his hand and threatened to smite them down, there in the wilderness; they should be lost among the peoples, scattered wide through the world. They dedicated themselves to Beelphegor, in honour of the dead gods sat down to feast; till their wicked ways roused God's anger, and a plague fell upon them. Nor might the destruction cease, till Phinees rose up and made amends, winning himself such title to God's favour as shall be remembered, age after age, eternally. They provoked his anger, too, at the waters of Meriba, so that Moses was punished for their sake; because, in his heart's bitterness, he broke out into open complaint.

Not theirs to root out the heathen, as the Lord had bidden them; they mingled with the heathen instead, and learned their ways; worshipping carved images, to their own undoing, sacrificing their sons and daughters in honour of devils. Innocent blood, the blood of their own sons and daughters, was poured out in worship to the idols of Chanaan; with blood the whole land was polluted, so heinous the guilt of its people, so wanton their ways. Then God's anger blazed up against his people, his chosen race became abominable to him, and he handed them over to the Gentiles; despised slaves, they were oppressed by their enemies, bowed down under the yoke. Again and again he brought them deliverance, but ever there were fresh shifts to provoke him, there was fresh guilt to drag them in the dust. And still, when he saw their distress, when he heard their appeals to him, the thought of his covenant availed them; in his great mercy he would relent; their very captors should be moved to pity.

Deliver us, O Lord our God, and gather us again, scattered as we are among the heathen, to praise thy holy name, to triumph in thy renown.

Blessed be the God of Israel from all eternity to all eternity; let all the people cry, Amen, Alleluia.

106 (107)

PRaise the Lord, the Lord is gracious; his mercy endures for ever; be this the cry of men the Lord has rescued, rescued them from the enemy's hand, and gathered them in from sunrise and sunset, from the north country and the south.

Some have wandered in parched deserts, missing the way to the city that was their home, hungry and thirsty, so that their spirits died within them. So they cried out to the Lord in their trouble, and he relieved their distress, guiding them surely to the place where they should find a home. Praise they the Lord in his mercies, in his wondrous dealings with mortal men; poor souls that were thirsty, contented now, poor souls that were hungry, satisfied now with all good.

Some lay where darkness overshadowed them, helpless in bonds of iron; their punishment for rebelling against God's decrees, for thwarting the will of the most High. Their hearts bowed down with sorrow, none else to aid their faltering steps, they cried out to the Lord in their trouble, and he relieved their distress, rescuing them from darkness, from the shadows, tearing their chains asunder. Praise they the Lord in his mercies, in his wondrous dealings with mortal men; the Lord who has shattered the gates of brass, riven the bonds of iron.

Some for their own fault must needs be humbled; for their guilt they lay sick, with no stomach for food, close to death's door. So they cried out to the Lord in their trouble, and he relieved their distress, uttered the word of healing, and saved them from their peril. Praise they the Lord in his mercies, in his wondrous dealings with mortal men; theirs to offer him sacrifice in thanksgiving, and proclaim joyfully what he has done for them.

Some there were that ventured abroad in ships, trafficking over the high seas; these are men that have witnessed the Lord's doings, his wonderful doings amid the deep. At his word the stormy wind rose, churning up its waves; high up towards heaven they were carried, then sank into the trough, with spirits fainting at their peril; see them reeling and staggering to and fro as a drunkard does, all their seamanship forgotten! So they cried out to the Lord in their trouble, and he relieved their distress, stilling the storm into a whisper, till all its waves were quiet. Glad hearts were theirs, when calm fell about them, and he brought them to the haven where they longed to be. Praise they the Lord in his mercies, in his wondrous dealings with mortal men; let them extol his name, where the people gather, glorify him where the elders sit in council.

Here, he changes rivers into desert sand, wells into dry ground; land that once was fruitful into a salty marsh, to punish its people's guilt. There, he turns the wilderness into pools of water, desert ground into springs; and establishes hungry folk there, so that they build themselves a city to dwell in, sow fields, and plant vineyards, and reap the harvest; he blesses them, so that their numbers increase beyond measure, and to their cattle grants increase. Once, they were but few, worn down by stress of need and ill fortune; but now the same power that shames proud chieftains, and keeps them wandering in a pathless desert, has rescued the poor from need, their households thrive like their own flocks.

- 42 Honest men will rejoice to witness it, and malice will stand dumb with confusion.
43 Heed it well, if thou wouldst be wise; be these thy study, the mercies of the Lord.

107

(108)

(A song. A psalm. Of David.)

- 2 A TRUE heart, my God, a heart true to thy service; I will sing of thee and praise thee.
3 Wake, my heart, wake, echoes of harp and viol; dawn shall find me watching. Let me give thanks, Lord, for all the world to hear 5 it, sing psalms while the Gentiles listen, of thy mercy, high above heaven itself, of thy 6 faithfulness, that reaches the clouds! O God, mount high above the heavens¹ till thy glory overshadows the whole earth.
7 Now bring aid to the men thou lovest, give our prayer answer, and lift thy right hand to save. God's word came to us from his sanctuary: In triumph I will divide up Sichern, and parcel out the valley of Tents; 9 to me Galaad, to me Manasses belongs; Ephraim is my helmet, Juda the staff I bear. Now Moab, too, shall be my drudge; over Edom I will claim my right; I will 11 lead the Philistines away in triumph. Such was the oracle; but now who is to lead me on my march against this fortress, who is 12 to find an entrance for me into Edom, when thou, O God, hast disowned us, and wilt 13 not go into battle with our armies? It is thou that must deliver us from peril; vain 14 is the help of man. Only through God can we fight victoriously; only he can trample our oppressors in the dust.²

108

(109)

(To the choir-master. Of David. A psalm.)

- GOD that guardest my renown, do not 2 leave me unbefriended; there are malicious lips, treacherous lips, that decry me; whispering against me, hedging me about with 3 a conspiracy of hatred, in unprovoked 4 attack. On their side, all calumny in return for love, on mine all prayer; kindness is repaid with injury, love with ill will.

An ill master let him have,³ and an accuser ready at his side; let him leave the court of judgement a doomed man, pleading with heaven in vain. Swiftly let his days come to an end, and his office be entrusted to another;⁴ orphanacy for the children, widowhood for the wife! Driven from a ruined home, to and fro let his children wander, begging their bread, while eager creditors eye his goods, and strangers divide the fruits of his toil. May no friend be left to do him a kindness, none to have pity on his defenceless kin; a speedy end to his race, oblivion for his name before a generation passes! Still may the sin of his fathers be remembered in the Lord's sight, his mother's guilt remain indelible; still may the Lord keep it in mind, and wipe out their memory from the earth. Did he himself keep mercy in mind, when he persecuted the helpless, the destitute, the grief-stricken, and marked them down for death? Cursing he loved, upon him let the curse fall; for blessing he cared little, may blessing still pass him by. Let cursing wrap him about, sink like water into his inmost being, soak, like oil, into the marrow of his bones! Let it be the garb he wears, cling to him like a girdle he can never take off.

So, in their own coin, may the Lord repay them,⁵ my accusers that defame me so cruelly. But do thou, my Lord and Master, take my part, to defend thy own honour; no mercy is so tender as thine. Deliver me in my helpless need; my heart is pierced through with anguish. Like a tapering shadow I depart, swept away like a locust on the wing. My knees are weak with fasting, my strength pines away un-nourished. They make a laughing-stock of me, toss their heads in derision as they pass by. Help me, O Lord my God; deliver me in thy mercy; prove to them that my woes are a visitation from thee, sent by no hand but thine. Bless me, thou, and let them curse as they will; disappoint my adversaries, and grant thy servant relief. Let these, my accusers, be covered with shame, wrapped in the mantle of their own

¹ vv. 2-6. See Ps. 56. 8-12.² See Ps. 59. 6-14.³ Verses 6-19 are perhaps spoken, not by the Psalmist, but by his detractors.

⁴ Ac. 1. 20.⁵ This is a doubtful interpretation of the Hebrew; it is possible to render 'Such are the proceedings of my accusers'.

confusion. Loudly will I give the Lord thanks, praise him before multitudes that listen; the Lord who has stood at the right hand of the friendless, brought redress to an innocent soul misjudged.

verance; to all eternity stands his covenant. Unutterable is his name and worshipful; vain without his fear is learning. Wise evermore are you who follow it; yours the prize that lasts for ever.

109

(110)

(Of David. A psalm.)

To the Master I serve the Lord's promise was given, Sit here at my right hand while I make thy enemies a footstool under thy feet. The Lord will make thy empire spring up like a branch out of Sion; thou art to bear rule in the midst of thy enemies. From birth, princely state shall be thine, holy and glorious; thou art my son, born like dew before the day-star rises. The Lord has sworn an oath there is no retracting, Thou art a priest for ever in the line of Melchisedech.² At thy right hand, the Lord will beat down kings in the day of his vengeance; he will pass sentence on the nations, heap high the bodies, scatter far and wide the heads of the slain. Let him but drink of the brook by the wayside, he will lift up his head in victory.³

110

(111)

(Alleluia.)

ALL my heart goes out to the Lord in praise, before the assembly where the just are gathered. Chant we the Lord's wondrous doings, delight and study of all who love him. Ever his deeds are high and glorious, faithful he abides to all eternity. Great deeds, that he keeps still in remembrance! He, the Lord, is kind and merciful. In abundance he fed the men who feared him, keeping his covenant for ever. Lordly the power he shewed his people, making the lands of the heathen their possession. No act but shews him just and faithful; of his decrees there is no relenting. Perpetual time shall leave them changeless; right and truth are their foundation. So he has brought our race deli-

111

(112)

(Alleluia.)

A BLESSED man is he, who fears the Lord, bearing great love to his commandments. Children of his shall win renown in their country; do right, and thy sons shall find a blessing. Ease shall dwell in his house, and great prosperity; fame shall ever record his bounty. Good men see a light dawn in darkness; his light, who is merciful, kind and faithful. It goes well with the man who lends in pity, just and merciful in his dealings. Length of days shall leave him still unshaken; men will remember the just for ever. No fear shall he have of evil tidings; on the Lord his hope is fixed unchangeably. Patient his heart remains and steadfast, quietly he waits for the downfall of his enemies. Rich are his alms to the needy; still his bounty abides in memory.⁴ The Lord will lift up his head in triumph; ungodly men are ill content to see it. Vainly they gnash their teeth in envy; worldly hopes must fade and perish.

112

(113)

(Alleluia.)

PRAISE the Lord, you that are his servants, praise the name of the Lord together. Blessed be the Lord's name at all times, from this day to all eternity; from the sun's rise to the sun's setting let the Lord's name be praised continually. The Lord is sovereign king of all the nations; his glory is high above the heavens. Who is like the Lord our God, so high above us, that stoops to regard both heaven and earth, lifting up the poor from the dust he lay in, raising the beggar out of his dung-hill, to find him a place among the princes, the ¹ This psalm, the meaning of which is in any case obscure, is further confused in the Latin, and in the Septuagint Greek, by the use of the same rendering for two different words in the Hebrew, here translated by 'Lord' and 'Master' respectively. Cf. Mt. 22. 44; Mk. 12. 36; Lk. 20. 42; Ac. 2. 34. ² See Heb. 5. 6, and elsewhere. ³ There is no agreement as to the precise meaning of this verse; some would render, 'they will drink', understanding the first half as an ironic reference to the princes lying slaughtered by the road side. ⁴ II Cor. 9. 9.

9 princes that rule over his people? He gives the barren woman a home to dwell in, a mother rejoicing in her children.

113

(Alleluia.)

(114)

WHEN Israel came out of Egypt, and the sons of Jacob heard no more a strange language, the Lord took Juda for his sanctuary, Israel for his own dominion. The seas fled at the sight they witnessed, backward flowed the stream of Jordan; up leapt, like rams, the startled mountains, up leapt the hills, like yearling sheep. What ailed you, seas, that you fled in terror, Jordan's stream, what drove thee back? Why did you leap up like rams, you mountains, leap up, you hills, like yearling sheep? Let earth thrill at its Master's presence; it is he that comes, the God of Jacob, who turned the rock into pools of water, the flint-stone into a springing well.

Not to us, Lord, not to us the glory; let thy name alone be honoured; thine the merciful, thine the faithful; why must the heathen say, Their God deserts them? Our God is a God that dwells in heaven; all that his will designs, he executes. The heathen have silver idols and golden, gods which the hands of men have fashioned. They have mouths, and yet are silent; eyes they have, and yet are sightless; ears they have, and want all hearing; noses, and yet no smell can reach them; hands unfeeling, feet unstirring; never a sound their throats may utter. Such be the end of all who make them, such the reward of all who trust them. It is the Lord that gives hope to the race of Israel, their only help, their only stronghold; the Lord that gives hope to the race of Aaron, their only help, their only stronghold; the Lord that gives hope to all who fear him, their only help, their only stronghold. The Lord keeps us in mind, and grants us blessing, blesses the race of Israel, blesses the race of Aaron; all those who fear the Lord, small and great alike, he blesses. Still may the Lord grant you increase, you and your children after you; the blessing of the Lord be upon you. It is he that made both heaven and earth; to the Lord belongs the heaven of heavens, the earth he gives to the children of men. From the dead, Lord, thou hast no praises, the men who go down into the place of silence; but we bless the Lord, we, the living, from this day to all eternity.

114

(Alleluia.)

(115)

MY heart is aflame, so graciously the Lord listens to my entreaty; the Lord, who grants me audience when I invoke his name. Death's noose about me, caught in the snares of the grave, ever I found distress and grief at my side, till I called upon the Lord, Save me, Lord, in my peril. Merciful the Lord our God is, and just, and full of pity; he cares for simple hearts, and to me, when I lay humbled, he brought deliverance. Return, my soul, where thy peace lies; the Lord has dealt kindly with thee; he has saved my life from peril, banished my tears, kept my feet from falling. Mine to walk at ease, enjoying the Lord's presence, in the land of the living.

115

(116)

I TRUSTED, even when most I bewailed my unhappy lot; bewildered, I said, Man's faith is false; but the Lord's mercies have never failed me; what return shall I make to him?¹ I will take the cup that is pledge of my deliverance, and invoke the name of the Lord upon it; I will pay the Lord my vows in the presence of all his people. Dear in the Lord's sight is the death of those who love him; and am not I, Lord, thy servant, born of thy own handmaid? Thou hast broken the chains that bound me; I will sacrifice in thy honour, and call on the name of the Lord. Before a throng of worshippers I will pay the Lord my vows, here in the courts of the Lord's house, here, Jerusalem, in thy heart.

¹ vv. 1-3. The sense here is obscure, and much disputed. It is usually supposed that what the Psalmist said comes to an end with verse 2; but it is difficult to see how this could be described as a confident utterance (see II Cor. 4. 13), and it seems best to take verse 3, and part or the whole of what follows, as falling within the quotation.

116 (117)

(Alleluia.)

PRAISE the Lord, all you Gentiles, let all the nations of the world do him honour. Abundant has his mercy been towards us; the Lord remains faithful to his word for ever.

117 (118)

(Alleluia.)

GIVE thanks to the Lord; the Lord is gracious, his mercy endures for ever. Echo the cry, sons of Israel; the Lord is gracious, his mercy endures for ever. His mercy endures for ever, echo the cry, sons of Aaron; his mercy endures for ever; echo the cry, all you who are the Lord's worshippers. I called on the Lord when trouble beset me, and the Lord listened, and brought me relief. With the Lord at my side, I have no fear of the worst man can do; with the Lord at my side to aid me, I shall yet see my enemies baffled. Better trust the Lord than rely on the help of man; better trust the Lord than rely on the word of princes. Let all heathendom ring me round, see, in the power of the Lord I crush them! They cut me off from every way of escape, but see, in the power of the Lord I crush them! They swarm about me like bees, their fury blazes up like fire among thorns, but see, in the power of the Lord, I crush them! I reeled under the blow, and had well-nigh fallen, but still the Lord was there to aid me. Who but the Lord is my protector, my stronghold; who but the Lord has brought me deliverance?

The homes of the just echo, now, with glad cries of victory; the power of the Lord has triumphed. The power of the Lord has brought me to great honour, the power of the Lord has triumphed. I am reprieved from death, to live on and proclaim what the Lord has done for me. The Lord has chastened me, chastened me indeed, but he would not doom me to die. Open me the gates where right dwells; let me go in and thank the Lord! Here is the gate that leads to the Lord's presence; here shall just souls find entry. Thanks be to thee, Lord, for giving me audience, thanks be to thee, my deliverer. The very stone which the builders rejected has become the chief stone at the corner; this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes.¹ This day is a holiday of the Lord's own choosing; greet this day with rejoicing, greet this day with triumph!

Deliverance, Lord, deliverance; Lord, grant us days of prosperity! Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord! A blessing from the Lord's house upon your company! The Lord is God; his light shines out to welcome us; marshal the procession aright, with a screen of boughs that reaches to the very horns of the altar. Thou art my God, mine to thank thee, thou art my God, mine to extol thee. Give thanks to the Lord; the Lord is gracious, his mercy endures for ever.

118 (119)

AH, blessed they, who pass through life's journey unstained, who follow the law of the Lord! Ah, blessed they, who cherish his decrees, make him the whole quest of their hearts! Afar from wrong-doing, thy sure paths they tread. Above all else it binds us, the charge thou hast given us to keep. Ah, how shall my steps be surely guided to keep faith with thy covenant? Attentive to all thy commandments, I go my way undismayed. A true heart's worship thou shalt have, thy just awards prompting me. All shall be done thy laws demand, so thou wilt not forsake me utterly.

Best shall he keep his youth unstained, who is true to thy trust. Be thou the whole quest of my heart; never let me turn aside from thy commandments. Buried deep in my heart, thy warnings shall keep me clear of sin. Blessed art thou, O Lord, teach me to know thy will. By these lips let the awards thou makest ever be recorded. Blithely as one that has found great possessions, I follow thy decrees. Bethinking me still of the charge thou givest, I will mark thy footsteps. Be thy covenant ever my delight, thy words kept in memory.

Crown thy servant with life, to live faithful to thy commands. Clear sight be mine, to contemplate the wonders of thy

¹ vv. 22, 23. Mt. 21. 42.

19 law. Comfort this earthly exile; do not 20 refuse me the knowledge of thy will.
 21 Crushed lies my spirit, longing ever for thy 22 just awards. Chastener of the proud, thy 23 curse lies on all who swerve from thy 24 covenant. Clear me of the reproach that 25 shames me, as I was ever attentive to thy 26 claims. Closeted together, princes plot 27 against me, thy servant, that thinks only of 28 thy decrees. Claims lovingly cherished, 29 decrees that are my counsellors!

30 Deep lies my soul in the dust, restore 31 life to me, as thou hast promised. Deign, 32 now, to shew me thy will, thou who hast 33 listened when I opened my heart to thee.
 34 Direct me in the path thou biddest me 35 follow, and all my musing shall be of thy 36 wonderful deeds. Despair wrings tears 37 from me; let thy promises raise me up 38 once more. Deliver me from every false 39 thought; make me free of thy covenant.
 40 Duty's path my choice, I keep thy bidding 41 ever in remembrance. Disappoint me, 42 Lord, never, one that holds fast by thy 43 commandments. Do but open my heart 44 wide, and easy lies the path thou hast 45 decreed.

46 Expound, Lord, thy whole bidding to 47 me; faithfully I will keep it. Enlighten me, 48 to scan thy law closely, and keep true to it 49 with all my heart. Eagerly I long to be 50 guided in the way of thy obedience. Ever 51 let my choice be set on thy will, not on 52 covetous thoughts. Eyes have I none for 53 vain phantoms; let me find life in following 54 thy ways. Establish with me, thy servant, 55 the promise made to thy worshippers.
 56 Ease me of the reproach my heart dreads, 57 thou, whose awards are gracious. Each 58 command of thine I embrace lovingly; do 59 thou in thy faithfulness grant me life.

60 For me too, Lord, thy mercy, for me too 61 the deliverance thou hast promised! Fit 62 answer for those who taunt me, that I rely 63 on thy truth. Faithful thy promise, let me 64 not boast in vain; in thy covenant lies my 65 hope. For ever and for evermore true to 66 thy charge thou shalt find me. Freely shall 67 my feet tread, if thy will is all my quest.
 68 Fearlessly will I talk of thy decrees in the 69 presence of kings, and be never abashed.
 70 Fain would I have all my comfort in the 71 law I love. Flung wide my arms to greet 72 thy law, ever in my thoughts thy bidding.

73 Go not back on the word thou hast pledged to thy servant; there lies all my 50 hope. Good news in my affliction, thy 51 promises have brought me life. Ground 52 down by the scorn of my oppressors, never 53 from thy law I swerve aside. Gracious 54 comfort, Lord, is the memory of thy just 55 dealings in times long past. Great ruth 56 have I to see wrong-doers, and how they 57 abandon thy law. Gone out into a land of 58 exile, of thy covenant I make my song.

 59 Gloom of night finds me still thinking of 60 thy name, Lord, still observant of thy bidding.
 61 Guerdon I ask no other, but the 62 following of thy will.

63 Heritage, Lord, I claim no other, but to 64 obey thy word. Heart-deep my supplica-65 tion before thee for the mercies thou hast 66 promised. Have I not planned out my 67 path, turned aside to follow thy decrees?
 68 Haste such as mine can brook no delay in 69 carrying out all thy bidding. Hemmed in 70 by the snares which sinners laid for me, 71 never was I forgetful of thy law. Harken 72 when I rise at dead of night to praise thee 73 for thy just dealings. How well I love the 74 souls that fear thee, and are true to thy 75 trust! How thy mercy fills the earth, 76 Lord! Teach me to do thy will.

77 In fulfilment of thy promise, Lord, what 78 kindness thou hast shewn thy servant!
 79 Inspire, instruct me still; all my hope is in 80 thy covenant. Idly I strayed till thou didst 81 chasten me; no more shall thy warnings go 82 unheeded. Indeed, indeed thou art gra-83 cious; teach me to do thy bidding. In vain 84 my oppressors plot against me; thy will is 85 all my quest. Inhuman hearts, curdled 86 with scorn! For me, thy law is enough. It 87 was in mercy thou didst chasten me, 88 schooling me to thy obedience. Is not the 89 law thou hast given dearer to me than rich 90 store of gold and silver?

91 Jealous for the handiwork thou hast 92 made, teach me to understand thy com-93 mandments. Joy shall be theirs, thy true 94 worshippers, to see the confidence I have 95 in thy word. Just are thy awards; I know 96 well Lord, it was in faithfulness thou didst 97 afflict me. Judge me no more; pity and 98 comfort thy servant as thou hast promised.
 99 Judge me no more; pardon and life for one 100 that loves thy will! Just be their fall, who 101 wrong me scornfully; thy law is all my 102 study. Joined to my company be every 103 soul that worships thee and heeds thy warnings. Jealously let my heart observe thy bidding; let me not hope in vain.

Keeping watch for thy aid, my soul languishes, yet I trust in thy word. Keeping watch for the fulfilment of thy promise, my eyes languish for comfort still delayed. Kitchen-smoke shrivels the wine-skin; so waste I, yet never forget thy will. Knowest thou not how short are thy servant's days? Soon be my wrongs redressed. Knaves will be plotting against me still, that are no friends to thy law. Knaves they are that wrong me; bring aid, as thy covenant stands unchanging. Keep thy bidding I would, though small hope of life they had left me. Kind as thou ever wert, preserve me; then utter thy bidding, and I will obey.

Lord, the word thou hast spoken stands ever unchanged as heaven. Loyal to his promise, age after age, is he who made the enduring earth. Long as time lasts, these shall stand, obeying thy decree, Master of all. Lest I should sink in my affliction, thou hast given thy covenant to be my comfort. Life-giving are thy commands, never by me forgotten. Lend me thy aid, for thine I am, and thy bidding is all my quest. Let sinners go about to destroy me, I wait on thy will. Look where I may, all good things must end; only thy law is wide beyond measure.

My delight, Lord, is in thy bidding; ever my thoughts return to it. Musing still on thy commandments, I have grown more prudent than my enemies. More wisdom have I than all my teachers, so well have I pondered thy decrees. More learning have I than my elders, I that hold true to thy charge. Mindful of thy warnings, I guide my steps clear of every evil path. Meek under thy tuition, thy will I keep ever in view. Meat most appetizing are thy promises; never was honey so sweet to my taste. Made wise by thy law, I shun every path of evil-doing.

No lamp like thy word to guide my feet, to shew light on my path. Never will I retract my oath to give thy just commands observance. Nothing, Lord, but affliction, never the saving help thou didst promise me? Nay, Lord, accept these vows of mine; teach me to do thy bidding. Needs must I carry my life in my hands, yet am I ever mindful of thy law. Nearly the snare of the wicked caught my feet, yet would I not swerve from thy obedience. Now and ever thy covenant is my prize, is my heart's comfort. Now and ever to do thy will perfectly is my heart's aim.

Out upon the men that play traitor to the law I love! Other defence, other shield have I none; in thy law I trust. Out of my path, lovers of wrong; I will keep my God's commandments. Only let thy promised aid preserve me; do not disappoint me of the hope I cherish. Only do thou sustain me in safety, looking ever to thy will. Obey thee who will not, shall earn thy disdain; idle is all their scheming. Outcasts they are that profane the land with wrong; for me, thy law is enough. Overcome is my whole being with the fear of thee; I am adread of thy judgements.

Protect the justice of my cause; never leave me at the mercy of my oppressors. Pledge thyself still to befriend me; save me from the oppression of my enemies. Pining away, I look for thy saving help, the faithful keeping of thy promises. Pity thy own servant, and teach him thy decrees. Perfect in thy own servant's heart the knowledge of thy will. Put off the hour, Lord, no more; too long thy commandment stands defied. Precious beyond gold or jewel I hold thy law. Prized be every decree of thine; forsworn be every path of evil-doing.

Right wonderful thy decrees are, hard to read, and well my heart heeds them. Revelation and light thy words disclose to the simple. Rises ever a sigh from my lips as I long after thy covenant. Regard and pity me, as thou hast pity for all that love thy name. Rule thou my path as thou hast promised; never be wrong-doing my master. Rescue me from man's oppression, to wait henceforth on thy bidding. Restore to thy servant the smile of thy living favour, and teach him to know thy will. Rivers of tears flow from my eyes, to see thy law forgotten.

So just, Lord, thou art, thy awards so truly given! Strict justice and utter faithfulness inspire all thy decrees. Stung by love's jealousy, I watch my enemies defy thy bidding. Shall not I, thy servant, love thy promises, tested and found true? Still despised and disinherited, I do not forget thy charge. Stands thy faithfulness eter-

143 nally, thy law for ever changeless. Sorrow and distress have fallen on me; in thy 144 commandments is all my comfort. Sentence eternal is thy decree; teach me the wisdom that brings life.

145 Thy audience, Lord, my whole heart 146 claims, a heart true to thy trust. To thee I cry, O grant deliverance; I will do all thy 147 bidding. Twilight comes, and I awake to plead with thee, hoping ever in thy prom-148 ises. Through the night my eyes keep 149 watch, to ponder thy sayings. Thine, Lord, to listen in thy mercy, and grant life 150 according to thy will. Treacherous foes draw near, that are strangers to thy cove-151 nant. Thou, Lord, art close at hand; all thy 152 awards are true. Taught long since by thy decrees, I know well thou hast ordained them everlastingly.

153 Unblessed is my lot; look down and rescue me, that still am mindful of thy 154 law. Uphold my cause, and deliver me; 155 true to thy promise, grant me life. Unknown thy mercy to the sinner that defies 156 thy bidding. Unnumbered, Lord, are thy blessings; as thy will is, grant me life.
157 Under all the assaults of my oppressors, 158 I keep true to thy charge. Unhappy I, that watch thy warnings to the sinner go un-159 heeded! Up, Lord, and witness the love
I bear thy covenant; in thy mercy bid me 160 live! Unchanging truth is thy word's fountain-head, eternal the force of thy just decrees.

161 Vexed by the causeless malice of princes, 162 my heart still dreads thy warnings. Victors rejoice not more over rich spoils, than I in 163 thy promises. Villainy I abhor and re-164 nounce; thy law is all my love. Votive thanks seven times a day I give thee for the 165 just awards thou makest. Very great peace is theirs who love thy law; their feet never 166 stumble. Valiantly, Lord, I wait on thee for succour, keeping ever true to thy 167 charge. Vanquished by great love, my 168 heart is ever obedient to thy will. Vigilantly I observe precept and bidding of thine, living always as in thy sight.

169 Wilt thou not admit my cry, Lord, to thy presence, and grant me thy promised 170 gift of wisdom? Wilt thou not countenance my plea, redeem thy pledge to 171 deliver me? What praise shall burst from my lips, when thou makest known thy 172 will! What hymns of thankfulness this tongue shall raise to the author of all just decrees! Wouldst thou but lift thy hand to aid me, that take my stand on thy covenant! Weary it is, Lord, waiting for deliverance, but thy law is my comfort.

When will thy just award grant redress, that I may live to praise thee? Wayward thou seest me, like a lost sheep; come to look for thy servant, that is mindful still of thy bidding.

119

(120)

(A song of ascents.)

NOT unheeded I cry to the Lord in the hour of my distress. Lord, have pity and deliver me from the treacherous lips, the perjured tongue. Perjurer, he will give thee all thy deserts and more; sharp arrows from a warrior's bow, blazing faggots of broom. Unhappy I, that live an exile in Mosoch, or dwell among the tents of Cedar! Long banished here among the enemies of peace, for peace I plead, and their cry is still for battle.

120

(121)

(A song of ascents.)

I LIFT up my eyes to the hills, to find deliverance; from the Lord deliverance comes to me, the Lord who made heaven and earth. Never will he who guards thee allow thy foot to stumble; never fall asleep at his post! Such a guardian has Israel, one who is never weary, never sleeps; it is the Lord that guards thee, the Lord that stands at thy right hand to give thee shelter.
The sun's rays by day, the moon's by night, shall have no power to hurt thee.
The Lord will guard thee from all evil; the Lord will protect thee in danger; the Lord will protect thy journeying and thy homecoming, henceforth and for ever.

121

(122)

(A song of ascents. Of David.)

WELCOME sound, when I heard them saying, We will go into the Lord's house!
Within thy gates, Jerusalem, our feet stand at last; Jerusalem, built as a city should be built that is one in fellowship. There the tribes meet, the Lord's own tribes, to give praise, as Israel is ever bound, to the Lord's name; there the thrones are set for judgement, thrones for the house of David. Pray for all that brings Jerusalem peace! May all who love thee dwell at ease! Let there be peace within thy ramparts, ease in thy strongholds! For love of my brethren and my familiar friends, peace is still my prayer for thee; remembering the house of the Lord our God, for thy happiness I plead.

122 (123)

(A song of ascents.)

UNTO thee I lift up my eyes, unto thee, who dwellest in the heavens. See how the eyes of servants are fixed on the hands of their masters, the eyes of a maid on the hand of her mistress! Our eyes, too, are fixed on the Lord our God, waiting for him to shew mercy on us. Have mercy on us, Lord, have mercy on us; we have had our fill of man's derision. Our hearts can bear no more to be the scorn of luxury, the derision of the proud.

123 (124)

(A song of ascents. Of David.)

IF the Lord had not been on our side, Israel may boast, if the Lord had not been on our side when human foes assailed us, it seemed as if they must have swallowed us up alive, so fierce their anger threatened us. It seemed as if the tide must have sucked us down, the torrent closed above us; closed above us the waters that ran so high. Blessed be the Lord, who has not let us fall a prey to those ravening mouths! Safe, like a bird rescued from the fowler's snare; the snare is broken and we are safe! Such help is ours, the Lord's help, that made heaven and earth.

124 (125)

(A song of ascents.)

THOSE who trust in the Lord are strong as mount Zion itself, that stands unmoved for ever. The hills protect Jerusalem; so the Lord protects his people, now and for ever. Domain of the just! No longer shall godless men bear rule in it; else the just, too, might soil their hands with guilt. Deal kindly, Lord, with the kindly, with the true-hearted. Feet that stray into false paths the Lord will punish, as he punishes wrong-doers; but upon Israel there shall be peace.

125 (126)

(A song of ascents.)

WHEN the Lord gave back Zion her banished sons, we walked like men in a dream; in every mouth was laughter, joy was on every tongue. Among the heathen themselves it was said, What favour the Lord has shewn them! Favour indeed the Lord has shewn us, and our hearts are rejoiced. Deliver us, Lord, from our bondage; our withered hopes, Lord, like some desert water-course renew!¹ The men who are sowing in tears will reap, one day, with joy. Mournful enough they go, but with seed to scatter; trust me, they will come back rejoicing, as they carry their sheaves with them.

126 (127)

(A song of ascents. Of Solomon.)

VAIN is the builder's toil, if the house is not of the Lord's building; vainly the guard keeps watch, if the city has not the Lord for its guardian. Vain, that you should be astir before daybreak, and sit on over your tasks late into the night, you whose bread is so hardly won; is it not in the hours of sleep that he blesses the men he loves?² Fatherhood itself is the Lord's gift, the fruitful womb is a reward that comes from him. Crown of thy youth, children are like arrows in a warrior's

¹ Some commentators think that the process of deliverance was still incomplete, only a small number of exiles (for example) having returned from captivity; others, that verse 1 expresses, not something which had actually happened, but an imaginary picture.

² The verse is not an incitement to idleness; the gist of the psalm lies in what follows. What is the use of a house to a childless man, of a well-built city with a dwindling number of inhabitants; what is the use of toiling day and night, unless you have a family to provide for?

1 hand. Happy, whose quiver is well filled 2 with these; their cause will not be set aside when they plead against their enemies at the gate.

127

(128)

(A song of ascents.)

BLESSED thou art, if thou dost fear the 2 Lord, and follow his paths! Thyself shall eat what thy hands have toiled to win;
blessed thou art; all good shall be thine.
3 Thy wife shall be fruitful as a vine, in the heart of thy home, the children round thy 4 table sturdy as olive-branches. Let a man serve the Lord, such is the blessing that 5 awaits him. May the Lord who dwells in Sion bless thee; mayest thou see Jerusalem in prosperity all thy life long.
6 Mayest thou live to see thy children's children, and peace resting upon Israel.

128

(129)

(A song of ascents.)

SORE have they beset me even from my 2 youth (let this be Israel's boast); sore have they beset me even from my youth, but 3 never once outmatched me. I bent my back to the oppressor, and long was the 4 furrow ere the plough turned; but the Lord proved faithful, and cut the bonds of 5 tyranny asunder. Let them be dismayed and routed, all these enemies of Sion. Let 6 them be like the stalks on a house-top, that wither there unharvested; never will they 7 be grasped in the reaper's hand, or fill the binder's bosom, no passer-by will say, The 8 Lord's blessing on you; we bless you in the name of the Lord.¹

129

(130)

(A song of ascents.)

OUT of the depths I cry to thee, O Lord; 2 Master, listen to my voice; let but thy ears be attentive to the voice that calls on thee 3 for pardon. If thou, Lord, wilt keep record of our iniquities, Master, who has strength to bear it? Ah, but with thee there is forgiveness; be thy name ever revered. I wait for the Lord, for his word of promise my soul waits; patient my soul waits, as ever watchman that looked for the day. Patient as watchman at dawn, for the Lord Israel waits, the Lord with whom there is mercy, with whom is abundant power to ransom.

He it is that will ransom Israel from all his iniquities.

130

(131)

(A song of ascents. Of David.)

LORD, my heart is not lifted up, my eyes not raised from the earth; my mind does not dwell on high things, on marvels that are beyond my reach. Bear me witness that I kept my soul ever quiet, ever at peace. The thoughts of a child on its mother's breast, a child's thoughts were all my soul knew. Let Israel trust in the Lord, henceforth and for ever.

131

(132)

(A song of ascents.)

IN David's reckoning, Lord, let not his patient care be forgotten, the oath he swore to the Lord, the vow he made to the great God of Jacob: Never will I come beneath the roof of my house, or climb up into the bed that is strewn for me; never shall these eyes have sleep, these eye-lids close, until I have found the Lord a home, the great God of Jacob a dwelling-place. And now, at Ephrata, we have heard tidings of what we looked for, we have found it in the plains of Jaar; now to go into his dwelling, pay reverence at his footstool! Up, Lord, and take possession of thy resting-place, thou and the ark which is shrine of thy glory! Let thy priests go clad in the vesture of innocence, thy faithful people cry aloud with rejoicing.

Think of thy servant David, and do not refuse audience to the king thou hast anointed. Never will the Lord be false to that inviolable oath he swore to David:

¹ Cf. Ruth 2. 4.² Literally, 'Behold, we have heard of it at Ephrata, and found it in the plains of Jaar'. If this psalm was composed for the dedication of Solomon's Temple (II Par. 6. 41, 42) and commemorates the bringing back of the Ark to Jerusalem (I Par. 13), we should naturally suppose that 'it' means the Ark. It is not clear that the Ark ever rested at Bethlehem-Ephrata; but some think that Ephrata here is another name for Silo (I Kg. 4. 3), and that the other half of the verse refers to Cariathiarim, the 'city of the woods' (I Par. 13. 5).

I will raise to thy throne heirs of thy own 2 body; if thy sons hold fast to my covenant, to the decrees which I make known to them, their sons too shall reign on thy 3 throne for ever. The Lord's choice has fallen upon Sion, this is the dwelling he 4 longed for: Here, for ever, is my resting-5 place, here is my destined home. Trust me, I will bless her with abundant store, the poor shall have bread to their heart's 6 content; I will clothe her priests in the vesture of triumph, cries of rejoicing shall 7 echo among her faithful people. There the stock of David shall bud, there shall a lamp burn continually for the king I have 8 anointed.¹ I will cover his enemies with confusion; on his brow the crown I gave shall shine untarnished.

132 (133)

(A song of ascents. Of David.)

GRACIOUS the sight, and full of comfort, 1 when brethren dwell united. Gracious as balm poured on the head till it flows down on to the beard; balm that flowed down 2 Aaron's beard, and reached the very skirts 3 of his robe. It is as if dew like the dews of Hermon were falling on this hill of Sion;² here, where the Lord grants benediction and life everlastingly.

133 (134)

(A song of ascents.)

COME, then, praise the Lord, all you that are the Lord's servants; you that wait on 2 the Lord's house at midnight, lift up your hands towards the sanctuary and bless the 3 Lord. May the Lord who dwells in Sion bless thee, the Lord who made heaven and earth!

134 (135)

(Alleluia.)

PRAISE the Lord's name; praise the Lord, 2 you that are his servants, you who stand in the house of the Lord, in the courts where our God dwells. Praise to the Lord, a Lord so gracious, praise to his name, a name so well beloved. Has not the Lord made 4 choice of Jacob, claimed Israel for his own?

Doubt it never, the Lord is great; he, 5 our Master, is higher than all the gods. In 6 heaven and on earth, in the sea and in the deep waters beneath us, the Lord accom-7 plishes his will; summoning clouds from the ends of the earth, rain-storm wedding to lightning-flash, bringing winds out of his store-house. He it was that smote the 8 first-born of the Egyptians, man and beast alike; what wonders and portents, Egypt, 9 thou didst witness, sent to plague Pharaoh and all his servants! He it was that smote 10 nation after nation, and slew the kings in their pride, Sehon king of the Amorrites, 11 and Og the king of Basan, and all the rulers of Chanaan, and marked down their lands 12 for a dwelling-place where his own people of Israel should dwell.

Lord, thy name abides for ever; age 13 succeeds age, and thou art ever unforgotten. The Lord defends his people, takes 14 pity on his servants. What are the idols of the heathen but silver and gold, gods which 15 the hands of men have fashioned? They 16 have mouths, and yet are silent; eyes they have, and yet are sightless; ears they have, 17 and want all hearing, never a breath have they in their mouths. Such the end of all 18 who make them, such the reward of all who trust them. Bless the Lord, sons of 19 Israel, bless the Lord, sons of Aaron, bless 20 the Lord, sons of Levi, bless the Lord, all you that are the Lord's worshippers. Here, 21 in Sion his dwelling-place, here, in Jerusalem, let the Lord's name be blessed.

135 (136)

(Alleluia.)

GIVE thanks to the Lord for his goodness, his mercy is eternal; give thanks to the 2 God of gods, his mercy is eternal; give 3 thanks to the Lord of lords, his mercy is eternal. Eternal his mercy, who does great 4 deeds as none else can; eternal his mercy, 5

¹ Literally, 'There will I make a horn grow for David, I have trimmed a lamp for my anointed', both metaphors for the continuance of his royal dynasty (III Kg. 15. 4; Lk. 1. 69).

² Literally, 'like the dew of Hermon that falls on the hill of Sion', which, however, was more than a hundred miles distant. It seems clear, therefore, that the dews of Hermon are only mentioned here as typical of exceptionally heavy dews; unless those authors are right who suspect that the reference is to a mount Sion, differently spelt in Hebrew, which was part of the Hermon range (Deut. 4. 48).

6 whose wisdom made the heavens; eternal his mercy, who poised earth upon the 7 floods. Eternal his mercy, who made the 8 great luminaries; made the sun to rule by 9 day, his mercy is eternal; made the moon and the stars to rule by night, his mercy is eternal.

10 Eternal his mercy, who smote the Egyp-11 tians by smiting their first-born; eternal his mercy, who delivered Israel from their 12 midst, with constraining power, with his arm raised on high, his mercy is eternal.
13 Eternal the mercy that divided the Red Sea 14 in two, eternal the mercy that led Israel 15 through its waters, eternal the mercy that drowned in the Red Sea Pharaoh and 16 Pharaoh's men. And so he led his people through the wilderness, his mercy is eternal.

17 Eternal the mercy that smote great 18 kings, eternal the mercy that slew the kings 19 in their pride, Sehon king of the Amorrh-20 ites, his mercy is eternal, and Og the king 21 of Basan, his mercy is eternal. Eternal the mercy that marked down their land to be 22 a dwelling-place; a dwelling-place for his 23 servant Israel, his mercy is eternal. Eternal the mercy that remembers us in our 24 affliction, eternal the mercy that rescues us 25 from our enemies, eternal the mercy that 26 gives all living things their food. Give thanks to the God of heaven, his mercy is eternal.

136 (137)

1 WE sat down by the streams of Babylon and 2 wept there, remembering Zion. Willow-trees grow there, and on these we hung up 3 our harps when the men who took us prisoner cried out for a song. We must 4 make sport for our enemies; A stave, there, should we sing the Lord's song in a strange 5 land? Jerusalem, if I forget thee, perish 6 the skill of my right hand! Let my tongue stick fast to the roof of my mouth if I cease 7 to remember thee, if I love not Jerusalem dearer than heart's content! Remember, Lord, how the sons of Edom triumphed when Jerusalem fell; O'erthrow it, they cried, o'erthrow it, till the very foundation

¹ The Hebrew word here translated 'angels' means literally 'gods'. Some think it refers, as in Ps. 81, to earthly rulers, cf. verse 4 below.

is left bare. Babyion, pitiless queen, blessed be the man who deals out to thee
the measure thou hast dealt to us; blessed be the man who will catch up thy children, and dash them against the rocks!

137 (138)

(Of David.)

MY heart's thanks, Lord, for listening to the prayer I uttered; angels for my witnesses,¹ I will sing of thy praise. I bow down in worship towards thy sanctuary, praising thy name for thy mercy and faithfulness; thy own honour and thy pledged word thou hast vindicated for all the world to see. To thee I appealed, and thou didst listen to me, didst fill my heart with courage. All the kings of the earth, Lord, will praise thee now; were not thy promises made in their hearing? Their song shall be of the Lord's doings, how great is his renown, the Lord, who is so high above us, yet looks with favour on the humble, looks on the proud too, but from far off.
Though affliction surround my path, thou dost preserve me; it is thy power that confronts my enemies' malice, thy right hand that rescues me. My purposes the Lord will yet speed; thy mercy, Lord, endures for ever, and wilt thou abandon us, the creatures of thy own hands?

138 (139)

(To the choir-master. Of David. A psalm.)

LORD, I lie open to thy scrutiny; thou knowest me, knowest when I sit down and when I rise up again, canst read my thoughts from far away. Walk I or sleep I, thou canst tell; no movement of mine but thou art watching it. Before ever the words are framed on my lips, all my thought is known to thee; rearguard and vanguard, thou dost compass me about, thy hand still laid upon me. Such wisdom as thine is far beyond my reach, no thought of mine can attain it.

Where can I go, then, to take refuge from thy spirit, to hide from thy view? If I should climb up to heaven, thou art there;

if I sink down to the world beneath, thou 9 art present still. If I could wing my way eastwards, or find a dwelling beyond the 10 western sea, still would I find thee beckoning to me, thy right hand upholding me.
 11 Or perhaps I would think to bury myself in darkness; night should surround me, 12 friendlier than day; but no, darkness is no hiding-place from thee, with thee the night shines clear as day itself; light and dark are one.

13 Author, thou, of my inmost being, didst thou not form me in my mother's womb?
 14 I praise thee for my wondrous fashioning, for all the wonders of thy creation. Of my 15 soul thou hast full knowledge, and this mortal frame had no mysteries for thee, who didst contrive it in secret, devise its pattern, there in the dark recesses of the 16 earth. All my acts thy eyes have seen, all are set down already in thy record; my days were numbered before ever they came to be.

17 A riddle, O my God, thy dealings with 18 me, so vast their scope! As well count the sand, as try to fathom them; and, were that skill mine, thy own being still confronts 19 me. O God, wouldst thou but make an end of the wicked! Murderers, keep your dis-20 tance from me! Treacherously thy rebel against thee, faithlessly set thee at defiance.
 21 Lord, do I not hate the men who hate thee, am I not sick at heart over their rebellion?
 22 Surpassing hatred I bear them, count them 23 my sworn enemies. Scrutinize me, O God, as thou wilt, and read my heart; put me to the test, and examine my restless thoughts.
 24 See if on any false paths my heart is set, and thyself lead me in the ways of old.

139

(140)

(To the choir-master. A psalm. Of David.)

2 RESCUE me, Lord, from human malice, save me from the lovers of oppression, 3 always plotting treachery in their hearts, 4 always at their quarrelling, tongues sharp as the tongues of serpents, lips that hide 5 the poison of adders. Preserve me Lord, from the power of sinful men, save me from these lovers of oppression who are plotting to trip my feet. What hidden 6 snares they set for me, these tyrants, what nets they spread to catch me, what traps they lay in my path!

To the Lord I make my appeal, Thou art 7 my God, listen, Lord, to the voice that pleads with thee. My Lord, my Master, 8 my strong deliverer, it is thou that shieldest my head in the day of battle. Lord, do not 9 let malice have its way with me, do not prosper its evil designs. They carry their 10 heads high as they close in around me; let their conspiracy prove its own undoing;
 let burning coals rain down on them, be 11
 they cast into a pit whence they shall rise no more. Not long the blasphemer's time 12 on earth: misfortune will overtake the oppressor unawares. Can I doubt that the 13 Lord will avenge the helpless, will grant the poor redress? Honest men will yet live 14 to praise thy name; upright hearts to enjoy the smile of thy favour.

140

(141)

(A psalm. Of David.)

COME quickly, Lord, at my cry for suc-1 cour; do not let my appeal to thee go unheard. Welcome as incense-smoke let 2 my prayer rise up before thee; when I lift up my hands, be it acceptable as the even-3 ing sacrifice. Lord, set a guard on my mouth, post a sentry before my lips; do not 4 turn my heart towards thoughts of evil, and deeds of treachery; never let me take part with the wrong-doers, and share the ban-5 quet with them. Rather let some just man deal me heavy blows; this shall be his kindness to me; reprove me, and it shall be balm poured over me; such unction never will this head refuse. Their injuries I will still greet with a prayer. . .

. . . My words have won their hearts, 6 a people that had seen their chieftains hurled down the rock-face,¹ a people whose 7 bones lie scattered at the grave's mouth, like seed when the earth is cloven into furrows.

To thee these eyes look, my Lord, my 8 Master; in thee I trust; let not my life be forfeit. Preserve me from the ambush they 9

¹ It does not seem likely that the word 'their' in this verse refers to the sinners just mentioned; it is more naturally interpreted of the Jewish people generally. This verse, and the verse which follows, are obscure.

10 have laid for me, from the snares of the wrong-doers. Into their own net, sinner upon sinner, may they fall, and I pass on in safety.

141

(142)

(A maskil. Of David, when he was in the cave.
A prayer.)

2 LOUND is my cry to the Lord, the prayer I 3 utter for the Lord's mercy, as I pour out 4 my complaint before him, tell him of the 5 affliction I endure. My heart is ready to 6 faint within me, but thou art watching over 7 my path. They lie in ambush for me, there 8 by the wayside; I look to the right of me, 9 and find none to take my part; all hope of 10 escape is cut off from me, none is concerned 11 for my safety. To thee, Lord, I 12 cry, claiming thee for my only refuge, all 13 that is left me in this world of living men.
14 Listen, then, to my plea; thou seest me all 15 defenceless. Rescue me from persecutors 16 who are too strong for me; restore liberty 17 to a captive soul. What thanks, then, will 18 I give to thy name, honest hearts all about 19 me, rejoicing to see thy favour restored!

142

(143)

(A psalm. Of David.)

1 LISTEN, Lord, to my prayer; give my plea 2 a hearing, as thou art ever faithful; listen, 3 thou who lovest the right. Do not call thy 4 servant to account; what man is there 5 living that can stand guiltless in thy 6 presence? See how my enemies plot against 7 my life, how they have abased me in the 8 dust, set me down in dark places, like the 9 long-forgotten dead! My spirits are 10 crushed within me, my heart is cowed.
11 And my mind goes back to past days; 12 I think of all thou didst once, dwell on the 13 proofs thou gavest of thy power. To thee 14 I spread out my hands in prayer, for thee 15 my soul thirsts, like a land parched with 16 drought.
17 Hasten, Lord, to answer my prayer; my 18 spirit grows faint. Do not turn thy face 19 away from me, and leave me like one sunk 20 in the abyss. Speedily let me win thy 21 mercy, my hope is in thee; to thee I lift up 22 my heart, shew me the path I must follow;

to thee I fly for refuge, deliver me, Lord, from my enemies. Thou art my God, teach me to do thy will; let thy gracious spirit lead me, safe ground under my feet. For the honour of thy own name, Lord, grant me life; in thy mercy rescue me from my cruel affliction. Have pity on me, and scatter my enemies; thy servant I; make an end of my cruel persecutors.

143

(144)

(Of David.)

BLESSED be the Lord, my refuge, who makes these hands strong for battle, these fingers skilled in fight; the Lord who pities me and grants me safety, who shelters me and sets me at liberty, who protects me and gives me confidence, bowing down nations to my will. Lord, what is Adam's race, that thou givest heed to it, what is man, that thou carest for him? Like the wind he goes, like a shadow his days pass.

Bid heaven stoop, Lord, and come down to earth; at thy touch, the mountains will be wreathed in smoke. Brandish thy lightnings, to rout my enemies; shoot thy arrows, and throw them into confusion! With heavenly aid, from yonder flood deliver me; rescue me from the power of alien foes, who make treacherous promises, and lift their hands in perjury. Then, O my God, I will sing thee a new song, on a ten-stringed harp I will sound thy praise; the God to whom kings must look for victory, the God who has brought his servant David rescue. Save me from the cruel sword, deliver me from the power of alien foes, who make treacherous promises, and lift their hands in perjury.

So may our sons grow to manhood, tall as the saplings, our daughters shapely as some column at the turn of a building, it may be, the temple itself. Our garners full, well stored with every kind of plenty, our sheep bearing a thousand-fold, thronging the pasture in their tens of thousands, our oxen straining at the load; no ruined walls, no exile, no lamenting in our streets. Happy men call such a people as this; and is not the people happy, that has the Lord for its God?

144

(145)

(Praises. Of David.)

AND shall I not extol thee, my God, my king; shall I not bless thy name for ever and for evermore? Blessing shall be thine, day after day; for ever and for evermore praised be thy name. Can any praise be worthy of the Lord's majesty, any thought set limits to his greatness? Down the ages the story of thy deeds is told, thy power is ever acclaimed; each magnifies thy unapproachable glory, makes known thy wonders. Fearful are the tales they tell of thy power, proclaiming thy magnificence; grateful their memory of all thy goodness, as they boast of thy just dealings. How gracious the Lord is, how merciful, how patient, how rich in pity! Is he not a loving Lord to his whole creation; does not his mercy reach out to all that he has made?

Joining, then, Lord, in thy whole creation's praise, let thy faithful servants bless thee; let them publish the glory of thy kingdom, and discourse of thy power, making that power known to the race of men, the glory, the splendour of that kingdom! No age shall dawn but shall see thee reigning still; generations pass, and thy rule shall endure. O how true the Lord is to all his promises, how gracious in all his dealings! Prostrate though men may fall, the Lord will lift them up, will revive their crushed spirits.

Quietly, Lord, thy creatures raise their eyes to thee, and thou grantest them, in due time, their nourishment, ready to open thy hand, and fill with thy blessing all that lives. So faithful the Lord is in all he does, so gracious in all his dealings. The Lord draws near to every man that calls upon him, will he but call upon him with a true heart. Utter but the wish, you that fear the Lord, and he will grant it, will hear the cry, and bring aid. Vigilantly the Lord watches over all that love him, marks down the wicked for destruction. While these lips tell of the Lord's praise, let all that lives bless his holy name, for ever, and for evermore.

145

(146)

(Alleluia.)

PRAISE the Lord, my soul; while life lasts, I will praise the Lord; of him, my God, shall my songs be while I am here to sing them. Do not put your trust in princes; they are but men, they have no power to save. As soon as the breath leaves his body, man goes back to the dust he belongs to; with that, all his designs will come to nothing. Happier the man who turns to the God of Jacob for help, puts no confidence but in the Lord his God, maker of heaven and earth and sea and all they contain; the God who keeps faith for ever, who redresses wrong, and gives food to the hungry. The Lord, who brings release to the prisoner, the Lord, who gives sight to the blind, the Lord, who comforts the burdened, the Lord, who befriends the innocent! The Lord, who protects the stranger, who defends orphan and widow, who overturns the counsel of the wicked! The Lord, reigning for ever, thy God, Sion, reigning from age to age! Alleluia.

146

(147. I-11)

(Alleluia.)

PRAISE the Lord; the Lord is gracious; sing to our God, a God who so claims our love; praise is his right. The Lord is rebuilding Jerusalem, is calling the banished sons of Israel home; he it is that heals the broken heart, and binds up its wounds. Does he not know the number of the stars, and call each by its name? How great a Lord is ours, how magnificent his strength, how inscrutable his wisdom! The Lord is the defender of the oppressed, and lays the wicked low in the dust. Strike up, then, in thanksgiving to the Lord, with the harp's music praise our God; the God who curtains heaven with cloud, and lays up a store of rain for the earth, who clothes the mountain-sides with grass, with corn for man's need, gives food to the cattle, food to the young ravens that cry out to him. Not the well-mounted warrior is his choice, not the swift runner wins his favour; the Lord's favour is for those who fear him, and put their trust in his divine mercy.

147 (147. 12-20)

1 PRAISE the Lord, Jerusalem; Zion, exalt 2 thy God! He it is that bolts thy gates fast, and blesses thy children, who dwell safe in 3 thee; that makes thy land a land of peace, and gives thee full ears of wheat to sustain 4 thee. See how he issues his command to 5 the earth, how swift his word runs! Now he spreads a pall of snow, covers earth with 6 an ashy veil of rime, doles out the scattered crusts of ice, binds the waters at the onset 7 of his frost. Then, at his word, all melts away; a breath from him, and the waters 8 flow! This is the God who makes his word known to Jacob, gives Israel ruling and 9 decree. Not such his dealings with any other nation; nowhere else the revelation of his will. Alleluia.

148

(Alleluia.)

1 GIVE praise to the Lord in heaven; praise 2 him, all that dwells on high. Praise him, all you angels of his, praise him, all his 3 armies. Praise him, sun and moon; praise 4 him, every star that shines. Praise him, you highest heavens, you waters beyond 5 the heavens. Let all these praise the Lord; 6 it was his command that created them. He has set them there unageing for ever, given them a law which cannot be altered.
 7 Give praise to the Lord on earth, mon-8 sters of the sea and all its depths; fire and hail, snow and mist, and the storm-wind 9 that executes his decree; all you mountains and hills, all you fruit trees and cedars; all 10 you wild beasts and cattle, creeping things and birds that fly in air; all you kings and 11 peoples of the world, all you that are 12 princes and judges on earth; young men and maids, old men and boys together; let 13 them all give praise to the Lord's name.

His name is exalted as no other, his praise reaches beyond heaven and earth; and 14 now he has given fresh strength to his people. Shall not his faithful servants praise him, the sons of Israel, the people that draw near to him? Alleluia.

149

(Alleluia.)

1 SING the Lord a new song; here, where the faithful gather, let his praise be heard.
 In him, the maker of Israel, let Israel 2 triumph; for him, the ruler of Zion, let Zion's children keep holiday; let there be 3 dancing in honour of his name, music of tambour and of harp, to praise him. Still 4 the Lord shews favour to his people, still he relieves the oppressed, and grants them 5 victory. In triumph let thy faithful servants rejoice, rejoice and take their rest.
 Ever on their lips they bear the high praise 6 of God, ever in their hands they carry two-edged swords, ready to take vengeance 7 upon the heathen, to curb the nations, to 8 chain kings, and bind princes in fetters of iron. Long since their doom is written; 9 boast it is of his true servants that doom to execute. Alleluia.

150

(Alleluia.)

1 PRAISE God in his sanctuary, praise him on his sovereign throne. Praise him for his 2 noble acts, praise him for his surpassing greatness. Praise him with the bray of the 3 trumpet, praise him with harp and zither.
 Praise him with the tambour and the 4 dance, praise him with the music of string and of reed. Praise him with the clang of 5 the cymbals, the cymbals that ring merrily.
 All creatures that breath have, praise the Lord. Alleluia.

THE BOOK OF PROVERBS

THESE proverbs were written by David's son Solomon, that was king of Israel, for the better understanding of true wisdom, and self-command. Here is made known the secret of discernment; here men may learn the lesson of insight, the dictates of duty and right and honour. Here simplicity is put on its guard; here youth may find instruction and advice both together. The wise, too, may be the wiser for hearing them; they will aid even the discerning to guide his course aright; he will read both parables and the interpretation of parables, both wise words and the hidden thoughts they signify.

True wisdom is founded on the fear of the Lord; who but a fool would despise such wisdom, and the lessons she teaches?

Heed well, my son, thy father's warnings, nor make light of thy mother's teaching; no richer heirloom, crown or necklace, can be thine. Turn a deaf ear, my son, to the blandishments of evil-doers that would make thee of their company.

There are lives to be had for the ambushing, the lives of unsuspecting folk whose uprightness shall little avail them; there are fortunes to be swallowed up whole, as a man is swallowed up by death when he goes to his grave. No lack of treasures here, they say, rich plunder that shall find its way into our houses; thou hast but to throw in thy lot with us; every man shares alike. Such errands, my son, are not for thee; never stir a foot in their company; thou knowest well how eager they are for mischief, how greedy for blood, and the snare is laid to no purpose if the bird is watching. What do they, but compass their own ruin, plot against their own lives? Such is ever the end of greed; he who cherishes it must fall by it at last.

And all the while Wisdom is publishing her message, crying it aloud in the open streets; never a meeting of roads, never a gateway, but her voice is raised, echoing above the din of it. What, says she, are you still gaping there, simpletons? Do the reckless still court their own ruin? Rash fools, will you never learn? Pay heed, then, to my protest; listen while I speak out my mind to you, give you open warning. Since my call is unheard, since my hand beckons in vain, since my counsel is despised and all my reproof goes for nothing, it will be mine to laugh, to mock at your discomfiture, when perils close about you. Close about you they will, affliction and sore distress, disasters that sweep down suddenly, gathering storms of ruin.

It will be their turn, then, to call aloud; my turn, then, to refuse an answer. They will be early abroad looking for me, but find me never; fools, that grew weary of instruction, and would not fear the Lord. Well for them, if they had followed my counsel, if they had not spurned all the warnings I gave! Now they must eat of the harvest their own wickedness has reaped, make the best of the cheer their own knavish schemes have brought them. Ah, silly souls, what a perilous refusal, what fatal foolhardiness was here!

But let a man give heed to me, peace undisturbed shall be his, happiness shall be his, free from all threat of danger.

Here, then, my son, is counsel for thee; take this bidding of mine to heart; ever be thy ear attentive to wisdom, thy mind eager to attain discernment. Wisdom if thou wilt call to thy side, and make discernment welcome, as thou wouldst fain hoard riches, or bring hidden treasure to light, then thou wilt learn what it is to fear God, make trial of what it is to know God. Wisdom is the Lord's gift; only by his word spoken comes true knowledge, true discernment. So it is that he watches over the lives of the upright, bids the innocent walk unharmed; safe and sound the chosen friends of God come and go. Duty and right and honour thou shalt discern, and see ever where the best course lies, if once wisdom finds a lodgement in thy heart, if knowledge once casts her spell upon thee. Watch and ward right counsel

12 shall keep over thee; it shall save thee from 13 the wrong choice, save thee from the false 14 counsellor. False counsellors there are, 15 that leave the high road to walk by dark 16 alleys; for sin and shame is all their love 17 and liking; ill guides on a wrong path all of 18 them! And from her, too, right counsel 19 shall protect thee, the woman that is no 20 daughter of Israel, with her mincing 21 foreign ways, that has forsaken the love 22 of her youth, forgotten the troth once plighted to her God. The house she dwells in is death's antechamber, the road by which she beckons leads to the grave;
 never man went in there that came back and set his face towards life.¹

20 Thine to choose a nobler course, keeping 21 ever the path of duty; the upright, the 22 innocent, shall have lands of their own and long enjoy them; the godless, the wrongdoer will be lost for ever to the scenes they knew.

3 Forget not then, my son, the teaching I give thee; lock these words of mine close in thy bosom; long years they shall bring thee of life well spent, and therewith prosperity. Two things must never leave thee, kindness and loyalty; be these the seals that hang about thy neck, graven be this inscription with thy heart for tablet;
 so both to God and man thou shalt be friend and confidant. Put all thy heart's confidence in the Lord, on thy own skill relying never; wilt thou but keep him in thy thoughts wherever thou goest, he will shew thee the straight path. Do not give thyself airs of wisdom; enough that thou shouldst fear God and shun ill-doing; here is health for the midmost of thy being, here is sap for the marrow of thy bones. Pay the Lord his due with what goods thou hast, letting him share the first-fruits of every crop; so shall plenty fill thy barn, so shall thy wine-press overflow at the vintage.

11 My son, do not undervalue the correction the Lord sends thee, do not be unmanned when he reproves thy faults.
 12 It is where he loves that he bestows correction, like a father whose son is dear to him.

13 Happy the man whose treasure-trove is wisdom, who is rich in discernment; silver and finest gold are less profitable in the handling. More rare is it than all things else; no prize thou covetest that can match it. Long life wisdom holds out to thee in one hand, riches and glory in the other;

 where she guides, journeying is pleasant, where she points the way, all is peace. Take hold of her, clasp her to thee, and the Tree of Life itself could not make thee more blessed. Not without these, wisdom and discernment, the Lord based earth, the Lord framed heaven; not without skill of his did the waters well up from beneath us, or the dews fall in mist. My son, never lose sight of what I am telling thee; cling to the wholesome dictates of prudence, that will quicken life within thee, sparkle like jewels on thy breast. Securely thou shalt walk, with no fear of stumbling, fearlessly thou shalt lie down to rest, and enjoy untroubled sleep; let no sudden alarm affright thee, though godless enemies press thee hard; the Lord will be at thy side, and keep thy feet clear of the snares they lay for thee.

Suffer him to do kindness who may, and thou thyself, when thou mayest, do kindness;² never bid a friend come back tomorrow for the gift that might be made to-day. Never plot harm against the friend that suspects no harm of thee, or pick a quarrel with one who has done thee no injury. Do not envy the prosperity of the wrong-doer, and be led away by his example; knavery the Lord hates, and keeps for honest men his familiar friendship. Still on the home of the wicked the Lord's ban falls, his blessing where uprightness dwells; he laughs at the mocker, grants his favours to the humble, and the wise shall win renown; only to their shame are fools exalted.

4 Sons of mine, take a lesson from your father; a lesson that will make discerning men of you, will you but heed it.
 A precious heirloom it is, the tradition I teach, not to be lightly bartered away.
 Time was when I had a father of my own;
 and when I was but a boy, my mother's darling, in such words as these he would

¹ vv. 16-19. Some take this as a literal reference to the habits of light women, as in chapter 7 below; but it is more probably an allegorical reference to apostasy from the Jewish religion.

² The meaning

teach me: Ever be thy heart true to my bidding; if thrive thou wouldst, hold fast 5 the charge I give thee. Wisdom be thy quest, thy quest discernment still; thy 6 father's apt and faithful pupil, keep her at thy side, thy guardian; cherish her, thy pre-7 server. Wisdom be thy chief thought, make 8 discernment thine at all hazards; her attainment exalts, her embrace ennobles thee; 9 a wreath of fresh graces she will give thee, a crown of glory, to overshadow thy brow.

10 Listen, then, my son, and master the charge I give thee, as thou wouldst have 11 long life. Here lies the road to wisdom, here is the path that will bring thee straight 12 to thy goal; here thou mayst walk unhampered, run without fear of stumbling.
 13 Hold fast by the instruction thou hast received, and never let it go; guard it as thou 14 wouldst guard thy life. For goddess ways and the example of sinful men have thou 15 neither love nor liking; shun their haunts and turn thy back upon them. Rest they 16 never without some ill deed done; some traveller's feet must stumble, or they lie 17 sleepless on their beds; godlessness is the very bread they eat, they crave for wrong-18 doing as for wine. See how the path of the just grows ever brighter, like the light of 19 dawn opening out into full day! But these, the sinners, are fain to walk on in darkness, surprised by every fall.

20 Hear then and heed, my son, these words of warning; never lose sight of them, cherish them in thy inmost heart; let a man 22 master them, they will bring life and healing to his whole being. Use all thy watch-23 fulness to keep thy heart true; that is the fountain whence life springs. Far, very far 24 from thy tongue be the cheating word, from thy lips the whisper of calumny; let 25 thy eyes see straight, thy gaze ever scan the path that lies before thee. Consider¹ that 26 path well, and on safe ground thou shalt journey still; swerving neither to right nor 27 left, but keeping thy steps ever clear of wrong-doing. (To the right lie such ways as win the Lord's favour, to the left such as miss the goal. He it is that will guide thy course aright, and set thy journey forward in peace.²)

5 My son, here is good advice for thy heeding; listen to wise counsel, if 2 thou wouldst be circumspect, if thou wouldst have ever on thy lips the maxims of prudence. First, give no credence to the 3 wiles of woman; honey-sweet words the temptress³ may use, all her talk be soothing 4 as oil, but oh, the dregs of that cup are bitter; a two-edged sword brings no sharper pang. Death's road she follows, 5 her feet set towards the grave; far from the highway that leads to life is the maze she 6 treads. Heed, then, my warning, and depart from it never; shun her company, 7 do not go near her doors. Wouldst thou squander the pride of thy manhood upon 8 heartless strangers like these?

If thus thou wilt spend all thy hopes, 10 bestow all thy pains, upon an alien home that is no home of thine, a time will come 11 at last when health and strength shall be wasted away. Then thou wilt complain 12 bitterly, Alas, why did I spurn every precept, reject every warning, unheard, un-13 heeded, every lesson I was taught? No marvel, had I paid the last penalty, with 14 the assembled people for my judges!⁴

Nay, drink, and drink deep, at thy own 15 well, thy own cistern; thence let thy offspring abound, like waters from thy own 16 fountain flowing through the public streets;⁵ only let them be thy own, let 17 there be no commerce between thyself and strangers. A blessing on that fountain of 18 thine! take thy pleasure with the bride thy manhood wins for thee. Thy own bride, 19 gentle as a hind, graceful as a doe; be it her bosom that steals away thy senses with the 20 delight of a lover that loves still. What, my son, wouldst thou yield to the wiles of a 21 stranger, dally with her embraces that is none of thine? The Lord is watching, and ¹ Literally 'direct' in the Latin version, 'weigh' in the Hebrew text. The Hebrew verb is ordinarily interpreted 'smooth out', but it is difficult to see the relevance of such a metaphor here.

² The words enclosed in brackets are found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text. They have perhaps been misplaced by accident; evidently they do not suit the thought of the present passage.

³ Literally 'harlot', but it would appear from what follows, especially verse 14, that the warning here given is one against adultery, not fornication. It is uncertain, both here and elsewhere in the book, how much the Hebrew term 'strange woman' is meant to convey the sense of foreign birth.

⁴ Lev. 20. 10; cf. Jn. 8. 5. ⁵ Literally, 'Let thy fountains be carried out in channels abroad; distribute thy well-water through the streets'; but the phrase evidently refers to a numerous family born in lawful wedlock.

knows what a man's errand is, let him 22 betake himself where he will. The sinner will be ensnared by his own guilt, caught in the toils of his own wrong-doing; 23 doomed by his own incontinence, by his own great folly bemused.

6 My son, has some friend persuaded thee to be his surety? Hast thou 2 pledged thyself for a bond which is none 2 of thine? Believe me, that word of assent has caught thee in a snare, thou art the 3 prisoner of thy own promise made. Do then, my son, as I bid thee; obtain thy freedom; it is ill done to fall into another man's power. Quick, no time to lose; wake 4 up this neighbour of thine from his bed, ere thou thyself close an eye-lid in sleep; 5 deer from captivity nor bird from fowler's hand so swift to escape!

6 Up with thee, idleness, go to school with the ant, and learn the lesson of her ways!
 7 Chief or ruler she has none to give her 8 commands; yet in summer hours, when the harvest is a-gathering, she ever lays up 9 food for her own nourishment. And thou, idleness, art still a-bed; wilt thou never 10 wake? What, thou wouldst sleep a little longer, yawn a little longer; a little longer 11 thou must pillow head on hand? Ay, but poverty will not wait, the day of distress will not wait, like an armed vagabond it will fall upon thee! (Wouldst thou see the good grain flow like water, wouldst thou see poverty take wing, thou must be up and doing.)¹

12 Worthless men there be, sinners there be, that go ever with a cunning smile on 13 their lips; a wink here, there a pressure of 14 the foot, there a beckoning finger; all the while their wicked hearts are plotting mis-15 chief, are sowing the causes of strife. Such men will be overtaken by their doom ere long, crushed all of a sudden beyond hope of remedy.

16 Six things I will tell thee, and name a seventh for good measure, the Lord hates 17 and will never abide; the haughty look, the lying tongue, the hands that take innocent 18 life, the heart that ever devises thoughts of mischief, the feet that hasten upon an ill 19 errand, the false witness whose every breath is perjury, and the sower of strife among brethren.

Keep true, my son, to the charge thy 20 father gives thee, nor make light of thy mother's teaching; wear them ever close 21 to thy heart, hang them like a lockset upon thy breast; be these, when thou walkest 22 abroad, thy company, when thou liest asleep, thy safeguard, in waking hours, thy counsellors. That charge is a lamp to guide 23 thee, that teaching a light to beckon thee; the warnings correction gave thee are a road leading to life.

Here is protection for thee against the 24 temptress that would lure thee away with her seductions. Never let her beauty win 25 thy heart, never let her bold glance deceive thee. A harlot's pay is but the price of a 26 meal; the adulteress costs dearer, her price is a man's whole life. Who can carry fire in 27 his bosom, without singeing the clothes he wears, or walk on hot coals without burn-28 his feet? No more can a man mate with his neighbour's wife, and not be defiled by her 29 touch. Small blame to the thief, when he 30 steals to fill his hungry belly, and if he be caught, why, he can pay sevenfold, or yield 31 up all that he has; the adulterer, in the 32 hunger of his heart, must risk losing life itself. Scathe and scorn he wins for him-33 self, and shame there is no blotting out; 34 no mercy for him, when the day of reckoning comes, from the anger of a jealous 35 husband that will listen to no man's entreaties, will refuse ransom never so abundant.

7 My son, do not forget these warnings;
 let this charge of mine be an heir-2 loom, kept jealously, as thou lovest thy own life; precious to thee as the apple of 3 thy eye be the teaching I give thee. Bind 4 it fast about thy fingers, write it, as upon a tablet, on thy heart; give to wisdom a sister's welcome, and hail discernment as thy friend.

So wilt thou learn to shun the temptress 5 with her honeyed words, the wife that is no wife of thine. Ere now, looking down 6 from my window through the lattice, I 7 have watched the thoughtless crowd, and seen some gallant, more insensate than the 8 rest, crossing the street at the corner where such a woman dwells. Now his steps are 9 taking him near that abode of hers; the day wanes, and the light fades; night spreads

¹ The words enclosed in brackets appear in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text.

10 her pall of darkness. Who comes to meet him? A woman in right harlot's guise, that goes out, ready of speech, to hunt men's 11 lives. No rest for her, stay at home she 12 cannot; ever in street and market-place she lies in ambush, at some corner of the ways.
 13 She draws him to herself and kisses him, 14 flattering him with her bold speech: Only to-day I have paid a vow that I owed for my preservation, and here are my victims 15 freshly killed; so I came out to find thee, longing for the sight of thee, and here thou 16 art! Soft, soft I have made my bed, spread it with embroidered tapestries of Egyptian 17 woof; freshly scented is that bower of mine with myrrh, and aloe, and cinnamon.
 18 Come, let us lose ourselves in dalliance, all the night through let us enjoy the long-19 desired embrace. My home stands master-20 less, my husband far away, and his purse with him; no fear of his returning till the moon is full.
 21 Alas, the ready speech that beguiles him, the seducing lips that lead him cap-22 tive away! He follows without more ado, unwitting as the ox that goes to the sham-23 bles, or a frisking lamb; nor knows what 24 fetters await him, till the shaft is already deep in his bosom. So joyfully flies bird into snare, heedless of its life's peril. Heed me well, my son; let not this warning be 25 given in vain; do not let her steal thy heart away, do not be enticed by her beckoning.
 26 Many the wounds such a woman has dealt; a brave retinue she has of men mur-27 dered; truly her house is the grave's ante-chamber, opens the door into the secret closet of death.

8 And, all the while, the wisdom that grants discernment is crying aloud, is 2 never silent; there she stands, on some high vantage-point by the public way, 3 where the roads meet, or at the city's approach, close beside the gates, making pro-4 clamations. To every man, high and low, 5 her voice calls: Here is better counsel for the simpleton; O foolish hearts, take warn-6 ing! Listen to me, I have matters of high moment to unfold, a plain message to 7 deliver. A tongue that speaks truth, lips that scorn impiety; here all is sound doc- 8 trine, no shifts, no evasions here. No 9 discerning heart, no well-stored mind, but 10 will own it right and just. Here is counsel, 11 here is instruction, better worth the win- 12

 ning than silver or the finest gold; wisdom 13 is more to be coveted than any jewel; there 14
 is no beauty that can be matched with hers.

What am I, the wisdom that speaks to 12 you? To shrewdness I am a near neigh- 13 bour, and I occupy myself with deep 14 designs; but, since they must hate evil that 15 fear the Lord, all pride and boastfulness, 16 every mischievous design and every trea- 17 cherous word I shun. Good counsel is 18 mine, and honourable dealing, discern- 19 ment and high courage are my gifts; 20 through me kings learn how to reign, law- 21 givers how to lay down just decrees; 22 through me chieftain and magistrate exer- 23 cise their power aright. Love me, and thou 24 shalt earn my love; wait early at my doors, 25 and thou shalt gain access to me. The gifts 26 I bring with me are riches and honour, 27 princely state and the divine favour. Mine 28 is a yield better than gold or jewels, mine 29 are revenues more precious than the finest 30 silver. A faithful course I tread, nor exceed the bounds of just retribution, failing never to enrich the souls that love me with abundant store.

The Lord made me his² when first he 22 went about his work, at the birth of time, 23 before his creation began. Long, long ago, 24 before earth was fashioned, I held my 25 course. Already I lay in the womb, when 26 the depths were not yet in being, when no 27 springs of water had yet broken; when I 28 was born, the mountains had not yet sunk 29 on their firm foundations, and there were 30 no hills; not yet had he made the earth, or 31
 the rivers, or the solid framework of the 32 world.³ I was there when he built the 33 heavens, when he fenced in the waters with 34
 a vault inviolable, when he fixed the sky 35 overhead, and levelled the fountain- 36 springs of the deep. I was there when he 37 enclosed the sea within its confines, for- 38 bidding the waters to transgress their as- 39 signed limits, when he poised the founda- 40 tions of the world. I was at his side, a 41

¹ The sense of the Hebrew text here is uncertain.
 of the verb used in the Hebrew text. But it is passages cited (e.g. Gen. 14. 19), and all through the book of Proverbs it is regularly used in the sense of acquiring' wisdom.

² Some would give 'made me' as the right translation of the Hebrew text. But it is doubtful whether it really has this meaning in the passages cited (e.g. Gen. 14. 19), and all through the book of Proverbs it is regularly used in the sense of acquiring' wisdom.

³ In the Hebrew text, 'the open spaces, or the beginnings of the world's dust'.

master-workman, my delight increasing with each day, as I made play before him 31 all the while; made play in this world of dust, with the sons of Adam for my play-32 fellows. Listen to me, then, you that are my sons, that follow, to your happiness, in the paths I shew you; listen to the teaching 33 that will make you wise, instead of turning away from it. Blessed are they who listen 34 to me, keep vigil, day by day, at my threshold, watching till I open my doors. The 35 man who wins me, wins life, drinks deep of the Lord's favour; who fails, fails at his 36 own bitter cost; to be my enemy is to be in love with death.

9 See, where wisdom has built herself a house, carved out for herself those 2 seven pillars of hers! And now, her sacrificial victims slain, her wine mingled, her 3 banquet spread, this way and that her maidens are dispatched, to city keep and 4 city wall, bidding her guests make haste. Simple hearts, she says, draw near me; and 5 to all that lack learning this is her cry, Come and eat at my table, come and drink 6 of the wine I have brewed for you; say farewell to your childishness, and learn to 7 live; follow all of you in the path that leads to discernment.
 8 (Rash souls there are, godless souls, that will not be taught or trained; who makes 9 the attempt, gets only injury and abuse for his thanks. With a rash fool never remon-10 strate; it will make him thy enemy; only the wise are grateful for a remonstrance.
 11 Ever the wise profit by the opportunity to become wiser yet; ever the godly are the 12 best learners.)
 13 True wisdom begins with the fear of the Lord; he best discerns, with his know-14 ledge of holy things. Long life I bring thee, and a full tale of years; wisdom thy-15 self shall profit, and misfortune fall only on the rash fools that earned it.
 16 Out upon her silly clamour, the woman that is so crafty, yet knowledge has none!
 17 At her door she sits, her chair commanding the city's height, and cries aloud to such as 18 pass by on their lawful errands. Simple hearts, she says, draw near me, and to all that lack learning this is her cry, Stolen waters are sweetest, and bread is better eating when there is none to see. Who shall warn them that dead men are her company, no guest of hers but is guest of the dark world beneath?

PROVERBS OF SOLOMON

10 A father's smile, a mother's tears, tell of a son well schooled or ill.

No good ever came of money ill gotten; honest living is death's avoiding. Still the Lord gives honesty a full belly, and on the knave's scheming shuts his door.

Idle hand, empty purse; riches come of hard work. (Who trusts in false promises, throws his food to the winds; as well may he chase bird in flight.)² Wilt thou gather in harvest time, a son well schooled? Or sleep the summer round, to thy father's great shame?

Shines the Lord's favour on the just man's head; the sinner's lips are silenced by his own ill-doing. When blessings are given, the just are remembered still; it is the sinner's name that rusts.

Warning the wise man hears; the fool talks on, and is ruined.

He walks secure, who walks pure; cunning will yet be found out.

It needs no more than a wink of the eye to bring trouble; what wonder if the fool who talks earns a beating?³ The mouth, for the just man a life-giving well, for the wicked an arsenal of harm.⁴ Hatred is ever ready to pick a quarrel; love passes over all kinds of offence. Never wise man's lips but found the right word, or fool's back but felt the rod. Wise men treasure up their knowledge; a fool's talk is ready to mar all.

As the rich man's wealth is his stronghold, and the poor man's need his peril, so the doings of the just evermore win fresh life, the sinner's increase his guilt. Who lives by the lessons he has learned finds life; the way is lost when warnings go unheeded.

Lying lips that hide malice, foolish lips

¹ vv. 7-9. There is some reason to suspect dislocation in the text here. These verses do not fit naturally into the speech of Wisdom, who is making an express appeal (verse 4) to the foolish. ² The second half of this verse is not found in the Hebrew text; the Septuagint Greek gives it immediately after verse 12 of ch. 9. ³ vv. 8, 10. The second half of either verse is the same in the original. ⁴ vv. 6, 11. In the Hebrew text, both verses end with the same formula, which the Latin interprets in verse 6 'iniquity covers the mouth of the godless' and in verse 11 'the mouth of the godless covers iniquity'.

19 that spread slander, what a world of sin 20 there is in talking! Where least is said, 21 most prudence is. Silver refined is the just 22 man's every word, and trash the sinner's 23 every thought. The just man's talk plays 24 of the shepherd to many, while the fool dies 25 of his own starved heart.

26 Of the Lord's gift comes wealth without 27 drudgery.

28 For the fool, it is but a pastime to make 29 mischief; to act prudently needs all a man's 30 wisdom.

31 Not in vain the sinner fears, the just 32 man hopes; vanished, like the storm of 33 yesterday, or secure eternally.

34 What irks a man more than vinegar on 35 the tooth, or smoke in the eyes? A lin-36 gering messenger.

37 If fear of the Lord brings life, few years 38 shall the wicked have; die their hopes must 39 while honest folk wait on contentedly. The 40 Lord's judgements, what comfort they 41 bring to the innocent, what terrors to the 42 evil-doer! An abiding home never the just 43 lacked yet, or the guilty found. A just 44 man's talk breeds wisdom, while the sin-45 ner's tongue dies barren; welcome ever the 46 one, cross-grained the other.

11 A false balance the Lord hates; nothing but full weight will content
 him.

2 Pride is neighbour to disesteem; hu-3 mility to wisdom.

4 The innocence of the upright guides 5 them safely; the treacherous by their own 6 plots are destroyed. When the time for 7 reckoning comes, little shall wealth avail; 8 right living is death's avoiding. An honest 9 purpose clears a man's path; the wicked 10 are entangled by their own scheming. For 11 his honesty, the upright man shall go free; 12 not so the wrong-doer, caught in the 13 meshes of his own net. No hope follows 14 the godless to the grave; nothing left, now, 15 of all their anxious longing. Honesty shall 16 yet go free, and a knave be heir to its 17 troubles. False speech the hypocrite will 18 use to ruin his neighbour; true knowledge 19 is the saving of the just. Thrive honest 20 men, come ruin on knaves, there is huzza'ing all through the city; how should a city stand or fall, but by good words from the one, ill counsel from the other?

He mocks loud, who lacks wit; discernment holds her tongue. Who bears ill tales, keeps no secrets; trust none with thy confidence but a loyal friend.

Ill fares the people, that guidance has none; safety reigns where counsel abounds.

He who goes bail for a stranger has great harm of it; that snare avoid, and sleep sound.

Gracious ways may win a woman re-now; man never grew rich but by hardiness.¹

A kindly man is the friend of his own well-being; cruelty will not spare its own flesh and blood.

Precarious livelihood the godless man
 wins; wouldst thou be sure of thy revenue, let honest doings be thy crop; mercy breeds life, evil ambitions death. A false heart the Lord cannot endure; nothing but honest dealing will content him. Depend upon it, the sinner shall never be held guiltless; the race of the just shall find acquittal.

A woman fair and fond, a sow ringed with gold.

In the desires of the just only good dwells; the hopes of the wicked only lead to ruin. One spends what he has, and yet has more to spare; another sets his heart on what is none of his, and is a poor man still; give and thou shalt thrive; he shall have abundance, that bestows abundantly.
 Corn hoarded shall win thee a curse, corn sold freely a blessing, from the lips of a whole people. Plan thou good, thou canst not be afoot too early; plan thou evil, on thy own head it shall recoil. Fall he must, that relies on riches; never shall the just fade or fail. He shall feed on air, that mis-rules his own household; the fool will be slave and the wise man master in the end.
 Where right living bears its fruit, a tree of life grows up; the wise man's reward is living souls.² Even honest men cannot go through the world unpunished; what, then, of the godless, what, then, of the sinner?

¹ The word used in the Hebrew text means 'ruthlessness', but is perhaps a false reading for the very similar word meaning 'diligence' (cf. 10. 4).

² In the second half of the verse, the text is possibly corrupt; as it stands, it should mean either that the wise man takes other people's lives, or that he receives the persons of others as his captives (Gen. 14. 14, 21). The exact sense is not clear.

12 Ever the friend of admonition is the friend of knowledge; only fools are impatient of warning.

² A kindly man wins the Lord's favour, ³ a schemer is his enemy. Wickedness shall never thrive; the just have roots immovable.

⁴ Crowned is his brow, who wins a vigorous wife; sooner let thy bones rot than marry one who shames thee.

⁵ Honourable thoughts the just conceive, ⁶ the wicked are all double-dealing; yet, when the accusations of the wicked lay a fatal snare, the just shall find words to deliver them. A turn in their fortunes, and no more is heard of the wicked; only the just have abiding prosperity.

⁸ Good sense is the measure of a man's repute; fond fancies are ever despised.

⁹ Better be poor, and toil to support thyself, than play the great lord with an empty belly.

¹⁰ A just man cares for the safety of the beasts he owns; the wicked are heartless through and through.

¹¹ Till field and fill belly; idle pursuits are but foolishness. (Sit long enjoying thy wine, and there is no strong fortress will win thee renown.¹)

¹² In unholy ambitions the wicked put their trust, but it is honesty that strikes deep root. Ruin comes upon the sinner for a word spoken amiss, while honest men ¹³ find acquittal. When a man is blessed, it is his own words that bear fruit; never son of Adam but had the lot his deeds deserved.

¹⁵ A fool is ever right to his own thinking; ¹⁶ the wise listen to advice. Fools betray anger on the instant, when prudence would pass the insult by.

¹⁷ Nothing but his honest thought a lover of truth declares, a false witness nothing but lies. Rash promises can stab the heart with remorse;² wise words bring healing. ¹⁹ Lips that speak the truth shall fade never; a lie serves but the haste of the moment.

²⁰ The schemer's thoughts dwell ever on treachery; for peace be all thy plotting, if thou wouldst have a contented heart. ²¹ Nothing can befall the just man to do him hurt; the wicked shall have their fill of mischief.

Lying lips the Lord cannot abide; keep ²² faith if thou wouldst content him.

Prudence says less than it knows; the ²³ fool's heart cannot contain its folly.

Busy hands, hands that shall bear the ²⁴ sceptre; idle hands, hands that shall bring tribute.

A heart bowed down with anxiety, how ²⁵ a kind word can refresh it!

It is well done to put up with loss for a ²⁶ neighbour's need; the calculations of the sinner do but lead him astray. Never yet ²⁷ did cunning achieve the gains it hoped for; a contented heart is precious as fine gold.³ Wouldst thou attain life, honesty is the ²⁸ high road; by-way there is none but leads to death.

13 By his father's teaching a son grows wise; only the headstrong will not listen to a warning.

Fair words yield a crop to content a ² man's heart; but not for the treacherous; they have no stomach but for wrong-doing. Guard thy tongue, guard thy soul; ³ thoughtless speech may bring ruin.

Idleness will and will not, both at once; ⁴ it is hard work that gives a full belly.

Honesty shuns the false word; the sinner ⁵ disappointment gives and gets.⁴ The upright heart is protected by its own innocence; guilt trips the heel of the wrongdoer.

Some are rich that nothing have; some ⁷ with a well-lined purse are yet poor. A man's wealth may be his own life's ⁸ ransom; yet will not the poor man be chidden for his poverty.⁵

Welcome the shining beams of a life ⁹ well lived; the rush-light of the wicked glimmers and is gone.

Ever there is wrangling among the ¹⁰ proud; wisdom's part is to be guided by other men's counsel.

Riches soon won are soon spent; the ¹¹ patient hoard breeds best.

Hope deferred, how it crushes a man's ¹² spirits! The granted wish, a tree of life-giving fruit!

¹ The second half of this verse is found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text.

² The meaning of the Hebrew text is perhaps rather, 'he who speaks rashly can wound like a sword'.

³ The Latin version here disagrees with the Hebrew text, which is obscure and perhaps corrupt.

⁴ 'Disappointment gives and gets'; according to the Hebrew text, 'behaves vilely and shamefully'.

⁵ The second half of this verse is difficult, and perhaps corrupt.

13 Neglect thy errand,¹ whatever it be, and thou art in default; carry out thy orders, and be at peace.

Faithless hearts wander far in their transgressions, but the just are ever pitying, ever merciful.

14 The teaching of the wise is a fountain where men may drink life far removed from all mortal perils. Good instruction breeds gracious thoughts; the headstrong are for the morass. For the prudent, skill guides every action; ignorance betrays the fool.

17 Who runs a sinner's errand, falls into mischief by the way; a faithful envoy mends all.

18 Comes want, comes shame from warnings unheeded; he achieves great things who will accept reproof.

19 Each man loves his own way best, and to a fool, there is no shame like sin's avoiding. Wise company brings wisdom; fool he ends that fool befriends.

21 Calamity is hard on the heels of wickedness, and honest men shall yet be rewarded. Son and grandson shall be the good man's heirs; the sinner lays up wealth for nobler men; the rich harvest of those ancestral fields, lack he honest worth, shall be reaped for strangers.²

24 Spare the rod, and thou art no friend to thy son; ever a kind father is quick to punish.

25 The just man eats his fill; the godless craves and never has enough.

14 It is by woman's wisdom a home thrives; a foolish wife pulls it down about her ears.

2 Does a man fear the Lord? He holds an even course; the knave has little regard for him.³

3 Pride burgeons from the lips of fools; in modesty of speech the wise find safety.

4 No need for a full crib, where oxen are none; yet ever rich harvest tells of the ox at work.

It is a faithful witness that never lies; the perjurer breathes out lies continually.

Vainly the rash aspire to wisdom; the discerning come by their knowledge with little pains. Go thy way, and let the fool go his; good sense is a strange language to him. Prudence picks its way wisely; the fool blunders and is lost. Fools make light of the guilt that needs atonement, and leave honest men to enjoy the Lord's favour.⁴

Heart's bitterness none may know but the heart that feels it; no prying stranger can tell when it finds relief.

Fall it must, the house of the wicked; where the upright dwell, all is increase.

The right road in a man's thinking may be one whose goal is death. Joy blends with grief, and laughter marches with tears. The incorrigible shall have a taste of his own ill-doings, and honest men shall have the better of him.

The simpleton takes all on trust; wisdom considers each step. (A treacherous son no part shall have; better shall a wise servant thrive and prosper.)⁵ Caution teaches the wise to shun danger; the fool is carried away by rash confidence. The impatient man blunders, as surely as the schemer makes enemies. Folly is the simpleton's heirloom; skill crowns the wise.

Vice lies prostrate before virtue, the sinner at the gates of the just.

Of the beggar, his own neighbours grow weary; wealth never lacks friends. Shame on the man who holds his neighbour in contempt; mercy to the poor brings a blessing. (Mercy he loves, who puts his trust in the Lord.)⁶ They follow a false path, that plot mischief; mercy and faithfulness mercy and faith shall find.

Hard work is sure wealth; of chattering comes only poverty.

Made rich, the wise are crowned, the folly of the thoughtless will be folly yet.

Men owe their lives to truthful witnesses; the very breath of the perjurer is treason.

¹ 'Neglect the command' according to the Hebrew text; it omits the second half of the verse.

² The Latin appears to connect this verse with the preceding one; the Hebrew text has 'There is much food in the fallow-lands of the poor, but there are some who are swept away, not by just judgment'.

³ The sense of the Hebrew text is plain; the God-fearing are the right-living, the despisers of God are revealed by their treacherous conduct. The Latin version makes the whole verse into a single sentence, which says that the God-fearing and right-living man is despised by, or (possibly) despises, the treacherous.

⁴ The first half of this verse is obscure in the Hebrew text. 'The Lord's favour'; literally, 'favour'; if the two halves of the verse are to be parallel, divine favour must be meant. ⁵ The words enclosed in brackets do not appear in the Hebrew text; they occur in the Septuagint Greek after verse 13 of the foregoing chapter. ⁶ The words printed in brackets are peculiar to the Latin.

26 The fear of the Lord gives strong confidence, bequeaths hope from the father to the children. The fear of the Lord is a fountain where men may drink life, far removed from all mortal peril.¹

28 Great people, great king; it is for want of men crowns are lost.

29 Patience comes of sovereign prudence, impatience of unchecked folly. Peace of mind is health of body; more than all else, envy wastes the frame.

31 He who oppresses the poor, insults man's Maker; him if thou wouldst honour, take pity on human need.

32 When the wicked is paid in his own coin, there is an end of him; at death's door, the just still hope.

33 In the discerning heart, wisdom finds a resting-place; even among fools it can impart learning.²

34 Duty well done, a whole nation becomes great; suffer whole peoples for guilt incurred.

35 A king shews favour to a wise servant; disappoint him, and thou shalt feel his anger.

15 A gentle answer is a quarrel averted; a word that gives pain does but fan the flame of resentment. The speech of the wise is learning's ornament; the fool babbles on. Go where thou wilt, the Lord's eye is watching; good nor evil escapes his scrutiny. Tongue that speaks peaceably is a tree whose fruit gives life; tongue undisciplined can break hearts.

5 He is a fool that makes light of his father's warnings; would he but listen to reproof, he should be prudent yet.

(Might is most where right is most; root and branch the sinner shall be plucked up.³) The just man's home guards its treasure well; the hopes of the wicked are all confusion.

7 The talk of the wise is a seed-ground of learning; the thoughts of fools are ill matched with it.

8 From the wicked man's sacrifice the Lord turns away with loathing; only the just with their vows win his favour. The whole course of the sinner's life he cannot brook; pursue the right, if thou wouldst win his love. Forsake the right path, and correction shall seem hard to thee; grow weary of reproof, and thy life shall pay for it. Shall the Lord read the secrets of the devouring grave, and not men's hearts?

Warn the headstrong, and thou wilt get no thanks for it; not for him the company of the wise.

Gay heart, gay looks; sad thoughts crush the spirit.

Truth is the quest of discerning minds, trifling the pasture-ground of the foolish.

To the friendless, every day brings trouble, but every day is a feast-day to a contented heart. Better a humble lot, and the fear of the Lord present, than great riches that leave a man unsatisfied. Better sit down to a dish of herbs seasoned with charity, than feast on a fattened ox in ill-will.

Any brawler can provoke a quarrel; it needs a patient man to lay it by.

Idleness finds ever a hedge of thorns in its path; the man of duty walks on unhampered.

A father well content, a mother slighted, tell of a son's wisdom or mortal folly.

A man of little sense is in love with his follies; prudence keeps to its chosen path. Counsel lacking, all designs go amiss; with the advice of many, they should have thriven. There are times when a counsellor has good cause to be proud; nothing better than the right word spoken.

A mind well schooled sees the way of life stretching upwards, leading away from the pit beneath.

A house where pride reigns the Lord will pull down at last; will have no encroaching on the lands of the friendless widow. The schemes of wickedness he abhors; the dreams of innocence he loves, and brings true.⁴ Let avarice lead thee away, thy home shall be ruined; long life is his, who scorns the bribe. (Kindness and honour are sin's purging; ever it is the fear of the Lord turns men away from harm.)⁵

¹ Cf. 13. 14 above.

² In the second half of the verse, the Hebrew text appears to mean, 'and in the inmost being of fools it makes itself known'; it is perhaps corrupt. The Latin version runs 'and it will instruct all fools', probably a copyist's error for 'And it will instruct even fools'.

³ The words enclosed in brackets occur in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text.

⁴ The second half of this verse reads, in the Hebrew text, 'but pleasant words are pure'; it is not certain in what sense.

⁵ The Latin version gives the second maxim twice over (see 16. 6 below).

28 Attentive and docile is the upright heart; from the lips of the wicked comes 29 mischief in full flood. From the wicked, the Lord withholds his presence, listens only to the prayer of the just.

30 The eye that smiles, how it cheers the heart! Good news, how it lends vigour to a man's frame!

31 A man's ear once attentive to the discipline that brings life, no company shall be 32 welcome thenceforward, but the wise. He holds his life cheap, that will not listen to a warning; heed reproof, and be master of 33 thy soul. It is the fear of the Lord teaches the lessons of wisdom; humility goes first,
and honour comes in her train.

16 Man's heart is ever full of devising; from the Lord comes the 2 ordering of right speech.¹ His own path man scans, and nothing sees amiss, but the 3 divine balance weighs our thoughts; share with the Lord the burden of all thy doings, if thou wouldst be sincere in thy intent.

4 God, who made all, made all for his own purposes, even the godless man, with doom awaiting him.

5 A proud man the Lord holds in abhor-rence; depend upon it, no acquittal shall he find. (To do right, that is the first step on the way of blessedness, a more welcome thing in God's sight than any sacrifice a 6 man can offer.)² Kindness and honour are sin's purging; ever it is the fear of the Lord 7 turns men away from harm. Live as the Lord would have thee live, and he will make even thy enemies into well-wishers.

8 Better a penny honestly come by than great revenues ill gotten.

9 Heart of man must plan his course, but his steps will fall as the Lord guides them.

10 Speaks king, speaks oracle; never a word amiss. Scale and balance are emblems of 11 the Lord's own justice; no weight in the merchant's wallet but is of divine fashion-12 ing. Wrong-doing the king will not abide; on right his own throne rests. Kings are 13 for honest talk; free-spoken is well loved.
14 The king's frown is death at thy door; 15 wisdom will appease it; his smile is life;
not more welcome the spring rains, than royal favour.

Not of gold or silver be thy hoard; make 16 wisdom thine, discernment thine, more precious than these.

The just man travels by the high road, 17 safe from harm, watching his path anxiously, as he values his life.

Presumption comes first, and ruin close 18
behind it; pride ever goes before a fall.
Better a humble lot among peaceful folk, 19 than all the spoil a tyrant's friendship can bring thee.

Well versed in doctrine, happiness thou 20 shalt win; trust in the Lord, and find a blessing. Good judgement a wise heart 21 can claim; winning words bring greater prizes yet. The prudent man drinks from 22 a living fountain; fools only learn the lessons of their folly. Wisdom distils from 23 heart to mouth, and lends the lips persuasion. Honey itself cannot vie with 24 well-framed words, for heart's comfort and body's refreshment. The right road in a 25 man's thinking may be one whose goal is death.

No better friend drudgery has than ap- 26
petite; hunger drives a man to his task.

Ever the godless man digs a well of mis- 27 chief, ever his lips are aflame. His the 28 scheming that breeds quarrels, the whispering that divides his clan, the love of 29 wrong that misleads his neighbours and carries them off into evil ways; spell- 30 bound with dreams of treachery, he shuts his lips tight and goes about his false errand.³

No prize so honourable as old age, and 31
it is won by innocence of life.

Patience is worth more than valour; 32 better a disciplined heart than a stormed city.

Into the lap's fold the lot falls hap- 33
hazard, but the Lord rules the issue.

17 Better dry crust and gay heart, than a house where all is feasting and all is quarrelling.

Where sons are fools, slaves will be 2 masters, and share the inheritance like heirs born.

For silver and gold, furnace and cru- 3 cible; men's hearts are for the Lord's assaying.

¹ The bearing of this maxim is uncertain.
giant Greek, but not in the Hebrew text.

² The second half of this verse is found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text. ³ In the first half of this verse, the Hebrew text is usually understood to mean 'He plots treachery with a wink of the eye.'

- 4 Ever ill-will gives heed to injurious talk, false faith listens to the slander.
- 5 He who shews contempt to the poor, insults man's Maker; at thy own peril thou wilt take delight in another's ruin.
- 6 Crown of old age, when a man sees his children's children; pride of youth, when a man can boast of the fathers that begot him.
- 7 Solemn talk matches ill with folly, lying speech with royalty.
- 8 When a man has hope in view, like a jewel it shines before him; look where he will, his way lies clear.¹
- 9 If good will be thy quest, hide the wrong done; gossip unknits the bond of friendship.
- 10 One word of warning in a prudent man's ear does more than a hundred lashes given to a fool. Still the godless man will be for stirring up strife, till at last an angel visits him with no kindly message. Better meet the she-bear reft of her cubs, than a fool in his blind confidence.
- 13 Evil shall still haunt his dwelling, that repays kindness with injury.
- 14 Who began the quarrel? He who let loose the flood-gates of it; and before he can suffer injury, he stands aside from the debate.²
- 15 Misjudgement the Lord will never abide, whether the guilty go free, or the innocent are condemned.
- 16 Little the fool's wealth avails; he may not buy wisdom if he would. (Build high, and court thy ruin; despise learning, and thou shalt come to mischief.)³
- 17 He is thy friend, who is thy friend at all times; of a brother's love there is no test like adversity.
- 18 He is a fool, that lightly goes bail for his friend.
- 19 He loves a feud, that loves contention; build high, and court thy ruin. False heart never found happiness, nor lying tongue escaped mischief.
- 21 A fool's birthday is a day of shame; never father had joy of a reckless son.
- 22 A cheerful heart makes a quick recovery, it is crushed spirits that waste a man's frame.

Out comes bribe from bosom, and the godless man turns justice aside from its course.

Wisdom is a beacon-light to the discerning; the fool's eyes roam this way and that, as wide as earth. Poor fool, his father's bane, sorrow of the mother that bore him!

Foul shame it is to make the innocent suffer, to strike a blow against the chieftain that gives redress.

Skilful is he who has skill to check his tongue, learned he is that knows how to spare his breath. Let him keep his own counsel, a fool may pass for a wise man; shut lips can claim discernment.

18 None so quick to find pretexts,⁴ as he that would break with a friend; he is in fault continually.

For prudent warnings a fool has no stomach; nothing will serve but to echo his own thought.

Little the godless man reckes of it, when he falls into sin's mire, but shame and reproach go with him.

Man's utterance has currents like the waters that run deep; from wisdom's well flows a stream in full flood.⁵

Foul shame it is to court favour with the wrong-doer by turning justice aside from its course.

A fool's talk is for ever embroiling him; let him but open his mouth, blows will follow. From his own words his undoing comes, from his own lips the snare. Innocent enough seem the words of the back-biter, yet their poison sinks deep into a man's belly.

(Slow natures every fear disarms; womanish souls shall go hungry.)⁶ Dainty and listless go to work, thou art own brother to that work's undoer.

No stronghold like the Lord's name; there the just take refuge, high above reach. What citadel has the rich man? His own possessions; he seems shut in by a wall impregnable; yet hearts are proudest when ruin is nearest; humility is the antechamber of renown.

¹ The sense of the Hebrew text seems to be, 'A bribe is a talisman for him who owns it; wherever he turns, he prospers'.

² The Hebrew text is commonly interpreted as meaning, 'The beginning of a quarrel is as when a man opens a sluice; let it alone, before trouble breaks out'.

³ The second part of this verse is found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text.

⁴ 'Quick to find pretexts'; in the Hebrew text, 'selfish'.

⁵ The sense and the bearing of this maxim are open to dispute.

⁶ The words printed in brackets are found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text.

Let a man hear the tale out before he answer, or he is a fool manifest, marked out for shame.

All mortal ills the spirit of man can bear; if the spirit itself be impatient, there is no lightening his lot.

Prize of the discerning heart, quest of the wise man's ear, is to learn truth.

The gift made, how it opens a man's path for him, wins him access to the great!

An innocent man is the first to lay bare the truth;¹ let his neighbour come and search him as he will.

The lot brings feuds to an end; greatness itself must bow to the lot's decision.

When brother helps brother, theirs is the strength of a fortress; their cause is like a city gate barred, unassailable.²

As mouth speaks, belly shall find its fare; a man's own words bear the fruit that must needs content him. Of life and death, tongue holds the keys; use it lovingly,³ and it will requite thee.

A good wife found is treasure found; the Lord is filling thy cup with happiness. (A good wife cast away is treasure cast away; leave to fools, and godless fools, the adulterous embrace.⁴)

Poor men must cringe, for the rich to rate them.

A man endeared to thee by fellowship will prove a better friend to thee than thy own kin.⁵

19 Better the poverty which keeps to honest ways, than the lot of a rich man who never learned to speak truth.⁶ Lack learning, all is not well within; ever the hasty stumble. Tripped by his own folly, a man eats his heart out, finding fault with the Lord.

Riches will make thee new friends a many, poverty rob thee of the old.

Perjury will bring its own punishment; never was liar yet that escaped his doom.

Suitors a many the princely heart shall have; give, and thou shalt find friends. The beggar wearies out his kinsmen; his friends, too, will shun him.

Who hunts idle talk, comes home empty-handed; as thou lovest thy life get wisdom; discernment at thy side, thou shalt speed well.

Perjury will bring its own punishment; never was liar but met his doom.

Ill days, when fools live in comfort; worse yet, when servants sway their own masters.

Patience is wisdom's livery; there is no such boast as a wrong overlooked.

Of the king's frown beware, as of lion roaring; welcome as dew on the grass his smile.

Great hurt it is to be a fool's father; he has a roof that drips unendingly, who is husband to a scold. House and hoard a man may inherit; it is the Lord's gift only, if he have a wife that minds her ways.

Sloth brings the sleep that has no awaking; idle hands, empty belly.

Law observed is life preserved; the careless step leads the way to death.

Befriend the poor, and lend to the Lord; he will repay faithfully.

Chasten thy son still, nor despair of his amendment; still let the death of him be far from thy thoughts.

He injures himself, that is unmanageable in rage; every advantage he seizes does but injure him the more.⁷ Give heed to counsel, accept correction, and thou shalt be wise at last. Thought jostles thought in man's heart; the Lord's will stands firm.

Poverty is the school of piety; better need than knavery. Fear of the Lord leads on to life, life where all is contentment, and no ill may come.

With folded hands the sluggard sits by, and never puts hand to mouth.⁸

The lash for the reckless, if thou wouldst

¹ Literally, 'A just man is the first to accuse himself'; but this can hardly mean that he confesses his guilt, since there would be no need, in that case, for investigation by his neighbours. The sense will be rather that he makes admissions which at first sight tell against his innocence. The Hebrew text is obscure; with some difficulty, it is interpreted as meaning, 'He who speaks first is always (apparently) in the right'.

² The Hebrew text here is usually rendered, 'A brother trespassed (against) is (harder to win over) than a strong city; (such) contentions are like the bars of a fortress'. ³ 'Lovingly' is usually interpreted as meaning 'lavishly', but 'with due reverence' may be meant.

⁴ The second part of this verse is found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text. ⁵ This verse is very obscure, and perhaps corrupt; some infer from the Hebrew text a contrast between fair-weather and genuine friends. ⁶ The word 'rich' does not occur in the Hebrew text. ⁷ This verse, in the Hebrew text, is of very disputable interpretation. The same is true of verse 22.

⁸ According to the Latin version, the sluggard hides his hands under his arm-pits; according to the Hebrew text, he buries them in the dish that lies in front of him.

turn a fool into a wise man; only cool heads will profit by a rebuke.

26 Shame on the wretch that brings ruin on his own father, drives his own mother out of doors.

27 Never weary, my son, of giving heed to warnings; never let the counsels of experience pass thee by.¹

28 Out on the faithless witness that scorns right; the sinful souls that are ever greedy for wrong-doing! There is a doom awaits the reckless; there are thick cudgels ready for the fool's back.

20 A reckless counsellor is wine, strong drink a riotous friend; the man who is swayed by these, call not wise.

2 Beware of the king's power, as of lion roaring; challenge it, and thy life is forfeit.

3 Well may he boast, that keeps clear of strife; every fool will be quarrelling.

4 Too cold to plough, says Sloth; vainly, when harvest comes, he will go a-begging.

5 Prudent counsel is a well buried deep in man's heart; but the wise know how to draw from it. Many there are that pass for kindly souls, but a faithful friend is hard to come by. An upright man that goes armed with honest intent, leaves a blessing

8 to his children. Let a king rule justly, wrong-doing shall be winnowed away under his scrutiny.

9 Who dares to boast, My heart is unsullied now, I have cleansed myself of every fault?

10 One balance for getting and one for giving, one yard-wand for selling and one for buying, the Lord will not endure.

11 Watch a boy even at his play, thou canst tell whether his heart is pure and true. The ear that listens, the watchful eye, are both of the Lord's fashioning.

13 Love not thy sleep, or poverty will overtake thee unawares; the open eye means a full belly.

14 A poor thing, says the buyer, a poor thing! Then off he goes, and boasts of it.

15 Gold thou mayst have in abundance, and jewels a many, but the finest ware of all is wise speech.

16 Does a man go bail for a stranger?

Without more ado, take his garment from him; who trusts without knowledge, forfeits the pledge.

Ill-gotten wealth is bread most appetizing, that will yet turn to grit in the mouth.

Counsel is the sure buttress of determination; wars must ever be won by statecraft.

With the whisperer, that goes about open-mouthed on his errand of gossip, never throw in thy lot.

In deepest night the lamp of his hopes shall be quenched, that turns upon father or mother with a curse. The inheritance too soon come by, too late thou shalt find unblesed. Never promise thyself vengeance; await the Lord's hour, and redress shall be thine. One weight for getting and one for giving, the Lord cannot endure; a false balance is great wrong. Every step man takes is of the Lord's choosing; and thou, poor mortal, wouldst thou plot out thy path?

He is trapped, that consecrates his gift in haste;² the vow made, repentance comes too late.

Fan and flail a wise king has for the ill-doer.

Man's spirit is a lamp the Lord gives, to search out the hidden corners of his being.

What is a king's best body-guard? Mercy and faithfulness; on mercy his throne rests.

Youth has strong arms to boast of, old age white hairs for a crown.

Hurts that bruise cruelly, chastisement felt deep within, are sin's best remedy.

21 The thoughts of a king are in the Lord's hand, streams he can sluice which way he wills. His own path man scans, and nothing sees amiss, but the divine balance weighs our thoughts. Mercy shewn and justice done win the Lord's favour beyond any sacrifice. Lordly looks, proud heart; the hopes³ of the wicked are all at fault.

Ever diligence plans for plenty; sloth will be content to starve.

¹ The Hebrew text here lacks the negative, and yields no good sense as it stands. ² This is the meaning of the verse as given in the Septuagint Greek, and perhaps as it stands in the Hebrew. The Latin has 'It is ruin to a man to devour the holy ones'. ³ Literally, 'the lamp', or (according to the Hebrew text) 'the untilled ground'. The sense is doubtful; nor is it clear whether 'at fault' refers to sinful actions or has its literal sense of missing a mark.

6 Illusion it is and madness, wealth to win by perjury; death has caught thee in his 7 snare. Wicked men, that refuse the right, by their own violence come to ruin.
8 Crooked is man's course, and belies his own nature, but pure souls there are whose life runs true.

9 Better lodge in a garret than share thy house with a scold.

10 A godless man has set his heart on ill-11 doing; no ruth has he for his fellows. The lash for the reckless, if thou wouldst turn a fool into a wise man; a wise master, and 12 he shall learn yet. Good heed the just man gives to the sinner's household, in hope of diverting sinners from harm.¹

13 Who shuts his ear to the poor man's plea, himself one day shall plead in vain.

14 Carry a secret gift in thy bosom for thy enemy's appeasing; the open hand no grudge will ever resist.

15 Right done, honest folk rejoice, and knaves tremble.

16 Stray from the path thou wast taught,
and thou shalt lodge with the dead.

17 Of greed comes want; he grows not rich that loves wine and oil.

18 The wicked is still the price of the just man's ransom; for honest folk, treachery pays the score.²

19 Better dwell in a wilderness than with a scold who rails at thee.

20 Precious store there is and good cheer where justice dwells;³ the fool devours all at once.

21 Honest living be thy quest and kindly deeds, life shall be thine, and blessing, and 22 honour. Wisdom can scale the fortress great warriors hold, and bring low its 23 boasted strength. Guard lips and tongue, as thou wouldst guard thy life from peril.

24 I know one, Sir Reckless is the name of him, that is all proud airs, and does nothing but in over-bearing scorn.

25 Day-dreams are the sluggard's down-26 fall; work his hands will not; all day long dreaming and scheming, while honest men never spare themselves, nor take their ease.

Tainted is the sinner's sacrifice; the ²⁷ hand that offers it is stained with guilt. The ²⁸ false witness shall meet his doom; obey the commandment, and thy pleadings shall ²⁹ triumph. The ill-doer has eyes for nothing but his wanton designs; the upright scans well his path.

Wisdom is none, prudence is none, ³⁰ counsel is none that can be matched against the Lord's will; well armed thy horse may ³¹ be on the eve of battle, but the Lord sends victory.

22 Precious beyond all treasure is good repute; not gold or silver is so worth the winning, as to be loved. Rich ² and poor dwell ever side by side, God's creatures both of them.

When ill times come, prudence is on its ³ guard, and takes refuge; the unwary march on, and pay the penalty.

Humility brings fear of the Lord, and ⁴ therewith riches, honour and long life.

Stake and caltrop beset the path of the ⁵ wicked; as thou lovest life, keep thy distance.

There is a proverb; a boy will keep the ⁶ course he has begun; even when he grows old, he will not leave it.⁴

Rich rules poor, debtor must wait on ⁷ creditor.

Who sows mischief, reaps a sorry crop; ⁸ ere long, the flail of his malice will have done its work.⁵ For every loaf of bread ⁹ given to the hungry, blessing shall be the reward of kindly hearts. (A renowned victory he wins, that is a bestower of gifts, and living men are the spoils of it.⁶)

Banish the reckless spirit, and strife goes ¹⁰ out with him; thou art rid of quarrelling and of disgrace.

Love purity of heart, and thou shalt find ¹¹ such gracious words as shall win thee a king's friendship. True knowledge has the ¹²

¹ There is no agreement as to the meaning of this verse; the Hebrew text has 'drag down to' instead of 'divert from', and some think that 'the Just' refers not to a just man but to Almighty God.

² Some think this means that in periods of general calamity the wicked suffer, while the just go free; but even so the phrasing of the verse would be obscure.

³ The Hebrew text has 'wisdom' instead of 'justice', and the reference is presumably to material (not spiritual) blessings, which the fool squanders and the wise man saves up.

⁴ In the Hebrew text, the verse begins 'Train a boy according to the measure of his way'; but, even when this correction is made, the sense of the maxim remains uncertain.

⁵ In the second half of this verse, the Latin (not the Hebrew) would allow us to translate, 'he will be brought to an end by the flail of his own malice'.

⁶ The sentence in brackets is found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text. The sense of its second half is uncertain, but cf. Gen. 14. 21.

Lord's smile for its protection; the schemer's cause he will overthrow.

13 Out? says Sloth; why, there is a lion without; wouldst thou have me slain in the open street?

14 Like a deep pit is the flattery of wanton wife; they only are ensnared, whom the Lord loves little.

15 Boyhood's mind is loaded with a pack of folly, that needs the rod of correction to shift it.

16 Oppress the poor for thy enrichment, and ere long a richer man's claim shall impoverish thee.¹

17 Wouldst thou but give heed, and listen to wise counsels, take these my warnings to heart! Digest them well, and they shall bring back a sweet taste to thy lips; to fill thy own heart too with confidence in the Lord, is the sum of my present teaching.

20 Not once nor twice have I warned thee and instructed thee, so as to ground thee in true doctrine, and send thee home supplied with ready answers concerning it.

22 Never oppress the poor; his poverty protects him; never bear hard on the friendless at law; be sure the Lord will grant them redress, and claim life for life.

24 Never let a quarreller, a man of angry moods, be thy friend; go thy way, and let him go his; ill habits are soon learned, to the sudden peril of thy life. Leave it to others to engage themselves, and go bail for their neighbour's debts; for thyself, thou hast no means of payment; wouldst thou see the clothes stripped from thy bed? Pass not beyond the ancient bounds which thy fathers have set. Mark me the man whose task is deftly done; he is for the court, no common service shall be his.

23 When thou art sitting at table with a prince, mark well what is set before thee, and, have thou thy appetite under control, guard as with a drawn knife thy gullet. Hanker thou never after those good things of his; they are bait to lure thee.²

4 Do not be at pains to amass riches; let thy scheming³ have its bounds. Never let thy eyes soar to the wealth that is beyond thy reach, eagle-winged against thy pursuit.

Shun the niggard's table; not for thee his dainties. Abstracted he sits, like soothsayer brooding over false dreams; Eat and drink, he tells thee, but his mind is far away. For that grudging food thou wilt have no stomach; all gracious speech will die away on thy tongue.⁴

Speak not with fools for thy hearers; of thy warning utterance they will reckon nothing.

Leave undisturbed the landmarks of friendless folk, nor encroach on the orphan's patrimony; a strong Champion they have, to grant them redress.

Still let thy heart be attentive to warnings, open be thy ear to words of instruction. Nor ever from child of thine withhold chastisement; he will not die under the rod; rather, the rod thou wieldest shall baulk the grave of its prey. Wise heart of thine, my son, is glad heart of mine; speak thou aright, all my being thrills. Do not envy sinners their good fortune, but abide in the fear of the Lord continually; the future holds blessings for thee, never shall that hope play thee false.

Listen, then, my son, and shew thyself wise, keeping still an even course. Be not of their company, that drink deep and pile the dishes high at their revels; ruined they shall be, sot and trencherman, and wake from their drunken sleep to find themselves dressed in rags. Thine to obey the father who begot thee, nor leave thy mother without reverence in her grey hairs; truth to covet, hold wisdom, and self-command, and discernment for treasured heirlooms. Joy there is and pride in an upright man's begetting for the glad father of a wise son; such joy let thy father have, such pride be hers, the mother who bore thee!

My son, give me the gift of thy heart, scan closely the path I shew thee. What pit so deep as the harlot's greed, what snare holds so close as wanton wife? Like a footpad she lurks beside the way, a deadly peril to all that forget their troth.

¹ The Latin version here gives the most intelligible account of a maxim whose meaning has been much disputed.

² At first sight, this passage suggests the danger of poisoning; but since no such occurrences are mentioned in the Old Testament, we should perhaps understand that the prince is trying to extort some advantage out of his guest by taking him off his guard.

³ Literally 'prudence'.
⁴ v. 6-8. The language of this passage is strained throughout, and it is hard to feel certain that we have found the right clue to its meaning.

29 Unhappy son of an unhappy father, who is this, ever brawling, ever falling, scarred but not from battle, blood-shot of eye?
30 Who but the tosspot that sits long over his 31 wine? Look not at the wine's tawny glow, sparkling there in the glass beside thee; 32 how insinuating its address! Yet at last adder bites not so fatally, poison it distils 33 like the basilisk's own. Eyes that stray to forbidden charms, a mind uttering 34 thoughts that are none of thine, shall make thee helpless as mariner asleep in mid ocean, when the tiller drops from the 35 helmsman's drowsy grasp. What! thou wilt say, blows all unfelt, wounds that left no sting! Could I but come to myself, and be back, even now, at my wine!

24 Not for thee to emulate wrongdoers, and aspire to be of their 2 company; what minds are theirs, who think only of men's undoing, what talk, whose every word is treachery!

3 No foundation for a house like wisdom, 4 no buttress like discernment; no furnishing may be found for the rooms of it so rare and so pleasant, as true knowledge.
5 Only the wise are strong; well taught is 6 firm of sinew. War must be planned first, before thou wage it, and he will prosper 7 best who most takes counsel; wisdom hangs high beyond the fool's reach;
tongue-tied he stands when there are consultations at the gate.¹

8 Consecrate close thought to evil ends, and thou wilt earn no better name than 9 mischief-maker. Craft of his own the fool has, but all used amiss; the insidious 10 rogue² no man can stomach.

11 What, hang thy hands down in time of 12 peril? Little shalt thou avail. Thine to rescue the doomed, to cheat the gallows of 13 its prey; not plead thy lack of strength, when he, the Searcher of all hearts, the Saviour of thy life, knows all, sees all, and requisites the actions of men.

13 Sweet to thy palate, my son, is honey 14 from the comb; why then, eat; but wise teaching is no less thy soul's food, tomorrow's resource, and a resource unfailing.

Lie not in wait, treacherously, to despoil 15 the homes where honest men take their ease; seven times the just may stumble, 16
and rise to their feet again, it is the wicked fall headlong into ruin. Not thine to 17 triumph over a fallen foe; that thrill of rejoicing in thy heart over his calamity the 18 Lord will see, and little love; his vengeance may yet change its course. Do not be 19 impatient when the wicked thrive, do not envy the lot of evil-doers; villainy has no 20 hope in store, its light flickers and is gone.

Fear God, my son, and fear the king; 21 have nothing to do with malcontents.
How sudden their ruin, how swift falls, 22
from either hand, the blow!

More maxims of the wise. It is ill done, 23 to let partiality sway thy judgement; if 24 thou acquit the guilty, what race will have a good word for thee, what people will love 25 thee? Condemn him, and thou shalt have renown, blessings shall fall on thy head.

The right word spoken seals all like a 26
kiss on the lips.³

Be thy first care what lies without; till 27 thy lands first with all diligence; then build up thy home.

Do not come forward as a witness 28 against thy neighbour; wouldst thou spread lying tales? Nor be content to say, 29
I am but serving him as he served me;
I pay off old scores.

Passing by field or vineyard where idle- 30 ness reigned and providence, what sights I have seen! Nettles were every- 31 where, briars had covered the ground, the stone wall was ruinous. That sight I took 32 to heart, found a warning in that ill example. Sleep on (thought I) a little 33
longer, yawn a little longer, a little longer pillow head on hand; ay, but poverty will 34 not wait, the day of distress will not wait;
like an armed vagabond it will fall upon thee!⁴

25 Here are more of Solomon's proverbs, copied out by Ezechias' men, that was king of Juda.

For mysteries unfathomable, praise 2
God; for mysteries revealed, the king, High as heaven thou must look, deep as 3

¹ The meaning of the Hebrew text here is doubtful. ² 'The insidious rogue'; literally, the 'calumniator'. The word used in the Hebrew text commonly implies rash folly, and is here inappropriate.
³ The phrase, in the original, runs simply 'Who returns right words kisses lips'; the exact bearing of it can only be conjectured. ⁴ vs. 33, 34. See 6. 10, 11 above.

earth, ere the mind of kings shall be made 4 known to thee. Rid silver of dross, and the 5 cup shines bright; rid the court of knaves, 6 and the throne stands firm. Never play the 7 great lord at court, and mingle with men of rank; who would not rather be beckoned to a higher place, than be put to the blush, and in the king's presence?¹

8 When men go to law, do not disclose hastily what thy eyes have witnessed;² it may be thou hast tainted a friend's name, 9 and there is no undoing the mischief. To thy friend's private ear open thy wrongs; 10 vent the secret abroad, and he, hearing it, will turn on thee with reproaches, nor wilt thou lightly recover thy good name.
 (Favour and friendship are thy protection;
 to lose them is a foul blot.)³

11 Like a boss of gold amid silver tracery it shines out, the right word spoken.
 12 Golden ear-ring nor pearl drop fits so well, as wise reproof given to a wise listener.

13 Find a trusty messenger; not snow in harvest-time will bring thee more relief.
 14 Storm-wrack and cloud and no rain to follow; such thanks he wins that boasts much, and nothing accomplishes.

15 A prince, in his forbearance,⁴ may yet be won over to thy cause; hard heart gives place to soft tongue.

16 Honey if thou find, eat thy fill and no more; nothing comes of surfeit but vomit-17 ing. Rare be thy visits to a neighbour; he will soon have enough, and weary of thee.

18 What is worse than javelin, sword, and arrow all at once? One that bears false 19 witness against his neighbour. What is more frail than rotting tooth, or sprained foot? A false friend trusted in the hour of need; as well lose thy cloak in mid winter.

20 Vinegar goes ill with natron, and song with a discontented heart. (Moth cannot fret garment, or worm wood, as care the heart.)

21 Hungers thy enemy? Here is thy 22 chance; feed him. Thirsts he? Of thy well let him drink. So doing, thou wilt heap burning coals upon his head, and for thyself, the Lord will recompense thee.⁵

The north wind stops rain, and a frown
 the backbiter.

Better lodge in a garret than share thy house with a scold.⁶

Good news from a far land, refreshing as cold water to parched lips.

Fouled the spring, poisoned the well, when honest men bow down before knaves.

A surfeit harms, though it be of honey;
 search too high, and the brightness shall dazzle thee.⁷ Like a city unwall'd he lies defenceless, that cannot master himself, but ever speaks his mind.

26 As well snow in summer or rain in harvest, as honour paid to a fool.

Light as a bird of passage, light as sparrow on the wing, the curse that is undeserved shall reach thee.

Whip for horse, bridle for ass, and never a rod for the fool's back?

Leave the fool's challenge unanswered, and prove thyself wise; or answer it, if thou wilt, and prove him fool.

Send a fool on thy errand, thou hast a lame journey, and mischief brewing for thee. Give a fool leave to speak, it is all fair legs and no walking. Pay a fool reverence, thou hast wasted one more stone on Mercury's cairn. Speech fits as well in a fool's mouth as branch of bramble in the hand of a drunkard. The law settles quarrels at last, yet silence the fool, and feud there shall be none.⁸ Like a dog at his vomit, the fool goes back ever to his own folly.⁹ Who is in more perilous case than the fool himself? The man who lays claim to wisdom.

What, go abroad? says Sloth; there is a lion there; trust me, a lion's dam loose in the street. Sloth turns about, but keeps his bed, true as the door to its hinge. With folded hands the sluggard sits by, too idle

¹ Lk. 14. 8-10.

² 'What thy eyes have witnessed'; some interpreters of the Hebrew text would connect the words so rendered with the preceding sentence.

³ The words enclosed in brackets are found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text.

⁴ Some would render 'through thy forbearance', but we should hardly expect a subject's attitude towards his prince to be so described.

⁵ vs. 21, 22. See Rom. 12. 20 and note there.

⁶ Repeated from 21. 9 above.

⁷ The second half of this verse has given rise to much conjecture. It runs, literally, in the Hebrew, 'and the searching out of their glory, glory'. The rendering given above is that presumably intended by the Latin, but it is difficult to derive this or any meaning from the Hebrew text as it stands.

⁸ vs. 6-10. The meaning of all these verses is obscure, and the Hebrew text, perhaps, not above suspicion. In verse 8, the Latin follows a rather far-fetched interpretation given by the Talmud; there is no reference to heathen worship in the original.

Verse 10 is very variously interpreted; the sense offered by the Latin is perhaps simpler than any other available, but it is not easy to guess what reading it represents in the Hebrew.

⁹ See II Pet. 2. 22.

16 to put hand to mouth.¹ Wiser than seven sages is the sluggard in his own thought.
 17 Better pull a dog by the ears than meddle in another's quarrels; pass on in quiet.
 18 No excuse he finds, that deadly brand 19 and arrow casts about him; nor he either, that hurts a friend by treachery and pleads that it was done in jest.
 20 No fuel, no fire; no tell-tale, no quarrel.
 21 Coal needs ember, and fire tinder, and strife a quarreller, for their kindling. Innocent enough seem the words of the backbiter, yet their poison sinks deep into a man's belly.² When the heart is wicked, fine talk is but lustre ware. The enemy that has treacherous thoughts is betrayed by his friendly talk;³ trust him not when he speaks thee fair; here are seven depths of wickedness in a single heart. Vain the pretences that cloak his malice; before the whole assembly it shall be made known; dig pit, and thou shalt fall into it, shift rock, and it shall roll back on thee. Fie on the glib tongues that hate all honesty, the treacherous lips that plot men's downfall!

27 Do not flatter thyself with hopes of to-morrow; what lies in the womb of the future thou canst not tell.

2 Seek praise, but not of thy own bestowing; another's lips, not thine, must sound it.
 3 What is more crushing than stone, more burdensome than sand? A fool's ill humour. Fierce, fierce is rage, and indignation mounts like a flood, but the pangs of jealousy, these there is no resisting.
 5 Better open reproof than the love that gives no sign. Better the love that scourges, than hate's false kiss.
 7 Full-fed spurns the honeycomb; to Hunger's lips, bitter is sweet.
 8 When bird leaves nest, let a man leave his home.
 9 Sweeter than ointment, sweeter than any perfume, when man's heart talks to heart of friend. Friend of thine, and friend that was thy father's, never forsake; so, in thy sore need, no kinsman's door thou shalt need to enter.

Neighbour over the way is better than kinsman at a distance.

My son, wouldst thou be thy father's pride? Court wisdom, and silence thy detractors.

When ill times come, prudence is on its guard, and takes refuge; the unwary march on, and pay the penalty.⁴

Does a man go bail for a stranger? Without more ado, take his garment from him; who trusts without knowledge, forfeits the pledge.⁵

So early abroad, so loudly wishing thy neighbour well? This is curse, not blessing.⁶

Between a scold and a roof that drips in winter there is nothing to choose. As well store up the wind in thy house, though thou call her the marrow of thy right hand.⁷

Iron whets iron, friend shapes friend. If figs thou wouldst eat, tend thy fig-tree well; if honour thou wouldst have, wait well on thy master.

Clear as a face mirrored in water, the wise see men's hearts.⁸

Death and the grave were never yet content, nor man's eyes with gazing.

Silver and gold are judged by furnace and crucible, man by his repute.⁹ (Heart of knave is ever set on mischief, heart of true man on wisdom.)

Bray a fool like corn, with pestle and mortar, he will be a fool still.

Spent be thy care, thy eyes watchful, over flock and herd of thine; riches will slip from thy grasp, and crowns, will they last for ever?¹⁰ See, where the meadows are laid bare, and the aftermath is springing, the hay all carried, now, from the hill-slopes! Pasture for the lambs that shall clothe thee, for the goats that shall be the price of more fields yet; goat's milk,

¹ vv. 13, 15. See 22. 13 and 19. 24 above.

² See 18. 8.

³ In the Hebrew text, 'dissembles in his talk'.

⁴ See 22. 3. ⁵ See 20. 16. ⁶ The precise bearing of this proverb remains in doubt.

⁷ The whole of this verse is obscure, and the second half of it probably corrupt.

⁸ The Hebrew text reads simply, 'As water face to face, so heart of man to man', it is not clear in what sense.

⁹ That common repute should be regarded as a test of what a man really is, seems unlikely (cp. especially 17. 3 above). Some think the Hebrew text means a man should be judged by what he holds in repute, and this would fit in well with the second part of the verse (which is found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text itself). Others would read, instead of 'repute', 'adversity', and this would lead on well to verse 22.

¹⁰ The Latin version here ignores the question, and runs 'but a crown shall be granted for ever'; a rendering which yields no good sense in the context.

too, shall suffice to feed thee, give life and strength to thy men and thy serving-maids.

28 Bad conscience takes to its heels, with none in pursuit; fearless as a lion the unreprieved heart.

² Short reigns and many, where a land is plagued for its guilt; by wise counsel, and men's talk overheard, long lives the king.

³ Tempest threatens and famine when poor men oppress the poor.

⁴ Sound teaching is forgotten, where the wrong-doer is well spoken of; honest folk will still be up in arms. No skill the knave has to discern the right; quest of the Lord's

⁵ will makes that craft perfect. Better a poor life lived honestly than crooked ways that bring riches. A son's wisdom is to obey his father's teaching, not to shame him by

⁶ keeping riotous company. Wealth that the usurer by extortion amassed, a more generous than he shall have the spending

⁷ of. Turn a deaf ear to thy teachers, and thy prayer shall be all sacrilege. Ruin he brings on himself, that leads the innocent

⁸ into ill ways, and honest men shall be the heirs of him. Wisdom he claims, that wealth has; yet there is many a poor man will put him down.

⁹ A fair sight it is, to see honest folk rejoicing; knaves' rule is the people's ruin.

¹⁰ Never shalt thou thrive by keeping sin hidden; confess it and leave it, if thou

¹¹ wouldst find pardon. Blessed evermore is the timorous conscience; it is hardened hearts that fall to their ruin.

¹² Nation without bread and prince without scruple, here is ravening lion and hungry bear all at once. Let prince lack prudence, everywhere is wrongful oppression; less covetous, he should have lived longer.

¹³ Compass thou a man's death, thou mayst flee to the depths of earth, none will shield thee.

¹⁴ Keep the path of innocence, and thou shalt be safe; at one blow the double-dealer shall fall.

¹⁵ Till field and fill belly; idleness shall have a bellyful of nothing but want.¹ Of honesty comes much honour, and how shall wealth reach thee suddenly, yet leave thy hands clean? Great wrong it is to sell judgement; wouldst thou barter truth away for a mouthful of bread? Eye on his rivals in the race for wealth, a man sees nothing, when want is hard at his heels.

Of Docility, Integrity, and other Matters

¹ More thanks thou wilt have, in the end, for honest reproof than for designing flattery.

² Shall he who robs father or mother make light of it? He is next door to a murderer.

³ Jostling pride it is that stirs up enmity; trust in the Lord, and thou shalt prosper. He is a fool that trusts his own wit; follow the rule of wise men, if thou wouldst reach safety.

⁴ Give to the poor, and nothing lack; turn away from their plea, and blessing thou shalt have none.

⁵ When knaves flourish, all the world takes to hiding; come they by their end, thou shalt see honest folk abroad.

29 Who spurns the yoke of correction shall meet sudden doom, and past all remedy.

¹ When right thrives, the city is all rejoicing; when there be knaves that rule it, all lament.

² Glad the father's heart, when the son takes wisdom for his mistress, nor spends on wantons his patrimony.

³ Kings by justice or exaction make the fortunes of a state or mar them.

⁴ By empty flattery thou mayst lay a snare for thy friend's feet.

⁵ By his own false steps the sinner is entangled; innocence goes singing and rejoicing on its way. An eye the upright man has for the friendless cause; the sinner is all darkness.

⁶ Rashness in a city ruins all; that madness, wisdom must turn aside.

⁷ Alas for the wise man that goes to law with a fool! Between bluster and mockery, there is no end to it.²

⁸ He makes murderous enemies, that lives innocently. . . and honest men demand his life.³

⁹ Folly blurts out its whole mind; wise men reserve utterance till by and by.

¹ See 12. 11.

² The Latin version (strangely misunderstood by modern editors) gives no indication whether it is the wise man or the fool who blusters and laughs; the latter is evidently meant.

³ 'Demand his life', according to Hebrew usage, can only mean 'demand that he should be put to death'. It seems clear, therefore, that our present text is either faulty or defective.

12 King that listens to false rumour has a 13 worthless court. Poor men and their masters dwell side by side, sharing the 14 Lord's sunlight. King that gives due redress to the poor has a throne unshakeable.

15 Wisdom comes of reproof, comes of the rod; leave a child to go its own way, and a mother's care is wasted.

16 Thrive the goddess, there will be wrongs a many; but the just will yet see them put down.

17 A son well schooled is rest well earned;
great joy thou shalt have of him.

18 What revel among the host,¹ the power of prophecy once withdrawn! Happy is he that keeps the law unbroken.

19 Word was never yet that would check a slave; he listens only to defy it.

20 Who is in more perilous case than the fool himself? The man who speaks too soon.²

21 Pamper thy slave young, and breed a pert manservant.

22 Ever the quarreller breeds strife; quick temper is ever at fault.

23 Pride will come low; honour awaits the humble.

24 As thou lovest thy life, aid thieves never;
wouldst thou hear appeal made, and keep thy own counsel?³

25 Fear of man's judgements will bring thee quickly to ruin; in the Lord put thy trust, and rise high above them. Suitors a many an earthly prince has for his favour;
but it is God that judges all.

27 Eyesores alike, the rogue to honest men the plain-dealer to villains. (Let the son heed a father's warnings, he shall fear no ruin.⁴)

30 Here are the words of Agur, son of Jacé.⁵ Here is revelation made known by one that had God with him, God's near presence to comfort him, as he spoke.

2 What though I be ignorant, beyond 3 human wont? What though the knowledge of man has passed me by, wisdom's dull pupil, without skill in holy lore? Who 4 may he be that has scaled heaven, and come back to tell its secrets; held the winds in the hollow of his hand, wrapped away the storm-clouds under his mantle, fixed the bounds of earth? Tell me his name; tell me, if thou canst, where son of his may be found?

All God's promises are like metal tested 5 in the fire; he is the sure defence of all who trust in him.⁶ Add to his word no word 6 of thine; speedily thy practices shall come to light.

Two requests I would make of thee; be 7 they mine while life lasts. Keep my thoughts ever far from treachery and lying; and for my state of life, be neither poverty mine nor riches. Grant me only 8 the livelihood I need; so shall not abundant tempt me to disown thee, and doubt 9 if Lord there be, nor want bid me steal, and dishonour my God's name with perjury.

Never accuse a slave to his master; curse 10 thee he may, and to thy undoing.

A bad breed it is, that curse their fathers 11 and for their mothers have no good word.
A bad breed, that owns no blot, yet is all 12 unpurged from its defilement. A bad 13 breed, all haughty looks and scornful brow.
A bad breed, that has teeth sharp as 14 swords, jaws that grind slowly on, till poor folk none are left, their friendless neighbours.

Two sisters there are, men say, brood of 15 the leech, that still cry, Give us more, give us more! But stay, there is a third In-satiableness; nay, a fourth I can name that never says, Enough! The grave, and the 16 barren womb, and earth that soaks up the rain, and fire; did fire ever say, Enough?

Proud looks, that tell of a father mocked, 17 a mother's pangs despised! That eye the ravens shall pick out on the hill-side, the vulture's brood shall prey on it.

Three mysteries there are too high for 18 me, and a fourth is beyond my ken; eagle 19

¹ The uncommon Hebrew verb here rendered by 'revel' occurs in Ex. 32. 25; which makes it probable that the absence of Moses on Mount Sinai is here referred to. Otherwise, it is hard to establish any connexion between the two halves of the verse.

² The form of this verse is exactly the same as that of 26. 12 above; but here (perhaps through an error) our present Latin text gives 'folly' instead of 'fool', and obscures the evident meaning of the sentence.

³ See Lev. 5. 1. ⁴ The bracketed words occur neither in the Hebrew text nor in the Septuagint Greek. ⁵ The Latin version here translates the two proper names, Agur and Jacé, as 'He who gathers' and 'He who vomits'. The latter part of the verse is wholly obscure, and is generally thought to include more proper names, Ithiel and Ucal. It is not clear whether Agur's prophecy forms a part or the whole of this chapter.

⁶ See Ps. 17. 31.

that flies in air, viper that crawls on rock, ship that sails the sea, and man that goes 20 courting maid.¹ Nor less I marvel at wanton wife that licks her greedy lips, and will have it that she did no harm.

21 Three sights there are set earth trembling, and a fourth it cannot endure; slave 22 turned king, churl full fed, a scold married, 23 and a maid that supplants² her mistress.

24 Of four little things in nature, wise men 25 cannot match the skill. How puny a race the ants, that hoard their food in harvest 26 time; how defenceless the rock-rabbits, 27 that hide their burrows in the clefts! No prince have the locusts, yet ever they 28 march in rank; the lizard climbs high, and makes its home in the palaces of kings.

29 Three creatures there are that walk majestically, and a fourth goes proudly on 30 his way; bravest of beasts, the lion, that 31 fears no encounter, the cock (Loins-girt they call him),³ and the ram; and the king, too, for who can say him nay?

32 Fool that thrusts himself forward will prove a fool;⁴ he had been better advised 33 to hold his tongue. First milk, then butter thou mayst have for the wringing; blow thy nose lustily, and blood shall flow at last; how then canst thou press thy quarrel home, and no strife come of it?

31 Here are words of king Lamuel;
here is revelation his mother made known to him for his instruction.

What word have I for my son, the child of my own womb, the fulfilment of my 2 prayers? Wouldst thou give thyself up to the love of women, spend thy all on a king's 3 undoing? Wine was never made for kings, 4 Lamuel, never for kings; carouse befits ill 5 thy council-chamber. Not for them to drink deep, and forget the claims of right, and misjudge the plea of the friendless.
6 Strong drink for the mourner, wine for the 7 afflicted heart; deep let them drink, and forget their need, and think of their misery 8 no more. Do thou, meanwhile, give thy voice for dumb pleader and for doomed 9 prisoner; ever let that voice of thine pronounce true sentence, giving redress to the friendless and the poor.

A man who has found a vigorous wife has found a rare treasure, brought from distant shores. Bound to her in loving 11 confidence, he will have no need of spoil.
Content, not sorrow, she will bring him as 12 long as life lasts. Does she not busy herself 13 with wool and thread, plying her hands with ready skill? Ever she steers her course 14 like some merchant ship, bringing provision from far away. From early dawn 15 she is up, assigning food to the household, so that each waiting-woman has her share.
Ground must be examined, and bought, 16 and planted out as a vineyard, with the earnings of her toil. How briskly she girds 17 herself to the task, how tireless are her arms! Industry, she knows, is well rewarded, and all night long her lamp does 19 not go out. Jealously she sets her hands to work, her fingers clutch the spindle.
Kindly is her welcome to the poor, her 20 purse ever open to those in need. Let the snow lie cold if it will, she has no fears for her household; no servant of hers but is 21 warmly clad. Made by her own hands was the coverlet on her bed, the clothes of lawn and purple that she wears. None so 23 honoured at the city gate as that husband of hers, when he sits in council with the elders of the land. Often she will sell linen 24 of her own weaving, or make a girdle for the travelling merchant to buy. Protected 25 by her own industry and good repute, she greeted the morrow with a smile. Ripe wisdom governs her speech, but it is kindly instruction she gives. She keeps watch 27 over all that goes on in her house, not content to go through life eating and sleeping.
That is why her children are the first to call 28 her blessed, her husband is loud in her praise: Unrivalled art thou among all the 29 women that have enriched their homes.
Vain are the winning ways, beauty is a 30 snare; it is the woman who fears the Lord that will achieve renown. Work such as 31 hers claims its reward; let her life be spoken of with praise at the city gates.

¹ The fourth mystery is given in the Hebrew text as 'the way of a man with a maid'; the Latin version, evidently in the same sense, has 'the way of a man in his manhood'. ² Literally, according to the Latin, 'inherits from', but the other sense of the Hebrew verb is clearly more appropriate.

³ The second majestic beast is given in the Hebrew text simply as 'the girt of loins', and cannot be certainly identified. The greyhound, or some other creature with a thin waist, seems more likely than the cock.

⁴ 'Thrusts himself forward' appears to be the sense of the Hebrew verb here, which is rendered in the Latin 'meets with advancement'.

THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES

WORDS of the Spokesman,¹ king David's son, that reigned once at Jerusalem.

2 A shadow's shadow, he tells us, a shadow's shadow; a world of shadows! How is man the better for all this toiling of his, here under the sun? Age succeeds age, and the world goes on unaltered. Sun may rise and sun may set, but ever it goes back and is reborn. Round to the south it moves, round to the north it turns; the wind, too, though it makes the round of the world, goes back to the beginning of its round at last. All the rivers flow into the sea, yet never the sea grows full; back to their springs they find their way, and must be flowing still. Weariness, all weariness; who shall tell the tale? Eye looks on unsatisfied; ear listens, ill content. 9 Ever that shall be that ever has been, that which has happened once shall happen again; there can be nothing new, here under the sun. Never man calls a thing new, but it is something already known to the ages that went before us; only we have no record of older days. So, believe me, the fame of to-morrow's doings will be forgotten by the men of a later time.

12 I was a king in my day, I, the Spokesman; Israel my realm, Jerusalem my capital. And it was my resolve to search deep and find out the meaning of all that men do, here under the sun; all that curse of busy toil which God has given to the sons of Adam for their task. All that men do beneath the sun I marked, and found it was but frustration and lost labour, all of it; there was no curing men's cross-grained nature, no reckoning up their follies.

16 I at least (so I flattered myself) have risen above the rest; a king so wise never reigned at Jerusalem;² here is a mind has reflected much, and much learned. And therewith I applied my mind to a new study; what meant wisdom and learning, what meant ignorance and folly? And I found that this too was labour lost; much wisdom, much woe; who adds to learning, adds to the load we bear.

2 Next, I thought to give the rein to my desires, and enjoy pleasure, until I found that this, too, was labour lost. Wouldst thou know how I learned to find laughter an empty thing, and all joy a vain illusion; how I resolved at last to deny myself the comfort of wine, wisdom now all my quest, folly disowned? For I could not rest until I knew where man's true good lay, what was his life's true task, here under the sun.³ Great plans I set on foot; I would build palaces, I would plant vineyards, I would have park and orchard, planted with every kind of tree; and to water all this greenery there must be pools of water besides. Men-slaves I bought and women-slaves, till I had a great retinue of them; herds, too, and abundance of flocks, such as Jerusalem never saw till then. Gold and silver I amassed, revenues of subject king and subject province; men-singers I had and women-singers, and all that man delights in; beakers a many, and jars of wine to fill them.⁴ Never had Jerusalem known such wealth; yet in the midst of it, wisdom never left my side. Eyes denied nothing that eyes could covet, a heart stinted of no enjoyment, free of all the pleasures I had devised for myself, this was to be my reward, this the fruit of all my labours. And now, when I looked round at all I had done, all that ungrateful

¹ The word Ecclesiastes, like the Hebrew word it renders, should mean one who convokes an assembly, or addresses it, or both.

² The Hebrew text here seems to imply that king Solomon was wiser than anyone who had reigned before him at Jerusalem, whereas David was in fact his only (Israelite) predecessor. But we need not attach too much importance to a conventional turn of phrase; cf. III Kg. 14. 9.

³ In the Hebrew text, the first part of this verse refers not to the second thoughts which recalled the author to a simpler way of living, but to those first thoughts of which he afterwards repented: 'I considered how best to pamper my body with wine, how best to cling to my follies, yet retaining wisdom all the while.'

⁴ The last ten words of this verse represent, in the Hebrew text, a passage of uncertain significance.

drudgery, nothing I found there but frustration and labour lost, so fugitive is all we cherish, here under the sun.

12 Then my mind went back to the thought of wisdom, of ignorance, too, and folly. What (thought I), should mortal king strive to imitate the sovereign power that made him?¹ I saw, indeed, that wisdom differed from folly as light from darkness; 13 the wise man had eyes in his head, while the fool went his way benighted; but the ending of them? In their ending both 14 were alike. Why then (I said to myself), if fool and I must come to the same end at last, was not I the fool, that toiled to achieve wisdom more than he? So my thoughts ran, and I found labour lost, here 15 too. Endlessly forgotten, wise man and fool alike, since to-morrow's memory will be no longer than yesterday's; wise man and fool alike doomed to death.

17 Thus I became weary of life itself; so worthless it seemed to me, all that man does beneath the sun, frustration all of it, and labour lost. And I, beneath that same sun, what fond labours I had spent! 18 I hated the thought of them now; should heir of mine succeed to them? An heir, 19 would he be wise man or fool? None could tell; but his would be the possession of all I had toiled for so hard, schemed for so anxiously; could there be frustration worse 20 than this? I would hold my hand; no more should yonder sun see labours of mine. 21 What, should one man go on toiling, his the craft, his the skill, his the anxious care, leaving all to another, and an idler? That were frustration surely, and great mischief done.

22 Tell me, how is a man the richer for all that toil of his, all that lost labour of his, 23 here under the sun? His days all painfulness and care, his very nights restless; what is here but frustration? Were it not better 24 to eat and drink, and toil only at his own pleasures? These, too, come from God's hand; and who has better right to food tasted and pleasure enjoyed than I? Who wins God's favour, has wisdom and skill for his reward, and pleasure too; it is the sinner that is doomed to hardship and to thankless care, hoarding and scraping, and all to enrich some heir God loves better! For him frustration, for him the labour lost.

3 Everything must be done by turns; no activity, here beneath the heavens, but has its allotted time for beginning and coming to an end. Men are born only to die, plant trees only to displant them. Now we take life, now we save it; now we are destroying, now building. Weep first, then laugh, mourn we and dance; the stones we have scattered we must bring together anew; court we first and then shun the embrace. To-day's gain, to-morrow's loss; what once we treasured, soon thrown away; the garment rent, the garment mended; silence kept, and silence ended; love alternating with hatred, war with peace. For all this toiling of his, how is man the richer?² Pitiably indeed I found it, this task God has given to mankind; and he, meanwhile, has made the world, in all its seasonable beauty, and given us the contemplation³ of it, yet of his own dealings with us, first and last, never should man gain comprehension. To enjoy his life, to make the best of it, beyond doubt this is man's highest employment; that gift at least God has granted him, to eat and drink and see his toil rewarded. But be sure all God has made will remain for ever as he made it; there is no adding to it, no taking away from it; so he will command our reverence. Nothing that has been, but lasts on still; nothing that will be, but has been already; he is ever repeating the history of the past.

I marked, too, how wrong was done instead of right, injustice instead of justice, there under the sun's eye; and I told myself that God would give judgement one

¹ The Hebrew text, in the latter half of this verse, runs: 'For what (shall) the man (do) that comes after the king? Why, what they have already done', perhaps a footnote recalling the follies of king Roboam (see verse 19 below). The literal sense of the Latin is: 'What (said I) is man, that he should be able to follow the King, his Maker?'

² vv. 1-9: These verses are ordinarily understood as implying that man's varied activities have to be carried on at a time of God's, not of his own, choosing. But, if so, the instances are strangely chosen, nor is it even clear why a series of contrasts should have been instituted at all. The context suggests (cf. especially verse 9) that we are meant to think of life as a monotonous alternation of opposite activities; in that case, the passage has the same note of frustration as r. 4-7 above.

³ Literally 'the discussion'. The Hebrew text gives a more mysterious phrase: 'He has set eternity (or perhaps, the world) in their hearts'.

day between the just and the sinners, and all things would reach their appointed end then.¹ I told myself that God's purpose with the sons of men was to test them...

... And that they might see they were 19 only like the beasts...² After all, man comes to the same ending as the beasts; there is nothing to choose between his lot and theirs; both alike are doomed to die. They have but one principle of life; what has man that the beasts have not? Frustration everywhere; we are all making for the same goal; of earth we were made, and to 20 earth we must return. Who has a right to tell us that the spirit of man mounts upwards, and the spirit of a beast sinks down 22 to the depth? So I became aware that it is best for man to busy himself here to his own content; this and nothing else is his allotted portion; who can show him what the future will bring?

4 And then my thoughts would turn back to all the wrongs that are done under the sun's eye. Innocent folk in tears, and who is to comfort them? Who is to comfort them, powerless against their oppressors? The dead, it seemed, were more 2 to be envied than the living; better yet to be still unborn, never to have known the shameful deeds that are done, out here in the sunlight.

4 I thought, too, of human toil and striving; how much it owed to man's rivalry with his fellows! All was frustration and lost labour here. What wonder if the fool sits idle, and starves to death?
 5 Better a handful (says he) quietly come by, than a whole armful that is all striving and labour lost.³

7 And there was another kind of frustration I marked, here under the sun. Here is one that works alone, partner nor son nor brother to aid him, yet still works on, never content with his bright hoard, never asking, as he toils and stints himself, who shall gain by it. Frustration and lost labour, here too.

Better to be in partnership with another, 9 than alone; partnership brings advantage to both. If one falls, the other will give 10 support; with the lonely it goes hard; when he falls, there is none to raise him. Sleep 11 two in one bed, each shall warm the other; for the lonely, there is no warmth. Two 12 may withstand assault, where one is no match for it; a triple cord is not lightly broken.

There is more hope for a wise servant⁴ 13 that is in hard straits, than for a dotard king that foresight has none. Men have risen 14 to a throne that till now were bound in prison; men born to rule a kingdom have died of want. I have seen the whole world, 15 from east to west, take part with the young man, the usurper that rises in the old king's 16 stead. The old king, that had an immemorial line of ancestors;⁵ and now posterity shall take no pride in him! All is frustration, and labour lost.

Look well what thou art doing when 17 thou goest into God's house; present thyself there in a spirit of obedience. Obedience is far better than the sacrifice made by fools, that are guilty of unwitting sacrilege.⁶

5 When thou standest in God's presence, do not pour out with rash haste all that is in thy heart. God sees as heaven sees, thou as earth; few words are best. Sure as dreams come from an overwrought brain, from glib utterance comes 2 ill-considered speech. Vow to God if thou utterest, without delay perform it, he will 3 have no light and rash promises; vow made must be vow paid. Far better undertake 4 nothing than undertake what thou dost not

¹ The Hebrew text has 'For there is a time for every purpose and for every deed there', it is not clear in what sense.

² The end of this verse, in the Hebrew text, is commonly suspected of corruption. But it seems doubtful whether there has not been some wider dislocation; the want of logical connexion between the two halves of this verse is unmistakable. Those editors who would strike out verse 18 as an insertion do not mend matters; it leaves a hopeless gap between the thought of verse 17 and that of verse 19.

³ vv. 5, 6: It is the Latin version, not the Hebrew text, that puts verse 6 into the mouth of the fool. Some think that verse 5 is misplaced here, and belongs to another context.

⁴ Or perhaps 'boy'.
⁵ 'The old king, that had an immemorial line of ancestors'; literally, 'The number of the people of those who were before him is infinite'. The Hebrew text has, 'The number of the people who followed his leadership was infinite', referring evidently to the usurper; the Latin gives a better sense. The language of the whole passage is strained, and perhaps in part corrupt; there is no reason to think that any particular historical situation is referred to.

⁶ The allusion is perhaps in the first instance to ceremonial defilement, such as might disqualify the worshipper from bringing his offering until he had been purified. But evidently it may be interpreted of moral disqualification; cf. Mt. 5. 23.

5 fulfil. Wouldst thou defile thy whole nature through the tongue's fault? Wouldst thou find thyself saying, with God's angel to hear thee, No thought I gave to it?¹ Little wonder if God disappoints every ambition of the man who speaks so. Dreams, empty dreams, led to those glib promises of thine; content thyself rather with the fear of God.²

7 Thou seest, it may be, in this province or that, oppression of the poor, false award given, and wrong unredressed? Let not such things bewilder thee; trust me, authority is watched by higher authority, subject in turn to higher authority yet; and, above them all, the King of the whole earth rules it as his dominion.³ What is his decree? Why, that covetousness should never fill its own maw; never did he that loved money taste the enjoyment of his money;⁴ here is frustration once again.

10 Richer if thou grow, riches will give thee more mouths to feed; profit he has none that owns them, save the feasting of his eyes on them if he will. Full belly or empty, sound is the cottar's sleep; sleep, to the pampered body of the rich still denied.

12 Another evil I have found past remedy, here under the sun; riches that a man hoards to his own undoing. By cruel misadventure they are lost to him, and to the son he has begotten nothing he leaves but poverty. Naked he came, when he left his mother's womb, and naked still death finds him; nothing to show for all his long endeavour. Alas, what ailed him, that he should go away no richer than he came? Nothing left of all those wasted labours of his; all his life long the cheerless board, the multitudinous cares, the concern, the melancholy! Better far, by my way of it, that a man should eat and drink and enjoy the revenues of his own labour, here under the sun, as long as God gives him life; what more can he claim? God's gift it is, if a man has wealth and goods and freedom to enjoy them, taking what comes to him and profiting by what he has earned. Few be his days or many, he regards little, so long as God gives his heart content.

6 With another hardship I have seen men visited here beneath the sun, and commonly. God gives a man wealth, and goods, and state, till there is nothing more left for his appetites to desire; and then God denies him the enjoyment of all this, throws the coveted morsel to a stranger instead; here is frustration, here is cold comfort indeed. Ay, let a man have a hundred children to his name, years let him have a many, and be near his end; yet, if he is not to enjoy the revenues of his land still, and lay his bones in it,⁵ I say it were better for him never to have come to the birth. Well made, the empty passage from light to darkness, well lost, the chance of earthly renown, if only a man never sees the sun, never learns the meaning of good fortune and ill! Though he should have lived two thousand years, he were none the better for it, if he might not continue in the enjoyment of his goods. Do we not all reach the same goal at last?⁶

What is all our striving, but a full mouth and an empty belly? Is wise man more to be envied than fool? Where should a man go when he is poor, save where he can find a livelihood?⁷

Better aim at what lies in view than hanker after dreams. But indeed all is frustration, and labour lost.

He is known already by name, that is still unborn; and this at least is known of him, that he is but man, and cannot plead his cause, matched against too strong an adversary.

¹ v. 5: 'No thought I gave to it'; literally, 'There is no foresight'. A comparison with the Hebrew text makes it clear that there is no question of denying God's Providence.

² vv. 1-6: It is perhaps best to understand the whole of this passage as referring to rash vows. In that case, the words in verse 1, literally, 'God is in heaven, and thou art on earth', will not be a mere assertion of the divine dignity, but a reminder that God knows, better than we ourselves, what is best for us.

³ There can be little doubt that the old Douay translators were right in interpreting the Latin as a reference to divine, not to earthly kingship. The meaning of the Hebrew text is quite uncertain.

⁴ In the original, this verse begins simply, 'The covetous man will never have his fill of money'; the rendering given above assumes that there is a tacit connexion between this verse and what went before.

⁵ Literally, 'and lack burial', but it is difficult to believe that the author of these chapters would regard the lack of funeral rites as a significant misfortune.

⁶ vv. 1-6: It is not clear how this situation differs from that described in 5. 12-16; unless perhaps the difference is between confiscation of a man's riches, and their accidental loss.

⁷ The second half of this verse, in the Latin, is literally, 'And what (advantage has) the poor man, save to go where there is life?' The true reading has perhaps been lost; the Hebrew text, 'What (has) the poor man who has knowledge to walk in the presence of the living?' yields no satisfactory sense.

Words, they be spun endlessly; yet what should lie at the heart of our reasoning, but frustration?

7 What need for man to ask questions that are beyond his scope? There is no knowing how best his life should be spent, this brief pilgrimage that passes like a shadow, and is gone. And what will befall after his death, in this world beneath the sun, who can tell?

There is no embalming like a good name left behind; man's true birthday is the day of his death.

Better a visit paid where men mourn, than where they feast; it will put thee in mind of the end that awaits us all, admonish the living with the foreknowledge of death. Frown ere thou smile; the downcast look betokens a chastened heart. Sadness, a home for the wise man's thoughts, mirth for the fool's.

Better receive a wise man's rebuke, than hear thy praises sung by fools. Loud but not long the thorns crackle under the pot, and fools make merry; for them, too, frustration.

Oppression bewilders even a wise man's wits, and undermines his courage.

Speech may end fair, that foul began; patience is better than a proud heart.¹ Never be quick to take offence; it is a fool's heart that harbours grudges.

Never ask why the old times were better than ours; a fool's question.

Great worth has wisdom matched with good endowment; more advantage it shall bring thee than all the rest, here under the sun. Wealth befriends whom wisdom befriends; better still, who learns wisdom wins life.

Mark well God's doings; where he looks askance, none may set the crooked straight.

Come good times, accept the good they bring; come evil, let them never take thee unawares; bethink thee, that God has balanced these against those, and will have no man repine over his lot.

In my days of baffled enquiry, I have seen pious men ruined for all their piety, and evil-doers live long in all their wickedness. Why then, do not set too much store ¹⁷ by piety, nor play the wise man to excess, if thou wouldst not be bewildered over thy lot. Yet plunge not deep in evil-doing; ¹⁸ folly eschew; else thou shalt perish before thy time. To piety thou must needs cling, ¹⁹ yet live by that other caution too; fear God, and thou hast left no duty unfulfilled.²

Wisdom is a surer ally than ten city ²⁰ magistrates; there is no man on earth so ²¹ exact over his duties that he does ever the right, never commits a fault.

The chance words men utter, heed but ²² little; how if thou shouldst hear thy own servant speaking ill of thee? Thy own ²³ conscience will tell thee how often thou too hast spoken ill of other men.

Thus, by the touchstone of my wisdom, ²⁴ I would test all things; Wisdom, cried I, I must have; yet all the while she withdrew from me, further away than ever. Deep, ²⁵ deep is her secret; who shall read it?

Here is a mind that has passed the whole ²⁶ world of things in review, examining everything, weighing everything, so as to have a wise estimation of them, eager to understand the fool's rebelliousness, the false calculations of rash souls. And this ²⁷ I have ascertained; death itself is not so cruel as woman's heart that wheedles and beguiles, as woman's clutches that release their captive never. God's friends escape her; of sinners she makes an easy prey. I weighed this against that (he, the Spokes- ²⁸ man, tells us), and the sum of my enquiry was this. One thing I ever longed to find, ²⁹ and found never, a true woman. One true man I might find among a thousand, but a woman never.

Of this, beyond all else, I have satisfied ³⁰ myself; man's nature was simple enough when God made him, and these endless questions are of his own devising.

The wise man, there is none like him. ³¹ O for one who should read the riddle!

8 When a man is given wisdom, it shines out in his face; Omnipotence will set a new stamp on his brow.

Mine to do a king's bidding, to hold fast ²

¹ The first half of this verse reads, literally, 'Better is the end of a speech (or, of a thing) than the beginning'. The sense of the maxim is uncertain. ² uv. 16-19. The author here appears to recommend taking a middle course between excessive piety and excessive ill-doing. Some think this was part of his immature speculations (verse 16); others, that the 'justice' which can be excessive is censoriousness about our fellow men, or scrupulous observance of ceremonial detail.

3 by an oath taken in the name of God. Do 4 not hasten away from his presence, or re-5 belliously withstand him; he can do all he 6 will, with such authority his word runs; 7 none may call his acts in question. Do as 8 thou art bidden, and fear no harm. A time 9 will come, the wise man knows, when he 10 shall win a hearing; time brings every man 11 his chance, be his business what it may, 12 only this curse lies upon man, that he 13 cannot learn from the past, cannot get 14 word of the future.¹

8 The breath of life man must resign at last; the day of his death he cannot determine; nor ever does war give release from service, nor sin discharge to the sinner.

9 This, too, I have marked, as I gave heed to all that befalls us, here beneath the sun.
 There are times when man rules over man to his undoing.² I have seen godless men go peacefully to the grave, that had lived their lives out in haunts of holiness, and won the name of good men from their fellow citizens; here, too, is frustration.³

11 Because sentence is not pronounced upon the evil-doers without more ado, men are 12 emboldened to live sinfully. And yet, though the sinner presume on the divine patience that has borne with a hundred misdeeds, I know well enough that bless-13 ings are for those who fear God, who fear his frown. Never a blessing for sinners; never be it said they lived out their full span of days! Reckless of God's frown, see, they pass like a shadow, and are gone!

14 Another kind of frustration, too, earth sees; there are upright men that are plagued as though they lived the life sinners live, just as there are sinners who take no more harm than if they could plead innocence; I say this is frustration indeed.

15 For me, then, mirth! No higher blessing could man attain, here under the sun,
 than to eat and drink and make merry;
 nothing else had he to show for all those labours of his, for all that life-time God has given him, here under the sun.

16 Should I cudgel my wits to grow wise, and know the meaning of all earth's tasks;
 be like the men that allow their eyes no sleep, day or night? Nay, I understood too well that God's dealings with man, here under the sun, are past all accounting for;

 the more a man labours to read that riddle,
 the less he finds out, and he least of all,
 that boasts himself wise in the reading of it.

9 All this, too, I pondered in my heart, and would spare no pains to find out the meaning of it. Here are upright men and wise; and every task of theirs is in God's keeping, nor can any tell whether they have earned his love, or his displeasure! This remains as yet uncertain, and meanwhile all have the same lot, upright and godless, good and wicked, clean and unclean alike. Brought they offerings, or brought they none, well did they or ill, true swore they or false, it is all one. Of all that goes amiss, here under the sun, nothing does more hurt than this equality of fortunes; what wonder if men's hearts, while yet they live, are full of malice and defiance? And so they journey on to the grave. Were but immortality the prize!
 But no, hope of that is none; living dog is better off than dead lion. They live under sentence of death; and when death comes,
 of nothing will they be aware any longer;
 no reward can they receive, now that every trace of them has vanished away; no love, no hatred, no envy can they feel; they have said good-bye to this world, and to all its busy doings, here under the sun.

Go thy ways, then, eat thy bread with a stout heart, and drink wine to thy contenting; that done, God asks no more of thee. Ever be thy garments of white, ever let thy brow glisten with oil; live at ease with the wife that is thy heart's love, long as this uncertain life is granted thee; fugitive days, here beneath the sun. Live thou and labour thou under the sun as thou wilt, this thy portion shall be, and nothing more. Whatever lies in thy power, do while do it thou canst; there will be no doing, no scheming, no wisdom or skill left to thee in the grave, that soon shall be thy home.

Then my thought took a fresh turn;
 man's art does not avail, here beneath the

¹ vv. 2-7: It is not clear whether we are concerned, in this passage, with an earthly king or a heavenly.

² 'His undoing'; according to the Latin, the ruler's own; more probably, in the original, the reference was to that of the subject. ³ The Hebrew text here is obscure, and the Latin differs from it in some points.

sun, to win the race for the swift, or the battle for the strong, a livelihood for wisdom, riches for great learning, or for the craftsman thanks; chance and the moment rule all. Nor does man see his end coming; hooked fish or snared bird is not overtaken so suddenly as man is, when the day of doom falls on him unawares.

And here, too, is wise warning, most wise, as I judge it. There was a small city once, with few men to hold it; and there was a great king that marched out against it, raised a mound and ringed it with siegeworks, till it was beleaguered on every side. To such a city, how came relief? By the wise counsel of one poor man that had his wits about him. And was there anyone, think you, that remembered the poor man afterwards? Not one. Sure enough, said I, wisdom has the better of valour; but see how the poor man's wisdom goes for nothing, and no one listens to him now!

A wise man's whisper carries further than great outcry from a king of fools. Arms cannot match wisdom; by one slip,¹ what great advantage is lost!

10 No ointment can perfumer brew so sweet, but it grows foul when dead flies are lodged in it. And wouldst thou barter away wisdom and honour both, for a moment's folly?

The fool's wits are astray; the wise man's right is to him left.² By his way of it, every passer-by on the road is a fool, save he.

Though a prince's anger should mount against thee, do not desert thy post; great harm by thy healing touch may yet be assuaged.

This is a source of trouble I have marked, here under the sun; the causeless whim of tyrants.

Fools come to the top, down go rank and riches; slaves you will see riding on horseback, and princes going afoot at their bridle-rein.

Fall into pit thou shalt not, if thou dig none; breach no walls, if thou wouldst avoid the adder's sting. Stone crushes his foot that stone carries, and wood scratches him that wood cuts.

Blunt tool that has grown dull from long disuse shall cost thee pains a many;³ if thou hadst been wise sooner, thou shouldst have boiled thee.⁴ Bite snake ere the spell begins, he is no better off that has the master-word.⁵

Wise utterance wins favour; the fool that opens his mouth does but ruin himself, his preface idle talk, his conclusion madness. Of words a fool has no stint. . . .

. . . What went before, is lost to man's view, and what shall befall when he is gone, none can tell him.⁶

He is on a fool's errand, that does not even know his way to town.⁷

Woe to the land that has young blood on the throne, whose court sits feasting till daybreak! And happy the land whose king is of true princely breed, whose courtiers feast when feast should be, to comfort their hearts, not all in revelry.

Roof sags where idleness dwells; a leaking gutter means nerveless hands within.

Food will cheer thee, wine bring thee gladness, but money, it answers every need.

Of the king, no treasonable thought; of the nobles, no ill word even in thy bed-chamber; the very birds in heaven will catch the echoes of it, and fly off to betray thy secret.

11 Here, on the stream's bosom, venture thy livelihood; wait long thou mayst, but be sure thou shalt recover it at last. Seven claims thou hast satisfied, do not refuse the eighth. Not thine to foresee what general calamities the future holds in store; there the rain comes, where the clouds gather; north or south as the tree falls, north or south the trunk will lie. Still waiting for a wind? Never shall thy seed

¹ The rendering 'one sin' is here less appropriate; the verb used, in the Latin as in the Hebrew, has the root meaning of 'making a mistake'.
² Literally, 'The wise man's heart is towards the right, the fool's towards the left'.
³ The Latin version obscures the sense of the proverb by adding 'in sharpening it'—the sense is rather 'in using it'.

⁴ Literally, 'thy wisdom follows thy striving'. The Hebrew text, which is perhaps corrupt, gives the lame ending, 'wisdom is a useful guide'.
⁵ This seems the best interpretation of the Hebrew text, which runs, literally, 'The owner of the tongue has no advantage'. Cf. Ps. 57. 6. The Latin rendering here, 'No worse off is he who backbites in secret', yields no appropriate sense.

⁶ It seems probable that there has been some dislocation of the text here. The latter part of the verse is practically a repetition of 8. 7.
⁷ The exact bearing of this proverb can no longer be identified.

be sown. Still watching the clouds? Never shall thy harvest be carried. Breath that comes and goes, the fashioning of man's frame in the womb, of all this thou knowest nothing; and thinkest thou to understand God's doings, that is Maker of all? Early abroad, to sow thy seed, and let evening find thee still at work; which sowing shall speed better, none knows, or whether both shall thrive to thy profit.¹

7 Ay, it is good to look upon, the light of day; never was eye yet but loved to see the sun. Only be thy years never so many, never so happy, do not forget the dark days that are coming, the long days, when frustration will be the end of it all. While thou art young, take thy fill of manhood's pride, let thy heart beat high with youth, follow where thought leads and inclination beckons, but remember that for all this God will call thee to account. Rid thy heart, then, of resentment, thy nature of ill humours; youth and pleasures, they are so quickly gone!

12 Do not forget thy Maker, now, while youth lasts; now, while the evil days are still far off, the years that pass unwelcomed. Not yet the obscuration of sun and moon and starlight; and the clouds that still gather when the rainy season is done. One day, palsy will shake those door-keepers, those stalwart guards will be bowed with age; rarer, now, the busy maidens at the mill, dimmer, now, those bright glances from the windows. The street-doors shut, muffled the hum of the mill, bird-song for waking-time, and all the echoes² of music faint! Fear upon every height, terrors on the road; almond-blossom matched for whiteness; the grasshopper's weight a burden now; the spiced food untasted!³ Man is for his everlasting home, and already the mourners are astr in the streets. That, or else yonder cord of silver will be loosed, yonder golden skein unravelled; pitcher broken beside the fountain, wheel lost in the well;⁴ with that, back goes dust to its parent earth, and the spirit⁵ returns to God who gave it.

A shadow's shadow, he, the Spokesman, tells us, a world of shadows!

Abundant wisdom the Spokesman had, to be the oracle of his people; the story of his life he made known to them, laid secrets bare, and proverbs framed a many. Sayings of much import he devised, and nothing his pen set down but was truth unalloyed. Sharp goads they are to sting us, sharp nails driven deep home, these wise words left to us by many masters, but all echoing one shepherd's voice. Let these, my son, be all the wisdom thou cravest; this writing of books is an endless matter, and from overmuch study nature rebels.

Conclude we then thus in general; Fear God, and keep his commandments; this is the whole meaning of man. No act of thine but God will bring it under his scrutiny, deep beyond all thy knowing, and pronounce it good or evil.

¹ vv. 1-6: These verses evidently teach that action is worth while, in spite of all the pessimistic considerations hitherto adduced. But commentators are not agreed whether they refer expressly to charitable actions (cf. Lk. 16. 9), or (at least in the first instance) to commercial ventures, or to action in general.
² Literally, 'daughters'. ³ Literally, 'Also they shall fear what is high, and be afraid on the road. The almond-tree will flourish, the locust will grow fat, and the caper-berry will be scattered to the winds, because man is . . .'.
⁴ vv. 2-6: The allegory of these verses has been the subject of much dispute among commentators; but it is probable that they describe, first the loss of physical and nervous strength which accompanies old age, and then (in verse 6) the sudden accidents which may cause death. The rendering above tries to indicate the lines of the interpretation commonly given, without insisting on its details.
⁵ Or perhaps, 'the breath'.

THE SONG OF SONGS

THAT OF SOLOMON

A KISS from those lips!¹ Wine cannot ravish the senses like that embrace, nor the fragrance of rare perfumes match it for delight. Thy very name spoken soothes the heart like flow of oil; what wonder the maids should love thee? Draw me after thee where thou wilt; see, we hasten after thee, by the very fragrance of those perfumes allured! To his own bower the king has brought me; he is our pride and boast, on his embrace, more ravishing than wine, our thoughts shall linger. They love truly that know thy love.

Dark of skin, and yet I have beauty, daughters of Jerusalem.² Black are the tents they have in Cedar; black are Solomon's own curtains; then why not I? Take no note of this Ethiop colour; it was the sun tanned me, when my own brothers, that had a grudge against me, set me a-watching in the vineyards. I have a vineyard of my own that I have watched but ill. Tell me, my true love, where is now thy pasture-ground, where now is thy resting-place under the noon's heat? Thou wouldst not have me wander to and fro where the flocks graze that are none of thine?

Still bewildered, fairest of woman-kind?³ Nay, if thou wilt, wander abroad, and follow with the shepherds' flocks; feed, if thou wilt, those goats of thine beside the shepherds' encampment. My heart's love, prized above all my horsemen, with Pharaoh's wealth of chariots behind them! Soft as doves are thy cheeks, thy neck smooth as coral. Chains of gold that neck must have, inlaid with silver.

Now, while the king sits at his wine, breathes out the spikenard of my thoughts!⁴ Close my love is to my heart as the cluster of myrrh that lodges in my bosom all the night through. Close he clings as a tuft of cypress in the vine-clad rocks of Engedi.

See how fair is the maid I love! Soft eyes thou hast, like a dove's eyes.

And see how fair is the man I love, how stately! Green grows that bower, thine and mine, with its roof of cedars, with a covert of cypress for its walls.

2 Count me no more than wild rose on the lowland plain, wild lily on the mountain slopes.⁵

A lily, matched with these other maidens, a lily among the brambles, she whom I love!

An apple-tree in the wild woodland, shade cool to rest under, fruit sweet to the taste, such is he my heart longs for, matched with his fellows.

Into his own banqueting-hall the king has brought me, shewn me the blazon of his love. Cushioned on flowers, apples heaped high about me, and love-sick all the while! His left hand pillows my head; his right hand, even now, ready to embrace me.

An oath, maidens of Jerusalem! By the gazelles and the wild fawns I charge you, wake never from her sleep my heart's love, till wake she will!⁶

¹ It is not certain, here or throughout the book, whether we are dealing with a series of disconnected love-songs, or with a continuous drama. The present rendering has been divided up into paragraphs on the assumption that a kind of dramatic unity is present, though we cannot always be certain who is the speaker. The first three verses are perhaps flattery addressed to king Solomon by the women of his court.

² vv. 4-6: The speaker seems to be a village girl, newly brought to the palace, and still thinking of her absent lover. 'A vineyard', i.e. a sweetheart, cf. 8. 12 below.

³ vv. 7-10: Spoken to her by king Solomon. ⁴ vv. 11-16: 'The spikenard of my thoughts'; in the original, simply 'my spikenard'. But it has been suggested that the words are meant to introduce a new access of reverie. The interruption in verse 14 may be either spoken words from Solomon, or an imagined address by the absent lover.

⁵ vv. 1-6: The village girl appears to be speaking, except in verse 2, which may be attributed to Solomon. 'He' is the country lover in verse 3, Solomon in verse 6.

⁶ The end of this verse is sometimes taken literally in the Hebrew text, as meaning 'do not arouse or excite (the sentiment of) love (in me) until it pleases to awake of its own accord'. But the Latin rendering, which interprets 'love' as 'the loved one' seems far simpler. If it is right, Solomon is the speaker; the village girl has fallen asleep over the banquet.

8 The voice I love! See where he comes, how he speeds over the mountains, how he 9 spurns the hills!¹ Gazelle nor fawn was ever so fleet of foot as my heart's love. And now he is standing on the other side of this very wall; now he is looking in through each window in turn, peering through 10 every chink. I can hear my true love calling to me: Rise up, rise up quickly, dear heart, so gentle, so beautiful, rise up' and come 11 with me. Winter is over now, the rain has 12 passed by. At home, the flowers have begun to blossom; pruning-time has come; we can hear the turtle-dove cooing 13 already, there at home. There is green fruit on the fig-trees; the vines in flower are all fragrance. Rouse thee, and come, so 14 beautiful, so well beloved, still hiding thyself as a dove hides in cleft rock or crannied wall. Shew me but thy face, let me but hear thy voice, that voice sweet as thy face is fair.

15 How was it they sang? Catch me the fox, the little fox there, thieving among the vineyards; vineyards of ours, all a-blossoming!²

16 All mine, my true love, and I all his; see where he goes out to pasture among the 17 lilies, till the day grows cool, and the shadows long. Come back, my heart's love, swift as gazelle or fawn out on the hills of Bethel.

3 In the night watches, as I lay abed, I searched for my heart's love, and 2 searched in vain. Now to stir abroad, and traverse the city, searching every alley-way and street for him I love so tenderly! But for all my search I could not find him.
 3 I met the watchmen who go the city rounds, and asked them whether they had 4 seen my love; then, when I had scarce left them, I found him, so tenderly loved; and now that he is mine I will never leave him, never let him go, till I have brought him into my own mother's house, into the room that saw my birth.

¹ v. 8-v. 4 of the next chapter. Since this passage begins and ends with a warning that the sleeper must not be awoken, the pictures recorded in it are evidently those of a dream. In verse 9, the dreamer seems to echo the half-heard utterance of verse 7.

² This is usually thought to be the text of some country song; the words 'How was it they sang?' have been inserted above, so as to prepare the reader for this.

³ It is difficult to see how this verse fits into its surroundings. Some would translate 'What is it that makes its way up. . . ' and treat verse 7 as the answer; but the analogy of 8. 5 suggests that the reference is somehow to the heroine of the poem.

⁴ vv. 7-11. These verses are plainly an interlude, in the form of a song (perhaps chanted by the women of Jerusalem) in honour of king Solomon's state litter.

⁵ Literally, 'Within, it was inlaid with love, on account of (in the Hebrew text, from) the daughters of Jerusalem'.

⁶ This chapter forms a love-song which has no special reference to any particular situation; they may be understood as words addressed to the village girl by her lover, and heard either literally or in the imagination.

An oath, maidens of Jerusalem! By the gazelles and the wild fawns I charge you, wake never from her sleep my heart's love, till wake she will!

Who is this that makes her way up by the desert road, erect as a column of smoke, all myrrh and incense, and those sweet scents the perfumer knows?³

See now the bed whereon king Solomon lies, with sixty warriors to guard him, none braver in Israel;⁴ swordsmen all, well trained for battle, and each with his sword girt about him, against the perils of the night! A litter king Solomon will have, of Lebanon wood; a golden frame it must have, on silver props, with cushions of purple; within are pictured tales of love, for your pleasure, maidens of Jerusalem.⁵ Come out, maidens of Sion, and see king Solomon wearing the crown that was his mother's gift to him on his day of triumph, the day of his betrothal.

4 How fair thou art, my true love, how fair!⁶ Eyes soft as dove's eyes, half-seen behind thy veil; hair that clusters thick as the flocks of goats, when they come home from the Galaad hills; teeth white as ewes fresh from the washing, well matched as the twin lambs that follow them; barren is none. Thy lips a line of scarlet, guardians of that sweet utterance; thy cheeks shew through their veil rosy as a halved pomegranate. Thy neck rising proudly, nobly adorned, like David's embattled tower, hung about with a thousand shields, panoply of the brave; graceful thy breasts as two fawns that feed among the lilies.

Till the day grows cool, and the shadows long, myrrh-scented mountain and incense-breathing hill shall be my home.

Fair in every part, my true love, no fault in all thy fashioning! Venture forth from Lebanon, and come to me, my bride, my queen that shall be! Leave Amana behind thee, Sanir and Hermon heights, where the lairs of lions are, where the leopards roam the hills.¹

9 What a wound thou hast made, my bride, my true love, what a wound thou hast made in this heart of mine! And all with one glance of an eye, all with one 10 ringlet straying on thy neck! Sweet, sweet are thy caresses, my bride, my true love; wine cannot ravish the senses like that embrace, nor any spices match the perfume that breathes from thee. Sweet are thy lips, 11 my bride, as honey dripping from its comb; honey-sweet thy tongue, and soft as milk; the perfume of thy garments is very 12 incense. My bride, my true love, a close garden; hedged all about, a spring shut in and sealed! What wealth of grace is here!
13 Well-ordered rows of pomegranates, tree of cypress and tuft of nard; no lack there 14 whether of spikenard or saffron, of calamus, cinnamon, or incense-tree,² of myrrh, aloe or any rarest perfume. A stream bordered with garden; water so fresh never came tumbling down from Lebanon.
16 North wind, awake; wind of the south, awake and come; blow through this garden of mine, and set its fragrance all astir.

5 Into his garden, then, let my true love come, and taste his fruit.³ The garden gained, my bride, my heart's love; myrrh and spices of mine all reaped; the honey eaten in its comb, the wine drunk and the milk, that were kept for me! Eat your fill, lovers; drink, sweethearts, and drink deep!

2 I lie asleep; but oh, my heart is wakeful! A knock on the door, and then my true love's voice: Let me in, my true love, so gentle, my bride, so pure! See, how bedewed is this head of mine, how the night 3 rains have drenched my hair! Ah, but my shift, I have laid it by: how can I put it on again? My feet I washed but now; shall 4 I soil them with the dust? Then my true love thrust his hand through the lattice, and I trembled inwardly at his touch. I rose up to let him in; but my hands 5 dripped ever with myrrh; still with the choicest myrrh my fingers were slippery, as I caught the latch. When I opened, my 6 true love was gone; he had passed me by. How my heart had melted at the sound of his voice! And now I searched for him in vain; there was no answer when I called out to him. As they went the city rounds, 7 the watchmen fell in with me, that guard the walls; beat me, and left me wounded, and took away my cloak. I charge you, 8 maidens of Jerusalem, fall you in with the man I long for, give him this news of me, that I pine away with love.⁴

Nay, but tell us, fairest of women, how 9 shall we know this sweetheart of thine from another's? Why is he loved beyond all else, that thou art so urgent with us?

My sweetheart? Among ten thousand 10 you shall know him; so white is the colour of his fashioning, and so red. His head dazzles like the purest gold; the hair on it lies close as the high palm-branches, raven hair. His eyes are gentle as doves by the 12 brook-side, only these are bathed in milk, eyes full of repose.⁵ Cheeks trim as a spice-bed of the perfumer's own tending; drench lilies in the finest myrrh, and you shall know the fragrance of his lips. Hands well 14 rounded; gold set with jacinth is not workmanship so delicate; body of ivory, and veins of sapphire blue; legs straight as 15 marble columns, that stand in sockets of gold. Erect his stature as Lebanon itself, noble as Lebanon cedar. Oh, that sweet 16 utterance! Nothing of him but awakes desire. Such is my true love, maidens of Jerusalem; such is the companion I have lost.

But where went he, fairest of women, 17 this true love of thine? Tell us what haunts he loves, and we will come with thee to search for him.

¹ 'My queen that shall be'; literally 'thou shalt be crowned'. The Hebrew text has simply 'Look down', or perhaps, 'Make thy way down'. It is difficult to see why the various heights of the Lebanon range should be mentioned here; unless, indeed, we may suppose that the house called 'the Forest of Lebanon' (III Kg. 7. 2 and elsewhere) had its different parts or rooms named after these peaks.
² 'Incense-tree'; the Latin version here transliterates, 'trees of Lebanon', instead of translating the second noun.
³ vv. 1-7: The first of these verses may describe a reunion which presents itself to the imagination of the village girl as she falls asleep; the remainder are evidently a dream, which repeats, with variations, the dream of 3. 1-3.

⁴ vv. 8-17: These verses, with the first two of the following chapter, form a dialogue in which the village girl, now awake, satisfies the curiosity of her companions about her lover's appearance, but puts them off with vague guesses as to his whereabouts.
⁵ 'Eyes full of repose'; we can only make guesses at the meaning of the Hebrew phrase, 'reposing upon fullness', which the Latin version renders 'residing by the fountains'.

- 6 Where should he be, my true love, but among the spices; where but in his garden, gathering the lilies? All mine, my true love, and I all his; ever he would choose the lilies for his pasture-ground.¹
- 3 Fair thou art and graceful, my heart's love; for beauty, Jerusalem itself is not thy match; yet no embattled array so awes men's hearts.² Turn thy eyes away, that so unman me! Hair dazzling as the goats have, when they come flocking home from the Galaad hills; teeth white as ewes fresh from the washing, well matched as the twin lambs that follow them; barren is none; thy cheeks shew through their veil rosy as skin of pomegranate! What are three score of queens, and eighty concubines, and maids about them past all counting? One there is beyond compare; for me, none so gentle, none so pure! Only once her mother travailed; she would have no darling but this. Maid was none that saw her but called her blessed; queen was none, nor concubine, but spoke in her praise. Who is this, whose coming shews like the dawn of day? No moon so fair, no sun so majestic, no embattled array so awes men's hearts.
- 10 But when I betook me to the fruit garden, to find apples in the hollows, to see if vine had flowered there, and pomegranate had budded, all unawares, my heart misgave me... beside the chariots of Aminadab.³
- 12 Come back, maid of Sulam, come back; let us feast our eyes on thee. Maid of Sulam, come back, come back!⁴

7 What can the woman of Sulam give you to feast your eyes on, if it be not the dance of the Two Camps?⁵

Ah, princely maid, how dainty are the steps of thy sandalled feet! Thighs well shaped as the beads of a necklace, some master-craftsman's work; navel delicately carved as a goblet, that has ever its meed of liquor, belly rounded like a heap of corn amid the lilies. Graceful thy breasts are as two fawns of the gazelle. Thy neck rising proudly like a tower, but all of ivory; deep, deep thy eyes, like those pools at Hesebon, under Beth-rabbim Gate; thy nose imperious as the keep that frowns on Damascus from the hill-side. Thy head erect as Carmel, bright as royal purple the braided ripples of thy hair. How graceful thou art, dear maiden, how fair, how dainty! Thy stature challenges the palm tree, thy breasts the clustering vine. What thought should I have but to reach the tree's top, and gather its fruit? Breasts generous as the grape, breath sweet as apples, mouth soft to my love's caress⁶ as good wine is soft to the palate, as food to lips and teeth.

My true love, I am all his; and who but I the longing of his heart?⁷ Come with me, my true love; for us the country ways, the cottage roof for shelter. Dawn shall find us in the vineyard, looking to see what flowers the vine has, and whether they are growing into fruit; whether pomegranates are in blossom. And there thou shalt be master of my love. The mandrakes, what scent they give! Over the door at home there are fruits of every sort a-drying; I put them by, new and old, for my true love to eat.

8 Would that thou wert my brother, nursed at my own mother's breast! Then I could meet thee in the open street

¹ Verses 1, 2 evidently continue the thought of the preceding chapter. ² vv. 3-9: The allusions in verses 4-6 (cf. 4. 1-3 above) suggest that the village girl is being addressed; but this time, it would seem, by king Solomon (cf. vv. 7, 8). That he should hit upon the same terms of comparison is perhaps a stroke of deliberate art. ³ vv. 10, 11: There is no clue to the speaker; naturally we assume that it is still king Solomon. A comparison of the words used with verse 1 above and 7. 8 below suggests that it was his intention to make the village girl his bride. At this point, the text seems to play us false; the statement (both in the Hebrew and in the Septuagint Greek), 'My soul made me into the chariots of Aminadab' (or, of my noble people), is one which gives no tolerable sense. It is probably implied that the speaker swooned away, but the exact meaning of the verse is irrecoverable, and it is not even certain that there may not be a serious gap in the text of the poem.

⁴ This verse, in which the word 'Sulamite' occurs for the first time, belongs in its context to the succeeding chapter. ⁵ vv. 1-9: The first sentence is presumably spoken by the Sulamite herself, the rest by Solomon. It is commonly assumed that this woman of Sulam (or Sunam, III Kg. 1. 3) is the village girl who was the heroine of the preceding chapters. But this is not stated; and we are free, if we will, to regard her as a new character in the drama; a dancer whose charms, lavishly displayed, distract king Solomon from his former love. At the end of verse 5 the Hebrew text probably means 'a king is held captive by thy ringlets', which confirms the impression that king Solomon is the speaker. ⁶ v. 9: 'To my love's caress'; in the original, the phrase is 'to him whom I love', but this introduces utter confusion into the passage, and the change of a single vowel-point gives us 'my caresses' as in I. 1 and elsewhere. ⁷ vv. 10-13: The village girl, who has now evidently said good-bye to the court, rejoins her lover.

and kiss thee, and earn no contemptuous 2 looks.¹ To my mother's house I will lead thee, my captive; there thou shalt teach me my lessons, and I will give thee spiced wine to drink, fresh brewed from my 3 pomegranates. His left hand pillows my head; his right hand, even now, ready to 4 embrace me! An oath, maidens of Jerusalem! Never wake from her sleep my heart's love, till wake she will!² 5 Who is this that makes her way up by the desert road, all gaily clad, leaning upon the arm of her true love?³

When I came and woke thee, it was under the apple-tree, the same where sore distress overtook thy own mother, where she that bore thee had her hour of shame.
 6 Hold me close to thy heart, close as locket or bracelet fits; not death itself is so strong as love, not the grave itself cruel as love unrequited; the torch that lights it is a 7 blaze of fire. Yes, love is a fire no waters avail to quench, no floods to drown; for love, a man will give up all that he has in the world, and think nothing of his loss.

¹ vv. 1-14: Although the transitions of thought are not always easy to follow, this chapter can be read without difficulty as lovers' talk, following on the reunion implied in the foregoing chapter. So read, it is curiously graphic, from verse 1, in which the village girl complains of prying eyes, to verse 14, in which her lover complains of being overheard.

² vv. 3, 4: The bride, in a drowsy ecstasy, repeats both her own words and Solomon's words from 2. 6, 7. ³ It is not clear whether the first half of this verse is spoken by the bride, or by onlookers; cf. 3. 6. The words 'all gaily clad' are in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text. In the second half, the bride speaks, reminding her lover that their trysting-place has been the actual place in which he was born; this is the sense both of the Hebrew text and of the Septuagint Greek, though the Latin version curiously has: 'There thy mother was ravished; there she who bore thee was violated'.

⁴ Verses 8, 9 are evidently a countryside song or proverb, which the bride quotes here so as to emphasise (in verse 10) her own faithfulness. ⁵ vv. 11, 12: (Cf. Mt. 21. 34.) The Latin version here has translated the proper names as common nouns, which yields no good sense.

⁶ This is the sense of the Hebrew text; in the Latin, verse 14 is addressed by the girl to her lover.

A little sister we have, still unripe for the love of man;⁴ but the day will come when a man will claim her; what cheer shall she have from us then? Steadfast as a wall if she be, that wall shall be crowned with silver; yield she as a door yields, we have cedar boards to fasten her. And I, I am 10 a wall; impregnable this breast as a fortress;
 and the man who claimed me found in me a bringer of content.

Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-Hamon; and when he gave the care of it to vine-dressers, each of these must pay a thousand silver pieces for the revenue of it. A vineyard I have of my own, here 12 at my side; keep thy thousand pieces, Solomon, and let each vine-dresser have his two hundred; not mine to grudge them.⁵

Where is thy love of retired garden walks? All the countryside is listening to thee. Give me but the word to come away, 14 thy bridegroom, with thee;⁶ hasten away like gazelle or fawn that spurns the scented hill-side underfoot.

THE BOOK OF WISDOM

LISTEN, all you who are judges here on earth. Learn to love justice; learn to think high thoughts of what God is, and with sincere hearts aspire to him. Trust him thou must, if find him thou wouldst; he does not reveal himself to one that challenges his power. Man's truant thoughts may keep God at a distance, but when the test of strength comes, folly is shewn in its true colours; never yet did wisdom find her way into the schemer's heart, never yet made her home in a life mortgaged to sin. A holy thing it is, the spirit that brings instruction; how it shrinks away from the touch of falsehood, holds aloof from every rash design! It is a touchstone, to betray the neighbourhood of wrong-doing. A good friend to man is this spirit of wisdom, that convicts the blasphemer of his wild words; God can witness his secret thoughts, can read his heart unerringly, and shall his utterance go unheard? No, the spirit of the Lord fills the whole world; bond that holds all things in being, it takes cognisance of every sound we utter; how should ill speech go unmarked, or the scrutiny of justice pass it by? The hidden counsel of the godless will all come to light; no word of it but reaches the divine hearing, and betrays their wicked design; that jealous ear is still listening, and all their busy murmuring shall stand revealed.

Beware, then, of whispering, and to ill purpose; ever let your tongues refrain from calumny. Think not that the secret word goes for nought; lying lips were ever the soul's destroying. Death for its goal, is not life's aim missed? Labours he well, that labours to bring doom about his ears? Death was never of God's fashioning; not for his pleasure does life cease to be; what meant his creation, but that all created things should have being? No breed has he created on earth but for its thriving; none carries in itself the seeds of its own destruction. Think not that mortality bears sway on earth;¹ no end nor term is fixed to a life well lived...² It is the wicked that have brought death on themselves, by word and deed of their own; court death, and melt away in its embrace, keep tryst with it, and lay claim to its partnership.

2 Reason they offer, yet reason all amiss. Their hearts tell them, So brief our time here, so full of discomfort, and death brings no remedy! Never a man yet made good his title to have come back from the grave! Whence came we, none can tell; and it will be all one hereafter whether we lived or no. What is our breath, but a passing vapour; what is our reason, but a spark that sets the brain whirling? Quench that spark, and our body is turned to ashes; like a spent sigh, our breath is wasted on the air; like the cloud-wrack our life passes away, unsubstantial as the mist yonder sun disperses with its ray, bears down with its heat. Time will surely efface our memory, and none will mark the record of our doings. Only a passing shadow, this life of ours, and from its end there is no returning; the doom is sealed, and there is no acquittal.

Come then (they say), let us enjoy pleasure, while pleasure is ours; youth does not last, and creation is at our call; of rich wine and well spiced take we our fill. Spring shall not cheat us of her blossoming; crown we our heads with roses ere they wither; be every meadow the scene of our wanton mirth. Share we the revels all alike, leave traces everywhere of our joyous passing; no part or lot have we but this.

Helpless innocence shall lie at our mercy; not for us to spare the widow, to respect the venerable head, grown white with years. Might shall be our right, weakness count for proof of worthlessness. Where is he, the just man? We must plot to be rid of him; he will not lend himself to our purposes. Ever he must be thwarting our plans; transgress we the law, he is all reproof, depart we from the traditions of our race, he denounces us. What, would he claim knowledge of divine secrets, give himself out as the son of God? The touchstone, he, of our inmost thoughts; we cannot bear the very sight of him, his life so different from other men's, the path he takes, so far removed from theirs! No better than false coin he counts us, holds aloof from our doings as though they would defile him; envies the just their future happiness, boasts of a divine parentage. Put we his claims, then, to the proof; let experience shew what his lot shall be, what end awaits him. If to be just is to be God's son indeed, then God will take up his cause, will save him from the power of his enemies.¹ Outrage and torment, let these be the tests we use; let us see that gentleness of his in its true colours, find out what his patience is worth. Sentenced let him be to a shameful death; by his own way of it, he shall find deliverance.²

¹ What is said here is understood by some as referring only to human life; others take it as implying that mortality in general owes its origin to the fall of Adam. ² This verse seems to be incomplete; the old Sixtine Vulgate adds, on the authority of certain Latin manuscripts, the phrase 'death is earned only by wrong-doing'.

So false the calculations that are blinded by human malice! The secret purposes of God they might not fathom; how should they foresee that holiness is required, how should they pass true award on a blameless life? God, to be sure, framed man for an immortal destiny, the created image of his own endless being; but, since the devil's envy brought death into the world, they make him their model that take him for their master.³

3 But the souls of the just are in God's hands, and no torment, in death itself, has power to reach them. Dead? Fools think so; think their end loss, their leaving us, annihilation; but all is well with them. The world sees nothing but the pains they endure; they themselves have eyes only for what is immortal; so light their suffering, so great the gain they win! God, all the while, did but test them, and testing them found them worthy of him. His gold, tried in the crucible, his burnt-sacrifice, graciously accepted, they do but wait for the time of their deliverance; then they will shine out, these just souls, unconquerable as the sparks that break out, now here, now there, among the stubble.⁴ Theirs to sit in judgement on nations, to subdue whole peoples, under a Lord whose reign shall last for ever. Trust him if thou wilt, true thou shalt find him;⁵ faith waits for him calmly and lovingly; who claims his gift, who shall attain peace, if not they, his chosen servants?⁶

But dearly shall the wicked pay for their error,⁷ for the claims of right forgotten, for the Lord's will defied. Their case is pitiable indeed, who make light of true wisdom and of ordered living; vain their hope, profitless their toil, barren their achievement. Light women are the wives they wed, worthless is their brood; a curse lies on their begetting. Blessed, rather, her lot, that childless is, yet chaste, that never knew the bed of shame; offspring she will not lack, when holy souls have their reward. Nay, let there be some eunuch that has kept his hands clear of wrong, has never harboured treasonable thought against the Lord; he too with rare gifts shall be faithfully rewarded, shall have the portion that most contents him in God's holy place.⁸ A noble harvest good men reap from their labours; wisdom is a root which never yet cast its crop. Not so the adulterers; never look for children of theirs to thrive; the offspring of the unhalloved wedlock will vanish away.⁹ Live they long, they shall be held in no regard, in their late age unhonoured; die they soon, they shall die without hope, no comfort to sustain them in the day when all comes to light. Bitterly they shall rue it hereafter, the race of the evil-doers.

¹ Cf. Mt. 27. 43.

² Some would render, less plausibly, 'he shall be judged by his words'.

³ 'They make him their model'; the Greek text has, 'they experience it', i.e. death. ⁴ Mt. 13. 43.

⁵ 'Trust him if thou wilt, true thou shalt find him'; literally, 'those who trust in him shall understand truth'. The word 'truth' in the Old Testament refers, as a rule, either to human loyalty or to divine fidelity.

⁶ 'His chosen servants'; the Greek text gives, 'His holy ones; who shall find deliverance, if not his chosen servants?'

⁷ Or perhaps, 'The scheming of the wicked shall recoil on them in punishment'.

⁸ Cf. Deut. 23. 1; Is. 56. 3. 'He too with rare gifts shall be faithfully rewarded'; literally, 'He too shall be given a rare gift of fidelity'. ⁹ Some think that adultery, here as often in the Old Testament, is used by a metaphor for the worship of false gods.

4 How fair a thing is the unwedded life¹ that is nobly lived! Think not the memory of it can fade; God and man alike 2 preserve the record; in life how eagerly imitated, in death how long regretted, in 3 eternity how crowned with triumph, the conquest gained in fields of honourable 4 striving! Let the wicked gender as they will, it shall nothing avail them; what, should those bastard slips ever strike their 5 roots deep, base the tree firm? Burgeon they may for a little, but the wind will shake their frail hold; root and all, the storm will 6 carry them away. Half-formed, the boughs will be snapped off, and their fruit go to 7 waste, unripe, unprofitable. And indeed, when the day of reckoning comes, needs 8 must they should be cited as witnesses against their own parents, these, the children 9 of their shame, by unlawful dalliance begotten.²

7 Not so the innocent; though he should die before his time, rest shall be his.
 8 A seniority there is that claims reverence, owing nothing to time, not measured by 9 the lapse of years; count a man grey-haired when he is wise, ripe of age when his life 10 is stainless. Divine favour, divine love banished him from a life he shared with 11 sinners; caught him away, before wickedness could pervert his thoughts, before 12 wrong-doing could allure his heart; such witchery evil has, to tarnish honour, such 13 alchemy do the roving passions exercise even on minds that are true metal. With 14 him, early achievement counted for long apprenticeship; so well the Lord loved 15 him, from a corrupt world he would grant him swift release.

15 The world looks on, uncomprehending; a hard lesson it is to learn, that God does 16 reward, does pity his chosen friends, does grant his faithful servants deliverance. Did 17 they know it, the death of the just man, with its promise early achieved, is a reproach 18 to the wicked that live yet in late old age. But what see they? Here is a man 19 dead, and all his wisdom could not save him. That the Lord planned all this, and 20 for the saving of him, does not enter their minds. What wonder if the sight fills them with contempt? And they themselves, all the while, are earning the Lord's contempt; they themselves, doomed to lie there dishonoured among the dead, eternally a laughing-stock! How they will stand aghast, when he pricks the bubble of their pride!³ Ruins they shall be, overthrown from the foundation, land for ever parched dry; bitter torment shall be theirs, and their name shall perish irrecoverably. Alas, the long tally of their sins! Trembling they shall come forward, and the record of their misdeeds shall rise up to confront them.

5 How boldly, then, will the just man appear, to meet his old persecutors, that thwarted all his striving! And they, in what craven fear they will cower at the sight of him, amazed at the sudden reversal of his fortunes! Inward remorse will wring a groan from those hearts: Why, these were the men we made into a laughing-stock and a by-word! We, poor fools, mistook the life they lived for madness, their death for ignominy; and now they are reckoned as God's own children, now it is among his holy ones that their lot is cast.⁴

Far, it seems, did our thoughts wander from the true path; never did the ray of justice enlighten them, never the true sun shone. Weary it proved, the reckless way of ruin, lonely were the wastes we travelled, who missed the path the Lord meant for us. What advantage has it brought us, all our pomp and pride? How are we the better for all our vaunted wealth? Nothing of that but is gone, unsubstantial as a shadow, swift as courier upon his errand. The ship that ploughs angry waves, what trace is left of her passage? How wilt thou track her keel's pathway through the deep? The bird's flight through air what print betrays? So fiercely lashed the still breeze with the beating of her pinions, as she cleaves her noisy way through heaven, wings flapping, and is gone; and afterwards, what sign of her going? Or be it some arrow, shot at a mark, that pierces the air, how quick the wound closes, the journey is forgotten! So literal adultery, but marriage with the heathen.

¹ In the Greek text, 'even a childless life'.

² puffed up as they are'. The sense of the Greek text is probably, 'When he throws them down headlong'.

⁴ ov. 3-5: 'These were the men...' in the Greek text, 'This is the man...' the singular being used throughout.

² Some think that the author is condemning, not

³ Literally, 'when he breaks them asunder, all with us it was all one, our coming to birth and our ceasing to be; no trace might we leave behind us of a life well lived; we spent ourselves on ill-doing.

(Such is the lament of sinners, there in the world beneath.¹) Short-lived are all the hopes of the goddess, thistle-down in the wind, flying spray before the storm, smoke that whirls away in the breeze; as soon forgotten as the guest that comes for a day, and comes no more. It is the just that will live for ever; the Lord has their recompense waiting for them, the most high God takes care of them. How glorious is that kingdom, how beautiful that crown, which the Lord will bestow on them! His right hand is there to protect them, his holy arm to be their shield. Indignantly he will take up arms, mustering all the forces of creation for vengeance on his enemies. His own faithfulness is the breastplate he will put on, unswerving justice the helmet he wears, a right cause his shield unfailing. See, where he whets the sword of strict retribution, and the whole order of nature is banded with him against his reckless foes! Well-aimed fly his thunder-bolts, sped far and wide from yonder cloud-arch, never missing their mark. Teeming hail-storms shall whirl about them, the artillery of his vengeance; fiercely the sea's waves shall roar against them, pitilessly the floods cut them off; the storm-wind shall rise in their faces, and scatter them as the gust scatters chaff. The whole earth ransacked, and the thrones of the mighty pulled down, by their own disobedience, their own malignancy!

6 (Wisdom more avails than strength; for a man of prudence, the warrior is no match.)² A word, then, for kings' ears to hear, kings' hearts to heed; a message for you, rulers, wherever you be! Listen well, all you that have multitudes at your command, foreign hordes to do your bidding. Power is none but comes to you from the Lord, nor any royalty but from One who is above all. He it is that will call you to account for your doings, with a scrutiny that reads your inmost thoughts; you that held his commission and were false to it, justice neglected, the law set aside, his divine will transgressed. Swift and terrible shall be his coming; strictly his doom falls where heads rise high. For the meanest, there may be pardon; for greatness, greater torment is reserved. What, should he cringe before high rank, stand in awe of a name, he, the Lord of a universe, that made great and little alike, that cares alike for all? Who most has power, him the sharpest pains await. Do you, then, royal sirs (for my warning touches none so nearly), learn wisdom's lesson, and save yourselves from ruin. He that would find soul's health, holy must be and hallowed precepts observe; master these he must, if he would make good his defence. Cherish these warnings of mine, and greedily devour them for your instruction.

The bright beacon of wisdom, that never burns dim, how readily seen by eyes that long for it, how open to their search! Nay, she is beforehand with these her suitors, ready to make herself known to them; no toilsome quest is his, that is up betimes to greet her; she is there, waiting at his doors. Why, to entertain the very thought of her is maturity of the mind; one night's vigil, and all thy cares are over. She goes her rounds, to find men worthy of her favours; in the open street unveils that smiling face of hers, comes deliberately to meet them. The very first step towards wisdom is the desire for discipline, and how should a man care for discipline without loving it, or love it without heeding its laws, or heed its laws without winning immortality, or win immortality without drawing near to God? A royal road it is, then, this desire for wisdom, and you, that have nations under your sway, as you value throne and sceptre, must hold wisdom in honour; how else shall your reign be eternal? (A welcome light hers should be to the world's princes.)

What wisdom is, whence came its birth, I will now make known to you. Not for me to withhold the secret; from first to last I will tell the story of her origin, bring to light all that may be known of her, no word of the truth passed by. Withhold it? Nay, the pale miser that grudges his store was never friend of mine; no such character

¹ The words enclosed in brackets are not found in the Greek text.

² Verses 1 and 23 are not found in the Greek text.

26 befits the wise. Wide let wisdom be spread, for the more health of mankind; what better security for a people, than prudence 27 on the throne? Learn, then, who will, the lesson of discernment; at my charges, and to his profit.

7 What of myself? Was not Solomon a mortal man like the rest of you, come down from that first man that was a thing of clay?¹ I, too, was flesh and blood; ten months I lay a-fashioning in my mother's 2 womb; of woman's body my stuff came,
and of man's procreation; midnight joys 3 went to the making of me. Born was I, and born drew in the common air; dust amid the dust I fell, and, baby-fashion, my first 4 utterance was a cry; swaddled I must be, and cared for, like the rest. Tell me, was 5 ever king had other manner of coming to be? By one gate all enter life, by one gate 6 all leave it.

7 Whence, then, did the prudence spring that endowed me? Prayer brought it; to God I prayed, and the spirit of wisdom 8 came upon me.² This I valued more than kingdom or throne; I thought nothing of 9 my riches in comparison. There was no jewel I could match with it; all my treasures of gold were a handful of dust beside it, my silver seemed but base clay in pre-10 sence of it. I treasured wisdom more than health or beauty, preferred her to the light of day; hers is a flame which never dies 11 down. Together with her all blessings came to me; boundless prosperity was her 12 gift. All this I enjoyed, with wisdom to prepare my way for me, never guessing 13 that it all sprang from her. The lessons she taught me are riches honestly won, shared without stint, openly proclaimed; a treasure 14 men will find incorruptible. Those who enjoy it are honoured with God's friendship, so high a value he sets on her instruction.
15 God's gift it is, if speech answers to thought of mine, and thought of mine to the message I am entrusted with. Who else 16 can shew wise men the true path, check them when they stray? We are in his hands, we and every word of ours; our prudence in act, our skill in craftsmanship.
17 Sure knowledge he has imparted to me of all that is; how the world is ordered, what influence have the elements, how the months³ have their beginning, their middle, and their ending, how the sun's course alters and the seasons revolve, how the years have their cycles, the stars their places. To every living thing its own breed, to every beast its own moods; the winds⁴ rage, and men think deep thoughts; the plants keep their several kinds, and each root has its own virtue; all the mysteries and all the surprises of nature were made known to me; wisdom herself taught me, that is the designer of them all.

Mind-enlightening is the influence that dwells in her; set high apart; one in its source, yet manifold in its operation; subtle, yet easily understood. An influence quick in movement, inviolable, persuasive, gentle, right-thinking, keen-edged, irresistible, beneficent, kindly, gracious, steadfast, proof against all error and all solicitude. Nothing is beyond its power, nothing hidden from its view, and such capacity has it that it can pervade the minds of all living men; so pure and subtle an essence is thought. Nothing so agile that it can match wisdom for agility; nothing can penetrate this way and that, etherial as she. Steam that ascends from the fervour of divine activity, pure effluence of his glory who is God all-powerful, she feels no passing taint; she,
the glow that radiates from eternal light, she, the untarnished mirror of God's majesty, she, the faithful image of his goodness. Alone, with none to aid her, she is all-powerful; herself ever unchanged, she makes all things new; age after age she finds her way into holy men's hearts, turning them into friends and spokesmen of God. Her familiars it is, and none other, that God loves. Brightness is hers beyond the brightness of the sun, and all the starry host; match her with light itself, and she outvies it; light must still alternate with darkness, but where is the conspiracy can pull down wisdom from her throne?

8 Bold is her sweep from world's end to world's end, and everywhere her gracious ordering manifests itself.

¹ Solomon's name is not mentioned in the original; but it is certainly he who is represented as speaking in this and the following chapters. ² Cf. III Kg. 3. 9. ³ Literally, 'The times'. ⁴ Or perhaps 'the spirits', either human or diabolic.

2 She, from my youth up has been my heart's true love, my heart's true quest; she was the bride I longed for, enamoured 3 of her beauty. Was I moved by noble birth? No better claim than hers, who dwells in God's palace, marked out by the 4 Ruler of the world as his favourite; the mistress of his craftsmanship, the arbiter 5 of his plans.¹ Or should life's dearest aim be wealth? Why then, who has more 6 wealth at her disposal than wisdom, that turns all to account? Or if sound judgement 7 is man's business, who else on earth goes to work so skilfully as she?² If thy 8 desire be for honest living, man's excellences are the fruit she labours to produce; temperance and prudence she teaches, justice and fortitude, and what in life avails 9 man more? Or if wide knowledge be thy ambition, she can inform thee of what is past, make conjecture of the future; she is versed in the subtleties of debate, in the reading of all riddles; marvels and portents she can foretell, and what events time or season will bring.
10 Her, then, I would take to myself, to share my home; to be my counsellor in prosperity, my solace in anxiety and grief.
11 Through her (said I) I shall win fame in the assembly, find honour, though so young, amidst the elders. If I sit in judgement, quick wit shall be mine, that shall strike 12 awe into the princes when I appear before them, the admiration of the great. Am I silent? They wait my leisure; speak I, they take heed; flows my speech on, they listen, 13 hand on lip. She, too, will bring me immortality; imperishable the name I shall 14 leave to after ages. Mine to rule peoples, and have nations at my call; dread tyrants 15 to daunt by the very name of me, the name of a king so loved by his people, so brave 16 in battle. Then home again, to rest upon her bosom; no shrewish mate, no tedious housewife, joy and contentment all of her.
17 So ran my thoughts, and well in my heart I pondered them. Wisdom, that brought such kinship with immortality, whose friendship was such dear delight, 18 whose exercise brought me credit unflinching, her daily comradeship a training in sound judgement, the eloquence she inspired an earnest of renown; win her for myself I must, and went about to attain my purpose. I was, indeed, a boy of good 19 parts, and nobility of nature had fallen to my lot; gentle birth above the common had 20 endowed me with a body free from blemish.³ But to be master of myself was a thing I could not hope to come by, except 21 of God's bounty; I was wise enough already to know whence the gift came. So to the Lord I turned, and made my request of him, praying with all my heart in these words following:

9 God of our fathers, Lord of all mercy, thou by thy word hast made all things, and thou in thy wisdom hast contrived man to rule thy creation, to order 2 the world by a law of right living and of just dealing, and give true award in the honest purpose of his heart. Wisdom I ask 3 of thee, the same wisdom that dwells so near thy throne; do not grudge me a place among thy retinue. Am I not thy servant, 4 and to thy service born? Mortal man thou seest me, the puny creature of an hour, a mind unapt for judgement and the making 5 of laws. Grow man to what perfection he will, if he lacks the wisdom that comes from thee, he is nothing; and me thou hast 6 chosen to reign over thy people; from me sons and daughters of thine must seek for redress! More than this, thou hast bidden 7 me raise thee temple and altar, upon this mountain, in the holy city where thou dwellest, model of that holy tabernacle, made long ago, whose pattern was of thy 8 own devising.⁴ Wisdom was with thee then,⁵ privy to all thy designs, she who stood by thee at the world's creation, and knows thy whole will, the whole tenour of thy commandments. From that heavenly 9 sanctuary, that high throne of thine, send her out still on thy errand, to be at my side too, and share my labours! How else should thy will be made clear to me? For her, no secret, no riddle is too dark; her prudent counsel will be my guide, the fame of her my protection. So shall my task be accomplished as thou wouldst have it be; so shall I give this people of thine just awards, no unworthy heir of the throne my father left me.

¹ The exact meaning of verses 3 and 4 is uncertain. ² Or p-rhaps, 'Who but she is the contriver of all that is?' ³ The Greek would naturally be taken to mean, 'Or rather, gentle birth had endowed me...'. But it is difficult to institute the desired contrast between this and the preceding verse, whatever rendering of them is adopted. The translation given above assumes that 'good' means 'nobly born', which is the primary sense of the word in Greek. Literally, 'And being more good I came into an undefiled body'. ⁴ Literally, 'Which thou didst make ready beforehand from the beginning'. The rendering given assumes a reference to the tabernacle in the desert, and the pattern of it shewn to Moses on Mount Sinai. Others would interpret the verse as alluding to God's dwelling-place in heaven. ⁵ Or perhaps, 'Wisdom is ever at thy side'.

What God's purpose is, how should man discover, how should his mind master the secret of the divine will? So hesitating our human thoughts, so hazardous our conjectures! Ever the soul is weighed down by a mortal body, earth-bound cell that clogs the manifold activity of its thought. Hard enough to read the riddle of our life here, with laborious search ascertaining what lies so close to hand; and would we trace out heaven's mysteries too? Thy purposes none may know, unless thou dost grant thy gift of wisdom, sending out from high heaven thy own holy spirit. Thus ever were men guided by the right way, here on earth, and learned to know thy will; ever since the world began wisdom was the salve they used, that have won thy favour.¹

10 When man was but newly made, the lonely father of this created world, she it was that watched over him, and set him free from wrong-doing of his own,² and gave him the mastery over all things else. Against her Cain rebelled,³ when he did foul wrong, and by murderous spite against his brother compassed his own ruin. Who but she, when the world was a-drowning for Cain's fault,⁴ gave it a second term of life, steering, on a paltry raft, one innocent man to safety? And when the nations went their several ways,⁵ banded in a single conspiracy of wickedness, of one man's innocence she still took note; Abraham must be kept irreproachable in God's service, and steeled against pity for his own child. Here was another innocent man, Lot, that owed his preservation to Wisdom, when godless folk were perishing all around him. Escape he should, when fire came down upon the Cities of the Plain; those five cities whose shame is yet unforgettably, while smoke issues from the barren soil, and never tree bears seasonable fruit, and the pillar of salt stands monument to an unbelieving soul. Fatal neglect of Wisdom's guidance, that could blind their eyes to the claims of honour, and leave the world such a memorial of their folly, as should make the record of their sins unmistakable!

But those who cherish her, Wisdom brings safely out of all their striving. When Jacob, her faithful servant, was in flight from his brother's anger, she guided him straight to his goal, and on the way shewed him the heavenly kingdom, gave him knowledge of holy things. She enriched him by his toil, and gave all his labours a happy issue. Knavery went about to get the better of him, but she stood by him and prospered him; kept him safe from his enemies, protected him from their scheming. She would have him wrestle manfully, and prove that there is no strength like the strength of wisdom. When Joseph, in his innocence, was sold for a slave, Wisdom did not desert him, did not leave him among the guilty, but went down with him into his dungeon. Fast he was bound, but she had not finished with him till she gave him dominion over a whole kingdom, and power to do what he would with his persecutors. So she brought home the lie to those who had traduced him, and won him everlasting fame.

So, too, with that innocent people of Israel, that unoffending race; did she not deliver them from the nations that kept them under? Did she not enter into the heart of God's servant, confronting dread rulers with portent and with miracle? Did she not restore to men ill-used the just reward of their labours? She, too, led them out on their miraculous journey, affording them shelter by day and starry radiance at night. She made a passage for them through the Red Sea, brought them safely through those leagues of water, and churned up the bodies of their drowned enemy from those unfathomed depths. So, enriched by the spoils of the goddess, they extolled, O Lord, thy holy name, proclaimed with one voice thy sovereign power; Wisdom opened the dumb mouths, and made the lips of infants¹ vocal with praise.

¹ This verse is represented in the Greek text by four words, meaning 'And were saved (or, healed) by wisdom'. ² It is not clear whether the final words of this verse refer to Adam's original innocence, or to his deliverance from the death-penalty after he had sinned. ³ This chapter, in the original, mentions no proper names; a few of them have here been supplied, in accordance with modern usage.

⁴ 'For Cain's fault' is an expression difficult to account for, except on the view that the 'sons of God' mentioned in Gen. 6. 2, are the descendants of Seth, the 'children of men' those of Cain. ⁵ The Latin here obscures the sense of the original, by describing the nations as 'coming together'. According to the Greek text, they 'were confounded', almost certainly a reference to Gen. 11. 7, where the same verb is used. Mankind, for its sin, was split up into a multitude of nations, but Wisdom saw to it that one of these, with Abraham as its founder, should be different from the rest.

11 With Moses set apart for his spokesman,² to what good issue he brought all their enterprises! Through desert solitudes they journeyed on, pitching their camp far from the haunts of men; boldly they confronted their enemy, and overcame his malice. When they were thirsty, on thy name they called, and out of the rock's sheer face water was given to heal their thirst, out of the hard flint. Strange likeness between the punishment that befell their enemies,³ who went thirsty while Israel had drink to their heart's content, and the relief of their want Israel now experienced! Thou who once, into defiling blood, hadst troubled the sources of a living stream, to avenge a murderous edict against new-born children, didst now give thy people abundant water to drink, by means unlooked for. How ill it had gone with their adversaries in Egypt, that thirst of theirs in the desert plainly shewed them; in mercy schooled, yet sorely tried, they learned to know what torments the wicked had undergone, forfeit to thy vengeance. For Israel, only a test of their faith; only a father's correction; for Egypt, as from a king, stern scrutiny and stern doom. Tidings from far away, that racked the Egyptians no less than their own former sufferings; anguish redoubled, as they groaned over the memory of things past! That the same plague of thirst which had tortured themselves should be the source of Israel's rejoicing! Then indeed they felt the Lord's power, then indeed they wondered at the revenge time had brought; wondered at Moses, whom their insolence had long ago disinherited, when they exposed him with the other children. Thirst, that had been Egypt's enemy, had no terrors for the just.

So lost to piety were these Egyptians, such foolish reasonings led them astray, that they worshipped brute⁴ reptiles, and despicable vermin. And swarms of brute beasts thou didst send to execute thy vengeance, for the more proof that a man's own sins are the instrument of his punishment. Thy power knows no restraint, the power that created an ordered world out of dark chaos. It had been easy to send a plague of bears upon them, or noble lions; or to form new creatures, of a ferocity hitherto unknown, breathing fiery breath, churning out foul fumes, terrible sparks darting from their eyes, so that men would die of fear at their very aspect, without waiting for proof of their power to do harm. Nay, without more ado thou mightest have overthrown them with a single blast; all at once their sins should have found them out, thy fierce breath whirled them away; but no, all thou doest is done in exact measure, all is nicely calculated and weighed.

No moment passes but thou, if thou wilt, canst shew thyself supreme; that arm has power there is no withstanding; the whole world, matched against thee, is but a scruple on the balance, is but a drop of dew, falling to earth at sunrise. Only thou art all-merciful, as befits the Almighty, and dost overlook our human slips, in hope of our repentance. All things thou lovest, nor holdest any of thy creatures in abhorrence; hate and create thou couldst not, nor does aught abide save at thy will, whose summoning word holds them in being. They are thine, and thou sparest them; all things that live thou lovest, thou, the Master of them all.

¹ Unless the word 'infants' is to be understood metaphorically (of the Jews, as a people newly born by their ransoming from Egypt), this verse seems to preserve a tradition not found in Ex. 15. 1, that even little children took part in the song of Moses.

² The word 'Moses', here and in verse 14, like the names of Egyptian and Israelite, has been inserted for the sake of clearness.

³ vv. 5-14: The thought of this whole passage is obscurely expressed in the original, and it is still further obscured by the Latin translation in verses 8 and 13, where the Greek has to be used as a guide, if we are to obtain any tolerable sense.

⁴ It seems likely that the author meant rather, 'inconsiderable'; cf. verse 17. The Egyptians, who were credited with worshipping beetles, were punished by plagues of insects.

12 Thy kindly influence, Lord, thy gracious influence is all about us.
 2 Tender, at the first false step, is thy rebuke; thou dost remind and warn us that we have gone astray, to make us leave our sinning and have faith in thee. So it was with the former inhabitants of this thy holy land.
 4 Good reason thou hadst to be their enemy; of what detestable practices were they not guilty, with those sorceries and unhallowed rites of theirs! Murderers that would not spare their own children, that feasted on human flesh, human entrails and blood, they must have no share in thy covenant. Thy will was that our fathers should root them out, these unnatural murderers of their own defenceless children;¹ and this land, dear to thee as no other, should be more worthily peopled by the sons of God. Yet they, too, were men, and thou wouldst deal gently with them; thou wouldst send hornets as the vanguard of thy invading host, to wear them down gradually.² Not that it was beyond thy power to give piety the mastery over godlessness by victory in battle, by some plague of ravening monsters, or by one word of doom. But no, their sentence should be executed by degrees, giving them opportunity to repent; though indeed thou knewest well that theirs was a worthless breed, of a malice so ingrained, that they would turn aside from their ill devices never;
 11 from its beginnings, an accursed race.

Nor, if thou wast patient with the sinner, was it human respect that persuaded thee to it. Thy acts who shall question, thy doom who shall gainsay? Will some champion arise to challenge thee on behalf of these rebels, tax thee with unmaking the peoples thou hast made? God there is none save thou, that hast a whole world for thy province; and shall thy justice abide our question? Punish thou mayst as punish thou wilt; king nor emperor can be bold to outface thee. So high beyond our censure, and therewithal so just in thy dealings! To condemn the innocent were unworthy of such majesty as thine; of all justice, thy power is the true source, universal lordship the ground of universal love! Only when thy omnipotence is doubted wilt thou assert thy mastery, their rashness making manifest, who will not acknowledge thee;³ elsewhere, with such power at thy disposal, a lenient judge thou provest thyself, riding us with a light rein, and keeping thy terrors in reserve.

Two lessons thy people were to learn from these dealings of thine; ever should justice and mercy go hand in hand, never should thy own children despair of forestalling thy justice by repentance. What, so patient, so unhurrying, in thy vengeance on the doomed enemies of thy chosen race; always delay, always the opportunity given them to repent of their misdeeds; and wouldst thou shew less anxious care in trying the cause of thy own children, bound to thee from of old by a sworn covenant so rich in mercies? It is for our instruction, then, that thou usest such exquisite care in the punishing of our enemies;⁴ judge we, let us imitate thy clemency, abide we judgement, let us ever hope for pardon.

And so it was that thou didst plague the Egyptians,⁵ that were knaves and fools both; their own false gods should be the undoing of them. This was the worst error of all their erring, that they worshipped the meanest of beasts as gods; silly children had been no more credulous. Why then, these silly children should have play-time penalties first; of those play-time penalties if they took no heed, then at last they should feel how a God can punish. Humiliated they well might be at those sufferings of theirs, the very gods they worshipped the instruments of their distress; a sight enough to convince them that he was the true God, whom all this while they had rejected! But no, they must needs bring upon themselves the full rigours of justice.

¹ vv. 5, 6: The Greek text is here clearly wrong, and cannot be restored with certainty. In the Latin, 'they must have no share in thy covenant' is literally 'away from the midst of thy sacrament', and the word 'murderers', through an error, has been translated 'authors'. ² See Ex. 23. 28. ³ The Greek text, probably by an error, gives 'who acknowledge thee'. ⁴ The first half of this verse is ordinarily rendered, 'In chastening us, thou dost scourge our enemies ten thousandfold'; but it will be seen that such considerations are out of harmony with the rest of the sentence. ⁵ The word 'Egyptians' does not occur in the original, but the reference of this passage is almost certainly to them; cf. 11. 15 above. For 'didst plague' the Latin version has, 'didst inflict the utmost torments upon', but this misses the sense. The plagues of lice, flies, locusts, etc., are here contrasted, as being comparatively light, with the last two plagues, to be mentioned in chs. 17 and 18.

13 What folly it argues in man's nature, this ignorance of God! So much good seen, and he, who is existent Good,¹ not known! Should they not learn to recognise the Artificer by the contemplation of his works? Instead, they have pointed us to fire, or wind, or to the nimble air, wheeling stars, or tempestuous waves, or sun and moon, and made gods of them, to rule the world! Perhaps the beauty of such things bewitched them into mistaking it for divinity? Ay, but what of him who is Master of them all; what excellence must be his, the Author of all beauty, that could make them! Or was it power, and power's exercise, that awoke their wonderment? Why then, how many times greater must he be, who contrived it! Such great beauty² even creatures have, reason is well able to contemplate the Source from which these perfections came.

Yet, if we find fault with men like these, their fault is little by comparison; err they may, but their desire is to find God, and it is in that search they err. They stop short in their enquiry at the contemplation of his creatures, trusting only in the senses, that find such beauty there. Excuse them, then, we may not; if their thoughts could reach far enough to form a judgement about the world around them, how is it they found, on the way, no trace of him who is Master of it? But there are men more wretched yet, men who repose all their confidence in a world of shadows. They give the name of god to what is made by human art, gold and silver that human workmanship has turned into the likeness of living things, blocks of senseless stone that human hands have carved, long ago.

What would you? Here is a craftsman in wood has been to the forest and sawed off a fine straight branch; deftly he strips off the bark, and fashions, with patient skill, some piece of carpentry apt for man's needs. As for the chips in his workshop, they cook his meal for him, to eat and take his fill. But one more piece of refuse wood is left, that is fit for nothing; so crooked is it and so gnarled. See him, in an idle moment, pick it up and spend his leisure carving it! A master craftsman this; ere long it has taken shape, made into a man's likeness; or it may be he gives it the form of a senseless beast. And now he paints it with ochre; ruddled it must be till all its native colour is lost, all its faults hidden away. That done, he must find a suitable room to house it, and there lets it into the wall, making it fast with iron clamps. No pains does he spare to keep it from falling; fall if it does, it shall find no remedy; please you, this is but an image, and cannot shift for itself!

And so, unashamed, for home and children and wife he utters his prayer, addressing himself all the while to a senseless thing. A weak, foolish thing, and for health he asks it; dead, and he will have life of it; shiftless, and he will have aid of it. How should it set forward his journeyings, that cannot walk? What service should it do, if trade he want, or skill, or good fortune, that is every way unserviceable?

14 Nay, here is one that will go a-voyaging, the wild waves for his pathway, and perishable wood to carry him, yet he makes his prayer to a piece of wood more perishable yet! As for the ship's timbers, it was man's covetousness that made the need for them, and man's skill that fashioned them; but it is thy fatherly Providence that brings her safe to port; thou hast made the sea into a high road men may travel by without harm, as if thou wouldst prove to us how strong is thy protection, though the sailor have little skill. So careful art thou that the gifts thy wisdom affords us should not go unused; man ventures his life on a few planks, and the frail barque gives him safe conduct across the waves. And what marvel? At the beginning of all, when the giants perished in their pride, was not such a barque the refuge of all the world's hopes? Yet thy hand was at the helm, and the seed of life was saved for posterity. A blessing on the wood that can so procure salvation! But yonder idol is accursed, no less than the man who made it; he for his wicked design, and the lifeless thing for the legend of divinity that was attached to it. Sinner and sin, God hates both; pardon is none for deed or doer. Thus it is that a time of reckoning will come for these idols the Gentiles make; part of God's creation though they be, he detests them, so have

¹ Or perhaps simply, 'who is'.

² Some manuscripts of the Greek read, 'such greatness and beauty'.

they entangled men's souls, and laid a trap for fools.

12 When idols were first devised, then began unfaithfulness; there was death in the invention of them. For indeed they were no part of man's life from the first, nor shall be at the last; it was but man's folly brought them into the world, and there shall be a short way with them yet.

13 Here was some father, bowed with sorrow before his time, his child untimely lost; the likeness of those features once made, to mortal man (that was dead besides) he would pay divine honours, and with that, rites of initiation must become the tradition of his clan. As time went on, impious habit grew into impious custom. A king would have his own likeness adored, and his subjects, living far away, so that they could not do obeisance to him in person, would have his present image set up in their view, eager to pay his absent royalty their adulation. And if any spur were needed yet for their ignorant superstition, the rivalry of craftsmen afforded it; each of these sought to please his master by improving the portrait, with the utmost abuse of his skill, till at last the vulgar, carried away by so much grace of art, would account him a god whom yesterday they revered as mortal man. So, un-awares, the world was caught in the ambush; under the stress, now of bereavement, now of royal policy, men imparted to stocks and stones the incommunicable name of God.

22 Nor were they content with these false notions of God's nature; living in a world besieged by doubt, they misnamed its innumerable disorders a state of peace. Peace, amidst their rites of child-murder, their dark mysteries, their vigils consecrated to frenzy! Peace, while there is no respect for life, or for wedlock undefiled; always the murderous ambush, the jealous pangs of a husband betrayed! All is a welter of bloodshed and murder, theft and fraud, corruption and disloyalty, sedition and perjury; honest men are assailed, kindnesses forgotten, souls defiled, breeds confused, marriages unsettled; adultery reigns and wantonness. Name we all these, name we never the idols whose worship is the cause, the beginning and end, of all these! Their ecstasies are but raving, their prophecies are but lies; ill live their worshippers, and lightly forswear themselves. And no marvel; what hurt should they take from the oath falsely sworn, since all their faith is in dead gods? But indeed they shall pay both scores, idolaters that thought so ill of God, and perjurers that by their treason slighted all honour; not the power he swore by, but the justice that keeps watch over sinners, walks ever close on the heels of ill-doing.

Growth of Idolatry; its fatal Effects

15 For us, thou art God; thou, beneficent and truthful, thou, always patient and merciful towards the world thou governest. Sin we, still we are thy worshippers; have we not proof of thy power? Sin we not, of this, too, we have proof, that thou wilt count us for thy own. To know thee as thou art, is the soul's full health; to have proof of thy power, is the root whence springs immortality. Not for us to be led astray by foolish tales of man's imagining, by the sculptor's barren art, as he picks out some image with motley colours, to set fools gaping at the sight of a lifeless shadow, all seeming and no breathing. Lovers they are of their own ruin, worthy of the fond hopes they cherish, that make such things, or sigh after them, or do them reverence.

Despise we not the potter's toil, that works the pliant earth between his fingers, and makes a cup here, a dish there for our use. Serve they noble ends or base, all alike come from the same clay, and what employment each of them shall find, it is the potter's right to determine. But very ill is that toil bestowed, when he uses the same clay to fashion some god that is no god. Bethink thee, potter, that it is but a little while since thou thyself wast fashioned out of the same earth, and ere long, when the lease of thy soul falls due, to that earth thou shalt return. But no, he never looks forward to the day when he will be past work; how short life is, he reckons not; he must vie with goldsmith and silversmith, he must be even with his neighbour that works in bronze; in puppet-making! all his hope lies of winning fame. O heart of dust, O ambition worthless as the sand, life than his own clay more despicable! No thought for the God that was his own fashioner, quickened him with the pulse of energy, breathed into him a living spirit!

¹ Rather, according to the Greek text, 'in passing false coin'. The imputation seems to be that such workmen covered over their clay figures with metal leaf; even as images, they were false; how much more as gods!

 Existence, for him, only a toy to be played with; our life here, only a market-place, where a man must needs get his living by fair means or foul! Such a man, as no other, sins with his eyes open; from the same earthenware he will make you fragile pot or carved effigy as you will.

Fools all, and doomed to misery beyond the common doom of tyrants,¹ were the enemies that from time to time have lorded it over thy people. Gods, for them, were all the idols of the heathen, with their sightless eyes, their nostrils that never drew breath, deaf ears, unfeeling hands, and feet that still would walk, yet still tarry; gods man-made, gods of his fashioning that is a debtor for the very breath he draws. For indeed, the gods man fashions are less than himself; vain his impiety, since he is but mortal, they already dead;
 better he than they, since he lived once, and they never. And what beasts are these they worship? Of all beasts, the most hateful; such models they have foolishly chosen as cannot vie with the others;² as have no beauty, even beast-fashion, to make them desirable; the least honourable of God's creatures and the least blessed.

16 Fittingly, then, were the Egyptians plagued by such beasts as these, that swarmed to their undoing.³ Thy own people no plague befell; pined their queasy stomach for dainties, thou wouldst feed them on quails. Though hunger drove them to food, the men of Egypt turned away with loathing from the necessities they craved, so foul the sight of the frogs that came to punish them. Thy own people should go wanting for a little, only so as to prepare them for the dainties that would follow. Their oppressors must feel the pinch of poverty; for themselves, the sight of another's chastisement should be lesson enough. When they themselves encountered brute malice, and the bites of writhing serpents threatened them with destruction, thy vengeance did not go to all lengths; enough that they should be warned by a brief experience of distress;

 they should be put in mind of thy law, yet have the assurance that thou wouldst come to their rescue. For indeed, he who turned to look did not win safety from the brazen serpent which met his eyes, but from thee, who alone canst save.

No better proof could our enemies have,
 that from all peril thou alone deliverest.
 Bite of locust or sting of fly was the undoing of them; no salve could be found against the mortal punishment they had deserved. And here were these sons of thine, unvanquished even by the teeth of venomous serpents, because thy mercy came out to meet them and gave relief.
 They must feel the prick, to remind them of the commandments they had from thee, and then quickly be rescued before they sank into deep lethargy, beyond the reach of thy succour. Herb nor plaster it was that cured them, but thy word, Lord, that all healing gives. Lord of life as of death, thou canst bring us down to the grave and back from the grave; thine is not the fatal stroke man deals in spite, that banishes life beyond recall, imprisons the soul for ever.

Truly, thine is a power there is no escaping; the uplifted arm that plagued impious Egypt, where thou wast treated as a stranger. Strange, indeed, to that country were the rains that hunted them down, the fierce hail-storms; the fire, too, that wasted them. Wonder beyond all wont, that in water, the all-quenching, fire should rage its fiercest; no element but must rally in the cause of right. Here the flame would burn low, to spare those creatures a scorching, that were thy emissaries against the goddess; doubt there should be none, for any who saw it, but divine justice was at his heels. Here, in the very midst of the water it would burn as never fire burned yet, to blast all the fruits of that accursed land. And thy own people, Lord? Them thou didst foster with the food of angels;
 bread from heaven thou didst set before them, which no labour of theirs had made

¹ According to the Greek text (itself probably corrupt), 'of infants'.

² This is probably the sense of the Greek; the Latin version here can hardly be translated.

³ The names 'Egypt' and 'Egyptians' have, as before, been inserted to make the sense of the original plainer. The same is to be said of the following words: 'frogs' in verse 3, 'brazen serpent' in verse 7, and 'manna' in verse 27.

ready, every taste uniting that could bring content, of every appetite the welcome 21 choice. So would thy own nature manifest a father's universal love; this food should humour the eater's whim, turning itself 22 into that which he craved most. In Egypt, snow and ice had resisted the fire, never melting; plain it was that this fire, which shone out amid the hailstones and the rain, was in alliance with them to burn up and 23 destroy the enemy's harvest. Now, once again, fire forgot its own nature, this time, to give faithful souls their nourishment!¹ 24 So well does thy creation obey thee, its author, now exerting all its powers to punish the wicked, now abating its force to do thy loyal followers a service!

25 Why should nature, seconding that universal bounty of thine, go to all shifts 26 to meet the needs of thy suppliants, but for the instruction of thy own children, Lord, children so well beloved? They were to learn that man lives, not by the ripening of crops, but by thy word, ever protecting 27 the souls that trust in thee. This manna, that never shrank from the fire while it was a-cooking, would melt before the heat of the sun's first feeble ray. What meant this, 28 but that we must be up before the sun to give thee thanks, seeking thy audience with day's earliest light? Thankless if a 29 man be, like the hoar frost of winter his hopes shall dissolve; like water that goes to waste they shall vanish.

17 High above us, Lord, are thy judgements, mysterious thy dealings; no skill had those Egyptian hearts to 2 understand them. They had thought to exercise barbarous tyranny over a nation consecrated to thee. And now they lay, shut close under their own roofs, darkness their dungeon, their sentence a long-drawn 3 night, exiled from the gifts of thy eternal Providence. Did they hope, under that dark veil of oblivion, to find a cloak for secret sinning? Nay, they were scattered far apart, and in grievous dread of the terrors that came to daunt them. Lie snug in their hidden lairs they might not; noises swept down, echoing about their affrighted ears, and boding visions of sad faces cowed their spirits. Fire itself no light could give them, nor star's clear beam illuminate that hideous night; only now and again a blaze shone out, not of their kindling, terrible to behold; and fear of this unseen radiance lent fresh horror to the sights it shewed.²

A mockery, now, seemed those magic arts of theirs; ignominious the rebuff to their boasted cunning. The very men who had professed to rid ailing minds of all discomposure and disquiet, were now themselves sick with apprehension, to their great discomfiture. Even when no alarms were present to disturb them, the memory of prowling beast and hissing serpent filled them with mortal tremors, till they shut their eyes against the sight of empty air, we must all breathe.³ So cowardly a thing is wickedness, it pronounces its own condemnation; hard pressed by conscience, it forecasts ever the worst. What else is timorousness, but a betrayal of the vantage-ground reason gives us? Imagination, already defeated within its own stronghold, fears the unknown more than it fears the true source of its misery. Whether the darkness that held them bound were true night, or that darkness which comes up from the lowest depths of the grave, their bemused senses could not well distinguish;⁴ now monstrous apparitions came indeed to scare them, now it was but their own faint hearts made cowards of them; in a moment dismay was all about them, and took them un-awares.

Into this prison, then, that needed no bars to secure it, all fell alike, whatever their condition; tiller of the fields, or shepherd, or workman that plied his task out in the desert, each was caught at his post, each must abide the inevitable lot, by

¹ vv. 22, 23: The meaning here is not very clearly expressed; it is, that fire twice failed to produce its natural effect, once when it did not melt the hailstones which fell in Egypt, and again when it did not melt the manna in the cooking-pots of the Israelites (see vs. 27 below, and Ex. 16. 21).

² The original is here very obscure; it runs, literally, 'Only a self-lighted beacon shone upon them at intervals, full of terror, and being afraid of that vision which escaped their observation, they thought the things seen worse'.

³ 'We must all breathe'; literally, according to the Latin version, 'which cannot possibly be avoided'; but the sense of the Greek is probably 'which there is no reason to dread'.

⁴ vs. 11-14: There is much obscurity here, and perhaps some corruption in the text. Of vs. 13, only conjectural interpretation is possible; it runs, literally, 'sleeping the same sleep the really impossible night and (the night) coming upon them from the depths of an impossible lower world'.

darkness, like all his fellows, held in thrall. Did the wind whistle, or bird utter tuneful notes deep amid the boughs; were it the dull roar of some waterfall, or the sudden crash of tumbling rocks, or the padding feet of beasts that gambolled past them unseen, or the howl of wild things ravening, or a booming echo from the mountain hollows, it was all one; it would startle them into a great quaking of fear. All around them the world was bathed in the clear sunlight, and men went about their tasks unhindered; over them alone this heavy curtain of night was spread, image of the darkness that should be their next abode. Yet each man had a burden heavier to bear than darkness itself, the burden of his own companionship.

18 Brightest of all, that light shone on thy chosen people. These neighbours of theirs, heard but not seen, the Egyptians must congratulate on their escape from the common doom, thank them for letting vengeance be, and ask forgiveness for past ill-will.¹ To these thou gavest, not darkness, but a pillar of burning fire, to be the guide of their unfamiliar journey, a sun, all gracious welcome, that brought no harm.²

A fitting punishment it was for the Egyptians, this loss of light; fitting that they should be imprisoned in darkness, who had kept thy own sons in prison; thy own sons, through whom that law, which is light unfailing, was to be given to the world. It was their purpose, besides, to slay all the children born of that holy stock; but one child survived exposure and lived to rebuke them; through him thou didst destroy Egypt's own children in their thousands, and drown its assembled host in the rushing waves. Of what should befall that night, our fathers had good warning; confidence in thy sworn protection should keep them unafraid. A welcome gift it was to thy people, rescue for the just, and doom for their persecutors; at one stroke thou didst punish our enemies, and make us proud men by singling us out for thyself.

In secret they offered their sacrifice, children of a nobler race, all set apart; with one accord they ratified the divine covenant, which bound them to share the same blessings and the same perils; singing for prelude their ancestral hymns of praise. But music was none in the enemy's cry that answered them; here all was dirge for children untimely mourned. Slave and master, prince and peasant, a common doom met them, and a common loss; death levelled all under one title; unnumbered everywhere the slain, nor might the living suffice to bury them; all in one moment, the flower of their race had perished. Against those earlier plagues, sorcery had hardened their hearts; Israel they recognized for God's children only when the first-born died.

There was a hush of silence all around, and night had but finished half her swift journey, when from thy heavenly throne, Lord, down leaped thy word omnipotent. Never lighted sterner warrior on a doomed land; never was sword so sharp, errand so unmistakable; thy word that could spread death everywhere, that trod earth, yet reached up to heaven. All at once came terror in their dreams; phantoms dismayed, and sudden alarms overtook them; and when they lay a-dying, each fallen where fall he must, they confessed what fault it was they expiated; all was foretold by the dreams that so disquieted them; they were not suffered to perish ignorant of their offence.

There was a time, too, when God's own people tasted the bitterness of death; out there in the desert a plague fell upon the common folk; but not for long this vengeance lasted. A peerless champion they found, in Aaron, that quickly took up the shield of his appointed ministry; the power of intercession that was his, and the atoning incense, held thy wrath in check, and brought the calamity to an end; none could doubt now he was the man of thy

¹ vs. 1, 2: The Greek text (which is rendered above) has here been misunderstood by the Latin translator, and the version he gives altogether misrepresents the sense of the passage; it runs: 'Brightest of all the light shone on thy chosen people. They heard the voice of these, but did not see their form. And they glorified thee for their escape from the common doom, thanking thee that they were not now, as they had been formerly, the sufferers; and they made a request of thee, that thou wouldst distinguish' (between themselves and the Egyptians). The words 'Egypt', 'Egyptians', 'Israel', and 'Aaron', though not in the original, have been supplied in this chapter as before.

² The Greek text probably means, 'which should preserve them from harm during their ambitious travels'.

22 choice! Not by strength of body, not by prowess in arms, he won the victory;¹ by persuasion he disarmed resistance, calling to mind the sworn covenant of our race.
 23 Already the corpses were piled thick one on another; but he kept vengeance at bay, standing in between to breach the path 24 between dead and living. Such blazonings he bore; what meant that long robe of his but the whole world's orbit, the four rows of gems but the great deeds of our first fathers, the mitre on his head but thy own 25 greatness? In awe of these shrank the destroying angel away; for thy own people, some taste of thy vengeance should be enough.

19 It was not so with their impious enemies; with them, God decreed that pitiless justice should run its course, knowing well what ill-doing of theirs lay 2 yet in store; how the very men who had allowed the Israelites to depart, nay, set them eagerly on their way, would soon 3 repent of it and march out in pursuit.² The business of mourning still in hand, the grave-sides of the dead still calling for their tears, they must needs betake themselves to a fresh desperate shift; they would hunt down as fugitives the unwel-4 come guests of yesterday. Fitting destiny, that lured them to a fitting doom, made them forget the past, and led them on to complete their tale of suffering and of 5 punishment! For thy people, a strange sea-faring; for those others, an unexamplified manner of death!
 6 Each form of nature, in its own proper sphere, was formed anew as from the beginning, obedient to the new laws thou hadst given it, for the greater safety of 7 thy children. Such was the cloud that over-shadowed their camp; such the dry land that appeared where water stood before; the Red Sea unlaboriously crossed,
 a grassy floor spread out amid the surging 8 billows! So, sheltered by thy hand, they passed on their way, a whole nation of them, strange marvels seen in their passage; lighthearted as horse at pasture or frisking lamb, they chanted praises to thee, Lord, their rescuer. Such, too, were their memories of Egypt itself; memories of the land that bred lice and could breed no beasts else, the river that could spawn frogs, yet never a fish lived there. Later on, they were to see how birds could be the subject of a new creation, when their appetites craved for richer fare, and quails came up from the sea to content them.

Nor were the Egyptians punished without warning; the thunders that terrified them were but echoes of the past. Did not their own wickedness deserve the pains they suffered, a race even more inhospitable than the men of Sodom before them?
 These did but refuse a welcome when strangers came to their doors; the Egyptians condemned their own guests, their own benefactors, to slavery. It is one thing to be called to account for unfriendly treatment of alien folk; but these Egyptians had received the Israelites into their midst with rejoicing, had admitted them to rights of citizenship, and then turned on them with savage ill-treatment. No wonder blindness fell on them, as upon the men of Sodom at Lot's door! But in Egypt the darkness was so bewildering that a man could not find his way through the doors of his own house.

All the elements may be transposed among themselves, keeping up the same answering rhythm, like the notes of a harp altering their mood; so much we may infer with certainty from the sights that have been witnessed in the past.³ Land-beasts turned to water-beasts, and the firm ground was trodden by creatures born to swim. Fire surpassed its own nature, when water forgot to quench it; then fire,
 in its turn, could not waste the frail flesh of living creatures that traversed it, nor melt that heavenly food that melted easily as ice. No means wouldst thou neglect, Lord, to magnify thy people and win them renown; never wouldst thou leave them unregarded, but always and everywhere camest to their side.⁴

¹ That is, according to the Latin version, 'he overcame the multitude', but some manuscripts of the Greek text give, 'he overcame the (divine) anger'. ² The word 'Israelites', like the other proper names used in this chapter, has been supplied so as to make the original text less obscure. ³ The meaning of this passage is highly doubtful, and it is possible that the text has been badly transmitted. But the notion seems to be that the history of miracle shows a kind of reciprocity between the elements, earth yielding to water and then water to land, ice to fire and then fire to ice. ⁴ op. cit. 18-20: It is not certain, from the context, whether these verses refer entirely to the period of the Exodus.

THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTICUS

PREFACE

MANY are the important truths conveyed to us by the law, by the prophets and by those other writers who have followed them. Israel must be given credit for its own philosophical tradition, suited not only to instruct those who talk its language, but to reach, in spoken or written form, the outside world too, and bring it great enlightenment. No wonder if my own grandfather, Jesus, who had devoted himself to the careful study of the law, the prophets, and our other ancestral records, had a mind to put something in writing himself that should bear on this philosophical tradition, to claim the attention of eager students who had already mastered it, and to encourage their observance of the law.

I must beg its readers to come well-disposed to their task, and to follow me closely, making allowances for me wherever I seem to have failed in the right marshalling of words, as I pass on wisdom at second hand. Hebrew words lose their force when they are translated into another language; moreover, when the Hebrews read out the law, the prophets, and the other books among themselves, they read them out in a greatly different form.

It was in my thirty-eighth year,¹ in the reign of Euergetes, that I went to Egypt and spent some time there. When I found writings preserved there which were of high doctrinal value, it seemed to me right and fitting that I, too, should be at some pains; I would set about translating this book. Learning I gave to the task and long labour, and so brought it to an end; and so I offer the book to all who are ready to apply their minds to it, and learn how a man must frame his conduct if he would live by the divine law.

1 All wisdom has one source; it dwelt with the Lord God before ever time began. Sand thou mayst count, or the rain-drops, or the days of the world's abiding; heaven-height thou mayst measure, or the wide earth, or the depth of the world beneath, ere God's wisdom thou canst trace to her origin, that was before all. First she is of all created things; time never was when the riddle of thought went unread. (What is wisdom's fount? God's word above. What is her course? His eternal commandments.²) Buried her roots beyond all search, wise her counsels beyond all knowing; too high her teaching to be plainly revealed, too manifold her movements to be understood. There is but one God, high creator of all things; sitting on his throne to govern us, a great king, worthy of all dread; he it was that created her, through his holy Spirit. His eye took in the whole range of her being; and he has poured her out upon all his creation, upon all living things, upon all the souls that love him, in the measure of his gift to each.

To fear the Lord is man's pride and boast, is joy, is a prize proudly worn; comfort it brings to the heart, happiness and content and a long life bestows; well it is, at his last hour, for the man who fears the Lord; his day of death shall be a day of blessing. Love of God is wisdom worth the having; welcome the sight when it shews itself, when it gives proof of its wondrous power. Wouldst thou be wise, the first step is fear of the Lord; to his chosen servants, a gift connatural from the womb; it goes with holy motherhood, and where his true worshippers are, shews

¹ In the original, 'the thirty-eighth year'; probably the author refers to 132 B.C., the thirty-eighth regnal year of Ptolemy Euergetes II. If the year meant is that of his own age, he may equally well have lived under Ptolemy Euergetes I (247-222 B.C.). ² The words printed in brackets are not found in the Greek. There are many other differences of detail between the Greek and the Latin, too numerous to be mentioned in these notes. The Hebrew original (which has been preserved to us only in small part) must have been current in several different forms at the time when our versions were made; and it seems probable that the Latin has sometimes included two alternatives side by side (cf. verses 26 and 31, 32 of this chapter).

17 manifest. The fear of the Lord lends wis-18 dom that piety which is hers; such piety as shall keep the heart safe and make it ac-19 ceptable, bring it joy and content. Well it shall be indeed for the man who fears the Lord; at his last end he shall win blessing.
 20 The fear of the Lord is wisdom's fulfilment, yields the deep draught that satis-21 fies; never a nook or cranny in thy house but shall be filled with the store of its 22 harvesting. The fear of the Lord is wisdom's crown; with this, peace and health 23 are thine to enjoy; this fear itself is God's gift, no less than the wisdom which is 24 counted out under his eye. Wisdom it is that imparts to us all our knowledge, all our powers of discernment; hold her fast, and she will set thee on a pinnacle of 25 renown; root of her is fear of the Lord, and long life the fruit of her.

26 True insight wisdom has in her treasure-house, and the piety that comes of knowledge; no wonder if sinners hate the name 27 of her. The fear of the Lord drives out sin; soul that feels no fear shall find no 29 pardon, its own wild mood overbalances
 it. Patience bides her time, and with time, 30 content comes back to her; praise shall be upon every lip for the wise thought that 31 checked, for a while, her utterance. Hidden in wisdom's treasure-house is the secret of 32 all discernment; and still sinners hate the name of piety. My son, if on wisdom thy 33 heart is set, keep the commandments, and God will grant thy wish; fear of the Lord 34 is true wisdom, true learning, and his will is to see thee loyal and patient; thou shalt 35 have no empty coffers then.

36 Let not thy fear of the Lord be overcast with doubt; never come to him with a heart that hesitates.

37 Do not play false in thy dealings with men, nor suffer thy own words to ensnare 38 thee. Watch those words well, or they may trip thee up; thou wilt have compassed thy 39 own disgrace, if God should reveal thy secret thoughts at last; wouldst thou be 40 thrown down, in full sight of all thy neighbours assembled, a heart that came to meet the Lord grudgingly, full all the while of treachery and deceit?

2 My son, if thy mind is to enter the Lord's service, wait there in his presence, with honesty of purpose and with awe, and prepare thyself to be put to the test. Submissive be thy heart, and ready to bear all; to wise advice lend a ready ear, and be never hasty when ill times befall thee. Wait for God, cling to God and wait for him; at the end of it, thy life shall blossom anew. Accept all that comes to thee, patient in sorrow, humiliation long enduring; for gold and silver the crucible, it is in the furnace of humiliation men shew themselves worthy of his acceptance.

 Trust in him, and he will lift thee to thy feet again; go straight on thy way, and fix in him thy hope; hold fast thy fear of him, and in that fear to old age come thou.

All you that fear the Lord, wait patiently for his mercies; lose sight of him, and you shall fall by the way. Fear him? Ay, and trust him; you shall not miss your reward.
 Fear him? Ay, and fix your hope in him;
 his mercy you shall find, and have great joy of it. Fear him? Ay, and love him; your hearts shall be enlightened. My sons, look back on the ages that are past; was ever man yet that trusted in the Lord, and was disappointed? Held fast to his commandments, and was forsaken, prayed to him, and found the prayer unregarded? A gracious God and a merciful; in times of affliction, he assoils us of our guilt, watches over all that with true hearts turn to him.

Out upon the false heart, the cheating lips, the hands busy with ill-doing; upon the sinner that will go two ways at once to enter the land of his desire. Out upon the unresolved will, that trust in God has none, and from him shall have no succour. Out upon the men who have given up hope, forsaking the right path, and to false paths betaking them; what shift will they make when the Lord calls them to account? Fear the Lord, and doubt his promises? Love him, and not keep true to the way he shews us? Fear the Lord, and not study to know his will? Love him, and not find contentment in his law? Fear God, and not keep the will alert, the heart holy in his sight? Men who fear God keep his commandments, and wait patiently until he comes to relieve them. Be this our thought, they say, that it is God's power we have to reckon with, not man's, if there is no penance done. And he has mercy ever at his side, a God merciful as he is great.

3 Wherever choice souls are found, wisdom is the mother of them; all submissiveness and love their breed is. Speak we now of a father's rights; do you, sons, give good heed, and follow these counsels, if thrive you would. God will have children honour their fathers; a mother's rights are his own strict ordinance. A lover of God will fall to prayer over his sins and sin no more; so, all his life long, his prayer shall find audience. . . . riches he lays up for himself, that gives his mother her due.¹ As thou wouldst have joy of thy own children, as thou wouldst be heard when thou fastest to praying, honour thy father still. A father honoured is long life won; a father well obeyed is a mother's heart comforted. None that fears the Lord but honours the parents who gave him life, slave to master owes no greater service. Thy father honour, in deed and in word and in all manner of forbearance; so thou shalt have his blessing, a blessing that will endure to thy life's end. What is the but-tress of a man's house? A father's blessing. What tears up the foundations of it? A mother's curse. Never make a boast of thy father's ill name; what, should his discredit be thy renown? Nay, for a father's good repute or ill, a son must go proudly, or hang his head. My son, when thy father grows old, take him to thyself; long as he lives, never be thou the cause of his repining. Grow he feeble of wit, make allowance for him, nor in thy manhood's vigour despise him. The kindness shewn to thy father will not go forgotten; favour it shall bring thee in acquittal of thy mother's guilt.² Faithfully it shall be made good to thee, nor shalt thou be forgotten when the time of affliction comes; like ice in summer the record of thy sins shall melt away. Tarnished his name, that leaves his father forsaken; God's curse rest on him, that earns a mother's ill-will.

My son, do all thou dost in lowly fashion; love thou shalt win, that is worth more than men's praise. The greater thou art, the more in all things abase thyself; so thou shalt win favour with God. . . .³ Sovereignty belongs to God and no other; they honour him most that most keep humility. Seek not to know what is far above thee; search not beyond thy range; let thy mind ever dwell on the duty God has given thee to do, content to be ignorant of all his dealings besides. Need is none thy eyes should see what things lie hidden. Leave off, then, thy much questioning about such things as little concern thee, and be content with thy ignorance; more is granted to thy view than lies within human ken. By such fancies, many have been led astray, and their thoughts chained to folly.⁴

. . . Heart that is obstinate shall thrive ill at the last; danger loved is death won. Heart that will try two ways at once shall prosper little; he falls into the snare that goes a-straying. Heart that will not mend shall be weighed down by its own troubles; the sinner is ever ready for one sin more. For one sort of men there is no remedy, the proud; too deep a root the evil has taken, before they knew it. Heart that is wise will prove itself in wise company; ever greedy of wise talk is the ear that knows how to listen. Heart that is wise and discerning will keep clear of wrong, and by honest dealings prosper yet.

No fire burns so high but water may quench it; almsgiving was ever sin's atoning. God marks the grateful eye, and remembers it; here is sure support won against peril of falling.

4 My son, do not cheat a poor man of the alms he asks, nor pass him by, with averted look, in his need. Wouldst thou despise his hungry glance, and add to the burden of his distress? Wouldst thou disappoint him in his bitter need by bidding him wait for the gift? Nay, spurn thou never the plea of the afflicted; look thy suppliant in the face, and of his poverty take good heed; shall his baffled rage curse thee behind thy back? The curse of an embittered man does not go unheard; his Maker is listening.

¹ ov. 4, 5: The Latin version here inserts a sentence which seems out of place (perhaps belonging to the end of the foregoing chapter); it omits the words given in the Greek text: 'He who honours his father will atone for his own sins'.

² In the Greek text, the giver of alms atones not for his mother's sin, but for his own. Cf. however Ps. 50, 7.

³ Some manuscripts and versions add, at the end of this verse, 'Men's esteem and honour is to be had for the asking, but it is to the humble that hidden things are revealed'.

⁴ Some manuscripts and versions add, at the end of this verse, 'Want eyes, want light; boast not that thou hast knowledge, where knowledge is none'.

7 To the common sort of men give friendly welcome; before an elder abate thy pride;
and to a man of eminence bow meekly thy 8 head. If a poor man would speak to thee, lend him thy ear without grudging; give him his due, and let him have patient and 9 friendly answer. If he is wronged by oppression, redress thou needs must win him, nor be vexed by his importunity.
10 When thou sittest in judgement, be a father to the orphans, a husband to the 11 widow that bore them; so the most High an obedient son shall reckon thee, and shew thee more than a mother's kindness.

12 New life wisdom breathes into her children, befriends all that have recourse to her, and guides them in the right way.
13 Love her, as thou lovest life; wait early at her doors, if thou wouldst win her sweet 14 embrace. Life the prize, if thou hold her fast; come she in at the door, God's bless-15 ing comes with her; court paid to her, worship paid to the Holy One; love given to her, God's love made thine in return for 16 it! A word from her, and the world is at thy feet, a sight of her face, and thou shalt 17 dwell ever secure; trust her, and she will be thy inheritance, settled on the heirs of 18 thy body. When first she chooses a man out, she does but make trial of his com-19 pany; she puts him to the proof, threatening him with her frown, teasing him with her difficult lore, until at last she has proved whether his thoughts are hers, and 20 can trust him perfectly. Then she gives him confidence, coming out openly to meet him; gladdens him with her smile, 21 and tells him all her secrets; makes him rich with store of true knowledge, and 22 enables him to discern the right. Only if he strays away from her does she abandon him, and leave him at the mercy of his foes.

23 My son, study well what the time needs, ever on thy guard against wrong-doing; 24 though life itself were in peril, never be ashamed to speak the truth. Deference, 25 that is the grace and glory of a man, may 26 yet make a sinner of him. Wouldst thou hold another man's honour dearer than thy own, and swear the lie at thy soul's peril?
27 Nay, speak out without shame, though thy own neighbour should be threatened with ruin. Withhold not thy counsel while safety may yet be won; thy wisdom is not to be hidden away like a veiled beauty.

Wisdom still needs a tongue to disclose it;
no discernment or knowledge or shrewd counsel but waits on the apt word; how else should men be encouraged in well doing? Speak thou never against the known truth; and if thy ignorance has erred, own thy error. Be never ashamed to confess thy faults, nor, for thy fault, put thyself in any man's power.

Wouldst thou defy, and openly, a ruler's authority? Thou hadst better swim against the stream's force.¹

Do battle for the right, all thy life long,
and with thy last breath do battle for the right still; God, in thy cause, will overcome thy enemies.

A glib tongue, and hands that hang down idle; such be not thine.

Lion if thou must be, let not thy own house feel the brunt of it, thy own servants harried, thy own slaves beaten to the earth.

Open hand when the word is Take, shut when the word is Give; such be not thine.

5 Wilt thou look round at ill-gotten gains, and tell thyself thou hast enough for all thy needs? Trust me, when vengeance finds thee out, all this shall nothing avail thee. In manhood's vigour, do not follow the whim of thy heart, boasting of thy strength, and asking who will call thee to account for thy doings; God will find a way to punish thee. Nor ever flatter thyself that thou hast sinned and come away scot-free; the eternal justice waits its time. Ill it were that sin's pardon should embolden thee to sin afresh. Dost thou tell thyself God's mercies are great, and he will pardon thy sins for all they are so many? Bethink thee that his vengeance rides swift as his mercy; it is a jealous eye that watches the sinner. Or wouldst thou make slow work of turning to the Lord, and put it off from day to day? Swift falls his anger and perilous, when the time for vengeance is ripe. And must thy thoughts still dwell on the ill-gotten gains, that shall ¹ vv. 31, 32. The Greek text here varies considerably from the Latin version. It runs: 'Be never ashamed to confess thy faults; wouldst thou swim against the stream's force? Never put thyself in the power of a fool, and never flatter a ruler's greatness'. Throughout the last fourteen verses of this chapter, the Latin and the Greek have many different twists of meaning, and neither can be interpreted with much certainty.

nothing avail thee when vengeance finds thee out?

Turn not with every wind, nor walk in every way that offers; that sinners do, till their hypocrisy is found out. Firm let thy feet be set on the path the Lord has chosen for thee; be true to thy own thought and to the knowledge thou hast, and ever let the counsels of peace and justice guide thee on thy way.

True answer and wise answer none can give but he who listens patiently, and learns all.

If discernment thou hast, give thy neighbour his answer; if none, tongue held is best, or some ill-advised word will shame thee; speech uttered was ever the wise man's passport to fame, the fool's undoing.

Never win the name of back-biter, by thy own tongue entrapped into shame. A thief must blush and do penance, a hypocrite men will mark and avoid; the back-biter earns indignation and enmity and disgrace all at once.

To all alike, high and low, give just award.

6 Wouldst thou rather be thy neighbour's enemy than his friend? Wouldst thou earn, by ill nature, an ill name, and be despised for such faults as these, envy and hypocrisy?

Wilt thou toss thy head, bull-fashion, and glory in thy own strength? What if that strength should be brought down by thy own folly? Then wilt thou be no better than some dry tree-stump out in the desert, its leaves withered, its hope of fruit all gone. Ill nature brings a man to an ill end, the scorn of his enemies and a prey to iniquity.

Gentleness of speech, how it wins friends everywhere, how it disarms its enemies! Never was a good man wanting for a gracious word. Be on good terms with all, but for thy trusted counsellor, choose one in a thousand. Tried friends be the friends thou makest; do not bestow thy confidence lightly; some men are but fair-weather friends, and will not stand the test of adversity. Some will veer from friend to foe, and lay bare old grudges, old quarrels, to reproach thee; some will be thy boon companions, but desert thee when trouble is afoot. Fast and faithful friend there is, that will be even as thyself, and have thy servants at his beck and call; let him behave modestly, and rid thee of his presence, and there shall be true and tried friendship between you.¹ From enemies thou mayst keep thy distance; against friends be on thy guard. True friendship, sure protection and rare treasure found;

true friendship, a thing beyond compare, its tried loyalty outweighing gold and silver; true friendship, elixir of life, and of life eternal! Only those who fear God will come by it; the fear of God gives friendship evenly shared, friend matched with friend.

My son, learn the lessons of youth, and garner wisdom against thy grey hairs; ploughman and sower thou must come to the task, and wait patiently for the harvest;
how light the toil wisdom claims, the fruits of her how soon enjoyed! Only to un-disciplined minds she seems an over-hard task-mistress; not for long will the fool endure her company; here is a weight (says he) that tries my strength too much, and away he casts it. The enlightenment which comes with wisdom is true to its name;
known to so few, yet where men are acquainted with it, it waits to light them into the presence of God.² My son, give good heed to the warnings of experience, do not spurn this counsel of mine. Yield foot of thine to wisdom's fetters, neck of thine to her collar, shoulder of thine to her yoke; do not chafe at her bonds. Make her thy whole heart's quest, follow, as best thou canst, the path she makes known to thee;
search, and thou wilt find her, hold fast,
and never let her go; in good time, thou shalt repose in her, and find her all delight.
In time, those fetters of hers shall prove a strong protection, a sure support, that halter of hers a badge of honour about thy neck; there is life in those trappings, healing virtue in those bonds. Robe is none

¹ vs. 11, 12: The sense of these verses is doubtful. The Greek text has, for verse 12, '(But) if thou art brought low, he will turn against thee, and hide his presence away from thee'. ² The Greek text runs, 'Wisdom is true to her name, she is revealed to few', which seems to imply a play upon words quite foreign to Hebrew vocabulary. The Latin version runs literally, 'The wisdom of doctrine is true to its name; it is revealed to few, but for those to whom it is known, it abides even to the sight of God'. There is an accidental resemblance in Hebrew between the noun 'wisdom' and the verb 'to wait'.

shall do thee more honour, crown is none shall rest more radiant on thy brow.

33 My son, mark well and learn, take heed 34 and be wise; here is true knowledge for the listening, here is wisdom if thou wilt lend 35 an ear. Where older men than thou are met, and wiser, take thou thy place, and give thy whole heart to their teaching; old tales of God's wonders thou shalt hear, and 36 sayings of much renown. A man of discernment if thou find, wait on him at daybreak, and wear out his door-step with thy 37 frequent visiting. Think ever upon God's commandments, and be constant in the following of his will; be sure he will give thee perseverance, and all thy desire for wisdom shall be granted thee.

7 Harm if thou do none, harm shall 2 none befall thee; clear of wrong is 3 clear of mishap. What avails it, my son, to sow in the furrow of mischief, and reap a sevenfold harvest?
4 Never ask of God high station, or of the king preferment.

5 Never try to prove thy innocence before God, who knows all, nor thy subtlety before the king.

6 Do not sit in judgement, unless thou art able to crush the wrong; if thou favour the rich, what else is thy award but a snare for thy own virtue?

7 Hurt never the public weal; no need to embroil thyself with thy own neighbours.

8 Never tack sin to sin; for the first thou art in arrears.

9 Do not lose confidence in thy praying, or leave almsgiving undone.

11 Do not flatter thyself that God will look favourably on thy many offerings, as if he,
the most High, could not refuse thy gifts.

12 Taunt never the disconsolate; God, who sees all, casts men down and lifts them up.

13 Not against thy own brother trump up the charge; nor thy neighbour either.

14 Every breath of falsehood avoid in thy speech; so ill grows the habit of it.

15 Idle talk becomes thee not, when thou sittest with the elders in council, nor, when thou prayest, repetition of thy prayer.

16 At toil repine not; the farmer's trade is of divine appointment.

17 When sinners abound, be not thou of 18 their company; bethink thee rather, how 19 swiftly comes vengeance, and so curb thy unruly spirits; for sinful flesh, fire and worm.

Thou hast a friend who is over-long in thy debt; use no cruelty with him; dear to thee as a brother, and shall gold count more? Thou hast a good wife, a thrifty woman that has thrown in her lot, in the fear of the Lord, with thine; do not leave her; that modesty of hers is a grace gold cannot buy. The slave that works for thee faithfully, the hireling that is pledged to thy service, injure not; a thrifty slave thou shouldst love as thy own self, not balking him of liberty or leaving him to starve. Cattle thou hast; tend them well, nor part with them while they do thee good service. Thou hast sons; train them to bear the yoke from their youth up. Thou hast daughters; keep them chaste, and do not spoil them with thy smile; a daughter wed is great good done, if a thrifty husband thou find her. And thy own wife, if thou lovest her, never do thou forsake, nor trust thy happiness to one who is little to thy mind.

And oh, with thy whole heart honour thy father, nor forget thy mother's pangs; be-think thee, that without them thou hadst had no being, and repay the service they have done thee.

With all thy soul fear God, and reverence his priests. He made thee; wilt thou not devote all thy powers to his love?
Wilt thou leave his ministers unbefriended? Rather, with all thy soul fear God, and to his priests give their due; with gift of the consecrated shoulder clear thyself of what is owing. The priests must have their share, by law prescribed, of first-fruits and of offering for transgression; even if thou hast committed a fault in ignorance, a little is claimed for thy cleansing. The gift of the consecrated shoulder thou must make to the Lord, and the offering of all that is dedicated, and the holy first-fruits; moreover, thou must open thy hand to the poor; so thy atonement shall be perfect, and perfect thy blessing.

No living man but is thankful for the gift given; and it is ill done to withhold thy favours even from the dead. Fail not to comfort the distressed, let the mourner have thee for his escort. Never tire of visiting the sick; no surer way of winning

40 thy neighbour's love. Remember at all times what thou must come to at the last, and thou shalt never do amiss.

8 If quarrel thou hast, let it not be with a prince, that may attach thy person; nor with a rich man, that may implead thee, with all the power there is in silver and gold to corrupt men, and sway even the hearts of kings; nor with a glib talker; thou dost but add fuel to his fire.

5 Be not familiar with a boor; thou wilt hear no good of thy ancestry.

6 Scorn not the sinner that would amend his ways; reproach comes amiss, where all stand in need of correction. Nor fail in respect for the aged; it is of our stuff grey hairs are made.¹ Rejoice not over thy neighbour's death; we all die, and would not have men rejoice over it. Do not be contemptuous of what older and wiser men have to tell thee; by their lore live thou, if wise thou wouldst be, and have the secret of discernment, and live contentedly in the service of the great. Do not let them pass thee by, these traditions older men have inherited from their fathers; they will turn thee into a man of judgement, that answer can make when answer is needed.

3 Wouldst thou remonstrate with a sinner? Make sure thou art not fanning the flame of his passions, thyself in peril of a scorching.

4 Wouldst thou make reply to the railing accuser? Make sure he is not baiting a trap to ensnare thee.

5 Lend to one who can master thee? Then lent is lost. Pledge not thyself beyond thy means; count ever thy pledge forfeit. Dispute not a judge's award; who judges by right rule if not he? Travel not with a rash companion, if thou wouldst not shoulder all his misfortune; he will go his own way, and thou share the reward of his folly.

9 Quarrel not with a man of quick moods; on a desert road he is no companion for thee; he cares nothing for bloodshed, and will lay thee in the dust when none is by to aid thee. Take not counsel with a fool; he knows none but his own way of it. Share not thy secret plans with a stranger; thou knowest not what trouble he may breed.

Never open to any man thy whole heart; an ill requital he may make, by bringing shame on thee.

9 Never shew thyself a jealous husband to the wife thou lovest; it may prove thou hast taught her, to thy cost, a ruinous lesson. Never give thy soul into a woman's power, and let her command the fortress of it, to thy shame. Never turn to look at the wanton, that would catch thee in her snare, nor spend thy attentions upon some dancing woman, that has power to be thy undoing; nor let thy eyes linger on a maid unwed, whose very beauty may take thee unawares. And for harlots, let nothing tempt thee to give way to them, as life and patrimony thou holdest dear; look not round thee in the city streets, nor haunt the alley-ways. From a woman bravely decked out turn away; have no eyes for her beauty that is none of thine. Woman's beauty has been the ruin of many ere now, a spark to light the flame of lust. A harlot? Then trample her down like mire in thy path. The love of stolen sweets has been the undoing of many; a word with her, and the spark is lit. Sit down never with a wedded wife, nor lean thy elbow upon table of hers, nor bandy words with her over the wine, nor bandy she thy heart away, thy life is forfeit.

An old friend leave not; the new is not his like. New friendship, new wine; it must ripen ere thou canst love the taste of it.

Envy not the wrong-doer his wealth and state; beyond all expectation of thine it shall come to ruin. Of his ill-gotten gains have neither love nor liking; be sure he will not die unpunished.

From one that has the power of life and death keep thy distance; so thou shalt be free from mortal alarms. If dealings thou hast with him, keep clear of all offence, or thou shalt pay for it with thy life. Death has become thy familiar; pit-falls encompass thy path; thou art making the rounds of a beleaguered city.²

Consider, as best thou mayest, thy company; be wise and prudent men thy counsellors; honest men thy guests.

Be the fear of God all thy boast, the thought of God all thy thinking, the commandments of the most High all the matter of thy discourse.

¹ Literally, 'men grow old out of (people like) us', although the text is perhaps corrupt. The Latin gives no good sense: 'Thou wilt be walking on the weapons of grieving men'.

² This seems to be the meaning of the Greek, although the text is perhaps corrupt. The Latin gives no good sense: 'Thou wilt be walking on the weapons of grieving men'.

24 By skilful handiwork the artist is known, the ruler of a people by the prudence of his counsel, the good sense of the aged by their word spoken.

25 No such peril to a city as a great talker; for his rash utterance, no man so well hated as he.

10 A wise ruler, a folk well disciplined; firm sits prudence on the throne. Like king, like court; like ruler, like subjects. Royal folly is a people's ruin; where prudence reigns, there cities thrive most. God's will it is, then, that rules a nation; when the time comes, he will give it the prince it needs, granting prosperity where he will; no scribe bears office but has divine authority stamped on his brow.

6 Forget the wrong done, nor enrol thyself among the doers of it.

7 Before God and man alike pride is hateful, and the wrong the Gentiles do is foully done; wrong and crime and outrage and treacherous shift, that he punishes by passing on the sceptre of empire into new hands; but worse sin is none than avarice. See how man, for all his pride, is but dust and ashes! This love of money is of all things the most perverse; what does the miser but sell his own soul? As well be bowelled alive!

11 Why be tyrannies short-lived? Why, it is a wearisome thing to the physician, a long illness, so he is fain to cut it short, and the king that reigns to-day will be dead to-morrow. And what is the new kingdom he inherits? Creeping things, and carrion beast, and worm.¹

14 Pride's beginning is man's revolt from God, when the heart forgets its Maker; and of all sin pride is the root. Leave it, or curses thou shalt have in full measure, and be ruined at the last. Such humiliation the Lord has in store; vanished utterly is yonder confederacy; proud thrones cast down, to make room for the oppressed, proud nations withered from the root, and humbler rivals planted instead! Whole nations of the world the Lord has overthrown, rased them to the ground; shrivelled and vanished away, they have left no trace of their passage. The proud forgotten, the humble kept in memory; such was the Lord's will. Pride was never made for man's estate; never child born of woman had anger's mood for its birthright.

There are two breeds of men; one fears God and wins renown, the other passes his commandments by, and is forgotten. Let clansmen honour a chieftain's rank; it is humble fear wins the divine regard. For riches and renown, as for the lowly born, there is one boast worth having, the fear of God. Honest poverty never despise, nor flatter, for all his wealth, the evil-doer; prince nor ruler nor nobleman can win any higher title than the fear of God.

Of his master's sons a prudent servant shall yet be master. Only the fool, that is ill trained, takes punishment amiss; and a fool will never rise to greatness.

Do not boast of thy fine craftsmanship and then, in time of urgent need, stand idle;² better fall to work and have a full belly than keep thy pride and go fasting. Abate thy pride, keep body and soul together; value thy life as it deserves. There is no excusing the man who is his own enemy, no worth in the man who thinks his life worth nothing.

One man, that little wealth has, may boast of his skill and the fear of God, another man of his riches. Grow he rich, the poor man shall boast indeed; that other, grow he poor, has good cause to fear his poverty.

11 A man may be lowly born, and yet rise high through the wisdom that is in him, till at last he takes his seat among men of rank.

Esteem no man for his good looks, nor for his outward show despise him; yonder bee is an inconsiderable creature, and yet there is a world of sweetness in the harvest she wins. Plume not thyself when thou goest bravely clad, nor pride thyself in thy brief hour of greatness. Of wonder and of praise what else is worthy, but the doings

¹ vv. 7-13: A comparison of the Latin with the Greek suggests that the order of these verses differed in different manuscripts of the original, and their sense cannot be certainly established. It seems likely that in verses 11-13 the physician referred to is Providence. ² This seems, in view of the context, the best account to give of a verse which is difficult in the Latin, and in the Greek almost untranslatable.

of the most High? And these, how hedged 5 about with secrecy! Kings a many have lost their thrones,¹ to pretenders they 6 never dreamed of; great ones a many have fallen full low, and their glory has passed to others.

7 Blame not, till thou hast heard the excuse; more just thy reproof shall be when 8 thou hast learnt all. Listen first, then answer, never breaking in when the tale is half told.

9 Quarrel not, where thou thyself art not concerned; leave judgement of the offender to others.

10 Do not be entangled, my son, in too many enterprises. The rich man pays for-feite, chasing what overtake he may not, or fleeing what he may not shun.

11 Some men's lives are all toil and haste and anxiety; yet the more they toil, the less 12 advantage they win, for want of piety. And others are backward folk, that cannot hold their gains, men of little power and much 13 poverty; and yet such a man the Lord will look upon with favour, rescue him from neglect and greatly advance him, to the 14 world's amazement, and the greater honour of God. From God all comes, good fortune and ill, life and death, poverty and 15 riches; in God's keeping are wisdom and temperance and knowledge of the law, charity and the good life.

16 Error and darkness are sinful man's birthright; it is by making evil their delight that men grow hardened in evil.

17 No momentary blessing it is, God's largesse to his faithful servants; that seed 18 that bears an eternal crop. No such boast has the man of thrift, that by his own effort 19 wins wealth. Does he tell himself that he has found security at last; nothing remains but to glut, with his own earnings, his own 20 greed? He forgets that time flies, and death draws near; die he must, and leave 21 all he has to another. Be true to thy covenant with God; its words to thy own ears repeat; to that, and thy enjoined duty, 22 inure thyself. Wouldst thou stand there gaping at the doings of sinners? Nay, trust in God, and keep to thy appointed task.

 Dost thou think God finds it hard to enrich 23 the beggar, and in a moment? Swift, swift comes the blessing that rewards faithful 24 service; in one short hour its fruits ripen.

Never tell thyself, need thou hast none, 25 there is no more good can befall thee; never flatter thyself, thou art master of thy 26 own lot, no harm can touch thee now.
 Rather, bethink thyself of foul weather in 27 fair, of fair weather in foul; on the very day of a man's death God can give him his 28 deserts. One hour of misery, how it can efface in the memory long years of ease!
 Only a man's death-bed brings the full 29 history of his fortunes to light.

Never call a man happy until he is dead;
 30 his true epitaph is written in his children.

Do not keep thy house open to every 31 comer; knaves have many shifts. Foul 32 breath lurks in a diseased body; the partridge a hidden lure awaits, a hidden snare the doe; so there be unquiet hearts, ever on the watch for a neighbour's downfall, ready to interpret good things amiss, and 33 cast blame on the innocent. One spark is enough to spread a fire, and one man's 34 treachery may be the cause of bloodshed;
 such villains as these plot against life itself.
 Against such a plague be thou timely on 35 thy guard, or it may prove thy eternal disgrace. Alien let in is whirlwind let in, that 36 shall alienate from thee all thou hast.²

12 Favour if thou grantest, look well to whom thou grantest it; so shall thy favours earn abundant gratitude. A 2 good turn done to an honest man is well rewarded; if not he, then the Lord will repay thee. It goes ill with the man who 3 spends all his time courting the wicked, and alms gives none; does not the most High himself treat sinners as his enemies, never sparing them till they repent?
 4 . . . For rebellious sinners he has nothing but punishment, although he may save up the day of their punishing.³ Keep thy 5

¹ Literally, in the Greek text, 'have sat on the ground'. The Latin version, perhaps through an error, reads 'have sat on their thrones'. ² vv. 31-36: The exact bearing of these verses cannot be determined. In verse 32, 'unquiet hearts' is literally 'proud hearts'; but pride seems irrelevant to the present context, and it is likely that the original Hebrew text had 'hearts of aliens' (as in verse 36). In that case the whole passage may be a warning against undue fraternization with Gentiles. ³ At the beginning of this verse, the Latin inserts the words, 'Keep thy favours for the merciful, and let the sinners go without their entertainment', which appears to be a duplicate of verse 5, included by error. It has been omitted in the rendering given above, as fatally disturbing to the order of the sentence. There was no doubt some dislocation of the text here; the Greek, too, has a duplicate of verse 5 immediately after verse 7.

favours for the kind-hearted, and let the 6 sinners go without their welcome. The friendless man deserves thy alms; to the godless give nothing; nay, prevent food reaching him, or he will have the mastery 7 of thee. All his gain will be doubly thy loss; and so it is that the most High both hates sinners and will bring retribution on their impiety.

8 Prosperity will not shew thee who are thy friends. In bad times, thy enemies 9 may triumph openly, that till now were grieved at thy good fortune; but it is these bad times will shew thee thy friends too.

10 Never trust an enemy; deep as verdigris 11 on copper his malice is ingrained. Lout he never so low, look to it well and be on thy 12 guard against him; never let him attend on thee, or sit at thy right hand. His eyes are on thy place; a time will come when he will sit where thou sittest, when thou wilt recognize the truth of my warning, and be 13 stung by the memory. Who shall pity snake-charmer or beast-tamer if he takes hurt? And he deserves no less, who consorts with rogues and is entangled in their 14 sinful ways. This false friend will be thy companion for an hour, then, if thou art for altering thy course, he will not hear of 15 it; all those honeyed words do but mask a plot to lure thee into some ditch. How he 16 weeps for thee, this enemy of thine! Yet, if his chance comes, there will be no glut-17 ting him with thy blood; come thou into mischief, he is there already waiting for 18 thee. How he weeps for thee, this enemy of thine! If he makes to aid thee, it is only 19 to trip thy heel; then what mopping and mowing, what clapping of the hands and whispering, what a change of mien!

13 Who handles pitch, with pitch is defiled; who throws in his lot with insolence, of insolence shall have his fill.
 2 A heavy burden thou art shouldering, if thou wouldst consort with thy betters; not 3 for thee the company of the rich. Pot and kettle are ill matched; it is the pot breaks 4 when they come together; rich man, that has seized all he can, frets and fumes for more; poor man robbed may not so much 5 as speak. If thou hast favours to bestow, thy rich friend will make use of thee; if none, he bids thee farewell; thy guest, he will eat up all thou canst give, and have no pity to waste on thee. Has he need of thee?

 Then, to be sure, he will ply his arts, all smiles and fair speeches, and eagerness to know what thy need is; he encumbers thee, now, with hospitality. So, twice and three times, he will drain thee dry; then he will turn on thee with a laugh, and if he meets thee again, it will be to pass thee by with a toss of the head.

Learn to abase thyself before God, and wait for his hand to beckon thee, instead of courting false hopes, that bring their own abasement. For all thy wisdom, do not hold thyself too cheap, or thou wilt lower thyself to folly. If a great man bids thee come close, keep thy distance; he will but bid thee the more; do not court a rebuff by wearying him, nor yet withdraw altogether, and be forgotten. Affable though he should be, treat him never familiarly; all his friendly talk is but a lure to drag thy secrets out of thee. All that thou sayest his pitiless heart will hold against thee; never a blow, never a chain the less. Have a care of thyself, give good heed to this warning, thou that walkest with ruin ever at thy side; wake from sleep at the hearing of it, and see thy peril. Love God all thy days, and pray that he will send thee good deliverance.

Every beast consorts with its own kind, and shall not man with his fellow? Like to like is nature's rule, and for man like to like is still the best partnership; as well match wolf with lamb as rogue with honest liver. Consecrated person¹ and prowling dog, what have they in common? And what fellowship can there be between rich man and poor? Poor man is to rich as wild ass is to lion out in the desert, his prey;
 wealth hates poverty, as the proud heart scorns humble rank. Totters the lordly house, it has friends to sustain it; the poor man in his ruin is driven from familiar doors. Trips the rich man, he has many to keep him in countenance; his insolent talk finds acquittal; trips the poor man, he is called to account for it; even for what he said to the purpose, no allowance is made him. Speaks the rich man, all must listen in silence, and afterwards extol his utterance to the skies; speaks the poor man,

¹ Or perhaps 'holy person'. The Greek text has, 'hyena'.

Why, say all, who is this? And if his words offend, it is the undoing of him.

30 Yet, where there is no sin to smite a man's conscience, a full purse is a blessing, and poverty itself is a great evil when it goes with a blasphemer's tongue.¹ Heart of man changes his mien, for good or ill, but where that pleasant mien is, that comes of a generous heart, no short or easy way there is to discover.²

14 Blessed the man whose lips have never betrayed him into a fault, who has never known the sting of remorse, never felt conscience condemning him, and the hope he lived by, his no more!

3 Vain is that store the miser cherishes; wasted on his distrustful nature, the bright gold! See how he wrongs himself to hoard up goods for others; to let his heirs keep high revel when he is gone! Whose friend is he, that is his own enemy, and leaves his own cheer untasted? This is the last villainy of all, that a man should grudge himself his own happiness; fit punishment for his poverty of soul that never did good except by oversight, and to his manifest remorse! Diseased eye of the niggard, that will turn away and let hunger go unsatisfied; and restless eye of the covetous man, that craves ever more than his due, till his very nature dries up from continual pining; an eye jaundiced with its own passions, and never a full meal, but always he must sit hungry and pensive at his own table, and ill content!

1 My son, if wealth thou hast, regale thyself, and make thy offering to God proportionable. Bethink thee that death waits not; there is no putting off thy tryst with the grave; nothing in this world, but its death-warrant is out already. While life still holds, make thy friends good cheer, and to the poor be open-handed as thy means allow thee; stint not the feast, nor any crumb put by of the blessings granted thee; wouldst thou have thy heirs wrangling over the fruits of thy bitter toil? 6 Much give, much take, set thy soul at ease; 7 while life still holds, do thy duty of almsgiving; feasting there shall be none in the grave. No living thing but fades as the grass fades; as the leaves fade, that burgeon on a growing tree, some sprouting fresh and some a-dying; so it is with flesh and blood, one generation makes room for the next. All the works of man are fugitive, and must perish soon or late, and he, the workman, goes the same way as the rest. Yet shall their choicest works win favour, and in his work he, the workman, shall live.

Blessed the man that dwells on wise thoughts, musing how to acquit himself well, and remembering the all-seeing eye of God; that can plan out in his heart all wisdom's twists and turns, fathom her secrets! Like a spy he follows her, and lingers in her tracks, peers through her window, listens at her doors, by her house takes up his abode, driving his nail into the walls of it, so as to build his cabin at her very side, cabin that shall remain for ever a home of blessing! Wisdom shall be the shade under which his children find their appointed resting-place; her spreading boughs shall protect them from the noon-day heat; wisdom shall be the monument of his glorious repose.

15 If a man fears the Lord, he will live an upright life. If a man holds fast to innocence, he will find wisdom³ ready to his embrace, welcoming him as a mother welcomes the son who cherishes her, greeting him like a maiden bride. Long life and good discernment are the bread this mother will provide for him, truth the refreshing draught she will give him to drink. She will take firm hold of him, so that he never wavers, restrain him, so that he is never disgraced. She will raise him to high repute among his neighbours; she will move him to speak before the assembled people, filling him with the spirit of wisdom and discernment, clothing him in magnificent array. Joy and triumph she has in store for him, and will enrich him with a name that shall never be forgotten. Not for the fools her embrace, only apt pupils encounter her; how should the fools catch sight of her, that is so far removed from 8 proud and treacherous ways? Nay, she is beyond the deceiver's ken; true hearts alone are her company, and these shall profit by it till they are fit for God's scrutiny.

¹ Literally, 'in the mouth of a sinner'. This would naturally be interpreted as meaning 'in the estimation of a sinner', but such a rendering would give no parallel of thought between the two halves of the verse. ² Or possibly the sense is that it is difficult to find instances of the pleasant man that results from a generous heart, because they are so rare. If so, the first two verses of ch. 14 should be taken as part of this chapter. ³ Literally, 'will find her'. Grammatically, this might refer to 'innocence', but it is fairly certain we are meant to think of Wisdom, alluded to in 14. 22 above.

 9 Praise is but praise deformed when 10 it is uttered by the lips of a sinner; wisdom comes from God only, and on wisdom the praise of God needs must wait. Praise on the lips of one who trusts God is rich in meaning; the Ruler of all inspires it.

11 This wisdom lackest thou?¹ Do not blame God for the want of it; learn to shun 12 the deeds God hates. Do not complain that it was he led thee into false paths; what need has God, thinkest thou, of rebels?
 13 No foul misdeed there is but God hates it; 14 there is no loving it and fearing him. When men first came to be, it was God made them, and, making them, left them to the arbitrament of their own wills; yet giving 15 them commandments to be their rule.
 16 Those commandments if thou wilt observe, they in their turn shall preserve thee, and give thee warrant of his favour.² 17 It is as though he offered thee fire and water, bidding thee take which thou 18 wouldst; life and death, blessing and curse, man finds set before him, and the gift given thee shall be the choice thou 19 makest; so wise God is, so constraining his power, so incessant the watch he keeps 20 over mankind. The Lord's eye is watching over the men who fear him, no act of ours 21 passes unobserved; upon none does he enjoin disobedience, none has leave from 22 him to commit sin. A brood of disloyal sons and worthless, how should this be the Lord's desire?

16 A brood of disloyal sons, let not thy eye dwell on these with pleasure;
 the fear of God lacking, let not a multitude 2 of children be thy comfort. Not on such lives as these set thy hopes, little regard 3 have thou for such doings as theirs; better one son who fears God than a thousand 4 who grow up rebellious; better die childless than have rebels to succeed thee.

 Through one man that is well-minded a whole country may thrive, and sinners,
 a whole race of them, may be extinguished;
 much proof of this my own eyes have seen,
 and stronger proof yet are the tales that have come to my hearing, of fire breaking out where sinners were met in company, fires of vengeance to consume a disobedient race. Those giants of long ago who perished in the pride of their strength, did they find pardon of their guilt? Lot's neighbours, did God spare them? Did he not attest his hatred of their insolence, destroying a whole nation without pity, for the sinfulness that defied him? And what of those six hundred thousand that marched out into the desert, men of stubborn heart? Stiff-necked if he had been like the others, Caleb himself should not have had God's pardon.³ His to pity, his to punish; intercession avails with him, but in full flood comes his vengeance; his severity, no less than his clemency, judges men by their deeds. Never may sinner enjoy his ill-gotten gains in safety, nor the hope of the generous be disappointed. No generous act but shall win God's consideration; he weighs each man's merits, knows how each passed his time on earth.

Never think to hide thyself away from God; never tell thyself, from that great height none shall regard thee; that thou wilt pass unnoticed amidst the throng of humanity, thy soul a mere speck in the vast fabric of creation. Why, the very heavens, and the heavens that are above the heavens,
 the great deep, and the whole earth with all it contains, shrink away at the sight of him;
 mountains and hills and earth's foundations tremble at his glance; all these have a heart, though it be a heart void of reason⁴, and there is no heart but its secrets are known to him. There is no fathoming his ways, no piercing the dark cloud man's eyes have never seen; all but a few of his doings are hidden away. His acts of retribution⁵ who can understand, or who can

¹ 'This wisdom lackest thou?'; according to the Greek text, 'Hast thou rebelled against him?'

² The rendering given above is an attempt to combine the Greek and the Latin versions, either of which, taken by itself, is untranslatable.

³ The words 'into the desert' have been inserted to make it clear that the Exodus is alluded to; they are not in the text. Nor is the name 'Caleb', but the grammar of the Latin version necessarily implies that one person was excepted from the general doom, cf. Num. 14. 24 and elsewhere. The Greek text has 'And if there is one stiff-necked person, it is a marvel if he escapes'.

⁴ 'All these have a heart, though it be a heart void of reason'; or perhaps, 'and in all these matters, the (human) heart is powerless to reason', which is the sense of the Greek text. ⁵ The sense of the Greek text is probably rather 'the acts which win his approval'.

bear? Far, far removed is that covenant of his from some men's thoughts; and yet in the end all shall undergo his scrutiny.¹

23 Away with these fancies of shallow minds, these fond dreams of error!

24 Wilt thou but listen to me, my son, thou shalt learn a wiser lesson. Give me thy heart's heeding, and instruction thou shalt

25 have in full measure, wisdom both profound and clear. Give me thy heart's heeding, and thou shalt share with me knowledge of the wonderful endowments God gave his creatures when first he made them; all the lore I have shall be truly told

26 thee. From the first, all God's creatures are at his beck and call; to each, when he first made it, he gave its own turn of service, the principle that determines its own 27 nature. To each, for all time, its own office is assigned, nor lack they, nor tire they, nor cease they from work, nor, for all time,

28 can any of them infringe upon its neighbour's rights; his word there is no gain-saying.² This done, on earth he let fall his regard, and filled earth with his blessings;

29 covered the face of it³ with the living things that breathe there, and into its bosom bade them return.

17 Man, too, God created out of the earth, fashioning him after his own likeness, and gave him, too, earth to be his burying-place, for all the divine power that clothed him; man, too, should have his allotted toll of years, his season of maturity, and should have power over all else on earth; no living thing, beast or bird, that should not live in awe of him and be subject to his rule. To him and to that partner of his, created like himself and out of himself, God gave will and speech and sight and hearing; gave them a heart to reason with, and filled them with power of discernment; spirit itself should be within their ken, their hearts should be all sagacity. What evil was, what good, he made plain to them; gave them his own eyes to see with, so that they should keep his marvellous acts in view, praise that holy name of his, boast of his wonders, tell the story of his renowned deeds. Warnings, too, he gave them; the law that brings life should be a cherished heirloom; and so he made a covenant with them which should last for ever; claim and award of his he would make known to them. Their eyes should see him in visible majesty, their ears catch the echo of his majestic voice. Keep your hands clear, he told them, of all wrongdoing, and gave each man a duty towards his neighbour.

Ever before his eyes their doings are; nothing is hidden from his scrutiny. To every Gentile people he has given a ruler of its own; Israel alone is exempt, marked down as God's patrimony. Clear as the sun their acts shew under his eye; over their lives, untiring his scrutiny. Sin they as they will, his covenant is still on record; no misdeed of theirs but he is the witness of it.

Alms if thou givest, thou hast the sign-manual of his favour; treasured as the apple of his eye is the record of man's deserving.⁴

... A day will come when he rouses himself and requites them, one by one, for their misdoing, overwhelms them in the depths of earth. Yet, to such as repent, he grants the means of acquittal, and makes their fainting hearts strong to endure; for them, too, he has a share in his promised reward. Turn back to the Lord, and let thy sins be; make thy prayer before him, and rid thyself of the peril in thy path. Come back to the Lord, from wrong-doing turn away, and thy foul deeds hate; in all his decrees and awards own God just, stand in thy appointed place to make intercession to him, the most High, and take thy part with a race of men sanctified, living men that still give thanks to God.⁵ Linger not in the false path of wickedness; give thanks while breath is in thee; the

¹ vv. 18-22: In the Latin version, this is apparently regarded as an answer to the notions mentioned in verses 16, 17; in the Greek text, it seems to be a continuation of them, the answer being delayed till verse 24.

² That is, according to the Greek text, the forces of nature are bound to obey it; the Latin version represents it as a warning against human disobedience.

³ This is the meaning of the Greek text. The Latin version has 'denounced before the face of it', which yields no satisfactory sense.

⁴ It seems possible that this verse has been misplaced, since it breaks into the connexion of thought between verse 17 and verse 19.

⁵ vv. 24, 25: The Latin here reads very unnaturally, and is perhaps the rendering of a corrupt Hebrew original. In the first half of verse 25, the Greek text has, 'Who will give praise to the most High in the grave?' The word rendered 'give thanks', here and in the following verses, may also, according to Hebrew usage, mean 'confess'. But cf. Is. 38. 19.

27 dead breathe no more, give thanks no more. Thanks while yet thou livest, thanks while health and strength are still with thee, to praise God and to take pride in all his mercies! The Lord's mercy, that is so abundant, the pardon that is ever theirs who come back to him!

29 Think not man is the centre of all things;¹ no son of Adam is immortal, for all the delight men take in their sinful follies. Nought brighter than the sun, and yet its brightness shall fail; nought darker than the secret designs of flesh and blood, 31 yet all shall be brought to light. God, that marshals the armies of high heaven, and man, all dust and ashes!

18 Naught that is, but God made it; he, the source of all right, the king that reigns for ever unconquerable. And wouldst thou tell the number of his creatures, trace his marvellous doings to their origin, set forth in words the greatness of his power, or go further yet, and proclaim his mercies? God's wonders thou shalt learn to understand, when thou hast learned to increase the number of them, or diminish it. Reach thou the end of thy reckoning, thou must needs begin again; cease thou from weariness, thou hast nothing learnt. Tell me, what is man, what worth is his, what power has he for good or ill? What is his span of life? Like a drop in the ocean, like a pebble on the beach, seem those few years of his, a hundred at the most, matched with eternity. What wonder if God is patient with his human creatures, lavishes mercy on them? If none reads, as he, their proud heart, none knows, as he, the cruelty of their doom; and so he has given his clemency full play, and shewed them an even path to tread. Man's mercy extends only to his neighbour; God has pity on all living things. He is like a shepherd who cares for his sheep, guides and controls all alike; welcome thou this merciful discipline of his, run thou eagerly to meet his will, and he will shew pity on thee.

My son, bestow thy favours ungrudgingly, nor ever mar with harsh words the gladness of thy giving. Not more welcome the dew, tempering the sun's heat, than the giver's word, that counts for more than the gift. Better the gracious word than the gracious gift; but, wouldst thou acquit thyself perfectly, let both be thine. The fool, by his scolding, mars all; never yet did eye brighten over a churl's giving.

First arm thyself with a just cause, then stand thy trial; first learn, then speak. Study thy health before ever thou fallest sick, and thy own heart examine before judgement overtakes thee; so in God's sight thou shalt find pardon. While health serves thee, do penance for thy sins, and then, when sickness comes, shew thyself the man thou art.² From paying thy vows³ let naught ever hinder thee; shall death find thee still shrinking from acquitting thyself of the task? God's award stands for ever. And before ever thou makest thy petition, count well the cost.⁴ Let it not be said of thee that thou didst invite God's anger. When his vengeance is satisfied, bethink thee still of his vengeance; of his retribution, when his glance is turned away.⁵ When all abounds, bethink thee of evil times; of pinching poverty, when thou hast wealth in store. Between rise and set of sun the face of things alters; swiftly God changes all; and he is wisest who walks timorously, shunning carelessness in a world where sins abound.

They are well advised that master wisdom's secret; much cause for thankfulness she bestows on him who finds her. Wise man that has the gift of utterance does more than wisely live; no stranger to truth and right, he is a fountain of true sayings and of right awards.

Do not follow the counsel of appetite;

¹ Literally, 'it is not possible that all things should be in man'. ² Literally, 'shew thy conversation', or perhaps, 'shew thy conversion'—the point is the same in either case. The Greek has, 'shew thy conversion at the time of transgressions', it is not clear in what sense. ³ The Latin has simply 'praying', but this misses the emphasis of the context, this paragraph being evidently concerned with getting things done in good time. ⁴ Literally 'prepare thy mind' (for the fulfilment of the vow with which the petition was accompanied). ⁵ Literally, this verse reads: 'Remember anger in the day of the end, and a time of retribution in the turning of the face'. It is ordinarily interpreted as meaning 'Remember the anger (which God will shew) at the end of the world (or, at the time of thy death), and the time of retribution (which will consist) in the turning away of his face'. But it is surely incredible that verse 24 should have exactly the same grammatical appearance as verse 25, and yet a totally different grammatical construction. Nor is God said to 'turn away his face' when he punishes men, but, on the contrary, when he seems to 'look the other way' and leaves them unpunished; cf. Ps. 9. 32.

31 turn thy back on thy own liking. Pamper those passions of thine, and joy it will 32 bring, but to thy enemies. Love not the carouse, though it be with poor men; they will be vying still one with another in 33 wastefulness. And wouldst thou grow poor with borrowing to pay thy shot, thou with thy empty coffers? That were to grudge thy own life.

19 Let him toil as he will, the sot's purse is empty; little things despise, and little by little thou shalt come to 2 ruin. Wine and women, what a trap for the loyalty of the wise, how hard a test of good 3 sense! He will go from bad to worse, that clings to a harlot's love; waste and worm shall have him for their prize; one gibbet
the more, one living soul the less.

4 Rash heart that lightly trusts shall lose all; forfeit thy own right to live, and none 5 will pity thee. A foul blot it is, to take pride in wrong-doing; a courting of death, to despise reproof; a riddance of much 6 mischief, to forswear chattering. Who forfeits his own right to live, will live to rue it; who loves cruelty, blots his own name.

7 Malicious word if thou hear, or harsh, do not repeat it; never wilt thou be the loser.
8 Speak not out thy own thought for friend and foe to hear alike, nor ever, if thou hast 9 done wrong, discover the secret. He that hears it will be on his guard, and eye thee askance, as if to avert fresh fault of thine;
such will be all his demeanour to thee 10 thenceforward.¹ Hast thou heard a tale to thy neighbour's disadvantage? Take it to the grave with thee. Courage, man! it will 11 not burst thee. A fool with a secret labours as with child, and groans till he is de-12 livered of it; out it must come, like an arrow stuck in a man's thigh, from that reckless heart.

13 Confront thy friend with his fault; it may be he knows nothing of the matter, and can clear himself; if not, there is hope 14 he will amend. Confront him with the word spoken amiss; it may be, he never said it, or if say it he did, never again will he repeat it. Be open with thy friend; 15 tongues will still be clattering,² and thou 16

dost well to believe less than is told thee.
Slips there are of the tongue when mind is innocent; what tongue was ever perfectly 17 guarded? Confront thy neighbour with his fault ere thou quarrellest with him, and let 18
the fear of the most High God do its work.

What is true wisdom? Nothing but the fear of God. And since the fear of God is contained in all true wisdom, it must be directed by his law; wisdom is none in fol- 19 lowing the maxims of impiety, prudence is none in scheming as the wicked scheme.
Cunning rogues they may be, yet alto- 20 gether abominable; a fool he must ever be called, that lacks the true wisdom.³ Better 21
a simpleton that wit has none, yet knows fear, than a man of great address, that breaks the law of the most High. Exact 22 and adroit even a rogue may be; it is an-23 other thing to utter the plain word that tells the whole truth. Here is one that wears the garb of penance for wicked ends, his heart full of guile; here is one that bows and 24 scrapes, and walks with bent head, feigning not to see what is best left unnoticed, and all because he is powerless to do thee 25 a harm; if the chance of villainy comes, he will take it. Yet a man's looks betray him; 26 a man of good sense will make himself known to thee at first meeting; the clothes 27
he wears, the smile on his lips, his gait, will all make thee acquainted with a man's character.

Reproof there is that no good brings, as 28
the event shews; the mistaken reproof that anger prompts in a quarrel. And a man may shew prudence by holding his tongue.

20 Better the complaint made than the grudge secretly nursed. When a man confesses his fault, do not cut him short in mid utterance.

Redress⁴ sought by violence no more 2

¹ ov. 8, 9: The sense of the Greek text is: 'Do not tell tales about friend or foe; bring nothing to light, unless it were sin in thee (to keep silent). Friend or foe will hear of it, and will keep thee under his eye, waiting for the opportunity to shew his hatred of thee'.

² Literally, 'for often there is competition', i.e., in the retailing of scandal; the same word is used by the Latin version as in 18. 32 above. The Greek text has, 'often there is slander'.

³ The first half of this verse runs, both in the Greek and in the Latin, 'There is a wickedness (or, wrongfulness), and it is an abomination'; a phrase which means little and does not suit the context. Evidently the Hebrew original contained some word which might be interpreted either as 'prudence' or as 'wickedness'; e.g., the word used in the former sense by Prov. 1. 4, and in the latter sense by Jer. 11. 15.

⁴ The Latin version substitutes 'false award' for 'redress', but it is doubtful whether this interpretation improves the sense of a passage already obscure.

content shall bring thee than eunuch's lust for maid.

4 Well it is to be reprov'd, and to confess thy fault, and be rid of all such guilt as thou hast incurred knowingly.

5 A man may be the wiser for remaining dumb, where the glib talker grows wearisome; the silent man, has he nothing to say? Or is he waiting for the right time to say it? Wisdom keeps its utterance in reserve, where the fool's vanity cannot wait. The babbler cuts his own throat; claim more than thy right, and all men are thy enemies.

9 For a mind ill trained, success is failure, winning is losing. Gift given may bring thee nothing in return, or twice its worth. Honour achieved may belittle a man, and modesty bring him renown. What use to make a good bargain, if thou must pay for it sevenfold?

13 Word of wise man endears him; the fool spends his favours in vain. Little will the fool's gift profit thee; seven times magnified is all he sees.¹ The paltrier the gift, the longer the admonitions that go with it, and every word of his an incitement to anger. Out upon the man who lends to-day, and will have the loan restored to-morrow! The fool has no friends, nor can win love by all his favours; they are but parasites that eat at his table; loud and long they will laugh over him; so injudiciously he bestows gifts worth having, and gifts nothing worth.

20 Slip of a liar's tongue is like slip from roof to ground; a villain's end is not long a-coming.

21 An ungracious man is no more regarded, than some idle tale that is ever on the lips of the ill-bred.

22 No weighty saying but offends in a fool's mouth; sure it is that he will bring it out unseasonably.

23 Some avoid wrong only because they lack the means to do it; idle they remain, yet rest they cannot.²

24 Some for very shame have courted their own ruin, resolv'd, though that opinion were worthless enough, to sacrifice themselves for another's good opinion. Some, too, for shame, make their friends high-sounding promises, and thereby gain nothing, but lose a friend.

A lie is a foul blot upon a man's name, yet nothing so frequent on ill-guarded lips. Worse than a thief is one who is ever lying, and to no better end may he look forward. He lives without honour that lies without scruple, and shame is at his side continually.

The wise word brings a man to honour; prudence will endure thee to the great. Till ground, and fill barn; live uprightly, and attain honour; win prince, and escape harm.

Hospitality here, a gift there, how they blind the eyes of justice! No better gag to silence reproof.

Wisdom hidden is wasted, is treasure that never sees the light of day; silence is rightly used when it masks folly, not when it is the grave of wisdom.

21 Sinned if thou hast, my son, be not emboldened to sin further; to prayer betake thee, and efface the memory of sins past. Sin dread thou not less than the serpent's encounter; its fangs will not miss thee, if once thou come close. Teeth so sharp no lion ever had, to catch human prey, nor ever two-edged sword gave wound so incurable as the law's defiance. Browbeat and oppress the poor, thy own wealth shall dwindle; riches that are grown too great the proud cannot long enjoy; pride shrivels wealth. Swiftly comes their doom, because the poor man's plea reached their ears, but never their hearts.³

Where reproof is unregarded, there goes the sinner; no God-fearing man but will come to a better mind.

To the glib speaker, fame comes from far and wide; only the wise man knows the slips of his own heart.

Wouldst thou build thy fortunes on earnings that are none of thine? As well mightest thou lay in stones for winter fuel.

¹ Literally, 'his eyes are sevenfold', a phrase which is sometimes understood as meaning that he expects a sevenfold return for his gift. But this meaning does not seem to be borne out either by usage or by the context, which emphasizes only the self-importance of the clumsy giver. But it must be admitted that the interpretation of this whole paragraph cannot be reached with certainty. ² Literally, 'he will be conscience-stricken in his repose'. The Greek inserts a negative. ³ Literally, 'The pleas of the poor man will come from the mouth as far as his ears'. Some interpret this as meaning the ears of divine justice, but there is no hint of this in the text.

10 When knaves come together, it is like heaping up tow; the flame burns all the brighter.

11 How smoothly paved is the path of sinners! Yet death lies at the end of it, and darkness, and doom.

12 If thou wouldst be master of thy own thought, first keep the law; no wisdom or discernment but is the fruit of God's fear.

14 Without shrewdness¹ thou wilt never advance in the school of virtue; yet shrewdness there is that breeds abundance of mischief; where the stream runs foul, there can be no rightness of mind. Where true wisdom is, there discernment flows in full tide, there prudence springs up, an inexhaustible fountain of life.

17 Heart of fool is leaking bucket, that loses all the wisdom it learns. Truths that wisdom will prize and cherish, the profligate hears no less, but hearing despises, and casts them to the winds. Listening to a fool is like journeying with a heavy pack; there is no pleasing the ear, where sense is none. How they hang on the lips of a wise man, the folk assembled, ay, and ponder in their hearts over the word said! A fool takes refuge in wise talk as a man takes shelter in a ruin; learning without sense, that cannot abide scrutiny. To the fool, instruction seems but a fetter to clog him, gyves that cramp his wrist. A fool laughs loud; smiling, the wise compress their lips.

24 Precious as an ornament of gold, close-fitting as a bracelet to the right arm, is instruction to a wise man. Folly sets foot over every threshold, where the experienced mind stands, as in a royal presence, abashed; folly peeps in at windows, where experience waits patiently without; listens thoughtlessly behind open doors, where prudence hangs back for very shame.² Fools break out into rash utterance, where the prudent are at pains to weigh their words; with the one, to think is to speak, with the other, to speak is to think.

30 Let the sinner curse the foul fiend that spites him,³ on his own head the curse shall recoil. The tale-bearer is his own enemy, shunned by all; court his friendship, and thou wilt court hatred; shut lips and calm judgement shall bring thee a good name.

22 What ill names shall we hurl at the sluggard? Stone from the sewers, that has no man's good word; dung from the midden, for all to wash their hands of him.

Spoilt son thou shalt beget to thy shame, spoilt daughter to thy great loss; bring she to her husband no dower of modesty, her shame shall cost thee dear. Shame the father shall have, shame the husband; fit company for sinners, she will have no good word from either of these.

Speech may be out of season, like music in time of mourning; not so the rod, not so chastisement; there lies ever wisdom.⁴ Teach a fool, and mend a pot with glue; better audience thou shalt have from the sleeper thou wouldst awake from a deep dream; thy wise speech ended, Why, what's to do?⁵ ask fool and dreamer alike.

For the dead that lacks light, for the fool that lacks wit, never cease to mourn; yet not for the dead overmuch, since rest is his, but the fool's life is empty beyond the emptiness of death; seven days the dead are mourned, but the fool, the godless fool, all his life long.

Linger never with a fool in talk, nor cast in thy lot with his; keep clear of him, as thou wouldst keep clear of mischief, and of sin's pollution; go thy way, and let him go his; thou shalt sleep the sounder, for having no folly of his to cloud thy spirits. Nought like lead for heaviness? Ay, but its name is fool. With sand or salt or iron bars burden thyself, not with rash and godless company, not with a fool.

Underpin the foundations with timber balks, thy house shall withstand all shock; nor less shall he, whose heart stands resolved in the counsels of prudence; no hour of peril can daunt that steadfast heart. Palisade set on high ground, with no better protection against the wind's fury than cheap rubble, is but of short

¹ In the Latin version, 'wisdom', in the Greek text, 'knavery'; cf. note on 19. 20. ² vv. 25-27: These verses are usually understood as an instruction in the usages of polite society. It is more probable that the sacred author is denouncing, under a metaphor, the habit of rash enquiry. ³ 'The foul fiend' may, in the Hebrew text, have meant simply 'his enemy'. ⁴ The use of words in this verse is very strained, and it is likely that the Hebrew text was corrupt. ⁵ The Greek text here has, 'What is it?' The Latin version ('Who is it?') would apply to the sleeper, but gives no satisfactory sense as applied to the fool.

22 endurance; faint heart that thinks a fool's thoughts will not be proof against sudden terror. Faint heart that thinks a fool's thoughts...

23 ... shall never be afraid; no more shall he, that still keeps true to God's commandments.¹

24 Chafed eye will weep, chafed heart will shew resentment. One stone flung, and the birds are all on the wing; one taunt uttered, and the friendship is past repair.

26 Hast thou drawn sword against thy friend?

27 Be comforted; all may be as it was. Hast thou assailed him with angry words? Thou mayst yet be reconciled. But the taunt, the contemptuous reproach, the secret betrayed, the covert attack, all these mean a friend lost.

28 Keep faith with a friend when his purse is empty, thou shalt have joy of his good fortune; stand by him when he falls upon evil times, thou shalt be partner in his prosperity.

30 Chimney-fumes and smoke rising, of fire forewarn thee; curse uttered, and threat, and insult, of bloodshed.

31 Never will I be ashamed to greet friend of mine, never deny myself to him; let harm befall me for his sake, I care not.

32 ... All that hear of it will keep their distance from him.²

33 Oh for a sentry to guard this mouth of mine, a seal to keep these lips inviolate! From that snare may I be safe, nor ever let my tongue betray me!

23 Lord, that gavest my life and art the ruler of it, never may these lips of mine have me at their mercy, never let them betray me into a fall! Be my thoughts ever under the lash, my heart disciplined by true wisdom; let it never deal gently with their unwitting offences, or gloss over the wrong they do! What if my transgressions should go, all unobserved, from bad to worse, if I should sin ever oftener, and add fault to fault? What humiliation were this, in full view of my enemies; how would my ill-wishers triumph at the sight!

Lord, that gavest my life and art the divine ruler of it, let them not have me at their mercy; never let haughty looks be mine, never the assaults of passion come near me. Let the itch of gluttony pass me by, nor ever carnal lust overtake me; do not leave me, Lord, at the mercy of a shameless, an unprofitable mind!

Here is the lore, my sons, of the tongue's use; hold fast by it, and thy own lips shall never be thy undoing, to ensnare thee in heinous wrong. What is it but his lying that entraps the sinner, what snare but their own speech catches the proud, the slanderers? That mouth of thine do not inure to oath-taking; therein lie many perils; wilt thou take God's name often on thy lips, and of holy titles make thy constant invocation, thy word is forfeit to them. Slave that is evermore under the lash cannot escape without bruises a many; thy often swearing, thy often invoking, shall lead thee into guilt at last. Oaths a many, sins a many; punishment shall be still at thy doors. Forswear thyself, thou shalt be held to account for it; forget the oath, it is at thy double peril; and though it were lightly taken, thou shalt find no excuse in that; plague shall light on all thou hast, in amends for it.

Sin of speech there is, too, that has death for its counterpart; God send it be not found in Jacob's chosen race;³ from men of tender conscience every such thought is far away, not theirs to wallow in evil-doing.

Beware of habituating thy tongue to lewd talk; therein is matter of offence.

Not thine to bring shame on father and mother. There are great ones all around thee; what if thyself God should disregard, when thou art in their company? Then shall this ill custom of thine strike thee dumb⁴ and bring thee to great dishonour; thou wilt wish thou hadst never been, and rue the day of thy birth.

Let a man grow into a habit of railing speech, all his days there is no amending him.

Two sorts of men are sinners above

¹ The Latin text here is evidently confused, and perhaps defective.

² vv. 31, 32: It is difficult to make these verses into a continuous sentence; to render 'let harm befall me through his agency' is a mis-translation of the Greek. There has perhaps been an omission in the text.

³ There can be little doubt that the reference is to blasphemy (see Lev. 24. 16).

⁴ 'What if thyself God should disregard, when thou art in their company? Then shall this ill custom of thine strike thee dumb'; literally, 'Lest by chance God should forget thee (in the Greek, thou shouldst forget) in their presence, and be made foolish by thy habit'. It is difficult to be certain either of the exact meaning of the passage, or of its relevance to the context.

measure, and a third I can name that calls 22 down vengeance. There is a hot temper, all fire and fury, that cannot die down till 23 it has had its fill. A man that is corrupted by the prompting of his own lust¹ will not 24 be content until it bursts into flame. To the fornicator, one pasture-ground is as good as another; there is no wearying him till he 25 has tried all. Out on the man that takes his life in his hands and comes between another's 26 sheets! There is none to witness it, thinks he; darkness all about, and walls to shelter me,
 and none watching; what have I to fear?
 27 Sins like mine the most High will never mark.
 Of that all-seeing eye no heed takes he;
 fear of a man has driven the fear of God 28 from his thoughts; of human eyes only he shuns the regard.² What, are not God's eyes a thousand times more piercing than the sun's 29 rays? Do they not watch all the doings of men, the depths of earth, and man's heart, every secret open to their scrutiny? God, that knows all he means to make, does he not watch over all he has made?

30 In full view of the open street the adulterer shall pay the penalty; loud, as for a runaway horse, the hue and cry; where he thought to 31 escape, justice outruns him. All the world shall witness his shame, that left the fear 32 of the Lord unregarded. Nor less guilty is she who plays her husband false, giving him for heir a child that is no son of his. Broken, 33 the law of the most High; her plighted troth forsaken; sons borne to a paramour, has she 34 not thrice played the wanton? Needs must she confront the folk assembled, nor shall those 35 sons of hers be spared; such roots must not 36 burgeon, such boughs never bear fruit; she leaves but the memory of an accursed name, 37 a name for ever dishonoured. Warning she gives to after ages that God's fear is best, 38 nor sweeter lot is any than the divine law well observed. Follow the Lord, and it shall be thy renown; a long life is the reward it shall bring thee.

24 Hear now how wisdom speaks in her own regard, of the honour God has given her, of the boast she utters

¹ Literally, 'by the mouth of his flesh'. It would be easiest to understand what are the three sins mentioned in verse 21, if we could suppose that the Hebrew text intended, in verse 23, the sin of gluttony (cf. verse 6 above). But some think that the whole passage, including verse 22, refers to sins against chastity.

² The Latin version, evidently by an error, gives at the end of the verse 'the eyes of men fear him', instead of 'the eyes of men frighten him'.

among the nation that is hers. In the court 2 of the most High, in the presence of all his host, she makes her boast aloud, and here, 3 amid the holy gathering of her own people, that high renown of hers is echoed; praise 4 is hers from God's chosen, blessing from blessed lips.

I am that word, she says, that was uttered 5 by the mouth of the most High, the primal birth before ever creation began. Through 6 me light rose in the heavens, inexhaustible;
 it was I that covered, as with a mist, the 7 earth. In high heaven was my dwelling-place, my throne a pillar of cloud; none but I 8 might span the sky's vault, pierce the depth of the abyss, walk on the sea's waves; no 9 part of earth but gave a resting-place to my feet.

People was none, nor any race of men, 10 but I had dominion there; high and low, my power ruled over men's hearts. Yet 11 with all these I sought rest in vain; it is among the Lord's people that I mean to dwell.
 He who fashioned me, he, my own 12 Creator, has found me a dwelling-place; and his command to me was that I should 13 find my home in Jacob, throw in my lot with Israel, take root among his chosen 14 race. From the beginning of time, before the worlds, he had made me, unailing to 15 all eternity; in his own holy dwelling-place
 I had waited on his presence; and now, 16 no less faithfully, I made Sion my stronghold, the holy city my resting-place, Jerusalem my throne. My roots spread out among the people that enjoys his favour, my God has granted me a share in his own domain; where his faithful servants are gathered I love to linger.

I grew to my full stature as cedar grows 17 on Lebanon, as cypress on Sion's hill; or 18 a palm tree in Cades, or a rose bush in Jericho; grew like some fair olive in the valley, some plane-tree in a well-watered 19 street. Cinnamon and odorous balm have no scent like mine; the choicest myrrh has 20 no such fragrance. Perfumed is all my dwelling-place with storax, and galbanum, and onycha, and stacte, and frankincense 21 uncrushed; the smell of me is like pure balm. Mastic-tree spread not its branches 22 so wide, as I the hopes I proffer of glory 23 and of grace. No vine ever yielded fruit so fragrant; the enjoyment of honour and riches is the fruit I bear.

24 It is I that give birth to all noble loving, all reverence, all true knowledge, and the 25 holy gift of hope. From me comes every grace of faithful observance, from me all 26 promise of life and vigour. Hither turn your steps, all you that have learned to long for me; take your fill of the increase I yield.
 27 Never was honey so sweet as the influence I inspire, never honey-comb as the gift I 28 bring; mine is a renown that endures, age 29 after age. Eat of this fruit, and you will yet hunger for more; drink of this wine, and 30 your thirst for it is still unquenched. He who listens to me will never be disappointed; he who lives by me will do no 31 wrong; he who reads my lesson aright will find in it life eternal.

32 What things are these I write of? What but the life-giving book that is the coven-33 ant of all truth? What but the law Moses enjoined, with the duties it prescribes, the inheritance it bestows, the promises it 34 holds out? Solemnly he pledged himself to give his servant David an heir most valiant, that should hold his royal throne 35 for ever. Who but he¹ can make wisdom flow, deep as the stream Phison sends 36 down, or Tigris, in the spring; make the tide of prudence run, strong as Euphrates' 37 own, or Jordan's tide in the month of harvest; make obedience rise to its full height, like Nile² or Gehon when men 38 gather the vintage? He it was that first attained to wisdom's secret, never since 39 made known to any less than himself; so deep are her thoughts, sea-deep, so dark her counsels, dark as the great abyss.

40 From me rivers flow, says Wisdom, deep rivers.

41 And what am I?³ A conduit that carries off the river's overflow, its channel, the 42 aqueduct that waters a park. I thought to refresh my well-set garden, give drink to 43 the fruits that fringe its border; and all at once my channel overflowed, this stream of mine had nigh turned into a sea! Teaching is here like the dawn for brightness, shedding its rays afar. Nay, I will make my way down to the depths of earth, and visit those who sleep there, and to such as trust in the Lord I will bring light. My teaching shall yet flow on, faithful as prophesy, heirloom to all such as make wisdom their quest, and to their children yet, until the holy days come. See how I have toiled, not for my own sake merely, but for all such as covet wisdom!

25 Three sights warm my heart; God and man wish them well: peace in the clan, good will among neighbours, man and wife well matched. Three sorts of men move my spleen, so that I am fain to grudge them life itself: poor man that is proud, rich man that is a liar, old man that is fond and foolish.

The store youth never puts by, shall old age enjoy? Good judgement well matches grey hairs, for still the elders must be men of prudence; wisdom for the old, discernment for senators, and the gift of counsel!
 No crown have old men like their long experience, no ornament like the fear of God.

Nine envious thoughts came suddenly into my mind, and a tenth I will add for good measure. Happy is he that has joy of his children; that lives to see his enemies' downfall. Happiness it is to share thy home with a faithful wife; to have a tongue that never betrays thee; to serve only thy betters. Happiness it is to have a true friend. . . .⁴ and to speak the right word to an ear that listens. Happy is he that wisdom gains and skill; yet is he no match for one who fears the Lord. The fear of God, is a gift beyond all gifts; blessed the man that receives it, he has no equal. Fear the Lord, and thou shalt learn to love him; cling close, and thou shalt learn to trust him.

There is no sadness but what touches the heart, no mischief but what comes from woman. A man will endure any wound but the heart's wound, and any

¹ Some would render, 'What but this . . .', referring to the Law of Moses.

² Both the Latin and the Greek have, 'like the light'; but the context makes it clear that they have overlooked a single vowel in the word which must have stood in the Hebrew original.

³ vv. 41-46: Commentators are not agreed whether these words are to be understood as spoken by Wisdom, like verse 40, or by Ecclesiasticus himself, like verse 47 (cf. 33, 18 below).

⁴ It seems possible that one of the nine beatitudes has fallen out through a textual error, unless we reckon wisdom and skill in verse 13 as separate sources of happiness.

60 malice but a woman's; just so he will 21 endure any annoyance but from his ill-22 wishers, any sentence imposed on him but 23 by his enemies.¹ No head so venomous as the viper's, nor any anger like a woman's.
 13 Better share thy home with lion and serpent both, than with an ill woman's com-14 pany. A woman's ill will changes the very look of her; grim as a bear's her visage, and she goes like one mourning. See where he 5 sits among his neighbours, that husband of hers, groaning deep and sighing as he 6 listens to them! All other mischief is a slight thing beside the mischief an ill woman does; may she fall to a sinner's lot!
 7 Better climb sandy cliff with the feet of old age, than be a peace-loving man mated 8 with a scold. Let not thy eye be caught by a woman's beauty; not for her beauty 9 desire her; think of woman's rage, her shamelessness, the dishonour she can do 10 thee, how hard it goes with a man if his 11 wife will have the uppermost. Crushed spirits, a clouded brow, a heavy heart, all 2 this is an ill woman's work; faint hand and flagging knee betoken one unblessed in his 3 marriage. Through a woman sin first began; such fault was hers, we all must die 4 for it. Thy cistern thou wouldst not let leak, ever so little; and wouldst thou let a 5 wanton wife roam at large? Leave she once thy side, thou shalt be the laughing-stock 6 of thy enemies; best cut away the ill growth from thy flesh; she will ever be taking advantage of thee.

26 Happy the man that has a faithful wife; his span of days is doubled.
 2 A wife industrious is the joy of her husband, and crowns all his years with peace.
 3 He best thrives that best wives; where men fear God, this is the reward of their service, 4 good cheer given to rich and poor alike;
 day in, day out, never a mournful look.
 5 Three things daunt me somewhat, a 6 fourth I dare not face. Gossip of the 7 streets, the judgement of the rabble, and the false charge preferred, all these make 8 death itself seem a light thing. But there is no affliction wrings the heart like a woman's jealousy; once a woman grows 9 jealous, her tongue is a scourge to all alike.

 Easier to guide an unsteady team of oxen 10 than an ill woman; easier to hold a snake than to manage her. Woman that is a sot, 11 vexation shall bring thee, and great dishonour; there is no hiding her shame.
 Haughty gaze and lowered eye-lid, there 12 goes a wanton. Headstrong daughter must be held with a tight rein, or she will find 13 opportunity to bestow her favours; beware 14 of that shameless eye, nor think it strange if she defies thee. Reckless thou wilt find 15 her as thirsty traveller that puts his mouth to the spring and drinks what water he can get; no stake but she will make fast by it, no arrow comes amiss to her archery, till of dalliance she has had enough.

Great content an industrious wife brings 16 to her husband; health to every bone of his body is that good sense of hers. No better 17 gift of God to man than a prudent woman that can hold her tongue; a soul well dis- 18 ciplined is beyond all price. Grace so gra-19 cious is none as woman's faithfulness and woman's modesty; woman's continence 20 there is no valuing. Sun dawning in heaven cannot match the lustre a good wife sheds on her home, and that beauty lasts into 22 ripe age, like the glow of lights on the holy lamp-stand. Firm as golden pillar in silver 23 socket rest the feet of steadfast woman on the ground she treads; and firm as founda- 24 tions built for all time on solid rock is holy woman's loyalty to God's commandments.²

Two sad sights my heart knows, and one 25 more that fills it with indignation; warrior 26 left to starve, and wise counsellor unregarded, and a man that leaves right 27 living for ill-doing, ripe for God's vengeance.

Two dangers I see that are hard to 28 overcome. How shall a merchant be cured of careless dealing, or a huckster for his lying talk find pardon?

27 Sin comes often of an empty purse; nothing distorts the eye like the love of riches. Stake that is held 2

¹ vs. 20, 21: It is difficult to feel certain that our versions have preserved the exact sense of the original. These two verses entirely break up the continuity of the context; in verse 23 the Greek makes matters worse by giving us 'like an enemy's' instead of 'like a woman's'. The word translated 'sentence' in verse 21 is literally 'vengeance'; and it is hard to see from what other class of people than one's enemies vengeance could reasonably be expected.

² A few Greek manuscripts insert here nine more verses upon the subject of women.

between two stones cannot escape; nor may sin be avoided when there is seller on this side, buyer on that. Wrong done shall be undone, and the doer of it as well; hold fast to thy fear of the Lord, or thy wealth shall soon come to ruin.

The sieve shaken, nothing is left but refuse; so thou wilt find a man's poverty in his thought.¹

Pottery is tested in the furnace, man in the crucible of suffering.

Good fruit comes from a tree well dressed, and a man will be in word what he is in thought; do not give thy opinion of a man till he has spoken; there lies the proof.

Make right-doing thy quest, and thou wilt not miss the mark; this shall be a robe of honour to clothe thee, a welcome guest in thy house, to watch over thee continually, and to be thy stronghold at the hour when all is made known.

Bird mates with bird, and he that shews faithfulness faithfulness shall meet.

The lion waits in ambush for his prey; leave the right path, and sin shall be ever at thy heels.

Unfailing as the sun is the wisdom of a devout mind; moon and fool change continually.

When thou hast fools for thy company, thy word can wait; be closeted continually with the wise.

Out upon the wearisome talk of sinners, that of sin and its dalliance makes a jest! Out upon the man that uses oaths lightly; hair stands upright at his blaspheming, and ears are stopped! Out upon the proud, that provoke bloodshed with their quarrelling, and by their cursing offend all who listen!

Betray thy friend's secret, and all confidence is lost; never more shalt thou have friend to comfort thee. Use such a man lovingly, and keep faith with him; if once thou hast betrayed him, court no more his company. Friendship thus killed, thy friend is dead to thee; bird let go from the hand is not lost more irremediably; he is gone, like hind released from the snare, gone beyond thy pursuit. The wound that hurts a man's soul there is no healing; the bitter taunt may yet be unsaid, but once the secret is out all is misery, all is despair.

Sly glance of the false friend! How shall a man be rid of him? Here in thy presence, he smooths his brow, and is all in wonderment at thy wise sayings; but ere long he will change his tune, and lend thy words an ill colour. Above all else, he earns my hatred; God's hatred too, I doubt not.

None can throw stone in air but at his own head's peril, nor ever was blow struck treacherously, but the traitor must have his share of hurt; a man may fall into the pit he dug, trip on the stone he set in his neighbour's path, perish in the snare he laid for another. Plot ill, and the ill shall recoil on thyself, springing up beyond all thy expectation.

For the proud, mockery and shame! Vengeance, like a lion, couches in wait for them.

For all who triumph at the ill fortune of the just, a snare to catch them, and a long remorse before death takes them!

Rancour and rage are detestable things both; and the sinner has both in store.

28 He that will be avenged brings on himself the Lord's vengeance; watch and ward shall be kept over his sins continually. Forgive thy neighbour his fault, and for thy own sins thy prayer shall win pardon; should man bear man a grudge, and yet look to the Lord for healing? Should he refuse mercy to his fellow-man, yet ask forgiveness, should he think to appease God, while he, a mortal man, is obdurate? Who shall plead for his acquittal? Look to thy last end, and leave thy quarrelling; with the grave's corruption God's commandments threaten thee.² Thy God fear, thy neighbour forgive; the covenant of the most High remember, thy neighbour's slip forget.

Keep clear of quarrelling, and sin shall less abound. Quick temper sets feuds a-raging, and wicked men there are that will embroil fast friends, and stir up strife

¹ This obscure maxim may be interpreted in several ways, none of which is quite satisfactory. There may have been an error in the text: 'poverty' is represented in the Greek by a second word for 'refuse', and in the Latin by an abstract noun which signifies 'not knowing which way to turn'.² Literally, in the Latin, 'Corruption and death threaten in his commandments'; in the Greek '(look to) corruption and death, and abide in his commandments'.

among folk that lived at peace. More fuel, more fire; strong man will rage the more, rich man push his vengeance further.

Heat is gendered by the haste of rivalry, and bloodshed by hot blood; but it is tongue of witness that brings death. Spark blown upon will blaze, spat upon will die out; see how of both the mouth is arbiter! A curse on every tale-bearer and traducer that disturbs the world's peace! Tongue that comes between two friends, how many it has exiled, sent them to wander far away, how many rich cities dismantled, great houses demolished, what armies it has routed, what proud nations brought to ruin, what noble women it has driven out from their homes, and left all their toil unrewarded! Pay heed to it, and thou shalt never rest more, never find friend in whom thou canst trust. Whip that lashes does but bruise the skin; tongue that lashes will break bones; the sword has killed many, the tongue more.

Blessed is he that is preserved from the tongue's wickedness, that has never felt its fury, never borne its yoke or worn its chains; that yoke of iron, those chains of bronze! Here is death worse than death itself, here is loss the grave cannot outvie. Not for ever shall its reign persist, but where wicked men go it still follows; the just it cannot consume, but if thou forsake God thou shalt encounter it, a fire that burns thee and will not be quenched, an assault more perilous than assault of lion or pard. Fence thy ears about with thorns, and give the wicked tongue no hearing; make fast thy mouth with bolt and bar. Melt down gold and silver of thine, and get thee a balance that shall weigh thy words, a bridle that shall be the rule of thy mouth;¹ do all that lies in thee to keep thy tongue from speaking amiss, lest lurking enemies triumph over thy ruin, the fatal and final ruin that shall be thine.

29 Heart full of kindness and hand full of comfort will keep the commandment, Lend to thy neighbour.

Neighbour must borrow easily when he needs, must repay readily when his need is over. Keep thy bond, deal faithfully, and thou shalt never lack. Out upon the man that treats loan as treasure trove, and is a burden to his benefactor! What, kiss the hand that gives, and make humble promises of repayment; then, when the debt falls due, ask for grace, and complain peevishly of hard times? Pay grudgingly when pay thou canst, offer but half the sum, and count it a windfall for the lender? Or, if thou canst not, disown the debt and make an enemy of him, rewarding thy benefactor not with due honour, but with angry curse and reproach? What wonder if many refuse to lend, not churlishly but for fear of wilful wrong? Yet I would have thee patient with needy folk; do not keep them waiting for thy charity; befriend them, as the law commands, nor ever send them away in their misery empty-handed. It is thy brother, thy friend that asks; better lose thy money than leave it to rust in a vault. Lay up store for thyself by obeying the commandments of the most High; more than gold it shall profit thee; the good deed treasured in poor men's hearts shall ransom thee from all harm, shall more avail than stout shield or lance to ward off thy enemies.

Kindness bids thee go bail for thy neighbour; he has lost all shame if he plays thee false.² And if another goes bail for thee, do not forget the benefit done thee; he gave his life for thine. It is right foully done to play a surety false; wouldst thou treat his goods as if they were thy own? Wouldst thou, ungrateful wretch, leave thy ransomer to suffer for it? Men have gone bail ere now for shameless friends that so abandoned them. By going bail for scoundrels, men of good fortune have fallen upon ruin and shipwreck; men that held their heads high must now wander far and wide, exiles in strange countries. Leave godless sinners to become sureties to their ruin; men that take rash ventures to fall into the law's clutches. For thyself, relieve thy neighbour as thy means allow, but never to thy own entanglement.

¹ vv. 28, 29: The Greek here differs from the Latin considerably, but its effect is the same, and makes it clear that the sacred author is alluding, all through this paragraph, not to the danger of incurring calumny, but to the danger of falling into a habit of calumniating others. ² vv. 19 sqq.: In Prov. 17, 18, and elsewhere a warning is given against the folly of becoming surety for a friend, and verses 26, 27 of the present chapter seem to imply the same moral. These warnings perhaps refer to rash commercial speculations; where it is a question of charity, we may have the duty of making ourselves responsible on behalf of some poor man, at the risk of his defrauding us.

28 What are man's first needs? Water, and bread, and clothing, and the privacy of a 29 home. Better the poor man's fare under his roof of bare boards, than to be guest at a splendid banquet, and home have none.
30 Make much of the little thou hast; never be it thine to bear the reproach of a wanderer.
31 A wretched life it is, passing on from house to house to find a welcome;
that welcome found, thou wilt lack all confidence, 32 and sit there mumchance. Then, when thou hast helped to entertain, with food and drink, the guests that owe thee no thanks, thou wilt have a poor reward 33 for it: Up, wanderer! Lay me a fresh table, and what lies before thee hand to others; 34 I have honoured guests coming, and thou must make way for them; a kinsman of mine stands in need of my hospitality!
35 Bitter words for an honest man to hear; shall he owe his bread to one that reviles him as homeless?

30 Inure thy son to the rod, as thou lovest him; so shalt thou have comfort of him¹ in thy later years, nor go about knocking softly at thy neighbour's doors. Discipline thy son, and thou shalt take pride in him; he shall be thy boast among thy familiars. Discipline thy son, if thou wouldest make thy ill-wishers envy thee, wouldest hold thy head high among thy friends. Father that dies lives on, if a worthy son he has begotten; here is a sight to make life joyous for him, and death not all unhappiness, and a bold front he keeps before his ill-wishers; such an heir will shew loyalty to his race, its foes warding off, his friends requiting. Let a man pamper his children, binding up every wound,² his heart wrung by every cry, and he shall find spoil son headstrong and stubborn as a horse unbroken. Cosset thy son and make a darling of him, it shall be to thy own anxiety, thy own remorse. Smile at his follies now, and the bitter taste of it shall set thy teeth on edge hereafter. Thou canst not afford to give him freedom in his youth, or leave his thoughts unchecked; none is too young to be bent to the yoke,

none is too childish to be worth a drubbing, if thou wouldest not see him wilful and disobedient, to thy heart's unrest. Discipline thy son, be at pains with him, or his shameless ways will be thy downfall.

Poor man sound and strong of body is better off than rich man enfeebled, and racked with disease. Health of the soul, that lies in duty done faithfully, is more worth having than gold or silver; no treasure so rare that it can match bodily strength. Health is best wealth; no comfort wilt thou find like a merry heart. Better the endless repose of death, than life by lingering sickness made irksome. For mouth that refuses nourishment what use in dainties? They are no better than the banquet left on a tomb, little availing yonder idol, that cannot taste or smell. Once the Lord has laid thee by the heels, to do penance for thy sins, thou shalt hanker and sigh for these dainties but as eunuch that fondles maid.

Nor let anxious thoughts fret thy life away; a merry heart is the true life of man, is an unfailing store of holiness; length of years is measured by rejoicing. Thy own self befriend, doing God's will with endurance, and giving all thy heart to the holiness he enjoins, and banish thy sad thoughts; sadness has been the death of many, and no good ever came of it. Jealousy and peevishness shorten a man's days; cares bring old age untimely;
gay and gallant heart is ever feasting, sets to and makes good cheer.

31 Wilt thou pine away with care for riches, lose thy sleep for thinking of it? These solicitudes breed a madness in the brain, such as only grave sickness can expel. Toils rich man for gain, till he can rest and enjoy what is his; toils poor man to fend off need, and when he ceases he is a poor man still. Love money, and thou shalt be called to account for it; thy quest corruption, of corruption thou shalt have thy fill. Many have given themselves up to the lure of gold, and in its beauty found their ruin; its worship was a snare to catch their feet; alas, poor fools that went searching for it, and themselves were lost!

¹ Or possibly, 'so shall he have comfort'.

² The sense given here is that of the Greek; the Latin version, apparently through misunderstanding a rare word in the Greek, gives us the meaningless phrase, 'he will bind up his own wounds for the souls of his sons'.

Blessed is the man who lives, for all his wealth, unproved, who has no greed for gold and puts no trust in his store of riches! Shew us such a man, and we will be loud in his praise; here is a life to wonder at. A man so tested and found perfect wins eternal honour; he kept clear of sin, when sinful ways were easy, did no wrong, when wrong lay in his power. His treasure is safely preserved in the Lord's keeping and wherever faithful men are met, his alms-deeds will be remembered.

Sit thou at a rich man's table, be not quick to remark upon it; it is ill done to cry out, Here is a table well spread! Be sure a covetous eye shall do thee no good; eye is a great coveter, and for that, like no other part of thy face, condemned to weep. Be not quick to reach out thy hand, and be noted, to thy shame, for greed; jostling goes ill with a feast. Learn from thy own conjecture thy neighbour's need; take sparingly the good things set before thee, nor court ill-will by thy gluttony. For manners' sake, leave off eating betimes, or thy greed shall give offence. When there are many about thee, do not be quick to stretch out thy hand, quick to call for wine. For a man well disciplined a little wine is enough; spare thyself the uneasy sleep, the pains that shall rack thee; wakeful nights come of excess, and bile and griping pains. For the temperate man, there is sound sleep; sleep that lasts till morning, and contents his whole being; though thou have been constrained to eat beyond thy wont, thou hast but to leave the table and vomit, and thou shalt find relief, nor come to any bodily harm.

Take good heed, my son, do not belittle this advice of mine; thou shalt live to prove it true. Put thy heart into all thou doest, and no infirmity of purpose shall hinder thee.¹ The generous host is on all men's lips; ever they bear witness to his loyal friendship; the niggard has the ill word of a whole city; men form shrewd judgement of a niggard.

Never challenge hard drinker to a drinking-bout; wine has been the ruin of many. Fire tests the strength of steel; and a proud man fuddled with wine betrays his quality. Easy flow wine, easy flow life, but to men of sober habit; sobriety must drink within measure. To the drunkard,² life is no life at all; wine is death, when it so deprives a man of life. Wine was made for mirth, never for drunkenness; drink wisely, and it shall rejoice thy heart and thy whole being; health it brings to mind and body, wine wisely taken. Wine drunk in excess brings anger and quarrelling and calamities a many; it is the poison of a man's life. What does the false courage of the drunkard? It takes him unawares, and makes him less a man; grievous wounds come of it. When the wine goes round, do not find fault with thy neighbour, or think the worse of him for being merry; never taunt him, never press him to repay the debt.

32 If they will make thee master of the feast, do not give thyself airs; bear thyself as an equal. Make good provision for the guests, and so take thy place among them; thy duty done, recline at ease, and in their pleasure rejoice, accepting the crown that marks their favour, the honour bestowed by their gifts. Speak first, as becomes thy seniority, but with due choice of words; and do not break in when music is a-playing; no need for thy words to flow when none is listening, for thy wisdom to be displayed unseasonably. Music and wine, carbuncle set in gold, music and wine, signet ring of gold and emerald, so the wine be good, and taken in due measure.

Keep silence, and give others a hearing; it shall win thee a name for modesty; if thou art but a young man, be loth to speak even of what concerns thee, and if thou art pressed for an answer, give it in brief. For the most part keep thy knowledge concealed under a mask of silence and enquiry; nor ever be familiar among great men, nor garrulous among the wise. Sure as the lightning is sign of a storm, men's good word is the sign of a modest nature; they will love thee all the better for thy

¹ The bearing of this maxim is very doubtful; we may translate 'sickness' instead of 'infirmity of purpose'.
² v. 33: 'To the drunkard'; literally, 'to him who is lessened by (or, in respect of) wine'. Elsewhere in this book this verb expresses some deficit in personal qualities. The sense 'to him who must go without wine' is admissible, and if it is adopted, the next verse will refer not to immoderate drinking, but to an empty cellar.

15 bashfulness. When the time comes for going, do not linger; get thee gone speedily to thy home, there to divert thyself, and 16 take thy ease, and follow the whim of thy own thoughts, yet innocently and with no 17 word proudly said. And for all this give thanks to God thy maker, that so contents thee with his gifts.

18 If thou fearest the Lord, thou wilt accept the schooling he gives thee, waiting early 19 at his door to win his blessing. In the law, the law's follower finds deep content, the false heart nothing but a snare to catch it.
 20 Those who fear the Lord will discover where right lies, the light of truth shall shine from their awards;¹ the sinner fears to have his life reproved, and will ever be finding precedents for gratifying his own 22 whim. A man of prudence will never throw caution to the winds; his proud 23 enemy feels no dread even upon rashly provoking him, but shall live to rue the assault.² Do nothing, my son, save with 24 consideration, and thy deeds shall not bring thee repentance. Take not some 25 ruinous road that shall trip thee with its boulders; some road where all journeying is difficult³ and thou mayst expose thy life 26 to sudden dangers. Of thy own children beware, be on thy watch against thy own 27 household; be it thine to trust with all thy soul's confidence,⁴ and thou hast kept the 28 commandments. Who trusts in God, keeps well God's command; confidence in him was never disappointed.

33 If a man fears the Lord, he shall meet with no disaster; God will be watching over him, even when his faith is put to the test, and from such disaster will preserve him. A wise man does not grow weary of the law, and the duties it enjoins, 2 and no shipwreck can befall him. If thou art a man of judgement, thou hast only to trust God's commandment, and it will not 4 fail thee; . . . giving a true answer to the question asked. . . .⁵ thou wilt prepare thy plea, and find audience for thy prayer; wilt recollect the teaching given thee, and so satisfy thy questioner. A fool's heart is but a wheel that turns; his are whirling thoughts. Hast thou a friend that will ever be mocking? Be comforted; stallion will ever neigh, ride him who will.

Why is it that one day which dawns, one year, takes precedence of another, when all come of the same sun? God's wisdom it was that so set them apart when he made the sun, and gave it a law to keep; made a succession of seasons, a succession of feast days, when at stated times men must keep holiday. To some he would assign high dignity; others should be lost in the common rabble of days. So it is that all men are built of the same clay; son of Adam is son of earth; yet the Lord, in the plenitude of his wisdom, has marked them off from one another, not giving the same destiny to each. For some, his blessing; he will advance them, will set them apart and claim them as his own. For some, his ban; he will bring them low, and single them out no more. Clay we are in the potter's hands; it is for him who made us to dispose of us; clay is what potter wills it to be, and we are in our maker's hands, to be dealt with at his pleasure. Evil matched with good, life matched with death, sinner matched with man of piety; so everywhere in God's works thou wilt find pairs matched, one against the other.

Think of me as one that has toiled last of all, and goes about gleaning a fruit here, a fruit there, after the vintagers have done. Yet did I trust that I, too, might have God's blessing, and I, too, have filled the wine-press, a vintager like the rest. See how I have toiled, not for my own sake merely, but for all such as covet wisdom! Words for the hearing of all, high and low; you that hold high place in the assembly, never disdain to listen.

Long as thou livest, do not put thyself in the power of others, though it be son or wife, kinsman or friend; do not make over thy goods to another; it is ill to go

¹ Or perhaps 'examples of obedience' (to the Law). ² vv. 22, 23: The language here is very confused, and it seems likely that the true text may have been lost. ³ In the Greek, 'where there is no danger of stumbling'. ⁴ Or perhaps, 'to trust with all confidence in thy own soul', that is, in thyself; this is probably the meaning of the Greek. But, in these later chapters, we have a Hebrew text to consult, which doubtless goes back (though with certain alterations) to the original manuscript from which Jesus, son of Sirach, made his Greek translation. And this, supported by the Syriac version, gives us 'keeps watch over his own soul' instead of 'trusts his own soul'. ⁵ There may be some confusion in the text here; the words 'giving a true answer to the question asked' are connected by the Greek with what goes before, by the Latin with what follows.

21 a-begging for what is thy own. While life 22 and breath is in thee, never change places 23 with another; it is for thy children to 24 ask thee for what they need, not to have 25 thyself for their pensioner. Be at the 26 head of thy own affairs, nor ever tarnish 27 thy renown, until thy days are finished; 28 then, at the hour of thy death, make thy 29 bequests.
 30 Fodder thy ass must have, and the whip, 31 and a pack to bear; thy slave, too, needs 32 food and discipline and hard work. Under 33 duress he toils, what marvel if ease should tempt him? Leave his hands idle, and he will seek to be his own master. The stubborn ox yoke and rein will subdue; slave held to his task is slave bowed to thy will;
 keep rack and stocks for one that is bent on mischief. To the task, no hours of leisure!
 Idleness is a great teacher of ill habit. Toil first assign to him; toiling is his lot; then, if he disobeys thee, with the stocks thou mayst tame him. Yet do not burden flesh and blood more than it can bear, nor inflict more than lawful punishment while the plea is still unheard. Faithful slave if thou hast, make much of him as of thy own self;
 treat him as if he were thy brother, as if thy own life were¹ the price of his purchase.
 Wrong him, and he may run away from thy 33 service; once he takes to his heels, who can tell thee where or in what guise thou mayst discover him?

34 Fools are cheated by vain hopes, 2 buoyed up with the fancies of a 3 dream. Wouldst thou heed such lying 4 visions? Better clutch at shadows, or chase 5 the wind. Nought thou seest in a dream 6 but symbols; man is but face to face with 7 his own image. As well may foul thing cleanse, as false thing give thee a true warning. Out upon the folly of them, pretended divination, and cheating omen, and 6 wizard's dream! Heart of woman in her pangs is not more fanciful. Unless it be some manifestation the most High has sent 7 thee, pay no heed to any such; trust in dreams has crazed the wits of many, and brought them to their ruin. Believe rather 8 the law's promises, that cannot miss their fulfilment, the wisdom that trusty counsellors shall make clear to thee.

A man will not learn until he is tested by 9 discipline.² That experience gained, he will think deeply, and the many lessons he has learned will make him a wise talker.
 Without experience, a man knows little;
 10 yet, if he is too venturesome, he reaps a rich harvest of mischief. . . . A man will not 11 learn until he is tested by discipline. . . . and if he is led astray he will be full of knavery. . . .³ I myself have seen much in 12 my wanderings, the customs of men more than I can tell.⁴ Sometimes, by this means, 13 I have been in danger of death, and only the divine favour has preserved me from it.

The life of such as fear the Lord is held 14 precious, and wins a blessing from his regard; they have a deliverer they can 15 trust in, and God's eye watches over them in return for their love. Fear the Lord, 16 and thou shalt never hesitate; nothing may daunt thee, while such a hope is thine.
 Blessed souls, that fear the Lord! They 17 know where to look for refuge. Fear the 18 Lord, and his eyes watch over thee; here is strong protection, here is firm support; shelter when the hot wind blows, shade at noon-day; here is reassurance when a man 20 stumbles, support when he falls; soul uplifted, eyes enlightened, health and life and blessing bestowed.

Tainted is every sacrifice that comes of 21 goods ill gotten; a mockery, this, of sacri-22 fice, that shall win no favour. For those who wait upon him in loyal duty, the Lord alone is God.⁵ Should the most High 23 accept the offerings of sinners, take the gifts of the wrong-doer into his reckoning, and pardon their sins because their sacri-24 fices are many? Who robs the poor and then brings sacrifice, is of their fellowship that would immolate some innocent child 25 before the eyes of his father. Poor man's

¹ Literally, 'since thy own life is'. Different versions have different variants of the phrase, and it is not certain what meaning should be assigned to it. ² 'Tested by discipline'; some of the Greek manuscripts have 'chastised', or perhaps simply 'schooled'; others, more plausibly, a 'travelled man'. ³ vv. 10, 11: The Latin here seems to have suffered from much confusion. 'Mischief' and 'knavery' in the Greek are 'discernment' and 'resourcefulness'; 'if he is led astray' is 'when he has travelled'. The Latin translator seems to have given two separate renderings of the same verse, neither of them accurate. ⁴ In the Greek, 'I know more than I am ready to tell'. ⁵ It is difficult to see the appositeness of this phrase. The rendering 'The Lord is only (approachable) for those who wait upon him in loyal duty' does not represent the Latin.

bread is poor man's life; cheat him of it, 26 and thou hast slain him; sweat of his brow, 27 or his life's blood, what matters? Disappoint the hireling, and thou art own 28 brother to a murderer. Build while another pulls down, and toil is its own 29 reward. Pray while another curses, and which of you shall find audience with 30 God? Cleanse thyself from dead body's contamination, and touch it again, what 31 avails thy cleansing? So it is when a man fasts for his sins, yet will not leave his sinning; vain is the fast, the prayer goes unanswered.

35 Live true to the law, and thou hast 2 richly endowed the altar. Let this be thy welcome-offering, to heed God's 3 word and keep clear of all wickedness; this thy sacrifice of amends for wrong done, of atonement for fault, to shun wrong-doing.
 4 Bloodless offering wouldst thou make, give thanks; ¹ victim wouldst thou immolate, 5 shew mercy. Wickedness and wrongdoing to shun is to win God's favour, and pardon for thy faults.

6 Yet do not appear in the Lord's presence 7 empty-handed; due observance must be 8 paid, because God has commanded it. If thy heart is right, thy offering shall enrich the altar; its fragrance shall reach the pre-9 sence of the most High; a just man's sacrifice the Lord accepts, and will not pass over his claim to be remembered.
 10 Generously pay the Lord his due; do not grudge him the first-fruits of thy earnings; 11 all thou givest, give with a smiling face, 12 gladly bring in the tithe. In his own measure God's gift repay; grudge thou 13 must not what afford thou canst; the Lord is a good master, and thou shalt have sevenfold in return.

14 But think not to bribe his justice; he 15 will have none of thy bribery. Never pin thy hopes on the power of wealth ill gotten;
 the Lord is a true judge, not swayed by 16 partiality, and thou canst not win him to take thy part against the friendless, turn 17 him deaf to the plea of the wronged. Prayer of the orphan, eloquent sigh of the widow, 18 he will not disregard; see the tears on yonder widow's cheeks, that accuse the 19 author of her misery! From her cheeks they rise to heaven, where all prayers are heard, a grievous sight. None but his true worshippers he makes welcome; for their supplication the clouds give passage.

 Pierce those clouds if thou wouldst, thou must humble thyself, inconsolable till that prayer finds audience, unwearying till it wins redress.

And will the Lord keep us waiting long?
 Hearing and redress he will grant to the innocent; strong as of old, patient no longer, he will crush the backs of our oppressors. The Gentiles punished, scattered the hordes of insolence, broken the sceptre of wrong! Men called to account everywhere for their deeds, the harvest of their mortal pride, and his own people vindicated at last, triumphing in his mercy at last! God's mercy, welcome to the afflicted as rain-clouds are welcome in time of drought!

36 God of all men, have mercy on us; 2 look down, and let us see the smile of thy favour. Teach them to fear thee, those other nations that have never looked to find thee; let them learn to recognize thee as the only God, and to acclaim thy wonders. Lift up thy hand, to shew these aliens thy power; let us see them, as they have seen us, humbled before thee; let them learn, as we have learnt, that there is no other God but thou. Shew new mar-vels, and portents stranger still; win re-3 nown for that strength, that valiant arm of thine; rouse thyself to vengeance, give thy anger free play; away with the oppressors, down with thy enemies! Hasten on the time, do not forget thy purpose; make them acclaim thy wonders. Let none of them escape their doom, the oppressors of thy people; let there be a raging fire ready to devour them; heavy let the blow fall on the heads of those tyrants, that no other power will recognize but their own. Gather anew all the tribes of Jacob; be it theirs to know that thou alone art God, to acclaim thy wonders; make them thy loved possession as of old. Have compassion on the people that is called by thy own name, on Israel, owned thy first-born; have com-4 passion on Jerusalem, the city thou hast set apart for thy resting-place; fill Sion's

¹ This would more naturally be rendered from the Latin, 'If thou wouldst give thanks, make a bloodless offering', but the context seems to indicate that this is a misinterpretation of the Greek.

walls, fill the hearts of thy people, with wonders beyond all telling come true, with thy glory made manifest. Vindicate the race that was from the first thy chosen; old prophecies uttered in thy name, at last fulfil; have we waited for thee to no purpose? Shall thy prophets be proved false? Listen to thy servants' plea, that claim the blessing Aaron pronounced over thy people; guide us into the right path; let all the world know that thou art God, watching us eternally.

20 Take what food thou wilt, belly is content; yet meat and meat differ. The savour of venison only palate can reach; only wise heart can discern lying tongue.

22 False heart breeds dismal thoughts; mind well schooled keeps them at bay.¹

23 Any woman is a mate for any man; yet maid and maid differ.

24 Fair wife, blithe husband; as no other lure, beauty draws us. What of her tongue? If that, too, has power to charm, if that is soft and gentle, never was man so blessed.

26 Good wife won is life well begun; a comforter thou hast, of thy own breed, a stay to support thee. No hedge, no garden; and if wife thou hast none, thou shalt wander homeless. Trust him never, that has not found a nest to dwell in, and does but lodge where night overtakes him, cut-purse that travels light from city to city.

37 Friends every man has that will say, I love him well; yet friends they may be in name only. Death itself cannot match it for sadness, when friend and companion becomes thy enemy. Cruel pretence, what mind first conceived thee, to turn solid earth into a morass of foul treachery? A companion, how he will enjoy the delights of his friend's prosperity, and turn against him in the hour of need! A companion, how he will share a friend's grief if he may share his bake-meats; use him as a shield against some enemy!² Never let friend of thine be far from thy thoughts; in thy prosperity never forget him.

7 Never take counsel with one who may be laying a trap for thee; from his envy hide thy purpose; advice every counsellor will give thee, but some will counsel thee for their own ends. Be on thy guard, then, against him who advises thee; how is his own turn best served? What is his secret mind? It may be, he will hide stake in pit for thee, crying, Thy course lies clear; then stand at a distance to see what becomes of thee. Consult, if thou wilt,³ unbeliever about holiness, knave about justice, woman about her rival, dastard about war, merchant about value, buyer about price, cynic about gratitude, scoffer about piety, rogue about honesty, farm labourer about work to be done, yearman about year's end, idle servant about great undertakings; but all the advice they give thee heed thou never. Closet thyself rather with some man of holy life, known to thee as God's worshipper, some soul well matched with thine, such as would grieve to see thee stumbling in darkness. And thy own heart enthrone as thy best counsellor; nothing may compare with that; there are times when a man of piety sees truth clearer than seven sentinels high in a watch-tower. With all this, entreat the most High to guide thy steps in the right path.

For every undertaking, every act of thine let just consideration prepare thee, and trustworthy counsel. Ill counsel may make the heart veer round; four points its compass has, good and evil, life and death; and it is ever the tongue that sways it.⁴

Shrewdness there is that can much impart, yet is its own enemy. And there is experience that imparts much to others, and is its own friend besides. There is quibbling talk that will earn thee enemies, and an empty belly; no power to win men the Lord has given it, so empty is it of all wisdom. But there is wisdom that befriends the owner of it, earning high meed of praise; if thus thou art wise, wisdom thou shalt impart to thy fellows, and shalt not miss thy own reward; blessings the wise man reaps from all around, to see him is to praise him. Man's days are numbered, Israel's none can number, and among our people the wise man wins an inheritance of honour, a deathless renown.

¹ The meaning of this verse is uncertain.

² This is usually rendered, 'he will take up his shield against an enemy', but this, without further qualification, seems meaningless.

³ The words 'if thou wilt' are not in the original; but the context evidently demands them in the Latin version; the Greek provides no difficulty; since it gives a negative, 'Do not consult. . .'

⁴ The text here is uncertain, and the meaning obscure. The Latin seems to demand some such rendering as that given above.

30 Son, as thy life goes on, make trial of thy appetites, and if harmful they be, give 31 them no liberty; not all things all men suit, nor please. When there is feasting, thy greed restrain; do not fall upon all the 32 meats thou seest; much feasting breeds infirmity, gluttony the bile, and many 33 have died of surfeiting; the temperate live long.

38 Deny not a physician his due for thy need's sake; his task is of 2 divine appointment, since from God all healing comes, and kings themselves must 3 needs bring gifts to him. High rank his skill gives him; of great men he is the 4 honoured guest. Medicines the most High has made for us out of earth's bounty, and shall prudence shrink from the use of 5 them? Were not the waters of Mara made 6 wholesome by the touch of wood?¹ Well for us men, that the secret virtue of such remedies has been revealed; skill the most High would impart to us, and for his 7 marvels win renown. Thus it is that the physician cures our pain, and the apothecary makes, not only perfumes to charm the sense, but unguents remedial; so in-8 exhaustible is God's creation, such health comes of his gift, all the world over.

9 Son, when thou fallest sick, do not neglect thy own needs; pray to the Lord, and 10 thou shalt win recovery. Leave off thy sinning, thy life amend, purge thee of all 11 thy guilt. With frankincense and rich oil make bloodless offering of meal; and so 12 leave the physician to do his work. His task is of divine appointment, and thou hast need of him; let him be ever at thy 13 side. Needs must, at times, to physicians thou shouldst have recourse; and doubt not they will make intercession with the Lord, that they may find a way to bring thee ease and remedy, by their often visit-14 ing thee. Offend thou thy maker by wrong-doing, much recourse thou shalt 15 have to physicians.

16 When a man dies, let thy tears flow, and set up a great lamenting, as for thy grievous loss; shroud him according to his quality, and grudge him no pomp of 17 funeral; then, to be rid of gossip, bemoan him bitterly for a day's space, ere thou wilt be comforted in thy sorrow; one day or 18 two, as his worth claims, bemoan him; no need to win thyself an ill name. But grief 19 will but hasten thy own death, will be the grave of thy own strength; where heart goes sad, back goes bowed. So long as thou 20 withdrawest thyself, sad thy heart will be;

 and what patrimony but heart's mirth is left to the poor? Why then, do not give 21 thyself over to regrets; put them away from thee, and bethink thee rather of thy own end. Do not fancy that the dead can 22 return; by torturing thyself thou canst nothing avail him. Remember, he tells 23 thee, this doom of mine; such shall thine be; mine yesterday, thine to-day. Let his 24 memory rest, as he rests, in death; enough for thee that thou shouldst comfort him in the hour when his spirit leaves him.²

The wisdom of a learned man is the 25 fruit of leisure; he must starve himself of doing if he is to come by it. How shall he 26 drink full draughts of wisdom that must guide the plough, that walks proud as any spearman while he goads on his team, all his life taken up with their labours, all his 27 talk of oxen? His mind all set on a straight furrow, the feeding of his cows an anxiety to deny him sleep? So it is with every 28 workman and master-workman, that must turn night into day. Here is one that cuts graven seals; how he busies himself with devising some new pattern! How the 29 model he works from claims his attention, while he sits late over his craft! Here is blacksmith sitting by his anvil, intent upon his iron-work, cheeks shrivelled with the 30 smoke, as he battles with the heat of the furnace, ears ringing again with the hammer's clattering, eyes fixed on the design he imitates. All his heart is in the finishing 31 of his task, all his waking thoughts go to the perfect achieving of it. Here is potter 32 at work, treadles flying, anxious continually over the play of his hands, over the 33 rhythm of his craftsmanship; arms straining at the stiff clay, feet matching its 34 strength with theirs.³ To finish off the glaze is his nearest concern, and long he must wake to keep his furnace clean. All 35 these look to their own hands for a living,

¹ See Ex. 15. 23. ² 'Enough for thee that thou shouldst comfort him'; the meaning of the Septuagint Greek is, 'And be comforted for his loss'.
 his feet', but the Greek has, 'its strength'.

³ Literally, 'bowing down his strength before

36 skilful each in his own craft; and without 37 them, there is no building up a commonwealth. For them no travels abroad, no 38 journeyings from home; they will not pass beyond their bounds to swell the assem-39 bly,¹ or to sit in the judgement-seat. Not theirs to understand the law's awards, not theirs to impart learning or to give judgement; they will not be known for uttering wise sayings. Theirs it is to support this unchanging world of God's creation; they ply their craft and ask for nothing better;
 . . . lending themselves freely and making their study in the law of the most High.²

39 But the wise man will be learning the lore of former times; the proph-2 ets will be his study. The tradition handed down by famous men will be in his keeping; his to con the niceties of every 3 parable, learn the hidden meaning of every proverb, make himself acquainted with 4 sayings hard to understand. To great men he will render good service, will be sum-5 moned to the prince's own council; will go upon his travels in foreign countries, to learn by experience what the world offers 6 of good and of harm. With dedicated heart, he will keep early vigil at the Lord's gates, the Lord that made him, to win audience for his plea from the most High.
 7 His lips will be eloquent in prayer, as he 8 entreats pardon for his sins. At the Lord's sovereign pleasure, he will be filled with a 9 spirit of discernment, so that he pours out showers of wise utterance, giving thanks to 10 the Lord in his prayer. His plans and thoughts guided from above, he will have 11 skill in the divine mysteries; will make known to all the tradition of teaching he has received, and take pride in that law which is the Lord's covenant with man.
 12 This wisdom of his, extolled on every side, 13 will never fall into oblivion; the memory of him, the renown of him, will be held in 14 honour from age to age. His wise words will become a legend among the nations;

where faithful men assemble, his praise will be told. A life that shall leave such 15 fame as one man wins in a thousand; a death not unrewarded.

And still I have thoughts worth the 16 telling; madman as easily might contain himself. A voice proclaims, Give heed to 17 me, you that are scions of the divine stock;
 yours to burgeon like a rose-bush that is planted by running water; yours to yield 18 the fragrance of incense; yours to blossom 19 like the lily, and smell sweet, and put forth leaves for your adornment; yours to sing songs of praise, and bless the Lord for all things he has made. His name extol; songs 20 of praise let your lips utter, and let harp's melody mingle with the song. And you shall praise him in these words following.

Good, wondrously good, is all the Lord 21 has made.³ Piled high the waters stand at 22 his command, shut in by cisterns of his appointing.⁴ All-sufficient is his will, un-23 failing his power to save; open to his view 24 are all deeds of mortal men, nothing can escape that scrutiny. On every age of time 25 his glance rests; marvel is none beyond his compass. Not for man to ask what this or 26 that may be, each shall be needed in its turn. His blessings flow like a stream in 27 full flood, like rain pouring down to refresh the parched earth. But the nations that 28 never look to find him, shall be the prey of his vengeance; did he not turn the waters 29 into firm ground, and dry up the floor of them, so that it made a path for the passage of his own people,⁵ and yet a trap to punish the wicked?

From the first, good things were made 30 for good men to enjoy; for sinners, they are good and evil at once. What are the first 31 needs of man's life? Water, fire, iron, salt, milk, wheat-meal, honey, the grape-32 cluster, oil and clothing. Thereby, for just men, nought but good is intended, yet for 33 sinners they turn to evil. Some powers⁶ there be that are created for wreaking of vengeance, and sternly they wield the lash

¹ Some would interpret the first part of this verse differently, taking it with verse 36 and giving it the sense 'there will be no living or going to and fro in common'.

² The last fourteen words of the chapter really belong, as the Greek shews, to the beginning of the next chapter. As applied to the manual labourers described above, they give exactly the wrong sense.

³ It is not clear how many of the remaining verses in this chapter the hymn of praise includes.

⁴ Cf. Ps. 32. 7 (33. 7 in the Hebrew text).

⁵ In the original, simply 'their passage'; but it seems clear that the Latin intends an allusion to the crossing of the Red Sea. The other versions would rather suggest a reference to the destruction of Sodom.

⁶ Literally, 'some spirits.' It may be that diabolical agencies are referred to; but the word 'spirits' may mean simply 'winds'; or (perhaps with greater probability) it may be taken as describing the forces of nature which are to be mentioned in verse 35.

34 in their raging; when the time for reckoning comes, they will put out all their force, until their Maker's anger is appeased.
 35 Fire, hail, hunger and death, all these were 36 made for wreaking of vengeance; ravening beasts, too, and scorpions, and serpents, 37 and the sword that punishes the wicked till there are none left. All these hold high revel as they perform his will; ready they stand till earth has need of them, and when the need comes, they will obey.
 38 From the first, all my questioning and all my thought confirms me in what I have 39 written, all things God has made are good, 40 and each of them serves its turn; nor ever must we complain things have happened for the worse, since each has its own occa-41 sion to justify it. With full hearts, then, and full voice, praise we and bless the Lord's name.

40 Great is the anxiety all men are doomed to, heavy the yoke each son of Adam must bear, from the day when he leaves his mother's womb to the day when he is buried in the earth, that is 2 mother of all. What solicitude is his, what fears catch at his heart; how quick his mind runs out to meet coming events!
 3 And the term of it all is death. What matter, whether a man sit on a throne, or 4 grovel in dust and ashes; whether he goes clad in purple and wears a crown, or has but coarse linen to wear? Anger he shall know, and jealousy, and concern, and bewil-5 derment, and the fear of death, and the grudge that rankles, and rivalry. Rest he on his bed at night, sleep comes to fashion 6 his thinking anew; even there, the rest he wins is but little or none at all, and there-7 upon, in his dreams, he is anxious as sentry waiting to be relieved, his are such whirling thoughts as fugitive has, just escaped from the battle. Then, at the moment of deliver-8 ance, comes waking; and he marvels to find his fears all vain. This lot he shares with all living things; beast has it as well as man, but for the sinner it is multiplied sevenfold.
 9 There is more besides, mortal sickness, bloodshed, quarrelling, the sword, oppression, famine, devastation and plague;

 all such things are designed for the punish-10 ing of the wicked; was it not from wickedness the flood came?

All that is of earth, to earth must needs 11 return, and all waters find their way back to the sea; what shall become of bribery 12 and oppression? The memory of them shall vanish; faithfulness will endure for ever. All the riches of the wrong-doer will 13 disappear, like stream that runs dry, will die away, like roll of thunder in a storm-cloud; open-handed is merry-hearted, the 14 sinners it is that shall pine away at the last.
 Never a branch will the posterity of the 15 wicked put forth; dead roots they are that rattle on the wind-swept rock. How green 16 yonder rushes grow by the river's bank!
 But they shall be plucked up before hay-17 harvest. But kindness, like the garden trees, lasts on, remembered in blessing;
 charity remains unforgotten.

Sweet is his lot, that toils and is con-18 tented; here is hidden treasure for thy finding.¹

Children born, and a city founded, will 19 bring thee a great name; best of all, a woman without spot. Wine and music 20 make heart glad; best of all, the love of wisdom. Flute and harp make sweet melody; 21 best of all a kindly tongue. Grace and 22 beauty charm the eye; best of all, the green wheat. Friend and friend, gossip and 23 gossip, are well met; best of all, man and wife. Kinsmen . . .² will help thee in hard 24 times; best of all thy alms-deeds to deli-25 ver thee. Gold and silver give thee sure vantage-ground; best of all, right counsel.
 26 Riches and strength make the heart beat high; best of all, the fear of the Lord.

Fear the Lord, lack thou shalt have 27 none, help need none; the fear of the Lord 28 is a garden that yields blessing. . . and in splendour above all splendour they have clothed him.³

Long as thou livest, my son, never turn 29 beggar; die is better than beg. Look thou 30 for thy meat to another's table, I count thy life no life at all; what, owe thy very being to another man's larder? From such a 31

¹ The other versions assimilate this maxim to the formula observed in verses 19-25; 'Contentment and hard work (in the Hebrew, a life of wine and strong drink) may be sweet, but best of all is finding a treasure'—an observation so little worth making, that it looks as if the Latin had preserved the true text.

² It seems clear that something has fallen out here; probably the original had 'Kinsmen and neighbours'.

³ The last clause of this verse does not fit on to what precedes it, either in sense or in grammar; once more, it seems likely that the text is defective.

chance, good teaching and good training shall keep thee safe.

32 Poverty, on a fool's lips, will pass for a thing desirable; but trust me, he has a fire raging within.

41 Out upon thee, death, how bitter is the thought of thee to a man that lives at ease in his own home, a man untroubled by care, no difficulties in his path, that his food still relishes! Hail, death! Welcome is thy doom to a man that is in need, and lacks vigour; worn out with age and full of anxieties, that has no confidence left in him, no strength to endure. Never fear death's doom; bethink thee of the years that went before thee, and must come after thee. One sentence the Lord has for all living things. What the will of the most High has in store for thee, none can tell; what matter, whether it be ten years, or a hundred, or a thousand? Once thou art dead, thou wilt take no grudging count of the years.

8 The children wicked men beget are born under a curse, familiars of a godless home; 9 all they inherit is soon lost to them; reproach dogs the footsteps of their posterity. How bitter their complaints against the father who is the author of their ill fame! Woe to you, rebels, that have forsaken the law of the Lord, the most High, 12 born of an unholy birth, an unholy death 13 your destiny! All that is of earth, to earth must needs return; from ban to bale is the cycle of a life ill lived.

14 Man sighs over his body's loss; what of his name? The wicked are lost to memory. 15 Of thy good name heed take thou; it shall remain thine longer than a thousand heaps 16 of rare treasure. Life is good, but its days are numbered; a good name lasts for ever.

17 My sons, here is wholesome teaching.¹ Wisdom hidden, I told you, is wasted, is treasure that never sees the light of day; 18 silence is rightly used when it masks folly, 19 not when it is the grave of wisdom. Yet sometimes bashfulness is no fault, as I will now make known to you. It is ill done to be 20 21 be ashamed on every occasion; but yet 22 neither is self-confidence for all and every 23 use. Of these things, then, be ashamed;² 24 that thy parents should find thee a forni-25 cator, ruler or prince a liar, magistrate or 26 judge a wrong-doer, assembly of the people 27 a law-breaker, partner or friend a knave, 28 or thy neighbour a thief. . . concerning 29 the faithfulness of God, and his covenant; 30 concerning thy sitting over meat. . .

 31 Ashamed be thou of belittling the gift 32 received, of leaving the greeting unre-33 turned, of letting thy eyes stray after har-34 lots, of denying thyself to kinsman that has 35 a near claim on thy regard, of property 36 fraudulently shared. Let not thy eye fall on 37 woman wed to another, nor ever exchange 38 secrets with handmaid of hers, nor come 39 between her sheets. Be ashamed of utter-40 ing reproach against thy friends, nor insult 41 the receiver of thy gift.

42 Nor ever do thou repeat gossip to the betraying of another's secret. If of such things thou art ashamed, shame thou shalt never feel, and thou shalt have all men's good word besides.

And other dealings there are over which thou must never be ashamed,³ nor, through respect for any human person consent to wrong. Such are, the law of the most High and his covenant; and right award, that gives the godless his due; a matter between some partner of thine and strangers from far off, the apportioning of an inheritance among thy friends, the trueness of weight and balance, profit overmuch or too little, the exchange between buyer and seller, the strict punishing of children, the cudgelling of a wicked slave till he bleeds. . . Thriftless wife if thou hast, seal is best. Where many hands are at work, lock all away; part with nothing, till it be measured and weighed, and of all thy spending and receiving, written record kept. . . Nor be thou 8 9 ashamed, when there is question of chastising reckless folly, and the complaints of old men against the young. So

¹ vv. 17-20: The order of the text here seems to be confused both in the Greek and in the Latin; they are here interpreted in the light of the Hebrew. The words, 'I told you', are not in the original, but there seems to be a deliberate quotation from 20. 32, 33.

² vv. 21-28: There is further confusion here, as even the grammar of the sentences shows, and several phrases cannot be interpreted with certainty.

³ vv. 1-8: Once more the text seems curiously confused. Verse 2 ought, judging by its form, to be a list of things we ought never to be ashamed of; 'Concerning the law of the most High, and his covenant, and acquitting the guilty' yields no tolerable sense. Verses 6, 7 look as if they had been displaced, and belonged to some quite different context. The explanation of verse 8 is perhaps to be found in Deut. 21. 18.

thou shalt shew prudence in all thy dealings, and win the good word of all.

9 Daughter to her father is ever hidden anxiety, a care that banishes sleep. Is she young? Then how if age creep on too soon? Is she wed? Then how if her husband should tire of her? Is she maid? 10 Then how if she were disgraced, and in her own father's house brought to bed? Once more, is she wed? Then how if she were false to her husband? How if she prove 11 barren? Over wanton daughter of thine thou canst not keep watch too strict; else she will make thee the scorn of thy enemies, the talk of the city; strangers will point the finger at thee, and all the rabble 12 know thy shame. Gaze not on the beauty of human kind, nor occupy thyself much 13 with women; garment breeds moth, and 14 woman wickedness in man. Man's wickedness is too strong for woman at her best;¹ and a woman that plays thee false brings thee only disgrace.

15 Recount we now what things the Lord has made; his visible creation be our theme; nothing he has fashioned but hangs 16 on his word. Just as yonder sun that looks down on all gives light to all, so the glory of the Lord shines through all his creation; 17 how should his faithful servants herald them enough, these marvels of his, enabled by divine omnipotence in that glory to 18 endure? Nothing is hidden from him, the deepest depths of earth or of man's heart; 19 he knows our most secret designs. All knowledge is his; does he not hold the clue of eternity, making plain what has been 20 and what is yet to be, laying bare the track of hidden things? No thought of ours escapes him, never a whisper goes un- 21 heard. How great the wisdom that so ordered all things, his wisdom who has neither beginning nor end; nothing may 22 be added, nothing taken away from them, nor needs he any man's counsel. How 23 lovely is all he has made, how dazzling to look upon!² Changeless through the ages, all of it lives on, responsive to his calls. 24 All things he has made in pairs, balanced against one another; never a fault of symmetry;³ to each one its own well-being assured. His glory contemplating, thou shalt never have thy fill.

43 Like a jewel the vault of heaven is set above us; the sight of it is glory made visible. Plain to our view is the sun's passage as it shines out, a very masterpiece of his workmanship, who is the most High. How it burns up the earth at noon-day! How fierce its glow, beyond all endurance! Tend thou the furnace, heat is thy daily portion; yet three times hotter the sun, as it burns up the hill-side, scorching all with its fiery breath, blinding men's eyes with its glare. Swiftly it speeds on its course, to do the bidding of the Lord, its glorious maker. The moon, too, that keeps tryst so faithfully, ever marking how the seasons change, and giving the signal when feast days come round! The moon, whose light must decrease till it vanishes, and then increase to the full circle, the month its name-child; cresset of a watch-fire that lights up the high vault of heaven with its radiant glow. And the stars that deck the sky with their splendour, a beacon-light the Lord kindles high above us; the summons of his holy word answering so loyally, watching so patiently at their post!

Look up at the rainbow, and bless the maker of it; how fair are those bright colours that span heaven with a ring of splendour, traced by an almighty hand. Swift comes the snow at his word, swift flashes the fire that executes his vengeance; he has but to unlock his store-house, and the clouds hover, bird-fashion, arsenals of his might, whence the pounded hail-stones fall. How his glance makes the hills tremble! Blows the south wind at his bidding, earth echoes with the crash of his thunder; blows the north wind, and there is whirling storm. Soft as roosting bird falls the snow, spread all around; not more silently comes locust-swarm to earth; what eye is but captivated by its pale beauty, what heart but is filled with terror at the dark cloud that brings it? He it is pours out the frost, that lies white as salt on the earth, the frozen earth that seems covered with thistle-down.

¹ The Greek is just patient of the rendering given above; but the natural sense of all the versions is 'Man's wickedness is better than a woman who does good'—a sentiment which could have little meaning, even in the mouth of the most determined cynic. Probably the true text is lost in this passage; the Greek in verse 13 has 'wickedness in woman', and the Hebrew in verse 12 has 'let her not shew her beauty to male eyes'.

² Literally, 'and like a spark which is to consider'; the Greek is hardly more intelligible.

³ Cf. 33. 15.

Cold blows the north wind, and ice forms on the water; no pool but it rests there, arming the water as with a breast-plate; frost gnaws at the mountain-side, parches the open plains, strips them, as fire might have stripped them, of their green. Remedy for all these is none, but the speedy coming of the mist; frost shall be overmastered by the showers the sirocco drives before it,¹ and at the Lord's word the chill blast dies away.

What else but divine wisdom tamed the rising of the seas,² and planted the islands there? Hear we what perils in the deep mariners have to tell of, and wonder at the tale; of the great marvels it contains, living things a many, both fierce and harmless, and monstrous creatures besides. Who but the Lord brought the venture to a happy issue? His word gives all things their pattern.

Say we much as we will, of what needs to be said our words come short; be this the sum of all our saying, He is in all things.³ To what end is all our boasting?⁴ He, the Almighty, is high above all that he has made; he, the Lord, is terrible, and great beyond compare, and his power is wonderful. Glorify him as best you may, glory is still lacking, such is the marvel of his greatness; praise him and extol him as you will, he is beyond all praising; summon all your strength, the better to exalt his name, untiring still, and you shall not reach your goal. Who can tell us what he is from sight seen of him? Who can magnify his eternal being? Much more lies beyond our ken; only the fringe of creation meets our view; and of all things the Lord is maker. Yet, live thou in the worship of him, wisdom thou shalt have for thy reward.

44 Speak we now in honour of famous men that were our fathers, long ago. What high achievements the Lord has made known in them, ever since time began! Here were men that had power and bore rule, men that excelled in strength, or in the wisdom that dowered them; prophets that worthily upheld the name of prophecy, issuing to the people the commands their times needed, uttering, through their foresight, a sacred charge to the nations. Here were men that had skill to devise melodies, to make songs and set them down in writing. Here were men rich in ability, noble of aim, that dwelt peacefully in their homes. These were the glories of their race, the ornament of their times; and the sons they begot have left a memory that adds to the recital of their praise. Not like those others, who are forgotten in death as if they had never been; nameless, they and their children, as if they had never lived; no, these were men of tender conscience;⁵ their deeds of charity will never be forgotten. Blessings abide with their posterity; their descendants are a race set apart for God, the pledged heirs of his promises. For their sakes this line of theirs will endure for all time; their stock, their name, will never be allowed to die out. Their bodies lie in peace; their name lasts on, age after age. Their wisdom is yet a legend among the people; wherever faithful men assemble, their story is told.

Enoch there was, that did God's will, and was taken away to Paradise, repentance his gift to mankind.⁶ Noe, too, blameless lived and faithful proved; when the day of retribution came, he made amends for all;⁷ so it was that earth had a remnant left when the flood came; with him God's covenant was made, never again should all living things be drowned together. What greatness was Abraham's, to be the father of so many nations! Where shall we find another that can boast he kept the law of the most High as Abraham kept it? He, too, entered into a covenant with God, and was bidden to bear on his own body the record of it. Once he had put

¹ v. 23, 24: It is possible, both in the Greek and in the Hebrew, to interpret verse 23 as referring to drought, with Almighty God himself as the subject of the sentence; verse 25 will then mean that the showers save the grass from the effects of the sirocco.

² Literally, 'pacified the abyss', but it seems clear that the reference is to Gen. 1. 9 and kindred passages.

³ Both the Greek and the Hebrew give, 'He is all'.

⁴ In the Greek and in the Hebrew, 'our glorifying of him'.

⁵ Here, and in verse 27, we may translate 'men well beloved'; that is, God's favourites.

⁶ This is commonly interpreted by the Fathers in connexion with Apoc. II. 3. In the Greek, Enoch is represented as an example of penitence; in the Hebrew, of wisdom.

⁷ The Greek word thus translated might also mean, 'was (allowed to survive) in exchange for all'.

him to the test and found him obedient, 22 God took an oath that this should be the father of a renowned posterity; their numbers should rival the dust on the ground, 23 should match the stars in heaven, stretching from southern to western sea, from 24 Euphrates to the ends of earth. Isaac, the 25 son of such a father, fared no worse; to him the Lord gave that blessing which should extend to all nations. In Jacob's person, 26 too, the covenant should be revived; the blessings Jacob uttered should be ratified, and the lands promised him should be divided among twelve tribes of his own begetting.

27 Him a posterity of famous sons awaited,¹ men of tender conscience, that had the good word of all their fellows.

45 Well loved by God, well loved among men, on the name of Moses 2 a benediction rests. The Lord gave him such honour as he gives to his holy ones;
 gave him renown by striking terror into his enemies, and then, at his word, abated the 3 prodigies that had befallen them. He made him great in the eyes of kings, entrusted commandments to him in full view of the chosen people, made a revelation to him of 4 the divine glory. The Lord set him apart, chosen out from the rest of mankind, so 5 loyal he was and so gentle; answered his 6 prayer by taking him up into a cloud, and there, face to face, imparting commandments to him, the law that gives life and wisdom; here, Jacob, was thy covenant, here Israel, the rule thou wast to live by.

7 Of Levite blood, too, sprang another renowned as Moses himself, his brother Aaron. To Aaron the Lord gave high 8 office, making an eternal covenant with him, investing him with the priesthood of the chosen race, enriching him with his 9 own glory. Bright was the cincture that girded him, bright the robe that clothed him; no ornament he wore but spoke of 10 majesty. The long tunic, the breeches, the sacred mantle, and golden bells a many 11 compassing him about, that tinkled still as he walked, echoing through the temple to 12 keep Israel's name unforgotten! The hallowed robe, all gold and blue and purple, work of a master weaver, that lacked neither skill nor faithfulness!² What craftsmanship of twisted thread dyed scarlet, of rare stones in a gold setting, engraved with all the gem-cutter's art, twelve of them to commemorate the twelve tribes of Israel! The gold finishing, too, of his mitre, engraved with the legend, Holiness;

 so proud an adornment, so noble a work of art, such a lure for men's eyes in its ordered beauty! Never vesture till then was seen so fair; and, from time immemorial, no other might put it on, only the sons of Aaron's line, in undying succession.

Day in, day out the fire should consume his sacrifice; when Moses consecrated him with the holy oil's anointing, this was a right granted in perpetuity, long as the heavens should last. His to perform the priest's office, to echo God's praise, to bless the people in his name. Alone of living men, he was chosen out to offer sacrifice, and the sweet-smelling incense that is a people's plea for remembrance, a people's atonement. Power was his to administer the divine decrees, a justiciary by right, handing on to Jacob its tradition, giving Israel the law's light to guide it.
 Once, out in the desert, that right was challenged; with envious cries, men of another clan surrounded him, Dathan and Abiron for their leaders, espousing Core's quarrel. Ill-content was the Lord God at the sight of it; his vengeance swept them away; by no common doom, a raging flame devoured them. Fresh privileges for Aaron were kept in store; he must share in the conquest by receiving all the land's firstfruits; his clan first of all must have bread enough and to spare, his children should inherit the eating of the Lord's own sacrifice. But he must have no lands in the conquered territory, no share like the rest of his race; the Lord should be his wealth, the Lord his portion.

Next to these two, Phinees the son of Eleazar won high renown; like Aaron, with the fear of God to guide him, he stood firm while the people shrank away; a loyal and a willing heart that made amends for Israel. For his reward, he received assurance

¹ The Greek and the Hebrew give 'him a descendant awaited'; that is, Moses.

² The Latin translator has probably missed the meaning of the original. It seems clear from the other versions that a reference is made here to the oracular burse described in Ex. 28. 30.

of the divine favour; command he should have of sanctuary and of people both, and the high priesthood that was his should descend to his heirs for ever. David the son of Jesse, of Juda's tribe, should bequeath to his children a legacy of kingship. . .

. . . with wise hearts endowing us, to preserve justice among his people, and keep safe the blessings he has given to it; and his pre-eminence over his people he has settled on them in perpetuity.¹

46 Next to Moses in the line of prophets comes Josue the son of Nave, that fought so well. With him, name and renown are one; who is more renowned for the deliverance he brought to God's chosen people, beating down the enemies that defied him until Israel made their land its own? What fame he won by those valiant blows he dealt, hurling his armed strength at city after city! What chieftain had ever stood his ground so manfully? And still the Lord brought enemies to confront him. On his fierce resolve the sun itself must wait, and a whole day's length be doubled. Let enemies attack him on every side, he would invoke the most High, to whom all strength belongs, the great God, the holy God, and his prayer was answered.² Hail-stones came down in a storm of wondrous violence, that fell on the opposing army and shattered the menace of it, there on the hill-side. So the Gentiles should feel God's power, and learn that it is a hard matter to fight against him. Ever had Josue followed in that Prince's retinue, since the days when Moses yet lived; he it was, and Caleb the son of Jephone, that took a generous part together; they would have engaged the enemy, and saved their own people from guilt by hushing the murmurs of rebellion. These two alone, out of six hundred thousand warriors, survived the perils of the journey; these two were appointed to lead Israel into the land, all milk and honey, that was its promised home.

¹ A comparison with the other versions confirms the impression, which the incoherence of the Latin would in any case suggest, that several words have been omitted. Both the Hebrew and the Greek indicate that King David was introduced into the narrative only by way of contrast; the sacred author is pointing out an analogy between the ecclesiastical and the secular government of Israel. In the Hebrew, the concluding words of the chapter form part of a doxology, which begins, 'And now bless the Lord, that is so bountiful'.
² vv. 5, 6: See Josue 10. 10-14.
³ See I Kg. 7. 10.
⁴ See I Kg. 12. 3.

On Caleb, too, the Lord bestowed such vigour, that in his old age he was a warrior still, and made his way up into the hill-country, where his descendants held their lands after him; no doubt should Israel have that he is well rewarded who serves so holy a God. The judges, too, have their glorious muster-roll, men of resolute heart, that God's cause never forsook; be their names, too, remembered in blessing, and may life spring from their bones, where they lie buried; undying be their memory, in their own posterity continued, undying be the sacred record of their renown.

Dear to the Lord God loved his prophet Samuel, that restored Israel's fortunes and anointed kings to rule over it. Well was the divine law kept, when he ruled our commonwealth, and the God of Jacob was gracious to it; here was a prophet of proved loyalty, and ever his word came true, such vision had he of the God that gives light. With foes about him on every side, he invoked the Lord, the Almighty, with an unblemished lamb for sacrifice; and therewith came thunder, sent from heaven, loud echo of the divine voice,³ that overthrew all the princes of the sea-coast, all the captains of the Philistines. There must be an end at last to his life, and to the age he lived in; but first he would make profession, with the Lord and the new-anointed king for his witnesses, bribe he had never taken from any living man, though it were but a gift of shoe-leather; and none might gainsay him.⁴ Even when he had gone to his rest, he had a revelation for the king's ear, and gave warning of the death that awaited him; a prophet, even in the tomb, while there was yet guilt among his people to be effaced.

47 Among prophets, Nathan was the next to arise, and it was then the reign of David began. Only the fat from the sacrifice, only David out of all Israel; the Lord must have ever the best! Here was one that would use lion or bear as playthings for his sport, tussle with them as if they had been yearling lambs. Such 4 was his boyhood; and who but he should save the honour of his people, by slaying 5 the giant? He had but to lift his hand, and the stone aimed from his sling brought 6 low the pride of Goliath; prayer to the Lord, the Almighty, gave him the mastery over a great warrior, and retrieved the for-7 tunes of his race. Ere long, they had given him the title, Slayer of ten thousand, and sang his praises, blessing the Lord's name; 8 kingly honours they accorded him. He it was that laid their enemies low all about them, extirpating, to this day, the malice of the Philistines, shattering their power 9 for ever. Yet there was no feat of David's but made him thank the most High, the 10 most Holy, and to him give the glory; still with all his heart he praised the Master he loved so well, the God who had created him and endowed him with strength to 11 meet his enemies. He would have musicians wait around the altar, and rouse 12 sweet echoes with their chant; feast-days should be kept with splendour, times and seasons duly observed, all his life long; morning after morning the Lord's holy name should be praised, God should re-13 ceive his full tribute of worship. So it was that the Lord pardoned his sins, and bade him carry his head high evermore; his by right was the kingship, and the proud throne of Israel.

14 To a wise son of his that throne passed; for David's sake all the threats of the 15 enemy were stilled, and Solomon might reign undisturbed. If God gave him mastery all around, it was because he would have a temple built in his honour, to be his sanctuary for all time. Ah, Solomon, how well schooled in thy youth!
 16 Deep as a river flowed thy wisdom; thy ambition it was to lay bare all the secrets 17 of earth; full scope thou wouldst have for riddle and proverb. Even to the distant 18 isles thy renown spread, and everywhere thy peaceful reign made thee beloved. The whole earth stood in awe of song and proverb and parable and interpretation of 19 thine; in awe, too, of the name of the Lord God, who is known among men as the God 20 of Israel. Gold thou didst amass in such plenty, as it had been only bronze; silver 21 was abundant in thy domains as lead. Yet women bowed thee to their will; of body's appetites thou wouldst brook no restraint, and thus thy renown was tarnished with 2 the gendering of a breed unhallowed. So it was that vengeance fell upon thy children, that must rue thy folly in after times;

 the kingdom divided, and in Ephraim 3 a rebel dynasty exercising dominion, through thy fault.

Yet God is ever merciful; his own de-4 sign he will not mar fruitlessly, nor undo; should he destroy it root and branch, the posterity of his chosen servant? Should the man that so loved him have begotten sons in vain? Jacob must have a stock to 2 breed from; the root of David should bur-geon yet. Solomon once laid to rest with his fathers, what heirs left he? A man of 3 his own blood, born to infatuate a nation, insensate Roboam, whose ill counsel drove the people to rebellion; and that other, 4 Jeroboam son of Nabat, who taught Israel to sin. All Ephraim followed the example of his misdoing; high rose the tide of their sins, till it swept them away altogether 5 from their own country.

For all this wickedness of theirs God 6 held them to account, waiting till the time should come for punishing them, and purging them of their guilt.

48 And now another prophet arose, Elias, a man of flame; blazed, like a fire-brand, his message. This man it was 2 brought down a famine to punish them, till few were left of the enemies that bore him a grudge, and found the Lord's commandment too hard for them. At the 3 Lord's word, he laid a ban on heaven itself, and three times brought fire down from it;
 such was the fame of Elias' miracles. Who 4 else could boast, as thou, of calling back the dead from the tomb, by the power of 5 the Lord God, and to life restoring them;
 of kings brought to ruin and all their 6 power lightly shattered, proud kings, that might leave their sick-beds no more? Sinai 7 should tell thee, Horeb should tell thee, of award made, and doom pronounced; kings 8 thou shouldst anoint, to be the redressers of wrong, and prophets to come after thee;
 then, amidst a flaming whirlwind, in a 9 chariot drawn by horses of fire, thou wast taken up into heaven. Of thee it was 10 written that in time of judgement to come thou wouldst appease the divine anger, by reconciling heart of father to heart of son, and restore the tribes of Israel as they were. Ah, blessed souls that saw thee, and were honoured with thy friendship! We live only for a life-time; and when death comes, we shall have no such renown as thine.

In that whirlwind Elias was lost to view, bequeathing his spirit of prophecy in full measure to Eliseus. Here was a man that in all his life never held prince in awe, never made way for human greatness. For him no task too difficult; was not his dead body prophetic still, to prove him a wonder-worker in death, that in life was marvellous? Yet the nation for whom all this was done would not amend, nor leave its sinning, until all the inhabitants of the land were driven out, and scattered through the world; only that little kingdom remained that was ruled by the heirs of David, and of these rulers, though some did God's will, there were some that had sins a many to answer for.

Well did Ezechias fortify his city, and brought a running stream into the midst of it, breaking through the rock with tools of iron, and building a cistern for the water. In his reign Sennacherib marched against the country, and sent Rabscaces to threaten it; Sion itself he threatened with attack, so proudly he trusted in his own strength. Heart and hand were unnerved at his coming; worse anguish woman in labour never knew. Yet they cried out upon God for pity, with hands outstretched heavenwards; and he, the holy One, he the Lord God, was not slow to answer them. Their sins he would remember no more; he would not leave them at the mercy of their enemies; by means of his holy prophet Isaias they should find release. With that, the Lord's angel fell on the camp of Assyria, and brought its armies to nothing. So faithfully Ezechias did the Lord's will, following boldly the example of his father, king David; so well he obeyed Isaias, a great prophet and a faithful interpreter of the vision the Lord gave him. In Isaias' days it was that the sun went back, in token that the royal life should be prolonged; Isaias it was that saw things far distant, by the power of inspiration, and comforted mourning hearts in Sion. Without end or limit future things he foretold, that still lay hidden in the womb of time.

49 Josias, too, is still remembered; a memory grateful as some mingled scent, pride of the perfumer's art, or the honey that tastes sweet in all men's mouths, or music over the wine. A king divinely ordained to make a nation's amends, how he swept away all the foul idols of the law-breakers; how true he kept his heart to the Lord's bidding, what comfort he gave to piety, when wickedness abounded! David, Ezechias, Josias, these three only were exempt from the guilt of their line; the other kings of Juda forsook the law of the most High, and counted the fear of God a light matter. What wonder if they were doomed to bequeath all the glories of their kingdom to strangers, to princes of an alien race, who set fire to the city that was God's chosen sanctuary, and left the ways unfrequented?

... By means of Jeremias;¹ so ill they used him, that was set apart to be a prophet when he was yet in his mother's womb, empowered to overthrow, to uproot, to destroy, then to rebuild and to plant anew. And next Ezechiel, to whose eyes God shewed the vision of glory, by wheeling cherubs borne aloft...

And in storm he remembered the enemy... to reward all such as pointed men to the right path.²

May life spring from the bones of the twelve prophets, where they lie buried; men that put heart into the sons of Jacob, and by trusting in God's power won deliverance.

The fame of Zorobabel what words of ours shall enhance? The jewel God wore on his right hand for signet-ring; he, with Josue son of Josedec, rebuilt God's house that then lay ruined; raised up a holy temple, of the divine glory the eternal dwelling-place. Nor shall Nehemias be soon forgotten, that mended these ruined walls of ours, our gates built and barred, our homes restored to us.

¹ It is very doubtful whether the words 'in the hand of Jeremias' can be construed so as to form a single sentence with verse 8; a gap in the text seems more probable. ² A further gap should perhaps be indicated here; Ez. 13. 13 hardly justifies us in making Ezechiel the subject of verse 11. The Hebrew and the Syriac have 'he remembered (or, made mention of) Job', which again would not naturally apply to Ezechiel, in spite of Ez. 14. 14.

- 16 Enoch no man born on earth can match, 17 that from earth was taken away; nor Joseph, that was born to be his brethren's master, and the bulwark of a great nation.
 18 Lord of his brethren, stay of a people, he left his bones to await the day of God's deliverance, in death prophetic still.
 19 Seth and Sem are among the heroes of their race, and Adam, too, that when earth began was made Lord of all living creatures.

50 A great priest was Simon, son of Onias;¹ in his day the house of God was repaired, to make the temple strong was his life's task. The high part of the temple, where the building was of double thickness, and the towering walls about it, he underpinned; in his day, too, the cisterns received their full flow of water, rose beyond all measuring, sea-deep. So well he cared for his fellow-citizens; no enemy should be able to compass our ruin; nor lacked he means to enlarge the city's span. See in what state he comes out to meet the people; entrance of temple and of temple-court lifted high above him! Bright he shone as the day-star amid the clouds, as the full moon in her season; nor sun ever shed on our own temple such generous rays as he. What shall be compared with him? Rainbow that lights up the clouds with sudden glory, rose in spring-time, lilies by the water-side, scent of olibanum on the summer air? Fire that glows brightly, and glow of incense on the fire? Ornament of pure gold, set with whatever stones are rarest; olive-tree that burgeons, tall cypress pointing to the sky? Such was he when he put on his robe of office, clad himself with the full majesty of his array; sacred the garments in which he went up to the sacred altar, yet were they ennobled by the man that wore them.

- 13 There he stood, by the altar, with the priests handing him their portions, every one, for sacrifice; and all these standing about him were but Lebanon cedars standing about Lebanon, were but as palm branches growing from their parent stem, all these sons of Aaron in the splendour of their attire. Theirs to hold out, before assembled Israel, the offerings made to the Lord; and he, completing his task at the altar, for the due observance of the great King's sacrifice, would reach out his hand for the cup, and with the grape's blood offer libation. And as he poured out at the altar's foot its consecrated fragrance, loud shouted the sons of Aaron, loud the silver trumpets blew; great was the cry raised to win God's audience. And with that, down fell all the people, face to earth, worshipping the Lord their God and pouring out their prayers to him, the Almighty, to him, the most High. The singers, too, broke out into chants of praise; sweetly their voices echoed through the wide courts; nor would the people leave off their praying to the Lord, the most High, till the divine praise was completed, and all their duty done. And then Simon would come down, his hand outstretched over the assembly of Israel, a blessing on his lips, and his heart proud to serve such a Master; and so fell to prayer again, for the better manifesting of God's power.

Bless we now his name who is God over all;² wide as earth is his wondrous power, the God that has granted us life since first we were borne in the womb, and most mercifully used us. Gladness of heart may he give us, and send Israel in our time peace that shall last for ever; and still may it be Israel's faith that God's mercy is with us, ready, when his time comes, to grant us deliverance.

Two nations with all my heart I loathe; and a third I can name, that nation indeed is none; the hill-tribes of Edom, and the Philistines, and the miscreant folk that dwell at Sichem.

The lessons of discernment and of true knowledge in this book contained were written down by Jesus, the son of Sirach, of Jerusalem; his heart ever a fountain of true wisdom. Blessed is he who lingers in these pleasant haunts, and treasures the memory of them; wisdom he shall never ¹ There were two high priests who could be described as 'Simon the son of Onias'. One of these flourished about three hundred, the other about two hundred years before Christ. The former is probably the one here alluded to. We have no information elsewhere about the improvements which are described, somewhat obscurely, in verses 2-5.

² vv. 24-26: It is not clear whether this is the formula of blessing used by Simon, or an epilogue written in the person of the author.

lack; and if by these precepts he live, nothing shall avail to daunt him; God's beacon-light shews the track he shall tread.

51 A prayer uttered by Jesus, son of Sirach. O Lord, my king, I give thee thanks, O God, my deliverer, I praise thee; I extol thy name, for all the succour and protection thou hast given me, saving my life from deadly peril, when calumny lay in wait, and lying tongues assailed me. In full sight of all that stood by thou didst come to my rescue; roaring lions stood ready to devour me, and thou in that great mercy, that renowned mercy of thine, didst deliver me. I was in the hands of my mortal enemies, shut in on every side by misfortune; there were stifling flames all round me, and I stood in the heart of the fire uninjured. I looked down into the deep womb of the grave, when foul lips brought lying accusations, and cruel king gave unjust sentence. And still I would praise the Lord, long as I had breath to praise him, though death's abyss yawned at my very feet, though I was cut off on every side, with none to aid me. Man's help I looked for, and could not find; yet I bethought me, Lord, of thy mercy, thy deeds of long ago; if men will but wait for thee patiently, thou, Lord, dost deliver them, dost rescue them from the power of the heathen. It was thou who hadst prospered my life on earth, and now, death ready to overwhelm me, to the Lord, Father of the Master I serve,¹ I made my plea. Would he leave me unaided when I was in distress, when my enemies were triumphing over me? I will extol thy name unceasingly, with grateful praise; my prayer did not go unregarded. Thou didst rescue me from deadly peril, didst save me in the hour of defeat; shall I not give thanks, shall I not praise and bless thy name?

A young man still, ere ever my wanderings began, I made my prayer for wisdom.² Before the temple I asked for this, my life's quest to the end. Came early the ripening of those grapes, and my heart rejoiced at it. Down a straight path I sped, the ardour of youth to aid my search. Ear that little listens shall yet hear; much wisdom that little listening gave. Further and further yet I travelled, thanks be to the God that all wisdom bestows. Good use to make of her was all my love and longing; never was that hope disappointed. Hardly I strove to win her, put force on myself to keep her rule; I stretched out my hands towards heaven, and grieved for the want of her. Kept I but true to the search for her, I found and recognized her still. Long since trained by her discipline, I shall never be left forsaken. Much heart-burning I had in the quest for her, but a rich dowry she brought me. Never shall this tongue, with utterance divinely rewarded, be negligent of praise. O hearts untutored, come near, and frequent the school of learning! Parley at the gates no more, complaining of thirst ever unsatisfied. Rather, to my proclamation give heed; win the treasure that is to be had without price paid. Suffice it that you bow your necks to her yoke, are content to accept her schooling. To find her, needs no distant travel. . . .³ Unlaborious days, as all can testify, what a harvest they have won me of repose! Would you grudge free expense of silver in the search for wisdom, that shall make you ample returns in gold? Your hearts shall yet triumph in his mercy, nor ever rue the day when you learned to praise him.

Do, while time serves, what needs doing; when the time comes, he will reward you.

¹ It is not easy to see what the sacred author meant by 'the Master whom I serve'; the obscure words used in Ps. 109. 1 are only an incomplete parallel. ² It is not clear whether we are to understand the word 'wanderings' literally (cf. 34. 12) or metaphorically. ³ It seems clear that some words have dropped out at the end of this verse; the Hebrew gives 'and the man who is intent upon her will discover her'.

THE PROPHECY OF ISAIAS

THIS is the revelation made to Isaias, son of Amos, about Juda and Jerusalem, during the reigns of Ozias, Joatham, Achaz and Ezechias in Juda. Listen, you heavens, and let earth attend to this, a divine remonstrance; my own sons, that I reared and brought to manhood, hold me in defiance! Ox recognizes its owner, ass knows the way to its master's crib; and I? I go unacknowledged; my own people of Israel gives me never a thought. Woe to a sinful nation, a people bowed with guilt, a rebellious race, a brood foully degenerate! They have forsaken God, they have spurned the Holy One of Israel, turned strangers to me. Would you have me smite you again, that you shew yourselves ever more faithless? Everywhere bowed heads, and faint hearts; no health anywhere, from sole to crown, nothing but wounds, and bruises, and swollen sores, that none binds up, or medicines, or anoints with oil! Your land a desert, your cities burnt to ashes, your fields ravaged before your eyes by strangers, desolation everywhere, as if an enemy had plundered you! Poor Sion, forlorn as vineyard watch-tower, summer-house in a herb-garden, a beleaguered city! A stock to breed from, so much the Lord of hosts has left us; but for that, we should be as Sodom is, Gomorrha's doom should be ours.

Listen, then, to this, the Lord's word, chiefs of the Sodom-city; people of Gomorrha, here is a command from our God for your hearing. What do I care, the Lord says, how you multiply those victims of yours? I have had enough and to spare. Burnt-offerings of rams, and the fat of stall-fed beasts, and the blood of calves and lambs and goats are nothing to me. Think you it is a welcome sound, the tramp of your feet in my courts bringing worship such as yours? Vain offerings, bring them no more, this incense of yours is an abomination. Enough of new moons and sabbaths, of thronged assemblies where none but sinners meet! The new month begins, the feast day comes round, how it cloy the appetite! These be hateful tasks I can bear no longer. Hold out your hands as you will, you shall get no heed from me; add prayer to prayer, I will not listen; are not those hands stained with blood?

Wash yourselves clean, spare me the sight of your busy wickedness, of your wrong-doing take farewell. Learn, rather, how to do good, setting your hearts on justice, righting the wrong, protecting the orphan, giving the widow redress; then come back, says the Lord, and make trial of me.

Crimson-dyed be your guilt, it shall turn snow-white; like wool new-washed yonder scarlet stain. Will you think better of it, and listen, and have rich harvests to feed you? Or will you refuse, and defy me, and yourselves be food for the sword? The Lord has given sentence. Strange, that the city once so faithful, once so upright, has turned harlot; the haunt of murderers, that was the home of right! The silver in thee turned to dross, the wine grown watery to the taste, thy law-givers wanting loyalty, so that they make common cause with thieves! None of them but takes bribe and looks for profit, none will give the orphan redress, none listen to the plaint of the widow.

What, then, does the Lord proclaim; he, the God of hosts, he, the Prince of Israel? Out upon it, I will rid myself of these rebels, my enemies shall have their deserts. And then I will take thee in hand again, smelting thee till thou art free from dross, purging away all that base alloy. Once more I will give thee judges like the judges of old, counsellors like the counsellors of past days, and thou shalt be called the home of right, the faithful city. Right and justice shall be done, when Sion is redeemed, when her exiles return; with one blow, the wayward sinner shall be overthrown, by the Lord he has forsaken doomed to perish. Tree-idols that have played you false, fond trust in your garden-shrines, you shall learn to rue them; yourselves but an oak-tree whose leaves are falling, a garden unwatered; when all your strength is like smouldering tow, and the idols you have made but a spark to set light to it, until both burn together, with none to quench them.

2 This is a message which was revealed to Isaias, the son of Amos, about Juda and Jerusalem. In later days, the mountain where the Lord dwells will be lifted high above the mountain-tops, looking down over the hills, and all nations will flock there together. A multitude of peoples will make their way to it, crying, Come, let us climb up to the Lord's mountain-peak, to the house where the God of Jacob dwells; he shall teach us the right way, we will walk in the paths he has chosen. The Lord's commands shall go out from Sion, his word from Jerusalem, and he will sit in judgement on the nations, giving his award to a multitude of peoples. They will melt down their swords into plough-shares, their spears into pruning-hooks, nation levying war against nation and training itself for battle no longer. Come you too (they will say), children of Jacob, let us walk together in the path where the Lord shews us light.

And still they are cast off, these children of Jacob, the Lord's own people; ever since they grew rich, like the men who went before them,¹ and began to trust in divination, like the Philistines, and to ally themselves with men of alien breed. A land full of silver and gold, with no end to its treasures, a land full of horses and chariots innumerable; a land full of idols, where men worship the devices their own hands have made. For this, high and low fall to earth, abate their human pride; and shall they find forgiveness?

See where the Lord comes, in all his terrors, in all the glory of his majesty; take refuge, now, in some rock-cavern, hide thee in some pit! Now indeed man's haughty looks must fall to earth, human pride must be abated; no room for any greatness but the Lord's, when that day comes. The day of the Lord of hosts! With the dawn of it all human pomp and state must be overshadowed, all human magnificence grow dim. High it will rise above the cedars of Lebanon, that grow so straight and tall, above the oaks of Basan; above aspiring mountain and swelling hill; above every topless tower, every impregnable citadel, above all the navies of Tharsis, above every sight that is fair to see. Shall not man's greatness fall to earth, shall not human pride be abated then? No room for any magnificence but the Lord's, when that day comes. Vanished the false gods, only cave in the rock, crevice in the ground will afford shelter, when the Lord comes, great and terrible, when he rises up to smite earth with dread! Flung away, when that day comes, idols of silver and gold they once made and worshipped; moles and bats all their worship now, as they sink into clefts of the hills, into rocky caverns, to hide themselves from the terrors of the Lord's coming, from this sublime majesty that daunts the earth! Trouble mankind no more;² this at least man can boast, he has the breath of life in his nostrils.

3 See where the Lord of hosts, our Master, takes away from Jerusalem and from Juda all that was valiant and strong, all the support they had against famine and thirst! Gone the hero and the warrior, judge and prophet, diviner and senator, captain of the watch, and nobleman, and counsellor, and skilful workman, and master of charms. Only boys will be left to rule, and wantonness shall govern all; the citizens coming to blows, neighbour falling out with neighbour; for age and rank there shall be no reverence. Here is one catching hold of his own brother, his own house-mate, What (says he) hast thou a coat to thy back? Be our chieftain, then; take these ruins into thy keeping. And the other answers, Who, I? Nay, I have no doctor's skill. As for my house, there is neither bread nor coat in it; ruler thou shalt never make of me. Jerusalem in ruins, Juda lying prostrate! Whispering and scheming of theirs defied the Lord, challenged his divine scrutiny. Their hang-dog looks betray them; they publish their guilt abroad, like the men of Sodom, making no secret of it. Ill-fated souls, retribution has come upon them.

¹ 'Like the men who went before them'; the Hebrew text more probably means 'from the east'. But the whole of the verse is very obscure, and perhaps corrupt. ² This verse seems to be addressed to the false gods. But the Hebrew text is best translated, 'Cease from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; what claim has he to regard?' The sense is not clear, and the Septuagint Greek omits the whole verse.

For the just, courage! His reward is earned; but woe betide the sinner! He shall be repaid for his ill deeds. My people has been despoiled by the tyrants that rule it; women have gained power over it; those who call thee happy, my people, are deceiving thee, are luring thee into false paths. Even now the Lord stands ready to hold his assize, waits there to pass judgement on all nations. The Lord will enter into a reckoning with the senators and the rulers of his people: You have made spoil of the vineyard, your houses are full of the plunder you have taken from the oppressed; what means it, that you ride roughshod over my people, that you spurn the right of friendless folk? Such warning he gives you, the Lord God of hosts.

This, too, the Lord says: See what airs they put on, the women-folk of Zion, walk head in air, look about them with glancing eyes, click the trappings on their feet with mincing steps. Ay, but the Lord has his doom ready for them; bald of head and bare of temple the women of Zion shall know it. In one day the Lord will sweep away all their finery, the shoes with the rest; locket, and collar, necklace and bracelet and veil; hair-pin, ankle-ring, chain, scent-box, pendant, signet-ring and nose-ring; gala dress and gown and scarf, bodkin and mirror and shawl and riband and kerchief. There will be new fashions then; stench for scent, hempen rope for waist-band, baldness for curls, and hair shirt for stomacher.

Of the men-folk, too, all that is fairest shall fall by the sword, all that is bravest, slain in battle. See where she sits on the ground desolate, every gateway of hers full of sorrow and lament!

4 Day of desolation! Here are seven women catching hold of one man, and promising, We will earn our bread, find ourselves in clothing; only let us bear thy name, and be saved from the reproach of barrenness!

When that day comes, bud and fruit there shall be, of the Lord's fostering; burgeoning of glory made manifest, harvest of our soil, the trophy of Israel's gleanings.¹ Set apart for him, all that dwell in Zion now, all that survive the city's purging; none else will be left alive in Jerusalem, when the Lord sweeps away the guilt of Zion's women-folk, washes Jerusalem clean from the blood that stains her, with the searing breath of his judgement. And over mount Sion, the shrine of his name, cloud shall hang by day, glowing haze by night, a veil for glory. Canopy they shall have, to shade them from the day's heat, a refuge to give them shelter from storm and rain.

5 A song, now, in honour of one that is my good friend; a song about a near kinsman of mine, and the vineyard that he had. This friend, that I love well, had a vineyard in a corner of his ground,² all fruitfulness. He fenced it in, and cleared it of stones, and planted a choice vine there; built a tower, too, in the middle, and set up a wine-press in it. Then he waited for grapes to grow on it, and it bore wild grapes instead. And now, citizens of Jerusalem, and all you men of Juda, I call upon you to give award between my vineyard and me. What more could I have done for it? What say you of the wild grapes it bore, instead of the grapes I looked for? Let me tell you, then, what I mean to do to this vineyard of mine. I mean to rob it of its hedge, so that all can plunder it, to break down its wall, so that it will be trodden under foot. I mean to make waste-land of it; no more pruning and digging; only briars and thorns will grow there, and I will forbid the clouds to water it. Alas, it is the house of Israel that the Lord called his vineyard; the men of Juda are the plot he loved so. He looked to find right reason there, and all was treason; to find plain dealing, and he heard only the plaint of the oppressed.

¹ Literally, 'In that day there will be a bud (or, according to the Hebrew, a burgeoning) of the Lord, for magnificence and glory, and fruit of the earth high uplifted, a source of triumph to those in Israel who are saved'. Scholars are not agreed whether this is a direct or only an indirect reference to the coming of the Messias.

² Literally, 'a horn, the son of oil'. The word 'horn' is generally interpreted here as a hill; but a rocky crag such as the word would indicate would be no place for a vineyard.

Woe upon you, that must ever be acquiring house after house, field after neighbouring field, till all the world goes wanting! Would you have the whole land to yourselves to live in? The news of all this has reached me, says the Lord of hosts; see if I do not leave these many houses, these fine great houses of yours, lonely and untenanted. Wait, till you find ten acres of vine-land yielding but one flagon of wine, thirty bushels of seed-corn yielding but three. Woe upon you, the men who must be up betimes to go a-drinking, and sit late into the evening, till you are heated with wine! Still you must have zither and harp, tambour and flute and wine for your entertainment; you give no thought to God's dealings, to the world his hands have made. It is this inconsiderateness that has made my people homeless exiles, their nobles starving, and common folk parched with thirst; that is why the abyss hungers for you, opens its greedy jaws, till all alike, the nobles of Sion and her common sort, that boast and triumph now, go down to its depths. The low-born must fall, the high-born abate his pride; the eyes of the boaster will be downcast; doom, by which the Lord of hosts will be exalted, just award, by which the God of holiness will shew holier yet! There, with his flocks browsing undisturbed, the stranger shall enjoy the rich pastures you left a wilderness.

Woe upon you, that lightly harness yourselves to ill-doing, and draw down upon you, as with a strong rope, its guilt! What is this, you say, that the Holy One of Israel threatens? Quick, no waiting; let us know the worst, and with all speed! Woe upon you, the men who call evil good, and good evil; whose darkness is light, whose light darkness; who take bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter! Woe upon you, that think yourselves wise, and boast of your own foresight! Woe upon you, heroes of the tankard, brave hearts round the mixing-bowl, that take bribes to acquit the guilty, and rob the innocent of his rights!

See how stubble is eaten away by the fire²⁴ that licks round it, melting away into the heat of the flame; so the root of them will turn to smouldering embers, and the fruit of them will go up like flying ashes; men who reject the law of the God of hosts, who defy every warning from the Holy One of Israel. That is why the Lord's anger²⁵ against his people has been so fierce; that is why his hand has been raised to smite them, so that the mountains trembled at it, and corpses lay unregarded like dung in the streets. But even so his anger is not yet appeased, his hand threatens us still.

And now he will raise up among the²⁶ distant nations one people to be a signal to the rest;¹ he will whistle it up from the ends of the earth, swiftly and suddenly it will answer his call. Not a man in those²⁷ ranks that will faint or lag behind; none grows weary or falls asleep; never a belt is unbuckled, never a shoe-string loosed. Sharp arrows this people has, and all its²⁸ bows are ready bent; it has horses with hoofs like flint, and chariot-wheels like the rushing of the storm. No lion roars so²⁹ loud; it will roar as lion-cubs do, growling and holding its prey fast, encircling it so that none can bring rescue. Sounds of³⁰ dread shall usher in that day, loud as the roaring of the sea; look where you will, all shall be dark with misery; light itself will be darkened by the shadow of its coming.

6 In the year of king Ozias' death, I had a vision. I saw the Lord sitting on a throne that towered high above me, the skirts of his robe filling the temple. Above² it rose the figures of the seraphim, each of them six-winged; with two wings they veiled God's face, with two his feet, and the other two kept them poised in flight.² And ever the same cry passed between³ them, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God of hosts; all the earth is full of his glory. The⁴ lintels over the doors rang with the sound of that cry, and smoke went up, filling the temple courts.

Alas, said I, that I must needs keep⁵ silence;³ my lips, and the lips of all my countrymen, are polluted with sin; and yet these eyes have looked upon their King, the Lord of hosts. Whereupon one of the seraphim flew up to me, bearing a coal which he had taken with a pair of tongs from the altar; he touched my mouth with it, and said, Now that this has touched thy lips, thy guilt is swept away, thy sin pardoned. And now I heard the Lord say, Who shall be my messenger? Who is to go on this errand of ours? And I said, I am here at thy command; make me thy messenger.

¹ This is the only possible way of translating the Hebrew text as it stands; but it seems likely that the word 'nations' has been written, through a copyist's error, instead of 'nation'. In that case the passage would run quite simply: 'And now he will raise a signal to a nation that is far away; he will whistle it up...' etc. ² The Hebrew text here is ambiguous, and may mean that the seraphim veiled their own faces and their own feet (cf. Ez. 1. 11), but the sense given above is that of the Latin version. ³ 'I must needs keep silence'; in the Hebrew text, 'I am lost!'; cf. Ex. 33. 20.

Go then, said he, and give a message to this people of mine: Listen as you will, but ever without understanding; watch all, and nothing perceive! Thy office is to dull the hearts of this people of mine, deaden their ears, dazzle their eyes, so that they cannot see with those eyes, hear with those ears, understand with that heart, and turn back to me, and win healing.¹ For how long, Lord? I asked. And he said, Till the cities are left unpeopled, and the houses untenanted, and the whole land a wilderness. The Lord will send its people into exile far away; wider, ever wider desolation must spread over it. Though a tenth of their number remain, it is but empty show,² like leafage of terebinth or oak that needs pruning; only a remnant of it will be left, the true stock of holiness.

7 Afterwards, in the reign of Achaz, whose father was Ozias' son Joathan, an attack was made upon Jerusalem by Rasin, king of Syria, and Phacee, son of Romelia, king of Israel. As it proved, they were not strong enough to take it; but when the news reached David's palace that Syria had gained a footing in Ephraim, the hearts of Achaz and his people trembled like forest trees before the wind. Then it was that the Lord said to Isaias, Take with thee thy son, Jashub the Survivor,³ and go out to the end of the aqueduct that feeds the upper pool in the Fuller's Ground. There thou wilt meet Achaz, and this shall be thy message to him, Shew a calm front, do not be afraid. Must thy heart fail thee because Rasin king of Syria and the son of Romelia are thy sworn enemies? What is either of them but the smouldering stump of a fire-brand? What if Syria, what if Ephraim and the son of Romelia are plotting to do thee an injury? They think to invade Juda and strike terror into it, so that they can bring it into their power, and set up the son of Tabeel as its ruler; a vain errand, the Lord says; it shall not be. As surely as Damascus rules Syria,⁴ and Rasin rules Damascus, within sixty-five years Ephraim will be a people no longer. As surely as Samaria rules Ephraim, and the son of Romelia rules Samaria, if you lose courage, your cause is lost.

The Lord sent, besides, this message to Achaz, Ask the Lord thy God to give thee a sign, in the depths beneath thee, or in the height above thee. But Achaz said, Nay, I will not ask for a sign; I will not put the Lord to the test. Why then, said Isaias, listen to me, you that are of David's race. Cannot you be content with trying the patience of men? Must you try my God's patience too? Sign you ask none, but sign the Lord will give you. Maid shall be with child, and shall bear a son,⁵ that shall be called Emmanuel. On butter and honey shall be his thriving, till he is of age to know good from harm;⁶ already, before he can tell this from that, king they shall have none, the two kingdoms that are thy rivals.

As for thee, and for thy people, and for thy father's house, the Lord means to bring upon thee such days of trouble as have not been seen since Ephraim parted from Juda, with the coming of the king of Assyria. Days when the Lord will whittle

¹ The effect of prophecy or preaching, if it is met by an impenitent attitude, is to put the hearer in a worse frame of mind than ever, since the message has become staled by repetition. Cf. Mt. 13. 14; where, however, our Lord quotes the prophecy in a milder form. ² 'It is but empty show'; in the Hebrew text, 'it will once again be destroyed'. ³ The full name of the prophet's son would seem to have been Shearjashub, 'a remnant shall return' (10. 22).

⁴ The words 'as surely as' are not expressed in the original; but it seems very difficult to explain the context if they are not understood. ⁵ Literally, the verse begins 'Therefore the Lord, he will give you a sign', 'Maid shall be with child'; cf. Mt. 1. 23. The Hebrew text, but not the Greek, would admit 'a maid' instead of 'the maid'. In the Hebrew text, the word used should perhaps be translated 'maid' rather than 'virgin', since it refers rather to a time than to a state of life; but in view of the event, we cannot doubt that this prophecy looks forward to the Virgin Birth. No very successful attempt has been made to explain its relevance to contemporary happenings. ⁶ Probably, both here and in verse 22 below, butter and honey signify not prosperity, but privation, the arable lands of Judaea having been turned into pasture.

up those plagues of his, yonder flies that hatch by the last rivers of Egypt; yonder bees, that hive in the land of Assur. Invading swarms, that settle even upon mountain, gully and rock, cavern; thicket is none, nor underground pit, shall be safe from them. Hard times, when the Lord will be hiring mercenaries from beyond Euphrates, the king of Assyria's men, and will leave you quite bare, hair of head and legs shaved close with this hired rasor of his, and the beard too! Hard times, when one heifer and a pair of sheep are all the stock a man has; milk plentiful, so that he has butter to eat; of butter and honey the survivors will have no lack; but where once a thousand vines grew, each worth a silver piece, all will be thorns and brushwood. Covert of thorns and brushwood, where men go armed with bow and arrows; only the hill-sides, that have felt the hoe, shall be free from the terrors of the covert, and these the cattle shall graze, the sheep trample under foot.

8 Then the Lord said to me, Take a great scroll, and write on it, in thy human penmanship,¹ the words, Spoiler, haste; there's plunder afoot. I took care to have men of credit for my witnesses, the priest Urias and Zacharias, son of Barachias. Afterwards, when the prophetess conceived and bore me a son, the Lord said to me, Call him by this name, Spoiler, haste; there's plunder afoot. This boy will not have learned to use the words Father and Mother, before the king of Assyria comes to carry off the wealth of Damascus, the spoils of Samaria.

And the Lord went on to say to me, This people of mine has cut itself off from the gently-flowing waters of Siloe, to welcome Rasin and the son of Romelia instead;² and now the Lord will bring the waters of Euphrates upon it, in full flood; I mean the king of the Assyrians, in all his greatness. This flood will fill up all the channels of the river, overflow all its banks, till it pours over Juda, overwhelming her and reaching up to her very neck. Wings spread out wide, till they cover the whole breadth of thy own land, Emmanuel, the God who is with us!

Muster, then, you peoples, to your own overthrow; obey the call, distant lands, in vain; summon up your valour, arm yourselves in vain! All your scheming baffled, all your boasts belied; God is with us!³ Strict warning the Lord has given me, I must not fall in with the fashion of Israel; Not for thee and thine to go about crying Treason; this people is for ever crying treason.⁴ Not for thee and thine to go in fear, dismayed like these others; enthroned the Lord of hosts above all else, him you must fear, of him stand in awe. Let the hour of peril consecrate you to him; for the rest, both in Israel and in Juda, it will be a stone to trip men's feet, a boulder that catches them unawares.⁵ A trap, a fine snare, for the citizens of Jerusalem; and there are many of them that will stumble, and fall, and bruise themselves, caught in its meshes. (Now to guard the prophetic record close, now to seal up these instructions, in the keeping of my disciples! What though the Lord hide his face from the men of Israel? To him will I look, and wait patiently for him; here stand I, and these children⁶ the Lord has given me, a portent, a warning sent to Israel by the Lord of hosts, who dwells on mount Sion. Men will bid you consult wizard and diviner, that talk in ghostly voices over their enchantments; Who doubts, they say, God will send his own people answer,

¹ Literally, 'the pen of a man'. This has often been translated 'with an ordinary pen' or 'in the common speech of the country', but it is difficult to see why either direction should be necessary. In Deut. 3. 11 'the cubit of a man' is evidently a measurement taken from the arm of an ordinary man, not from that of a giant.

² The people of Juda are blamed for cutting themselves off from the holy city (here represented by the pool of Siloe, its water-supply), and permitting the son of Romelia to enter their country (11 Par. 28. 6). They will be punished by a flood, that is, the invasion of Juda by Sennacherib (IV Kg. 18); it will drown them only up to the neck, because Jerusalem will remain unconquered.

³ vv. 9, 10. These verses are evidently addressed to the defeated forces of Sennacherib.

⁴ The Latin (though not the Hebrew text) would also yield the sense 'it is rather the (alarmist) language of these people themselves that should be accounted treason'.

⁵ It is commonly assumed that Almighty God himself will be a stone, a boulder, etc.; but the sense of this is not evident, and there is no reason, either in the Latin or in the Hebrew, why the subject of the verb should not be neuter. This national crisis will be a means of sanctification to Isaiahs and his disciples; others, taken unawares by it, will involve themselves in ruin (e.g., by taking flight and falling into the hands of the Assyrians).

⁶ The word 'children' may be taken literally (cf. 7. 3 and 8. 3 above); St Jerome, however, understands it of the prophet's disciples.

20 an oracle from the dead to the living? By these instructions rather abide, this record of prophecy; who follows other inspiration, shall not see the dawn.)

21 As for the invader,¹ he shall meet with disaster, and then famine. Famine-stricken, he will turn with curses against 22 his king, his god; first looking upwards and then to earth, to find nothing but distress and darkness, ruin and want, with night pressing hard upon him; from his calamity there is no escaping.

9 Land of Zabulon and Nephthali, its burden at first how lightly borne! but afterwards affliction weighed on it, Galilee, by the sea road where the Gentiles
2 dwell west of Jordan.² And now the people that went about in darkness has seen a great light; for men abiding in a land where death overshadowed them, light has 3 dawned. Their number thou didst increase, but gavest them no joy of it;³ now, they shall rejoice in thy presence, as men rejoice when the harvest is in, as men triumph when victory is won, and booty taken, and they fall to dividing up the 4 spoils. Yoke that fixed the burden, shaft that galled the shoulder, rod of the tyrant, all lie broken now, as they did long ago, the old Madian fell. All the trophies of the 5 old tumultuous forays,⁴ all the panoply stained with blood, will be burnt up now, 6 will go to feed the flames. For our sakes a child is born, to our race a son is given, whose shoulder will bear the sceptre of princely power. What name shall be given him? Peerless among counsellors, the mighty God, Father of the world to come, 7 the Prince of peace. Ever wider shall his dominion spread, endlessly at peace; he will sit on David's kingly throne, to give it lasting foundations of justice and right; so tenderly he loves us, the Lord of hosts.

Meanwhile, the Lord has issued his sentence against Jacob, his writ is out against Israel: Ephraim will soon know of it, all the citizens of Samaria. Fools, that boast in the pride of their hearts: The brick houses have fallen, we must build them up in stone; the sycamores have been cut down, we must plant cedars instead! The Lord will make Rasin's rivals more powerful than Rasin himself;⁵ all the enemies of Israel he will set astir, Syria on the East, and the Philistines in the west, that will fall upon him wide-mouthed. And even so the Lord's anger is not appeased; his hand threatens us still. Alas for the people that will not come back to God, who chastens it; that leaves the Lord of hosts unregarded as ever!

And now, in one day, the Lord will cut off from Israel both head and tail, both pliant reed and stubborn bough.⁶ (What is the head, but the senator that holds his head so high? What is the tail, but the prophet that gives lying assurances?) False guides, that promised all was well; fools that gave them credence, to their own undoing! Pride in their warriors the Lord has none, pity for orphan and widow has none; all are false and worthless, no mouth but talks presumptuously. Even so the Lord's anger is not appeased, his hand threatens us still. Our wickedness is like a raging fire, that will devour brushwood and thorn-bush, then set light to the forest's tangled boughs; see how proudly yonder column of smoke whirls upward! Fiery vengeance of the Lord of hosts, that ravages country-side and devours citizen! Brother shews brother no mercy; turn he to the right, nought but famine is there;

¹ Literally, 'he will go through it' (the land). Verses 21, 22 probably relate to the position of Sennacherib after his defeat (IV Kg. 19. 35), the prophet's thought having gone back to verse 8 above. The invasion is there described as a spreading out of wings, and here, in verse 22, Sennacherib is warned that he will not be able to 'fly away' from his calamity.

² In the Hebrew text, this is given as verse 23 of ch. 8, and connected with verse 22 by the words, 'Yet that ruin shall not be like the (former) straits'. But the transition here to Messianic rejoicing, and back again to lamentation in verse 8, perhaps represents a shifting current of prophetic inspiration, rather than any connexion of thought; a principle which deserves to be remembered all through the writings of the prophets. Cf. Mt. 4. 15.

³ The negative here is of doubtful authority in the Hebrew. ⁴ Literally, 'every violent foray accompanied by tumult'. The Hebrew text is generally understood as meaning 'the boots whose tramping was so loud'. ⁵ The sense here is very confused, and some think the word 'Rasin' has crept in by error; in which case the original meaning was, that Israel's own enemies were exalted above him. As the text stands, the rivals of Rasin will be the Assyrians (IV Kg. 16. 9).

⁶ 'Pliant reed and stubborn bough'; literally, 'him who bends down and him who holds back'. The Hebrew text has, 'both the palm-branch and the reed', which is commonly understood as meaning 'both high and low', but seems to be interpreted by the Latin translator as meaning 'both the stubborn (senator) and the pliant (prophet)', so as to correspond with the 'head' and the 'tail', as explained in verse 15.

eat he what comes to his left hand, he is yet hungry, so that at last he will fall on his own flesh and blood,¹ Manasses on Ephraim and Ephraim on Manasses, and both will be banded together against Juda. And even so the Lord's anger is not appeased; his hand threatens us still.

10 Out upon you, that enact ill decrees, and draw up instruments of wrong; suppress the claims of the poor, and refuse redress to humble folk; the widow your spoil, the orphan your prey! What shifts will you be put to, when the day of reckoning comes, when the storm overtakes you that is brewing far away? With whom take refuge, where hide away your treasures? Yours to crouch down in chains, or fall among the massacred. And even so the Lord's wrath is not appeased, his hand threatens us still.

Woe, too, upon the Assyrian! What is he but the rod that executes my vengeance, the instrument of my displeasure? I have sent him to punish one nation that has proved false to me; against one defiant people he holds my warrant; let him prey on it as he will, carry off what spoils he will, trample it like the mire in the streets. Not such are his own thoughts, not such the dreams he cherishes; he dreams of extermination, of realm after realm dispeopled. Are not my chieftains, he says, as good as kings, every one of them? What difference between Charcamis and Calano, between Arphad and Emath, between Damascus and Samaria? I have had my way with the kingdoms that worship false gods; shall it not be the same with the images they worship at Jerusalem and Samaria? May I not treat Jerusalem and her images as I treated Samaria and her false gods?²

Wait we, till the Lord has carried out all his designs upon mount Sion and Jerusalem. Then he means to reckon with the boastful ambition of Sennacherib, with the proud glance of those scornful eyes. My own strength (the king says to himself) has done all this, my own wisdom has planned it; I have removed the frontiers of nations, I have robbed princes of their treasure, with a strong hand I have pulled down rulers from their thrones. Mighty peoples, and my hand closed over them like a nest; I gathered up a whole world, as a man gathers up eggs that lie abandoned; no flapping of wings, no angry screech to forbid me. Poor fool, can axe set itself up against woodman, saw defy carpenter? Shall the rod turn on him who wields it, the staff, that is but wood, try conclusions with a living man?

What says our Master, the Lord of hosts? He will send a wasting sickness into that gorged frame; beneath that pride a living firebrand shall burn, burn deep. He who is our light will turn into a fire, the Holy One of Israel will be a flame, that will burn up suddenly; in one day those thorn-bushes, that dry brushwood shall be consumed. Like a proud forest, or a garden plot, he shall be eaten up, body and soul; see where he flies in terror! Of all the trees in that forest so few shall be left, a child might count them. And when that day comes, the remnant of Israel, the survivors of Jacob's line, will learn to trust, not in the staff that turns into rod to smite them,³ but in the Lord, the Holy One of Israel; here he shall find loyalty. A remnant will turn back, only a remnant of Jacob, to God, the Mighty One. Countless though Israel be as the sea sand, only a remnant of it will return; there must be a sharp reckoning first, before we are restored, abundantly, to his favour.⁴ Short and sharp is the reckoning the Lord, the God of hosts, will make, with the whole world for the scene of it.

Here, then, is a message for you from the ¹ Literally, 'the flesh of his own arm', but the context seems to shew that the words are used metaphorically. ² vv. 10, 11. Cf. IV Kg. 18. 34, 35. Sennacherib is represented as supposing that the God of Israel would have images like the gods of the neighbouring countries; in calling these 'false gods', he is using the prophet's language, not his own.

³ Literally, 'in him who smites them'. The sense is, that Achaz, instead of trusting in God, had put his trust in the king of Assyria to help him against his own neighbours (IV Kg. 16. 7), and this staff on which he had leaned was to turn into a rod which would chastise him.

⁴ This is the general sense of the Hebrew text, which seems to mean, 'there is (to be) a decisive bringing-to-an-end, which will produce an overflow of rightness of heart'; that is, God will leave in Juda a remnant that is pleasing to himself, only at the price of destroying many other lives first. The Latin version means literally, 'An abbreviated consummation will overflow with rightness of heart'—perhaps in the sense given above, but not necessarily. The Septuagint Greek has, '(God is) consummating and cutting short his word (that is, his action upon the world) in rightness of heart (or perhaps, in justice)'. This Greek version is the basis of the quotation which St Paul makes in Rom. 9. 27.

Lord, the God of hosts: Never lose heart, men of Sion, my own people, before the Assyrian, rod though he have to smite thee, staff to chastise thee, when thou meetest 25 him on the road to Egypt.¹ Wait for a little, for a short moment wait, and my angry vengeance for his ill doings shall find full 26 scope. The Lord of hosts will bring the lash down upon him, as he did once on Madian at the rock Oreb; by the sea-shore, on the road to Egypt, his rod will be up-27 lifted. And with that, thy shoulder will be eased of the burden, the yoke will fall from thy neck, yoke that has gone rotten for want of oil.²

28 See where he enters Aiath, crosses to Magron, halts his baggage-train at Machmas!
 29 Already the pass lies behind them; Geba will be theirs by nightfall. In Rama, what terror! Saul's own city of Gabaa is in 30 flight. Cry aloud, maidens of Gallim, and listen, Laisa, to the cry; woe upon thee, 31 poor Anathoth! Medemena stands empty; now, men of Gabim, you need courage!
 32 Daylight still! Why, he will make his halt at Nobe, threaten the mountain where queen Sion stands, the very hill of Jerusalem!

33 Then, as we look, our Master, the Lord of hosts, will spread terror among them, and break them like earthenware.³ Yield 34 greatness, and pride topple; axe-iron for yonder tangled forest, the strength of Lebanon outmatched!

11 From the stock of Jesse a scion shall burgeon yet; out of his roots a 2 flower shall spring. One shall be born, on whom the spirit of the Lord will rest; a spirit wise and discerning, a spirit prudent and strong, a spirit of knowledge and of 3 piety,⁴ and ever fear of the Lord shall fill his heart. Not his to judge by appearances, listen to rumours when he makes award; 4 here is judgement will give the poor redress, here is award will right the wrongs of the defenceless. Word of him shall smite the earth like a rod, breath of him destroy the ill-doer; love of right shall be the baldric he wears, faithfulness the strength that girds him. Wolf shall live at peace with lamb, leopard take its ease with kid; calf and lion and sheep in one dwelling-place, with a little child to herd them! Cattle and bears all at pasture, their young ones lying down together, lion eating straw like ox; child new-weaned, fresh from its mother's arms, playing by asp's hole, putting hand in viper's den! All over this mountain, my sanctuary, no hurt shall be done, no life taken. Deep as the waters that hide the sea-floor, knowledge of the Lord over-spreading the world!

There he stands, fresh root from Jesse's stem, signal beckoning to the peoples all around; the Gentiles will come to pay their homage, where he rests in glory.⁵ Then, once again, the Lord's hand at work! From Assyria, from Egypt, Pathros and Ethiopia, from Elam and Sennaar, from Emath, from the islands out at sea, his people, a scattered remnant, shall return. High lifted, for a world to see it, the standard that shall call Israel home, gather in the exiled sons of Juda from the four corners of the earth. Gone, Ephraim's envious looks, vanished away Juda's enemies; Ephraim shall hate Juda, Juda harry Ephraim, no more. Together they will sweep down on Philistia's neck, there by the western sea; plunder the children of the east, Edom and Moab in their grasp, the sons of Ammon pliant to their will. And the Lord will make a desert out of the tongue of sea that flanks Egypt; with the blast of his breath he will threaten Euphrates, dividing it into seven streams, that a man can cross dry-shod. And so the remnant of my people which is left among the Assyrians will find a path made for it, as a path was made for it when it came up out of Egypt, long ago.

¹ 'When thou meetest him on the road to Egypt'; literally 'in the way of Egypt', presumably in the sense that Sennacherib was on his way to invade Egypt when he laid siege to Jerusalem. Some, however, would interpret these words in the Hebrew text as meaning 'after the fashion of Egypt', i.e. the Assyrians will press hard on Israel as the Egyptians did at the time of the Exodus. In that case, it becomes necessary to alter the text at the end of verse 26, to give the sense 'as he did once on Madian at the rock of Oreb, and as he lifted his rod against Egypt by the shore of the (Red) sea'.

² Literally, 'from the face of oil'. If the text is sound, it seems necessary to interpret the phrase here as meaning 'away from'; 'deprived of' oil, not in its usual sense, 'as the result of'.

³ Literally, 'break an earthen vessel in (an atmosphere of) terror'. Cf. Ps. 2. 9. The Hebrew text is generally understood as meaning 'lops off branches terribly'.

⁴ The Hebrew text does not make any mention of the gift of piety; perhaps through a corruption, it seems to introduce 'fear of the Lord' twice over.

⁵ 'Where he rests in glory'; the Latin understands this of resting in the tomb, but this is not suggested by the Hebrew text.

12 Angry with me, Lord? thou wilt say, when that day comes; ay, thou wast angry with me, but now, praised be thy name, the storm has passed; all is consolation. God is here to deliver me; I will go forward confidently, and not be afraid; source of my strength, theme of my praise, the Lord has made himself my protector.¹ So, rejoicing, you shall drink deep from the fountain of deliverance; singing, when that day comes, Praise the Lord, and call upon his name, tell the story of his doings among all the nations, keep the majesty of his name in grateful remembrance. Sing in honour of the great deeds the Lord has done, make them known for all the world to hear. Cry aloud in praise, people of Zion; great is the Holy One of Israel, that dwells among you.

13 The burden² that awaits Babylon, as it was revealed to Isaias, son of Amos. A signal raised amid the shadow of the mountain, voices lifted, and a waving of hands; all is ready for the captains to march in through the city gates. These are my chosen warriors, doing my bidding; my champions whom I have summoned to execute my vengeance; they boast of my renown. The hills echo with the voices of a multitude, as if a host had gathered; voices of assembled kings, of whole peoples mustered there; the Lord of hosts is marshalling his troops for battle. They come from far away, from the most distant region under heaven; the Lord is angry, and these are the instruments of his vengeance, to lay a whole world waste. Cry aloud, for the day of the Lord is coming; his the dominion, his the doom. No hand now but will hang useless, no heart but will be fainting with dismay; tortures and pangs will seize them, throes as of a woman in travail; each man looks at his neighbour in bewilderment, their faces ashy pale.³ Yes, the day of the Lord is coming, pitiless, full of vengeance and bitter retribution, ready to turn earth into a wilderness, ridding it of its sinful brood. The stars of heaven, its glittering constellations, will shed no ray; sunrise will be darkness, and the moon refuse her light. I will punish the world's guilt, and tax the wicked with their misdoings, stilling the rebel's pride, crushing the haughtiness of tyrants, till a man is a rarer sight than gold, and a slave cannot be bought with all the treasure of Ophir. So terribly will I shake the heavens, and move earth from its place, to shew that the Lord of hosts will be patient no longer, and the hour of his bitter vengeance has come. Men will take to flight as deer or sheep would, with none to marshal them, each turning towards his own home, seeking refuge in his own country. Whoever is found left behind will be slain, and those who are encountered in the open will fall at the sword's point; their children will be dashed to pieces before their eyes, their houses plundered, their wives ravished.

With such an enemy I mean to embroil them; the Medians, who reckon nothing of silver, who are not to be tempted with gold; they will make young boys a target for their arrows, have no pity for pregnant mothers, no kindly glance for children. So Babylon, the pride of many nations, glory and boast of the Chaldeans, will go the way of Sodom and Gomorrah, cities which the Lord overthrew. It shall remain for ever uninhabited; generation after generation will pass, but it will not be founded again; even the Arabs will not pitch their tents, wandering shepherds will not find a lodging there. Wild beasts will make their lairs in it, its houses will be tenanted by serpents; ostriches will nest there, and satyrs dance; the owls will hoot to one another in its palaces, birds of ill omen in its temples of delight.⁴

14 The day of her doom is close at hand, not long the respite that will be granted her.

And now the Lord will have pity on Jacob; on the sons of Israel, his chosen ¹ The second half of this verse is a quotation from Ex. 15. 2; cf. 11. 16 above.

² The word in the Hebrew text which is translated 'burden', here and in the following chapters, is understood by some as meaning 'utterance', 'oracle'.

³ Literally, 'burnt up'; in the Hebrew text, 'faces of flame'. This is understood by many commentators as meaning 'red with excitement', but St Jerome interprets it as pallor.

⁴ vv. 21, 22. The creatures here mentioned cannot be certainly identified; according to some, the 'wild beasts' are wild cats; the 'serpents', 'owls' and 'birds of ill-omen' may also be jackals, hyenas, wolves, etc. The 'satyrs' are perhaps wild goats.

people as of old. On their own lands they shall live undisturbed, whose new inhabitants will make common cause with them, and throw in their lot with Jacob's 2 race. Alien peoples will take them by the hand, to escort them back to their home; content now to be Israel's servants and 3 hand-maidens, the captors captive, the oppressors tributary now. When that time comes, when the Lord gives thee respite from all the hardship and turmoil and 4 drudgery of old days, it will be thy turn to have thy say against the king of Babylon. Can it be (thou wilt say) that the tyranny is 5 over, the exactions at an end? The Lord has broken the staff in the hands of the 6 wicked, the rod that oppressed us; the rod whose mortal stroke once fell on the peoples so angrily, tamed the nations so 7 cruelly, persecuted, and would not spare. The whole earth, now, sinks back into 8 ease; listen to its cry of rejoicing! The very fir-trees and the cedars of Lebanon triumph over thee; no woodman comes 9 near us any longer, since thou wast laid to rest. The shadow world beneath is astir 10 with preparation for thy coming; wakes up its giants to greet thee. The great ones of the world, that ruled the nations, rise up 11 from the thrones where they sit, hailing thee with a single voice, Thou too brought 12 low as ourselves, thou too like us! All thy pride sunk down into the world beneath, and there thy corpse lies, with the moth for its shroud, worms for its cerecloth.
 13 What, fallen from heaven, thou Lucifer, that once didst herald the dawn? Prostrate on the earth, that didst once bring nations 14 to their knees? I will scale the heavens (such was thy thought); I will set my throne higher than God's stars, take my seat at his own trysting-place, at the meeting of the northern hills;¹ I will soar above 15 the level of the clouds, the rival of the most High. Thine, instead, to be dragged down into the world beneath, into the heart of 16 the abyss. Who that sees thee there, but will peer down at thee and read thy story:

Can this be the man who once shook the world, and made thrones totter; who turned earth into a desert, its cities into ruins; never granted prisoner release? For those other kings, honourable burial, each in his own palace; thee the grave itself rejects, like a withered root, like a thing unclean. Rots thy corpse unrecognized, beneath yonder coverlet of men slain, that went down to the deep pit together; no fellowship hast thou with those others, no share in their sepulture, thou who didst lead thy country to ruin, thou, who didst bring destruction on thy people. The posterity of the wicked shall be nameless for ever; for the guilt they have inherited, his sons too must be slain, they must not live to make the land their own, and people the world with cities. A message from the Lord of hosts: Now I mean to take arms against them, to destroy Babylon name and fame, root and branch. I will make the place over to the hedge-hog,² turn it into standing pools; I will sweep it clean, the Lord of hosts says, sweep it clean away.

And now the Lord of hosts has taken an oath, his doom shall be executed, his design shall stand: In this my own land I will break the power of Assyria,³ upon these hills I will trample him under foot. Gone his yoke; there shall be no more shouldering his burden; such purpose I have for the world's ordering; my hand once lifted, all the nations must bow. The Lord's decree, who shall annul it? The Lord's power, who shall thwart it?

And in the year of king Achaz's death, a fresh burden was imposed: Too soon, Philistia, thou wouldst make public holiday over the breaking of the rod that smote thee. The serpent has gone, but he has left a basilisk stock behind him; a race that can catch birds on the wing. Here, then, shall be food for the very poorest; beggar man shall lie down in safety; thee I will destroy with famine root and branch, slay all the remnant that is left in thee. All thy gates, now, must echo with lament, all thy cities

¹ Literally, 'on the hill of the covenant, on the northern slopes'. This may have some reference to the situation of Jerusalem (cf. Ps. 47. 2, and note there); but it is more generally understood by modern scholars as a reference by the King of Babylon to those northern hills upon which, according to his own mythology, the gods were supposed to meet.

² The word here translated 'hedge-hog' is found nowhere else, and some think it is the name of a bird, perhaps the bittern. ³ vs. 24-32. Hitherto this chapter, like the last, has dealt with the destruction of Babylon by the Medes, about two centuries after Isaiah's own time. Here the prophecy abruptly returns to contemporary events; the destruction of the Assyrians when they invaded Judah, and the ill fortune which nevertheless awaits the neighbouring country of the Philistines.

ring with cries; all Philistia swoons away.
From the north a smoke comes ever nearer, signal of an army none may escape.

12 Our news when the world asks, what message? Tell them Sion never rested in the Lord so surely; here be friendless folk that trust in him.

15 What burden for Moab? Ar Moab has fallen in a night, and all is still; Moab's battlements have fallen in a night, and all is still! Prince¹ and people of Dibon have gone up to the hill-shrines to lament; on Nabo and on Medaba, Moab cries aloud, every head cropped, every beard shaved in mourning. In the streets, men walk girded with sackcloth; house-top and square echo with loud crying, that breaks into tears. The dirge goes up from Hesebon and Eleale, so loud that Jasa hears it; well may the warriors of Moab cry out; the very soul of Moab utters a cry.

5 My heart laments for Moab, once ringed with walled cities as far as Segor; Segor that now moans like a full-grown heifer.² There is weeping on the slopes of Luith; along the Oronaim road they wail aloud for misery. The waters of Nemrim will turn into desert; old grass has withered, new grass has failed, and their banks are green no more. Heavy their reckoning, to match the abundance of their riches; a nation in exile, carried away to the Vale of Willows.³ 8 A cry goes up all about the frontiers of Moab; Gallim echoes the lament, and the well of Elim hears the sound of it. Dibon's waters already swollen with blood; and still for Dibon I have perils in store, lions to meet the fugitives, the remnant that is left in the land of Moab.⁴

16 Send forth (O Lord) a lamb to be ruler of the land,⁵ from Petra in the desert to the hill where queen Sion reigns. There they will be, the women-folk of Moab, waiting at the ford of Arnon, like fluttered birds, fledgelings that have taken wing from the nest; there are plans to be made, deliberations to be held; Shelter us, like the shadow, dark as night, that gives shelter at noon-day; hide these fugitives of ours, do not betray them in their wanderings; let them dwell as exiles in your land; poor Moab,⁶ give it sanctuary from threat of the invader! But see, the dust of armies has died down, the guilty wretch has met his end; vanished and gone, who trampled the world under foot! Mercy and faithfulness return; a throne set up in David's dwelling-place, for a judge that loves right and gives redress speedily!

The boasting of Moab has long been in our ears; who so boastful as he? Proud, scornful, and overbearing, with dreams that came to nothing. So, from one end of Moab to the other, there is a dirge, everywhere a dirge; for yonder folk, that live content behind walls of hardened brick, tidings of ruin.⁷ The fields about Hesebon lie deserted; alien chieftains have rooted up the vineyard of Sabama, whose shoots once reached as far as Jazer, strayed through the wilderness;⁸ forlorn, now, its tendrils, wandering overseas. I will weep, then, as Jazer weeps, for the vineyard of Sabama, water Hesebon and Eleale with my tears. That thy vineyard, thy vintage-time should be disturbed by the cry of trampling armies! All joy, all triumph gone from that fruitful land of thine; no mirth, no gaiety left; the presses shall be trampled

¹ 'Prince'; literally, 'the house', unless the word conceals a proper name, but it seems likely that the text here is corrupt. ² Literally, in the Latin, 'My heart laments for Moab; its bars reach as far as Segor, a calf of three years old'. Some think the word 'bars' should be 'fugitives', by a different understanding of the Hebrew text, and it is possible that the 'calf of three years old' conceals a proper name.

³ In the Hebrew text, the first half of this verse is generally understood to mean 'What remains of their abundance, their store', and it is this which is carried away to the 'Vale of Willows' in an effort to save it. St Jerome understands that the inhabitants themselves are carried away to the 'Vale of Willows', possibly with a reference to Ps. 136. 2. ⁴ The reference to fresh troubles soon to arise may be compared with 14. 29 above, though it is not certain that the events dealt with in the two passages are contemporary.

⁵ The word 'Lord' is lacking in the Hebrew text, and the verb 'send' is in the plural; many modern scholars omit the word 'be' and think the allusion is to the old tribute of lambs paid to Samaria. But the prophet is interested in Juda rather than in Israel, and Petra was in Edom, not in Moab. There may be corruption in the text; the Septuagint Greek has 'I will send forth as it were creeping things on the land'. For the whole of this chapter, cf. Jer. 48. 29-37. ⁶ The word Moab has the appearance of a vocative in the Latin; but the Hebrew idiom makes it probable that the refugees are coming out of Moab, not going into it, and the context implies as much.

⁷ The Hebrew text, in the second half of this verse, is usually interpreted as meaning, 'You will lament, all stricken, for the raisin-cakes (or perhaps, the foundations) of Cir-Chareset'. ⁸ According to the Hebrew text, the end of this verse may also be rendered, 'its tendrils spread out, they crossed the seas', perhaps with the implication that the Moabite wine was good enough for export.

no more by the labourers we knew; forgotten, now, the cry that used to go up 11 when they trod the grapes. For Moab, my inmost being thrills like a harp's strings; my heart goes out to those brick-walled 12 cities of hers. What shift will she make, when all goes ill with her on the heights? Prayer of hers, recourse to those shrines of hers, shall nothing avail her?

13 Such was the word the Lord spoke to Moab, long since, and now he declares his purpose: In three years, by the time a labourer's contract is out, Moab, so populous now, shall be shorn of her glory; shall be left small and weak, a thriving nation no longer.

17 What burden for Damascus? Damascus, too, shall cease to be a city, shall become a heap of stones in ruin: the cities of Aroer will lie, now, abandoned to flocks, that take their ease undisturbed.
 3 Ephraim protected no more, Damascus a kingdom no more, what is left of Syria will enjoy no more renown than Israel itself; such is her doom from the Lord of hosts.

4 The renown of Jacob, little enough will it be when that day comes; nothing but skin and bone will be left. Scanty as the corn a man gathers in his arm when he picks up what is left after the harvest, some gleaner in the valley of Rephaim. Only a cluster left here and there, a few olives still to be shaken off, two or three at the end of a branch, four or five on the top branch of all; that is what the Lord, the God of 7 Israel, has decreed. Then at last man will turn to his Maker, will look towards the 8 Holy One of Israel. He will turn no longer towards altars of his own designing, have eyes no longer for pillar and shrine of his 9 own fashioning. The cities he had fortified will be abandoned then, as ploughs and crops¹ were abandoned when Israel itself was the invader, and thou shalt be left forlorn. Thou didst forget the God who delivered thee, and gavest no thought to thy strong protector; thou art like one who plants on soil of good promise, but all the while is putting in bastard shoots. Wild grapes they were from the day when thou didst plant them, and soon this planting of thine will begin to bud; and now, when the time comes to enjoy it, here is all thy harvest lost to thee, and bitterly thou dost repine.²

Doom goes with it, this swollen multitude of nations, like the swollen seas that go roaring past; like the roar of those swollen seas is the stir of such a throng. Nations roaring with the roar of waters in full flood; and then, God will rebuke him, and in a moment he is far away, swept like the dust when a wind blows on the hills, or the whirl of leaves before the storm. Night comes, and there is terror all around; day breaks, and it is seen no more. Such the invader's doom, so evermore shall they thrive, that come to despoil us.³

18 Woe to the land that has the whirring of wings for its music, there beyond the Ethiop rivers! In skiffs of papyrus reed she sends her ambassadors to the sea-coast! Ay, speed on your errand, but to a people far away, sundered from you by leagues of travel, dreaded people at the end of the earth, race that bears a tyrant's yoke, in a land that is all rivers like your own.⁴

All you peoples of the world, all you that dwell on earth, wait till you see the signal raised on the mountains, till you hear the trumpet sound. Such warning the Lord has given me: I will keep silent and watch, here in my dwelling-place, as still as the bright sunshine of noon-day, or the haze that comes with the dew in harvest-time. What a blossoming was here before the time of harvest, how fully formed the buds that were still ripening! But its boughs

¹ The meaning of the words in the Hebrew text is uncertain, and many modern scholars follow the Septuagint Greek, which has 'the Amorrites and the Hevites'—that is, the old inhabitants of Chanaan. ² vs. 10, 11. The text here is difficult, and variously explained; but all are agreed on the general meaning, which is, that the Ten Tribes, in adopting the worship of false gods, were like men who are deceived, until it is too late, about the quality of the plants they put into the ground. ³ vs. 12-14. These verses are generally interpreted as a doom pronounced against the Assyrians, as if the subject were abruptly changed. But it is possible that it is Israel who will be 'rebuked' in verse 13, and will disappear in verse 14, with the Assyrians as the cause of his downfall.

⁴ vs. 1, 2. Almost every word in these two verses is interpreted by scholars in a variety of ways; nor is there any agreement as to the bearing of what is said. The race referred to may be the Egyptians, or the Ethiopians, or some nation still more distant; and it is not clear whether the messengers in verse 2 are being sent back to give a message to their own race, or sent on their way to give a message to some other race, for example the Assyrians. Some think the prophet is discouraging an Egyptian offer of alliance (IV Kg. 18. 24).

shall be cut back with the pruning-knife, its straying tendrils shall be torn off and thrown away. All alike will be left a prey to the mountain birds, and the beasts that roam through the land; all through summer the birds will hover about it,¹ and the beasts flock to it in winter. And then the people that is sundered far away, dreaded nation at the ends of the earth, land of the tyrant's yoke, land of the branching rivers, will bring gifts to the Lord of hosts, be-taking itself to mount Sion, where the name of the Lord of hosts is worshipped.

19 What burden for Egypt? See where the Lord comes into Egypt, with the cloud-drift for his chariot, and all the false gods of Egypt tremble, the very heart of Egypt melts away! Egyptians I will embroil with Egyptians; each man will turn on his neighbour, one city, one kingdom on another. The spirit of Egypt shall fail her, and I will daze her wits, till men go about consulting oracle and diviner, wizard and soothsayer. Tyrants for Egypt's masters, a fierce king to rule over it; the Lord of hosts has decreed it. Waters of the sea shall ebb, river waters be parched and dried up, the brooks failing, the channels, with their high banks,² flowing in a thin stream, reed and sedge withered away. Laid bare, yonder river-bed, from its source; fade the crops its moisture nourished, fade and dwindle to nothing. Sad days for the fisher-folk; never a hook cast, never a net sunk, all is grief and repining. Disappointed of their trade, the men who worked in flax, combing and weaving it so cunningly; in those brackish swamps there are no fish-ponds a-making now.³

Nonplussed, all the princes of Tanis; all Pharaoh's wise counsellors must needs give him a fool's answer. Where is that inheritance of learning they boast, come down from ancient kings? What has become of thy wise men, Pharaoh? Let them give thee news, let them tell thee what the Lord means to do with Egypt. No, the princes of Tanis are nonplussed; degenerate, the lords of Memphis; Egypt is deceived in her great men, that should have been the corner-stone of her commonwealth.⁴ The Lord has mazed her wits; fuddled brains of drunkard had been as well advised; head and tail, reed and stubborn branch, in Egypt's troubled counsels avail alike.⁵

Weak as a woman Egypt shall be, when that day comes, dazed and terrified, to see the Lord of hosts lift his hand so threateningly. Upon Juda Egypt must needs look with awe; fear is in the very name of it, as they scan the future; what means the Lord of hosts now? Cities five there shall be in the land of Egypt that talk with the speech of Chanaan, and take oaths in the name of the Lord of hosts; a city that bears the sun's name among them. There will be an altar set up to the Lord for all Egypt to see, and at its frontier a pillar dedicated to him, a trophy, there, in Egypt, bringing the Lord of hosts to mind. Cry they out to him, when they suffer oppression, he will give them a saviour, a champion, to deliver them. Thus the Lord will reveal himself to Egypt; the Egyptians, when that day comes, will acknowledge him, doing him worship with sacrifices and offerings, will make vows to the Lord and perform them.

First calamity, then healing; when they come back to the Lord, he will relent and restore. There will be a high-road, then, between Egypt and the Assyrians; either shall visit other, and Egypt under Assyria be at peace.⁶ And with these a third people shall be matched; who but Israel, source of the whole world's happiness? Such blessing the Lord of hosts has pronounced upon it, Blessed be my people in Egypt, and the home I have made for the Assyrian to dwell in; but Israel is the land of my choice.

20 It was in the year when Tharthan, at the bidding of king Sargon of Assyria, invaded the territory of Azotus, and captured it by assault, that the Lord sent out a message through Isaiah, son of Amos. Up, said he, and undo the sackcloth that girds thee, and take off thy shoes. This Isaiah did, and went bare and unshod. Whereupon the Lord said, Look, how my servant Isaiah goes bare and unshod; that is a sign and a portent of what must come upon Egypt and Ethiopia when three years are past.¹ It is thus that the king of Assyria will lead away the prisoners he takes in Egypt, the exiles from Ethiopia, young and old alike. Bare and unshod they shall go, with their buttocks exposed, to the shame of Egypt. A time of dismay and confusion for those who put their trust in Ethiopia, who boasted of Egypt's power! Dwellers in this nook of earth, they will cry out, Here lay all our hope; these were to be our protectors, and bring us deliverance when the king of Assyria came! And what of us? For us no refuge now.

¹ Owing to the doubts alluded to above, it is difficult to say what nation is referred to by the 'it' of this verse. ² 'The channels, with their high banks'; or perhaps (according to the Hebrew text) 'the channels of Egypt'. ³ vv. 7-10. Several phrases in this passage are of doubtful interpretation, particularly the last verse; the Hebrew text here being understood by some as meaning 'The pillars of the land (that is, the nobles) shall be crushed, and those who work for hire will grieve'. ⁴ The Latin implies that Egypt is the corner-stone of her own commonwealth, but the Hebrew text can equally well be interpreted as applying that description to the great men of the country. ⁵ See note on v. 14 above.

⁶ The Hebrew text here may mean, not that the Egyptians will serve the Assyrians, but they will serve (i.e. worship the true God) with the Assyrians.

21 What burden for the desert by the sea?² From the desert it comes, from a land full of terrors, like the storm-wind rising from the south. Here be stern threats revealed to me: the treacherous one still treacherous, the plunderer still at his plundering! Elam, to the attack! Lay siege to him, Medians! From yonder desert there shall be groaning no more! What wonder if pain gripped the loins of me, sudden as woman's pangs in travail? What wonder if sight and sound of it daunt and daze me, if heart fails and I grope in darkness, bewildered over her ruin, the Babylon³ I love?

What, the banquet spread? From yonder post of vantage look down on them, where they sit at their meat and drink! Now, captains, to arms!
Yes, the Lord's word has come to me, Go and bid the watchman stand at his post, to give tidings of all he sees. A chariot he saw, with two out-riders, one that rode on an ass, and one that rode on a camel; looked long at them, watching them eagerly. Then he cried, Lonely as lion am I, that have charge of the Lord's watch-tower; day after day I have stood here, night after night I keep my post. Nearer now, the chariot and its two outriders; Tidings! cries charioteer. Babylon has fallen, has fallen; images of the gods she worshipped have come crashing to the ground.⁴ My countrymen, winnowed with me in the same threshing-floor of trial, from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, such tidings I bring.

What burden for Duma?⁵ A cry comes to me from Seir, How goes the night, watchman? How goes the night? Morning is on its way, says he, but with morning, the night. Come back again and enquire, if enquire you must.

What burden for the Arabs?⁶ By evening, sleep in the woods you must, you that travel to Dedanim. Dwellers in the south, bring out water to meet the thirsty, bread to meet fleeing men. They have fled to escape the sword, the drawn sword, to escape the bow already bent against them, the stress of battle. In a year's time, the Lord says, by the time a labourer's contract is out,⁷ Cedar shall be robbed of all its glory; of all the brave archers that were Cedar's sons, only a dwindling remnant shall be left; the Lord, the God of Israel has decreed it.

22 What burden for the Valley of Revelation?⁸ Here is great stir among the townspeople, climb they eagerly to the house-tops. What means this shouting everywhere, these thronged streets, as of a city that makes holiday? Alas for thy dead, that were never slain by the sword,

¹ Literally, 'a sign and portent of three years'. It is not clear whether the prophet was ordered to go half-clad and barefoot during all that time.

² The desert by the sea is evidently Babylon. Some think this prophecy refers to the defeat of Merodach-Baladan, who was friendly to Juda (see ch. 39 below), which would explain the prophet's sympathy. Others connect it with the defeat of Baltassar (Dan. 5), supposing verse 5 here to be an allusion to Baltassar's feast; in that case, the prophet must be speaking in an assumed character, or perhaps in irony.

³ 'Babylon'; the Hebrew text has 'twilight'.
⁴ It is not clear how much of this verse, if any, is spoken by the watchman.

⁵ Duma, which is the Hebrew word for silence, is here used to represent Idumaea, or Edom; some think, by a play upon words.

⁶ The Hebrew forms 'in Arabia' and 'at evening' differ from one another only minutely. The Hebrew text reads 'in Arabia' twice over; some modern scholars, on the contrary, give this prophecy the heading 'A burden (or, oracle) at evening'.
⁷ Cf. 16. 14 above; the reference is perhaps to the time of year at which labourers were paid off.
⁸ The Valley of Revelation is clearly Jerusalem itself; but it is not clear to what period in its history the prophet refers, nor whether the disasters of which the Jews shew so little consciousness are already past, or still to come.

never died in battle; alas for rulers of thine, who with one accord have fled, or else been cruelly bound! Chains for all that were left, and distant exile. I pray you then, leave me alone, to weep bitterly; never try to comfort me, now that this people of mine is widowed. Day of doom, when the Lord of hosts will have yonder Valley of Revelation defeated, overrun, thrown into confusion; a day to test its ramparts, and overawe its citadel;¹ to archer, to chariot, to horseman, Elam sends out her challenge, bids shield come down from its place on the wall. Chariots up and down all thy favoured valleys, horsemen halted at thy gate!

Here is Juda, then, stripped bare; here is a day for looking to the armoury, there in the Forest House.² How many breaches, already, in the wall of David's city! Water you must bring in from the lower pool; take count of the houses in Jerusalem, pulling down some to build up the defences; you must find a bed between the two walls to contain the waters of the old pool. And all the while, no thought of him who made it all, no eyes for him who fashioned it, long ago. This day the Lord, the God of hosts, summons you to mourn and lament, to shave your heads and wear sackcloth; and instead all is mirth and gladness, oxen killed here, rams slaughtered there, meat being eaten and wine drunk; come, let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die! Plain it rings in my ear, the voice of the Lord of hosts, Never while you live shall this sin of yours be pardoned.

A message from the Lord God of hosts; Up, to my house betake thee, and find Sobna, that has charge of the temple.³ This be thy word to him, What claim of rank or kinship hast thou here, that thou shouldst hew out a burying-place for thyself? A tomb carefully hewed out on the hill side, an eyrie for thyself among the rocks? Wait till the Lord trusses thee like a trussed fowl, folds thee like a cloak, twines thee about with misfortune, and tosses thee like a ball into the great open plain! There shalt thou lie, and there that chariot which is thy pride, which is the shame of thy master's house. I mean to expel thee from the rank thou holdest, deprive thee of thy office. And when that time comes, I will summon one who is a true servant of mine, Eliacim the son of Helcias, clothe him with thy robe, gird him with thy girdle, entrust him with the power that once was thine; to rule all the citizens of Jerusalem, all Juda's race, with a father's care. I will give him the key of David's house to bear upon his shoulders; none may shut when he opens, none open when he shuts.⁴ I will fix him securely in his place, like a peg that is to carry all the royal honour of his father's house; all the honour of his father's house will rest upon him, as a man's goods rest on a peg, the smaller of them, here a cooking-pan, there an instrument of music. A day is coming, says the Lord of hosts, when the peg that was once securely fixed will be dislodged from its place; suddenly it must break and fall, and all that hung from it be ruined; the Lord decrees it.⁵

23 What burden for Tyre? Mourn aloud, ocean-going ships,⁶ that reach Cyprus to learn that the home you left is in ruins! Stand they aghast, dwellers in the coast-land that once was thronged with Sidonian merchants, that gathered its revenue from far over-seas; grain of Egypt's sowing, of the Nile's ripening, bartered they among the nations. Poor Sidon, by false hopes betrayed! A cry comes up from the sea, from her that was guardian of the sea, Not for me a mother's joys, a mother's pangs; never a son reared, never a maid brought to womanhood. Here is news for Egypt, news from Tyre that shall grip her with despair! Go out on your ocean voyage, dwellers on the coast-land,

¹ 'A day to test its ramparts, and threaten its citadel'; in the Hebrew text, it is possible to read proper names here, 'Cir is undermining, and Shoa is on the mountain side'—the two names being those of countries subject to Assyria. Similarly in verse 6 we may understand, 'Cir is laying bare (that is, is getting ready) the shield'. ² See III Kg. 7. 2. ³ 'Of the temple'; in the Hebrew text, 'of the house', that is, probably, the royal palace. ⁴ Apoc. 3. 7. ⁵ In the Hebrew text, the meaning of verses 23-25 is obscure; nor are scholars agreed, whether the peg that is to be dislodged from its place is Eliacim himself, at a later time, or Sobna, his predecessor in office. ⁶ 'Ocean-going ships'; in the Hebrew text, 'ships of Tharsis', and so in verses 10 and 14 below. The position of Tharsis is uncertain, but it is generally identified with Tartessus, on the Western coast of Spain. In that case a 'ship of Tharsis' would have to be one capable of resisting the seas of the Atlantic.

7 mourning aloud; your city come to this, the same city that had so long boasted of her ancestry! For her townfolk there is a journey to make on foot, a distant 8 journey.¹ Who was it plotted the downfall of Tyre, a city once so rich in crowns, whose merchants were princes, whose traffickers were among the great men of the earth? He, the Lord of hosts, designed it; who else drags in the mire the boaster's pride, brings all the great men of the earth into derision?

10 Daughter of ocean,² henceforward thy land must be watered with streams; the girdle of strength thou hadst is thine no 11 more. The Lord's hand, now, is stretched out over the sea itself, throwing all the kingdoms into dismay; his writ has gone out against Chanaan, that all its strongholds 12 should be brought to nothing. Sidon, poor queen (he says), boast no more of thy virginity; thy name is tarnished now. Cross the sea, and betake thyself to Cyprus if thou 13 wilt; even there thou shalt find no rest. Her resting-place is the land of the Chaldeans, where Assur has founded a nation strong as no nation ever was; nation that has carried off her warriors into captivity, undermined her palaces, made her into a heap of 14 ruins.³ Mourn aloud, ocean-going ships; your stronghold is laid waste.

15 After this thou wilt be forgotten, thou city of Tyre, for seventy years, long as the life-time of one of thy kings. At the end of those seventy years, Tyre will know the meaning of the harlot's song, Take thy harp and go round the streets, poor harlot forgotten; now for thy best notes, now for thy whole store of music, to bring thee 17 back into remembrance! At the end of those seventy years, the Lord will relent towards Tyre, and send her back to her trafficking; all the world over, with all the world's kingdoms, she shall play the harlot 18 once more. But now the revenues of her trafficking shall be devoted to the Lord's use, not hoarded up and laid by; revenue she shall earn, but for Sion's folk, the Lord's servants, to give them food in abundance, and brave clothes to wear.

24 Look you, the Lord means to make earth a void, a wilderness; twist it out of shape, and scatter its inhabitants far and wide. One law for priest and people, for master and servant, for mistress and maid; for seller and buyer, for borrower and lender, for debtor and exactor of debts. Earth drained to its dregs, earth ravaged and ransacked; such decree the Lord has uttered. Earth woebegone and withered, a world that withers and grows feeble; how feeble they have grown now, the great ones of the earth! Poor earth, polluted by the men that dwell on it; they have broken God's law, traversed the decree he made for them, violated his eternal covenant with men; cankered it lies by a curse, peopled with guilty men, only a frantic remnant left⁴ of its inhabitants. Woebegone the vintage, withered now the vine, hearts sighing that once were merry; silent the gay tambour, hushed the noise of holiday-making, silent the harp's mirth. No more feasting and song; the wine turns bitter in their mouths. Ransacked and ruined lies yonder city,⁵ where every house denies entrance, and a cry goes up in the streets because all the wine is spent, the mirth forsaken, the joy vanished; a city left to desolation, with ruin fallen upon its gates.

In the midst of the wide earth, among those many peoples, what shall be left? A remnant, the last olives that are shaken from the tree, the gleanings that remain when vintage-time is over. Few only, but they shall lift up their voices in praise; God's honour vindicated, their rejoicing shall be heard across the sea, Give glory to

¹ Literally, 'her feet will carry her far away to find a home'. In the Hebrew text, the sense may be 'her feet used to carry her', and the reference may be to the colonizing activity of the Phœnicians.

² In the Hebrew text, 'daughter of Tharsis'. This is understood by some as meaning that Tharsis, once Tyre had fallen, could enjoy complete liberty (the 'girdle' being interpreted as meaning the restraint of foreign domination). But there is no evidence that Tartessus was in any sense a colony of Tyre; it was only a trading station. The prophet, then, seems to be condoling with Tartessus on the loss of her imports, as he condoleth with Egypt in verse 5 on the loss of her exports. Tharsis will now have to grow her own food; this is the sense implied by the rendering given in the Septuagint Greek, 'Till thy own land, for no more vessels will come to thee from Carthage'.

³ The Hebrew text here is different, and the interpretation of it is much disputed. It gives 'has raised towers' for 'has carried off her warriors'.

⁴ 'A frantic remnant left'; in the Hebrew text, 'they will be burned up till few of them are left'.

⁵ It is not clear whether any particular city, and if so what city, is meant.

God, where knowledge of him is revealed;¹ praise to the God of Israel among the distant isles; here at the ends of the earth his song of triumph has reached us, the boast of his elect.² Heart, keep thy secret, heart, keep thy secret; no more of that.

But alas, the traitors still betray his cause; treachery is treachery still, and its fruit is treason. For the dwellers on earth, tidings of fear; pit and snare await them; flee they from tidings of fear, they shall fall into the pit, flee they from the pit, they shall be held fast in the snare. The flood-gates of heaven will be opened, and the foundations of earth rock; earth must be rent and riven, earth torn and tattered, earth must quiver and quake; earth rolling and reeling like a drunkard, earth tottering like some frail shelter that is gone in a night, bowed down by the weight of its own guilt, till it falls, never to rise again. When that day comes, the Lord will hold a reckoning with the hosts of heaven, there above, with the kings of the earth, here on earth; huddled together, as captives are huddled together in a dungeon, they shall remain prisoners; so, at last, the reckoning will be held. And then the Lord of hosts will reign at Jerusalem, on mount Zion; and the moon will be put to shame, and the sun hide his face, before the glory in which he will appear then, with the elders of his people about him.

25 Lord, thou art my God; I extol thee and praise thy name for thy wonderful doings; for thy designs, so long prepared, so faithfully executed; see, it is done! A heap of stones where, but for thy decree, a town stood; a crumbling ruin, all that is left of a walled city; a fortress of the invader, dismantled now and never to be built again. What wonder great nations should do thee homage, embattled cities hold thee in dread? Stronghold thou art of the poor, stronghold of the helpless in their affliction, refuge from the storm, shade in the noonday sun; against that wall the rage of tyrants blusters in vain. Uproar of the invader stilled, as it were the breathless summer of a parched land; oppression withered up from the roots, like haze of burning heat!³

A time is coming when the Lord of hosts will prepare a banquet on this mountain of ours; no meat so tender, no wine so mellow, meat that drips with fat, wine well strained. Gone the chains in which he has bound the peoples, the veil that covered the nations hitherto; on the mountain-side, all these will be engulfed; death, too, shall be engulfed for ever. No furrowed cheek but the Lord God will wipe away its tears; gone the contempt his people endured in a whole world's eyes; the Lord has promised it.

When that day comes, men will be saying, He is here, the God to whom we looked for help, the Lord for whom we waited so patiently; ours to rejoice, ours to triumph in the victory he has sent us. On yonder mountain the divine deliverance shall rest, and by his power Moab shall be crushed, like straw ground in the chaff-cutter;⁴ Moab shall stretch out his hands, like a man swimming, and low shall his pride fall when they crash down to earth!⁵ Down they must come, the battlements that crown those walls, lie inglorious in the dust.

26 But in the land of Juda, when that day comes, what shall their song be? Zion is ours, an impregnable fortress; divine protection it has for wall and breast-work; wide let its gates be opened, to welcome true hearts that still keep troth with him. Our thoughts wayward no longer, thou wilt maintain us in peace, peace that comes surely to those who trust in thee. Yours to trust in the Lord continually, the Lord that is evermore your protection.

¹ 'Where knowledge of him is revealed'; literally 'in the doctrines', the Hebrew word being that used for the oracular adornment of the high priest's breastplate. Its literal meaning is 'lights', and some think it is here used poetically for 'the east'. ² 'His elect'; that is, either the Messias, or the redeemed people generally. The words which follow are obscure in the Hebrew, and some think the meaning is, 'My weakness, my weakness' (literally, 'my leanness'). If this translation is right, the words are more naturally taken with what follows than with what precedes them. ³ The Hebrew text here is difficult, and may perhaps be corrupt; for 'oppression withered up from the roots' it has 'bring low the song of the oppressor'. ⁴ For 'ground in the chaff-cutter' the Hebrew text has 'trodden down in the dung-hill' (or perhaps, the cess-pool). ⁵ It is not easy, either in the Latin or in the Hebrew text, to be certain what the subject of the verbs is, or what the precise picture is meant to be. In the Latin it is, apparently, that of a man who puts out his hands to save himself from falling, but unsuccessfully.

5 Mountain-dwellers he can bring low, towering city walls he can level, level them with the ground, drag them down to the 6 dust. There they lie, trodden under foot; poor folk trample on them now, the disinherited spurn them as they pass.

7 Where heart is true, path lies plain;
level the road he treads that wins acceptance with thee. And we, Lord, we have kept to the 8 path thou hadst decreed for us, waiting for thee still; longing we had none but for thy greater 9 renown. All through the night my soul has yearned for thee, to thee my heart aspires, watching for the dawn; soon thou wilt execute thy decrees on earth, and the whole world shall know 10 how just thou art. The goddess will not learn that lesson from mercy shewn him; in a land that is all holiness, they will pervert justice still, no eyes for the Lord's majesty.
11 Hand of thine which threatened them, heed they would not; heed now they must, those envious eyes, and to their own confusion; they shall see fire consume thy enemies! Thou wilt busy thyself, 12 Lord, to make peace for us; what achievement of ours but the doing of it is thine?

13 O Lord our God, masters we have had a many in place of thee, but only thy name shall be held in remembrance; live they cannot nor revive, gone down to death with the heroes of long ago; thou hast called them to account, and made an end of them, till the very memory of their names has vanished. Didst thou win thyself 14 honour, Lord, when thou didst shew favour, such high favour, to thy people, when thou didst enlarge all the frontiers of its land?¹ 16 No, Lord, it was in affliction they turned back to thee; in silent hours of suffering thy chastisement reached them.² We were no better than woman with child that is near her time, ready to cry out dolorously in her pangs; such lot thou hadst given us.
18 Conceived we, ay, and traveled, yet nothing brought forth but wind; not through us came deliverance to our country, not through us were the peoples of the world cast down.³

Fresh life they shall have, Lord, that are thine in death; lost to us, they shall live again.
Awake and utter your praises, you that dwell in the dust. The dew thou sendest, Lord, shall bring light to them; only the land of dead heroes thou wilt doom to overthrow.

Up then, my people, to your innermost chambers betake you; shut yourselves within doors; hide for a little, until the time of retribution is past. See, where the Lord comes out from his dwelling-place, holds the nations of the world to account for their guilt! Earth shall disclose the blood spilt on it, and no more cover its dead.

27 Hard and heavy and strong that sword is which the Lord carries; shall he not wreak his vengeance, in due time, upon the monstrous serpent that bars the gate, and the monstrous serpent that coils up yonder;⁴ shall he not deal death to the great beast of the sea?
And the praise of his doings shall be sung by his own vineyard, a vineyard rich in wine.

I, the Lord, am the keeper of this vineyard;
I come soon to water it. Day by day I watch over it, to shield it from attack, nor any grudge my hearts bears it. Would I were an enemy as heartless as thorns and briars are!⁵ Then I would trample it down and make a bonfire of it. But now, see how it clings to my protection!
Ay, it shall have peace, it shall make its peace with me. Israel shall flourish and put forth shoots, multitudes that shall be added to the number of Jacob; with its offspring the wide face of earth shall be peopled.

What, should the Lord smite Israel as

¹ In the Hebrew text, there is no sign that this is meant to be a question; but the statement 'Thou didst win honour' is more difficult to fit into the context.

² 'In silent hours of suffering thy chastisement reached them'; this is the sense indicated by St Jerome. The phrase runs, literally, 'Thy chastisement (came) to them in the tribulation of a whisper'; the Hebrew text gives the equally difficult sense, 'they poured out a whisper; thy chastisement (came) to them'.

³ The last clause in this verse is understood by some as meaning 'not through us were (new) inhabitants born to the land'; the sense suggested is that the small numbers of the surviving Jews will be supernaturally recruited by a resurrection. But there is no other instance of the word 'to fall' meaning 'to be born'; unless in the next verse, where the same scholars would translate 'thou wilt cause the land of dead heroes to be reborn'.

⁴ The enemies of Israel are probably alluded to here under symbolic names, but they cannot be identified with any certainty.

⁵ So the Latin version, which seems to suggest, rhetorically, that God is reluctantly unable to abandon his people. Some, supposing a very unusual construction in the Hebrew, translate, 'Would that I had thorns and briars for my enemies'.

he smote his enemies? Destroy it, like those others he doomed to overthrow? Nay, cast her away he might, but there should be due measure in her punishment; not for nothing did he expose her to cruel wind and burning heat;¹ so should the race of Jacob find pardon for its sins. Cleansed now from guilt, to bear fruit in full abundance; ground fine as chalk the altar-stones, pillar and shrine raised up no more!

Meanwhile, the city that once was fortified must lie desolate, forsaken, that fair dwelling-place, abandoned, part of the wilderness; cattle will browse and lie down, and crop the tall bushes on it; nothing that grows there but will wither and be snapped off. Women shall be their teachers;² so foolish has this nation grown, too foolish for its own maker to pity, for its own creator to spare. But a time is coming, when the Lord will beat the fruit from his trees,³ as far away as the bed of Euphrates and the river of Egypt, and you, sons of Israel, shall be gathered in one by one. That day, a call will be sounded on a great trumpet, and men long lost will come from Assyria, and exiles from Egypt, to worship the Lord on his holy mountain, in Jerusalem.

28 Out upon the drunken lords of Ephraim, and the city that is their boast, their crown! Quickly shall it fade, this flower, in the pride of its beauty. Careless they dwell at the head of yonder fruitful valley, all besotted with their wine; and the Lord will come upon them like a rough, boisterous hail-storm, like a destroying whirlwind, like a swift flood that rises and spreads out over the plain. Trodden under foot it shall lie, the crown that was drunken Ephraim's boast; that flower, whose brief bloom once delighted him, shall look down over the fruitful valley no more. Fig ripens to its cost, that ripens ere autumn brings the harvest, no sooner seen than plucked and eaten by the first that passes by!

But the Lord has his own people still left him; to these he shall be a crown to boast of, a garland of pride; his the justice inspires them when they sit in judgement; his the courage that rallies them when they fall back, fighting, to the gates.

What, these too? These too fuddled with wine, bemused with their revelling? High revel they hold, priest and prophet together, till all are fuddled and sodden with wine, their wits bemused; what wonder if the true seer goes unrecognized, if justice is forgotten? No room is left at their tables for aught but filth and vomit. Here is one (they say) has knowledge to impart,⁴ has a message to make known, to whom? Does he think we are children new-weaned, fresh from their mothers' milk? It is ever, Pass the word on, pass the word on, Wait a while yet, wait a while yet, A word with you, here, A word with you, there! Here is stammering speech, here is outlandish talk for our folk to listen to! Yet he did but counsel rest and repose; rest none other, repose none other, than to give respite to a weary nation. And listen they would not; to them, the Lord's message was all Pass the word on, pass the word on, Wait a while yet, wait a while yet, A word with you, here, and a word with you, there! And so they will go on their way, to stumble backwards and break their bones, to fall into a trap and lie there caught.

Hear the Lord's word, then, you mockers, that bear rule over my people in Jerusalem. Did you think to make terms with death, enter into alliance with the grave itself, that the flood of ruin should pass you by, so confident in your vain hopes, so armed with illusion? A message to you, then, from the Lord God, See, I am laying a stone in the foundations of Sion that has been tested and found true, a corner-stone, a stone of worth, built into

¹ In the Latin, the second half of this verse reads literally, 'he meditated with his hard breath in the day of heat'. The Hebrew seems to mean, 'he removed (her) with his fierce wind, at the season of the sirocco'.

² 'Women shall be their teachers'; in the Hebrew text, the meaning generally understood is 'women shall come and set it (i.e. the vegetation just mentioned) on fire'.

³ Or possibly 'beat out (instead of threshing) his ears of corn'.
⁴ In verses 9-13, the prophet evidently relates a personal experience. It seems as if the dissolute notables of Jerusalem had taunted him, over their wine, with always repeating the same 'catch' phrases, like one teaching children to spell, or a stammerer who can get no further with his sentence, or a foreigner who cannot express himself. Some think that 'he' in verse 11 is Almighty God, who will 'speak to' his people through a foreign invasion, but it seems simpler to understand it of the prophet himself.

the foundations themselves.¹ Hurry to and 17 fro who will; faith knows better. You shall have justice dealt out to you by weight, your sentence shall be strictly measured;
 shattered, the vain hopes, as by a storm of hail, buried the illusion as by a deluge.
 18 Hold they shall not, your terms with death, your compact with the grave; when the flood of ruin sweeps past, it shall leave you 19 prostrate. It will carry you away as it passes; pass it will, suddenly, in the space of a day and a night, and the very alarm of it will make you understand the revelation 20 at last. Too narrow a bed, and one or the other must fall out; a short cloak is no 21 covering for two.² Who stands there?
 None other than the Lord himself, as he stood once on the mountain of Disruption,³ vengeful still, as when he stood in the valley at Gabaon; but now, his own purpose to achieve, he lends himself to the purpose of another, now his will is, to let 22 the alien have his will. Mock, then, no more, if you would not see your chains riveted tighter; the Lord God of hosts is my witness, he means to make a short and sharp reckoning with the whole earth.

23 Listen now, and give me a hearing, mark 24 well the message I bring. Plough the farmer must, ere he sow, but will he be ever ploughing? For hoe and harrow is 25 there no rest? Nay, he will level it anon, plant fennel, sow cummin, with a border 26 of wheat or barley, millet or vetch; such lore he has learned, such prudence his God 27 has given him. What, shall sledge crush the fennel seed, threshing-wheel pass to and fro over the cummin? A switch for the fennel, a rod for the cummin, and they 28 shall be beaten enough. Thrashed the corn must be, sure enough, yet not for ever does the wheel harry it, do the spikes 29 wear it down.⁴ This lesson, too, the Lord would teach us; learn we how wonderful are his designs, how high above us his dealings.

29 Out upon her, Ariel,⁵ the lion-city
 King David stormed long ago!
 This year once added to the tale of years, feast-days of it over and gone, I will lay siege to Ariel, that shall roar and roar again, a lion-city indeed. Trust me, I will ring thee round, throw up earth-works against thee, set engines in place to besiege thee. Cower down thou must, and offer parley from the earth where thou liest;
 from the ruins thy voice will make itself heard, no better than a muttering from the ground, as it were some ghost that moaned there under the earth.

Then, like fine dust, the hordes that routed thee shall vanish; like a spark that smoulders, thy conquerors shall die away.
 Suddenly, in a moment, the Lord will sweep down upon them in thunder, and earthquake, in a storm of roaring wind, in fire that devours all before it; gone, the thronging nations that fought against Ariel, like a dream that passes with the night; gone, the fighting, and the siege, and their triumph. Dreams hungry man of a full belly, then wakes empty as ever;
 dreams thirsty man of a cool draught, then wakes weary, and thirsty, and still unsatisfied! Such comfort shall be theirs, the many folk that beleaguered Sion.

Ay, gape and gaze as you will; hum and haw you, bemused ere you lifted cup, be-sotted ere you have been at your wine, besotted with never a taste of drink! So deep a lethargy the Lord instils, blinding the prophets that should be your eyes, muffling with a veil the wise heads that should see visions for you. What is revelation to you, but a sealed book, offered as vainly to scholar that finds it sealed, as to yonder simpleton, that vows he never learned his letters? This people, the Lord says, makes profession of worshipping me, does me honour with its lips, but its heart is far from me.⁶ If they fear me, it is a lesson they learned from human precepts.

¹ In verses 15 and 16 the reference, according to some, is to those Jews who put their trust in a projected alliance with Egypt against Assyria (cf. ch. 31 below). We know nothing about the corner-stone, except that the prophet refers here, at least indirectly, to our Lord's coming. Cf. Rom. 9, 33, where the verse ends 'The believer will not be disappointed' instead of 'Hurry to and fro who will; faith knows better'. ² This is clearly a proverb, intended to justify God's design in saving some of the Jewish people, rejecting others.

³ 'The mountain of Disruption', that is, Baal Parasim, II Kg. 5, 20; for Gabaon, see Jos. 10, 10. The same God who once fought for his people will now carry out his purposes by granting success, for the time being, to foreign invaders. ⁴ It is not certain whether this parable in verses 23-28 is meant to explain the merciful gradation God shows in his judgements, or to recommend a less oppressive policy to the Jewish rulers (cf. verse 12 above).

⁵ Ariel is generally interpreted as meaning, Lion of God. It is nowhere else used as a name for Jerusalem, and no certainty can be felt about the sense of the passage. ⁶ Cf. Mt. 15, 8.

What remains but some great, some re-sounding miracle, to strike awe into such hearts as these? Bereft of wisdom their wise men shall be, cunning of their counsellors vanish. Out on you, that would hide your designs from the Lord in the depth of your hearts, plotting on in the dark and telling yourselves none can see, none can find you out! What a strange thought is this! As well might clay scheme against the potter; handicraft disown its craftsman, or thing of art call the artist fool.

Short the time shall be, and quickly fled, ere Lebanon forest shall be fruitful as Carmel, ere land fruitful now shall be reckoned as forest. Then this book will have a message for deaf ears to hear, for blind eyes to see through the mist that darkens them; humble folk shall yet learn to rejoice in the Lord, poor clods of earth triumph in the Holy One of Israel. Vanished, the triumphant foe, scornful incredulity is silenced; where are they now, that spent themselves on wrongdoing, watching a man's words to convict him of guilt, defrauding him of justice at the city gate, setting aside, with a quibble, the plea of the innocent? Here is a message to the race of Jacob from the Lord, that was Abraham's deliverer: No longer shall Jacob be disappointed, no longer put to the blush. He shall see children of his, my gift, doing honour publicly to my name; honour to the Holy One of Jacob, homage to the God of Israel! Restless hearts will attain true knowledge then, and the murderers learn wisdom.

30 Out upon you, the Lord says, what treason is this? Here be plans afoot that were never mine, webs a-weaving, and the pattern none of my choice. Trust me, you do but add to your guilt. What are these journeyings down into Egypt, and I never consulted? Think you to find refuge in the strength of Pharaoh, look you to Egypt for shelter? Strength of Pharaoh shall play you false, nor shelter Egypt bring you, but shame. Princes of thine in Tanis, ambassadors from thee making their way to Hanes! Fruitless errand to a folk that could not save them; no help, no comfort there, only failure and mockery.

What burden for the cattle-droves in the south? Here is a land of difficulty and danger, home of lion and lioness, of viper and flying serpent; and through it, goods piled on asses' backs, treasures stored on the humps of camels, go men asking for help where help is none. From Egypt's protection you shall have neither gain nor good; my word has been said about her, There goes Pride, let her alone. Go home, then, and engrave it on a tablet of box-wood for their instruction; write it down, too, carefully on a scroll, to be an abiding record in after days. So rebellious a people is this, so treacherous a breed, refusing, my own children, to listen to the law of their God; forbidding the prophet to prophesy, the man of vision to have vision of the truth. Ever they must be told what likes them best, comforted in their illusions; for them no marching orders, no prescribed path; he, the Holy One of Israel, must be kept far from their view.

From him, the Holy One of Israel, this message: Warning of mine you have rejected, so blindly you trust your own cunning, your own headstrong will. Sudden and swift shall be your punishment, as the crash of a high wall that has long gaped ruinously, long been anxiously watched. So shrewd a blow potter never dealt, shivering earthen pot into fragments, till no shard is left that will carry a lighted coal from the hearth, or a mouthful of water from the cistern. From the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel, word was given you, Come back and keep still, and all shall be well with you; in quietness and in confidence lies your strength. But you would have none of it; To horse! you cried, We must flee! and flee you shall; We must ride swiftly, you said; but swifter still ride your pursuers. Be you a thousand to one, yet at the challenge of five men you shall take to flight; nought left of you but a remnant, lonely as flag-staff on the mountain-top, as beacon on the hill.

What if the Lord waits his time before he will have mercy on you? The more glorious, when it comes, his deliverance. The Lord is a God who makes award justly, blessed they shall be that wait for him. In Jerusalem they only will be left, true citizens of Sion. And thou, Jerusalem, tears shalt have none to shed; mercy is none he shall withhold. Soon as he hears thee crying out to him, the answer will 20 come. Bread the Lord will grant, though it be sparingly, water, though it be in short measure. Birds of passage they shall be no longer,¹ the men he gives thee for thy teachers; always thou wilt have a true 21 counsellor in sight, always hear his voice in thy ear as he warns thee, This is the true path, follow it; no swerving to right or left!

22 Silver leaf on thy graven images defaced now, defaced the sheaths of gold; thou wilt cast all away, as a woman casts away de-23 filed clouts of hers, and bid it begone. And thereupon, sow where thou wilt all over the land, rain shall be granted to thy crops;
 rich and full shall be thy harvest of wheat;
 thou shalt have pasture, then, for lambs to 24 browse in at liberty. Ox and ass on thy farm shall have mixed feed, pure grain fresh winnowed on the threshing-floor; 25 never a mountain-top, never a high hill, but will flow with torrents of water, when that day comes. The dead shall lie in heaps that day, and towers come crashing down; 26 moon's light will be like the light of the sun, and the sun will shine in sevenfold strength, as if the light of seven days were joined in one, when the time comes for the Lord to bind up his people's hurt, and heal their grievous wound.

27 See where the majesty of the Lord comes from far away; his anger is aflame, and there is no withstanding it! There is menace on his lips, his tongue is like a 28 consuming fire, and his breath like a mountain stream that floods over till it is neck-deep. He will sweep away whole nations into oblivion, sweep away the bridle of false fears that curbed the peoples till now.² 29 But, you, that night, will be singing for joy, as if it were the night when a solemn feast begins; your hearts will be light, as men's hearts are light when they go up, with the flutes playing about them, to the mountain of the Lord, where he dwells, the strong 30 God of Israel. The Lord will make his dread voice heard, will lay bare his terrible arm, volleying out his anger in flashes of Juda kept safe by divine, not human Aid devouring fire, laying all low with his whirlwind, with his hail-stones; and Assur will shrink in fear from the Lord's voice, and will feel his rod. So it is decreed that the rod should pass over him, brought down on him by the Lord's hand to the music of your tambours and harps; a strange warfare this,³ that shall quell them! In these times a new Topheth⁴ has been made ready; this, too, made ready by a king. It is deep and wide, fed with flaming brands in abundance; and the breath of the Lord comes down like a stream of brimstone, to kindle it.

31 Out upon you, that betake yourselves to Egypt for succour! Horses must be your speed in the hour of peril;
 great array of chariots you must have, and horsemen without number, to bring you confidence; to the Holy One of Israel turn you never, confidence in the Lord is none.
 And yet he too is a wise counsellor; brings he trouble to a man's door, he does not lightly change his purpose; doubt not he will take arms against a rebellious race, the unholy alliance bring to nothing. Strength of Egypt is human, not divine; its horses are weak flesh, not immortal spirit; one movement of the Lord's hand, and down comes rescuer, down falls the rescued, to lie there forgotten. A promise from the Lord God! Here is lion, or cub of a lion, growling over his prey; what though the shepherds rally, and go out to meet him?
 Nothing cares he for their shouts, is not awed by their numbers. So it will be with the Lord of hosts, when he comes down to war, here on mount Sion, with his own hill-side for battle-ground. As parent bird hovers over nest, so will the Lord of hosts protect Jerusalem; protect her and bring her safe through, grant signal deliverance.
 Come back, sons of Israel, that have hidden yourselves away so deep.

Time, then, for each man to cast away his idols of gold and silver, idols your guilty hands have made. Not by the sword of man Assur shall fall, earthly weapon is

¹ 'Birds of passage they shall be no longer'; the Hebrew text is more commonly interpreted as meaning, 'no longer hide away in corners'.

² It is not certain, here, what is meant by a 'bridle of false fears'; nor is it clear from the Hebrew text whether it is something the Lord will destroy (literally, 'winnow away'), or something which he will impose.

³ 'A strange warfare'; in the Hebrew text, 'a warfare of waving'.

⁴ Topheth was the name given to a place where human sacrifices were burned to Moloch, 'the King'. The burning of Sennacherib's dead soldiers will be a new Topheth, prepared (according to the Hebrew text) 'for a king'; but the Latin version gives a better sense, if we understand the King to be Almighty God.

none shall boast it slew him. Flee he must ere sword threaten him, and never warrior of his be left, but to slavery. All that stubborn strength of his by terror unmanned, all his princes fled away! Such comfort the Lord sends to Sion, where his fire is lit, to Jerusalem, where glows his furnace.

32 See, where a king rules his folk justly! His nobles, too, make right award;¹ to them men look, as for shelter against the wind, cover in a storm; for running streams in drought, shade of towering rock in a parched land. Eyes they will have to see with, no darkness there; ears that are strained to listen attentively; rude minds shall learn wise thoughts, the stammering tongue speak out readily and clear. Noble rank shall no longer be for the reckless, or lordly titles for the crafty. The reckless man, that speaks ever recklessly, his heart set on mischief, still full of empty show, and blasphemy against the Lord; food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty denying still! And the crafty man, an ill craft is his, false pleas devising to ruin harmless folk, cheat the poor of their rights! From a noble nature spring noble acts; title is none to greatness higher than this.

Bestir you, fine ladies, and listen; for ears untroubled by alarm I have a message. Swiftly the days pass, the year goes round, and you shall have trouble enough, anxious foreboding, when the vintage fails, and no fruit-harvest comes. Bewildered, the minds that were once at ease, full of foreboding, those untroubled hearts; you must go stripped and shame-faced now, with sackcloth about your loins, mourn for lost fruitfulness, for the fields once so smiling, for the vineyards that bore so well. That thorns and briars should come up in these lands of yours; come up over haunts you loved, in the city that was all mirth! Empty, now, the palace, forgotten the hum of yonder streets; nothing but gloom, where a man must pick his way through caverns² endlessly; loved haunts of the wild ass, a pasture-ground for the flock.

All this, until the spirit is poured out on us from above; fruitful as Carmel then the wilderness, to make your well-tilled lands seem but waste. Alike desert and fruitful field the home, now, of innocence, the abode of loyalty; loyalty, that has peace for its crown, tranquillity for its harvest, repose for ever undisturbed. In quiet homes this people of mine shall live, in dwelling-places that fear no attack; all shall be ease and plenty. But first the hail-storm must do its work, forest be laid low, city levelled with the ground. Ah, blessed race, their seed sowing, their oxen and asses driving, by every stream that flows!³

33 What, plunderer of the nations, unplundered still? Proud lord of others, does none dispute thy lordship? A time comes when thou must cease plundering, and thyself be plundered, when of lordship thou hast had enough, and others lord it over thee. Have mercy on us, Lord, that wait for thee so patiently; day after day be our stronghold, our deliverer thou in time of trouble!

Fled, the alien host, scattered the heathen, thy angel's voice⁴ once heard, thy power made manifest! Your spoils, Gentiles, how easily amassed! Easily as the locusts, where they swarm in the trenches. The Lord's power made manifest, that is throned high in heaven! With his just award Sion shall be well content; still in these times of ours⁵ the promise well kept, the full deliverance. Knowledge and wisdom and the fear of the Lord, what treasure like these?

See, where they stand at the gates, the men we sent out to report,⁶ hailing us; the messengers we sent to ask for peace,⁷ weeping bitterly; Deserted, the highways, the lanes untravelled; the enemy has broken the truce, making no terms with the cities, not sparing the lives of men;

¹ Verses 1-8 are generally understood as a prophecy, e.g. of the reforming activities of king Ezechias. But they may be read simply as an expression of proverbial truths; and indeed the whole tone of them recalls that of the Wisdom literature.

² Literally, 'gloom and a groping over caverns'. The Hebrew text seems rather to mean, 'Ophel and the watch-tower shall be turned into caverns'.

³ It is not clear whether this refers to the security which God's people are later to enjoy, or whether it is a proverb whose meaning is now lost to us.

⁴ 'Thy angel'; in the Hebrew text, 'a rumour'.

⁵ 'Of ours'; literally, 'of thine', the prophet addressing (it seems) an imaginary contemporary of his own.

⁶ 'The men we sent out to report'; literally, 'those who see', but it does not seem probable that the phrase refers here, as it often does, to the prophets. The Hebrew text differs, and its meaning is much disputed.

⁷ Literally, 'The angels (or messengers) of peace'.

9 widowed the countryside and lifeless, Lebanon shrunken and withered, Saron a wilderness, Basan and Carmel quaking with fear. Now, the Lord says, to bestir myself, now to rise up in arms against them, now to make them feel my power!

11 A raging fire conceived in the womb, and nothing but stubble brought to the birth; your own impetuous spirit shall be a fire, Gentiles, to devour you; like ashes in a kiln they shall be left, the alien hordes, bundles of brushwood eaten up by the fire.

13 Listen then, you that live far off, to the story of my doings; and you, who dwell close to me, learn the lesson of my power.

14 In Sion itself there be guilty folk that tremble, false hearts full of dismay; who shall survive this devouring flame, the near presence of fires that burn unceasingly?

15 He only, that follows the path of innocence, tells truth, ill-gotten gain refuses, flings back the bribe; his ears shut to murderous counsels, his eyes from every harmful sight turned away. On the heights his dwelling shall be, his cryic among the fastnesses of the rocks, bread shall be his for the asking, water from an unfailing spring. Those eyes shall look on the king in his royal beauty, have sight of a land whose frontiers are far away.

18 Of those old fears, how thou wilt recall the memory! Where are they now, the learned men, that could weight each phrase of the law, that taught us like children?¹

19 No longer wilt thou see before thee a rebellious people,² all profound talk that passes thy comprehension, and no wisdom.

20 Look around thee at Sion, goal of our pilgrimage, see where Jerusalem lies, an undisturbed dwelling-place; here is tent securely fixed, its pegs immoveable, its ropes never to be broken. Here, as nowhere else, our Lord reigns in majesty; a place of rivers, of wide, open streams, yet no ship's oar will disturb it, no huge galleon pass by; the Lord our judge, the Lord our lawgiver, the Lord our king, will himself be our deliverance. Now, thy tackle hangs loose and unserviceable, too weak thy mast is to display thy pennon; then, thou wilt have the spoil of many forays to divide, even lame folk shall carry plunder away. No more shall they cry out on their helpless plight, these, thy fellow citizens; none dwells there now but is assoiled of his guilt.

34 Nations, come near and listen, here is news for all mankind; give heed the whole world must, and all that lives on it, earth and all earth breeds. On all nations the Lord will be avenged, never an armed host but must feel the blow, forfeit, all of them, and doomed to perish. See where they lie slain, their carrion polluting the air, the very hills rotted away with their blood! Fade they into nothing, yonder heavenly powers; shrivel, like a scroll, the heavens themselves, nor any star there but must wither, as leaf withers on vine or fig-tree; in the very heavens my sword shall drink deep of blood. On Edom doubt not it shall fall, death-sentence to execute, the sword of the Lord, glutted with blood! Well nourished with fat, where it drank the blood of lambs and goats, of stalled rams! There are victims ready for the Lord in Bosra; great slaughter then shall be in the land of Edom. Down go the wild bulls with the rest, the bullocks, leaders of the herd; earth must be sodden with their blood, rich grow the soil with fat of their pampered kings. Swiftly it comes, the day of the Lord's vengeance, the year that shall see Sion's wrongs redressed. Pitch they shall be henceforward, the brooks of Edom, its soil brimstone; a land of burning pitch, never quenched night or day, its smoke going up eternally; age after age it shall yet be desolate, untravelled for ever by the foot of man. Pelican and hedge-hog shall claim it, ibis and raven be its tenants; plotted with the Lord's measuring-line, an empty void, tried with his plummet, a hanging ruin. Cry they for a king to govern it, that has no chieftain now; all its princes have vanished. Thorns and nettles shall grow in its palaces, briars over its battlements; it shall be the lair of serpents, the pasture-ground of the ostrich. Devils and monstrous forms shall haunt it, satyr call out to satyr; there the vampire lies down and finds rest. Hedge-hog makes a nest to rear its young, nurtured safely in yonder shade; vulture there with vulture meets.¹

¹ According to the Hebrew text, the prophet asks what has become of the notaries, the men who weighed (out money, to buy off Assyria), the men who counted the towers of Jerusalem. ² 'A rebellious people'; this word, nowhere else found, is understood by some modern scholars in the sense of 'barbarous', and the whole verse is taken as referring to the Assyrians.

Turn back, when the time comes, to this record of divine prophecy,² and read it afresh; you shall learn, then, that none of these signs was lacking, none waited for the coming of the next. The Lord it was entrusted me with the prophecies I utter; by his Spirit that strange company was called together. For each its own dwelling-place; in his hand was the line that measured it out to them; there they shall live on for ever, to all ages undisturbed.

35 Thrills the barren desert with rejoicing; the wilderness takes heart, and blossoms, fair as the lily. Blossom on blossom, it will rejoice and sing for joy; all the majesty of Lebanon is bestowed on it, all the grace of Carmel and of Saron. All alike shall see the glory of the Lord, the majesty of our God. Stiffen, then, the sinews of drooping hand and flagging knee; give word to the faint-hearted, Take courage, and have no fear; see where your Lord is bringing redress for your wrongs, God himself, coming to deliver you! Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and deaf ears unsealed; the lame man, then, shall leap as the deer leap, the speechless tongue cry aloud. Springs will gush out in the wilderness, streams flow through the desert; ground that was dried up will give place to pools, barren land to wells of clear water; where the serpent had its lair once, reed and bulrush will show their green. A high road will stretch across it, by divine proclamation kept holy; none that is defiled may travel on it; and there you shall find a straight path lying before you, wayfarer is none so foolish he can go astray. No lions shall molest it, no beasts of prey venture on it. Free men shall walk on it, coming home again to Sion, and praising the Lord for their ransoming. Eternal happiness crowns them, joy and happiness in their grasp now, sorrow and sighing fled far away.

¹ The names of the beasts and monsters mentioned in verses 11-15 cannot be given with certainty. Some would understand a bird (perhaps the bittern) in place of the hedge-hog in verse 11; and in verse 15, where a different and very rare word is used in the Hebrew text, there is no clear agreement what animal, bird, or reptile is meant. ² Turn back, when the time comes, to this record of divine prophecy'; literally, 'search carefully in the book of the Lord'. The sense given above is that commonly adopted, but the text of the passage is uncertain; the Septuagint Greek has, 'there the hinds gather, and meet face to face'. ³ The whole of this chapter is to be found, with slight variations, in the fourth book of Kings (ch. 18).

36 It was in the fourteenth year of Ezechias' reign that Sennacherib, king of Assyria, marched on the fortified cities of Juda, and took them.¹ And the king of Assyria, who was then at Lachis, sent Rabsaces at the head of a strong force to Jerusalem, where king Ezechias was. This Rabsaces took up his stand on the aqueduct that fed the upper pool, on the way that brings you to the Fuller's Field, and there he was met by Eliacim, son of Helcias, the controller of the royal household, and Sobna, the scribe, and Joahe, son of Asaph, the recorder. So he bade them tell Ezechias, Here is a message to thee from the great king, the king of Assyria. What confidence is this that makes thee so bold? By what cunning or what force dost thou hope to meet me in arms? On whose help dost thou rely, that thou wouldst throw off my allegiance? What, wilt thou rely on Egypt? That is to support thyself on a broken staff of cane, that will run into a man's hand, if he presses on it, and pierce him through; such does Pharaoh, king of Egypt, prove himself to all those who rely on him. Or wilt thou answer, We trust, I and my people, in the Lord our God? Tell me, who is he? Is he not the God whose hill-shrines and altars their king, Ezechias, has cleared away, bidding Juda and Jerusalem worship at one altar here? Come now, if thou wert to make terms with my master, the king of Assyria, by which I must hand over to thee two thousand horses, wouldst thou be able to do thy part by putting riders on them? Why, thou art no match even for a city prefect, the least of my master's servants. Trust if thou wilt in Egypt, its chariots and its horsemen; but dost thou doubt that I have the Lord's warrant to come and subdue this land? It was the Lord himself who sent word to me, Make war on this land, and subdue it.

At this, Eliacim and Sobna and Joahe said to Rabsaces, My lord, pray talk to us in Syriac; we know it well. Do not talk to us in the Hebrew language, while all these folks are standing on the walls within 12 hearing. What, said Rabsaces, dost thou think my master hath sent me with this message for thee only, and for that master of thine? It is for the folk who man the walls, these companions of yours that have nothing left to eat or drink but the ventings of their own bodies. Then Rabsaces stood up and cried aloud, in Hebrew, Here is a message to you from the great king, the king of Assyria! This is the king's warning, Do not be deluded by Ezechias, he is powerless to save you; do not let Ezechias put you off by telling you to trust in God; that the Lord is certain to bring you aid, he cannot allow the king of Assyria to become master of your city. No, do not listen to Ezechias; here are the terms the king of Assyria offers to you. Earn my good will by surrendering to me, and you shall live unmolested; to each the fruit of his own vine and fig-tree, to each the water from his own cistern. Then, when I come back, I will transplant you into a land like your own, which will grudge you neither wheat nor wine, so rich is it in cornfields and vineyards. No, do not let Ezechias stir you to action by telling you that the Lord will deliver you. What of other nations? Were their countries delivered, by this god or that, when the king of Assyria threatened them? What gods had Emath and Arphad, what god had Sepharvaim? Did any power rescue Samaria from my attack? Which of all the gods in the world has delivered his country when I threatened it, that you should trust in the Lord's deliverance, when I threaten Jerusalem?

21 But all kept silence, and gave him no word in answer; the king had sent orders that they were not to answer him. So Eliacim, son of Helcias, the controller of the royal household, and Sobna, the scribe, and Joahe, son of Asaph, the recorder, went back to Ezechias, with their garments torn about them, to let him know what Rabsaces had said.

37 No sooner had king Ezechias heard it, than he tore his garments open, and put on sackcloth, and went into the house of the Lord.¹ Meanwhile, he sent word to the prophet Isaias, son of Amos. Eliacim, the controller of the household, and Sobna, the scribe, and some of the older priests, went on this errand. Here is a message for thee, they said, from Ezechias. Troublous times have come upon us; times to make us mend our ways, or else blaspheme God.² What remedy, when children come to the birth, and the mother has no strength to bear them? Unless indeed the Lord God should take cognizance of what Rabsaces has been saying, Rabsaces, who was sent here by his master, the king of Assyria, to blaspheme the living God. Surely the Lord thy God has listened to the reproaches he uttered. Raise thy voice, then, in prayer for the poor remnant that is left.

Thus visited by the servants of Ezechias, Isaias answered, Give your master this message. Do not be dismayed, the Lord says, at hearing the blasphemies which the courtiers of the Assyrian king have uttered against me. See if I do not put him in such a mind, see if I do not make him hear such news, as will send him back to his own country. And when he reaches his own country, I will give the word, and the sword shall make an end of him.

And now Rabsaces went back to find the king of the Assyrians before Lobna, hearing that he had raised the siege of Lachis. News had come that Taracha, king of the Ethiopians, was on his way to do battle with him. And the king, when he heard the report, despatched messengers to Ezechias; Give this warning, he said, to Ezechias, king of Juda. Do not let the God in whom thou puttest such confidence deceive thee with false hopes, telling thee that Jerusalem will never be allowed to fall into the hands of the Assyrian king. What, hast thou not heard what the kings of Assyria have done to the nations everywhere, destroying them utterly? And what hope hast thou of deliverance? What saving power had the gods of those old peoples my fathers overthrew, Gozam, and Haram, and Repheth, and the race of Eden who lived in Thalassar? Where are they, the kings of Emath, and Arphad, the kings who governed the city of Sepharvaim, and Ana, and Ava?

These despatches were hauded by the messengers to Ezechias, and when he had read them, he went up into the house of the Lord, and held them out open in the

¹ vv. 1-38. See IV Kg. 19.

² Literally, 'times of reproof and of blasphemy'.

Lord's presence. And this was the prayer which Ezechias made to the Lord: Lord of hosts, God of Israel, who hast thy throne above the cherubim, thou alone art God over all the kingdoms of the world, heaven and earth are of thy fashioning. Give ear, Lord, and listen; open thy eyes, Lord, and see; do not let Sennacherib's words go unheard, these blasphemies he has uttered against the living God. It is true, Lord, that the kings of Assyria have brought ruin on whole nations, and the lands they lived in, and thrown their gods into the fire; but these were in truth no gods; men had made them, of wood or stone, and men could break them. Now it is for thee, O Lord our God, to rescue us from the invader, and shew all the kingdoms of the world there is no other Lord, save thee.

Then Isaias, son of Amos, sent word to Ezechias, A message to thee from the Lord, the God of Israel, in answer to the prayer thou hast made to him about Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians. This is what the Lord has to say of him: See how she mocks thee, flouts thee, Sion, the virgin city! Jerusalem, proud maiden, follows thee with her eyes and tosses her head in scorn. So thou wouldst hurl insults, and blaspheme, and talk boastfully, and brave it out with disdainful looks, against whom? Against the Holy One of Israel. In thy name, these servants of thine have hurled insults at the Lord. It was thy dream that thou hadst scaled, with those chariots of thine, the mountain heights, the slopes of Lebanon; and now thou wouldst cut down its tall cedars, its noble fir-trees, till thou couldst reach the very summit of the ascent, the garden its woods enclosed. Thou wouldst dig wells and drink wherever it pleased thee, thou wouldst dry up, in thy march, the banked channels of the Nile.¹

What, hast thou not heard how I dealt with this people in time past? This present design, too, is one I have formed long since, and am now carrying out; such a design as brings with it ruin for the mountain-fastnesses, the walled cities that fight against thee. Sure enough, they were overawed and discomfited, the puny garrison that held them; frail as meadow grass or mountain pasturage, or the stalks that grow on the house-top, withering before they can ripen. But I am watching thee where thou dwellest, thy comings and goings, thy raving talk against me. Yes, I have listened to the ravings of thy pride against me, and now a ring for thy nose, a twitch of the bridle in thy mouth, and back thou goest by the way thou didst come.

Here is a test for thee, Ezechias, of the truth of my prophecy; this year thou must be content to eat the aftergrowth, and next year wild things shall be thy food; in the third year you may sow and reap, plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them.² A remnant of Juda's race will be saved, and this remnant will strike root deep in earth, bear fruit high in air; yes, it is from Jerusalem the remnant will come, from mount Sion that we shall win salvation; so tenderly he loves us, the Lord of hosts. This, then, is what the Lord has to tell thee about the king of the Assyrians; he shall never enter this city, or shoot an arrow into it; no shield-protected host shall storm it, no earthworks shall be cast up around it. He will go back the way he came, and never enter into this city, the Lord says; I will keep guard over this city and deliver it, for my own honour and for the honour of my servant David.

It was after this that an angel of the Lord went out on his errand, and smote down a hundred and eighty-five thousand men in the Assyrian camp; when morning came, and men were astir, nothing was to be seen but the corpses of the dead. So Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, broke up camp, and took the road, and was gone; nor did he leave Ninive again. And one day, when he was at worship in the temple of his god Nosroch, two sons of his, Adramelech and Sarasar, drew their swords on him, and so escaped into the land of Ararat; and the kingdom passed to his son Asarhaddon.

38 And now Ezechias fell sick, and was at death's door;³ indeed, the prophet Isaias, son of Amos, visited him with this message from the Lord, Put thy affairs in order; it is death that awaits thee, not recovery. At this Ezechias turned his face towards the wall, and prayed to the Lord thus: Remember, Lord, I entreat thee, a life that has kept true to thee, an innocent heart; how I did ever what was thy will. And Ezechias wept bitterly. And thereupon the word of the Lord came to Isaias, Go and tell Ezechias, Here is a message to thee from the Lord, the God of thy father David. I have listened to thy prayer, and marked thy tears; be it so, I will add fifteen years to thy life. And I will save thee and thy city from the power of the Assyrian king; I will be its protector. This sign, too, the Lord gives thee, in proof that he will make his promise good; see how low the shadow has fallen, with sun-down, where the dial of Achaz marks the hours! I will make it go ten hours back. And with that the sun retraced ten hours of its descent.

¹ Literally, 'the channels of earthworks', but see 19. 6, and note there. ² Some think that this prophecy was made three years before the events described in 5. 36. Sennacherib having been engaged meanwhile in an attack on Egypt. But the exact bearing of the 'sign' is not certain. ³ vv. 1-8. See IV K^g. 20. 1-11.

These are the words Ezechias king of Juda wrote, upon falling sick and recovering of his illness. It seemed as if I must go down to the gates of the world beneath, in the noontide of my years; the remnant of life that I hoped for, hoped for in vain. No more (thought I) to lift up my eyes to the Lord God in this land of the living, to see men's faces, and quiet homes, no more!¹ This familiar world² taken away from me, folded up like a shepherd's tent, my life cut short like the weaver's thread! And he had cut me off while the web was still in the making; before the day reached its evening, he would make an end of me. All night long I lay still, as if he had been a lion that had broken all my bones; before the day reached its evening he would make an end of me. My voice was as feeble as the voice of a nestling swallow or murmuring dove; my eyes wearied out with ever straining upwards. Lord, I am in hard straits; win my release for me! And yet, what words can I use, what answer can I expect, when it is he himself that has brought this upon me? With bitter heart I pass all my years in review.³ Lord, so frail a thing is life; on so little does my mortal breath depend! Thou canst chastise me, thou canst make me live.⁴ Bitter, bitter the discipline that brings me peace!

And now thou hast saved the life that was in peril, thrusting away all my sins out of thy sight. Thou hast no praise in the world beneath, death cannot honour thee; those who go down into the grave have no promise of thine to hope for; it is living men, as I am a living man to-day, that give thee thanks, pass on from father to son the story of thy faithfulness. Lord, be my saviour still; so, all day long, the Lord's house shall ring with the music of our psalms.

Note that Isaias bade them take a lump of figs, and make a plaster of it for the king's ulcer, and this is how he was healed. And note that Ezechias had asked what sign should be given him, in proof that he would set foot in the Lord's house again.⁵

39 And now, hearing of his sickness and recovery, the king of Babylon, Merodach Baladan, son of Baladan, sent a letter and gifts to Ezechias.⁶ Ezechias was delighted at the coming of these envoys, and shewed them his scented treasure-house,⁷ with its silver and gold and spices and rich ointments; the rooms where his ornaments were kept; all the wealth of his store-house. There was nothing in palace or domain but he showed it to them.

Then the prophet Isaias gained audience of king Ezechias, and asked him, What message did these men bring, and whence had they come? They came to see me, said Ezechias, from a country that is far away, from Babylon. And when Isaias asked

¹ Literally, 'I shall no more see man, nor the dweller in quiet'. The reference seems to be to the years of peace promised after the failure of Sennacherib's invasion. But some, by a slight change in the Hebrew text, would read 'the world' instead of 'quiet'; others interpret the Hebrew text as meaning, 'I shall be deprived of the sight of man, as those who dwell in quiet (that is, in the grave) are'.

² The Hebrew word here used may mean 'my contemporaries', or 'my dwellings', or perhaps simply 'my life'.

³ The Hebrew text appears to mean, 'I will walk as if in procession all my years in the bitterness of my soul'.

⁴ Literally, 'Lord, if it is thus men live, and the breath of my life is such, thou wilt correct me and make me live'. The Hebrew text has 'grant me recovery' instead of 'correct me'.

⁵ We should expect verses 21 and 22 to occur between verse 6 and verse 7 above (as they do in IV Kg. 20). It seems probable that they dropped out by accident, and were replaced here as a footnote to the story.

⁶ op. cit. 1-8. See IV Kg. 20. 12-19.

⁷ Literally, 'his house of perfumes', according to the Latin version. The Hebrew text is generally understood as meaning 'his house of treasures'. The word translated 'ornaments' probably means, according to the Hebrew text, 'armour'.

what they had seen in his palace, he told him, They saw everything in my palace; I have no treasures I did not shew them. 5 And at that Isaias said to Ezechias, I have a message for thy hearing from the Lord 6 of hosts. Behold, a time is coming when all that is in thy house, all the treasures which thy fathers have amassed there in times past, will be taken away to Babylon; nothing shall be left of it, the Lord says. 7 And sons of thine, men of thy own line, of thy own stock, shall be carried off to be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon. 8 Why then, Ezechias said to Isaias, welcome be the word the Lord has spoken! In my time at least, he said, may there be peace, may the promise hold good.

40 Take heart again, my people, says 2 your God, take heart again. Speak Jerusalem fair, cry aloud to her that her woes are at an end, her guilt is pardoned; double toll the Lord has taken for all her 3 sins. A cry, there, out in the wilderness, Make way for the Lord's coming; a straight road for our God through the 4 desert! Bridged every valley must be, every mountain and hill levelled; windings cut straight, and the rough paths paved; 5 the Lord's glory is to be revealed for all mankind to witness; it is his own decree.¹ 6 A voice came, bidding me cry aloud; asked I in what words, in these: Mortal things are but grass, the glory of them is but grass 7 in flower; grass that withers, a flower that fades, when the Lord's breath blows upon it. The whole people, what is it but grass? 8 Grass that withers, a flower that fades; but the word of our Lord stands for ever. 9 Good news for Sion, take thy stand, herald, on some high mountain; good news for Jerusalem, proclaim it, herald, aloud; louder still, no cause now for fear;² tell the 10 cities of Juda, See, your God comes! See, the Lord God is coming, revealed in power, with his own strong arm for war- rant; and see, they come with him, they walk before him, the reward of his labour, 11 the achievement of his task,³ his own flock! Like a shepherd he tends them, gathers up the lambs and carries them in his bosom, helps the ewes in milk forward on their way.

Who was it measured out the waters in his open hand, heaven balanced on his palm, earth's mass poised on three of his fingers? Who tried yonder mountains in the scale, weighed out the hills?

No aid, then, had the spirit of the Lord 13 to help him, no counsellor stood by to admonish him. None other was there, to 14 lend his skill; guide to point out the way, pilot to warn him of danger. What are the 15 nations to him but a drop of water in a bucket, a make-weight on the scales? What are the islands but a handful of dust? His 16 altar-hearth Lebanon itself could not feed, victims could not yield enough for his burnt-sacrifice. All the nations of the 17 world shrink, in his presence, to nothing, emptiness, a very void, beside him. And 18 will you find a likeness for God, set up a form to resemble him? What avails image 19 the metal-worker casts, for goldsmith to line with gold, silversmith plate with silver? What avails yonder wood, hard of 20 fibre, proof against decay; the craftsman's care, that his statue should stand im- movable?⁴

What ignorance is this? Has no rumour 21 reached you, no tradition from the begin- ning of time, that you should not under- stand earth's origin? There is One sits so 22 high above its orb, those who live on it seem tiny as locusts; One who has spread out the heavens like gossamer, as he were pitching a tent to dwell in. The men who 23 can read mysteries, how he confounds them, the men who judge on earth, what empty things he makes of them! Sap- 24 plings never truly planted, or laid out, or grounded in the soil, see how they wither at his sudden blast, how the storm-wind carries them away like stubble! What like- 25 ness, then, can you find to match me with? asks the Holy One. Lift up your eyes, and 26 look at the heavens; who was it that made them? Who is it that marshals the full muster of their starry host, calling each by its name, not one of them missing from the ranks? Such strength, such vigour, such spirit is his.

¹ Cf. Lk. 3. 4. ² In the Hebrew text, it is Sion (or Jerusalem) itself that is represented as the bringer of good news, according to the most probable interpretation. ³ Literally, 'his reward is with him, and his task (or perhaps, the wages of his task) is before him'. It seems likely that the Israelites returning from exile are here compared to the flocks and herds with which Jacob returned from Mesopotamia (Gen. 31. 18). ⁴ The Hebrew text differs here, but its sense is obscure, and perhaps corrupt.

27 What, then, is this thought of thine, Jacob, what is this complaint of thine, Israel, that the Lord does not see how it fares with thee, that thy God passes over thy wrongs? What ignorance is this? Has not the rumour of it reached thee? This Lord of ours, who fashioned the remotest bounds of earth, is God eternally; he does not weaken or grow weary; he is wise beyond all our thinking. Rather, it is he who gives the weary fresh spirit, who fosters strength and vigour where strength and vigour is none. Youth itself may weaken, the warrior faint and flag, but those who trust in the Lord will renew their strength, like eagles new-fledged; hasten, and never grow weary of hastening, march on, and never weaken on the march.

41 Let the islands cease their clamour, and come to me, let the peoples of the world take heart afresh;¹ and so let them come and plead their cause; we will submit the question to an arbiter, they and I. Tell me, who was it summoned his faithful servant² from the east, beckoned him to follow? The nations should be at his mercy, kings be subdued at his coming; flying like dust before his sword, scattered like chaff in the wind at the threat of his bow. He should rout them in battle, and pass through their country unmolested, leaving not a footprint behind him. Who was the author, the doer of all this, but I, the Lord, who summon all the ages into being? Before all, and at the end of all, I am. The islands have seen it, and trembled at the sight; the remotest parts of the world have been smitten with dismay; they draw near, and obey the summons.

6 (And still each abets his neighbour; 7 Courage, says one to another. The metal-worker, plying the hammer, encourages his fellow that is smiting the anvil; all goes well, he says, with the soldering. And he fastens it with nails, immovable.)³

But thou, Israel, my servant, thou, Jacob, on whom my choice has fallen, art sprung from that Abraham, who was my friend; in his person, I led thee by the hand from the ends of the earth, beckoning thee from far away, and still I whispered to thee, My servant thou art, chosen, not rejected. Have no fear, I am with thee; do not hesitate, am I not thy God? I am here to strengthen and protect thee; faithful the right hand that holds thee up. Thou shalt see all thy enemies disappointed and put to the blush; what are they? A very nothing, those adversaries of thine; they must vanish away; thou wilt look in vain for the men who troubled thee, fought against thee; thy search is for a very nothing, a memory of the past. It is I, the Lord thy God, that hold thee by the hand and whisper to thee, Do not be afraid, I am here to help thee.

Jacob, poor worm, poor ghost of Israel, do not be afraid; I am here, says the Lord, to help thee; I am here, says the Holy One of Israel, to ransom thee. I mean to go a-threshing, and thou my sledge, newly made; teeth like saws to thresh the mountains and crush them down, turn the hills into chaff; ay, and winnow them, till wind carries them away and storm scatters them! Thou shalt yet make thy boast of the Lord, triumph in the Holy One of Israel. Poor vagrants that long for water, where water is none, how dry their tongues with thirst! And shall I, the Lord, refuse them a hearing, I, the Holy One of Israel, leave them forsaken? I will open springs on the hill-slopes, wells in the open plain, turn the wilderness into pools, the trackless desert into running streams. I will plant those wastes with cedar and acacia, myrtle and olive; rear, in that desert soil, fir and elm and box besides; proof for all to see and recognize, for all to mark and to consider, that the Lord's hand was there; who but he, the Holy One of Israel, creates?

¹ 'Take heart afresh'; the same words are used for 'renew their strength' in 40. 31 above, and some think they have been written in here by an error, since they are not clearly suitable to the context.

² Literally, 'a just man'. The Hebrew text has 'justice', and some modern scholars would interpret: 'Who summoned from the east (a certain person whom) justice (that is, victory) meets (that is, attends) at his heels?' It is a matter of much disagreement, who is the person so referred to. St Jerome and others think it is the Messiah; but the context seems to suggest that the event lies in the past, not in the future. It may perhaps be Cyrus, king of Persia, who is described as God's chosen emissary in 44. 28, 45. 1. But it can also be understood of Abraham and his descendants, taken in conjunction, verse 2 referring to Abraham himself and verse 3 to the Exodus. The text of verse 9 below seems to favour this last interpretation.

³ Verses 6 and 7 are generally understood as referring to the making of idols; but their connexion with the context is so obscure that some think they have been misplaced, and stood originally after verse 20 of the foregoing chapter.

21 Come then, says the Lord, your pleadings! Let the King of Jacob hear your 22 contentions; let them come forward, these other gods, and tell us the future.¹ So read the past for us, that the study of it may disclose what needs must follow; coming 23 events make known. Foretell you what is yet to be, we shall know you are gods indeed. Then, if you have the power, grant good or ill fortune to mankind; confer we, 24 and pass judgement on it! Why, you are all empty air, a nothing that nothing can effect; he courts his own shame, that makes choice of you.

25 I summoned one from the north country; from the east his coming should be,
and ever he should invoke my name.² Princes he should harry to and fro, lightly as potter treads out his clay. Which of you foretold this from the first? Let us recognize it. Which of you knew it from the beginning? We must needs say, His plea is just. But no, none gave tidings of it, none foretold it; there was no word came 27 from you. Who will be the first³ to tell Sion, Here, here they are? He shall carry my good news to Jerusalem. But when I 28 looked, there was none of them that could offer counsel, or give a word in answer 29 when I questioned him. None of them has right on his side; all their doings are nothingness; no better than empty air the images men make of them.

42 And now, here is my servant,⁴ to whom I grant protection, the man of my choice, greatly beloved. My spirit rests upon him, and he will proclaim right 2 order among the Gentiles. He will not be contentious or a lover of faction; none shall hear his voice in the streets. He will not 3 snap the staff that is already crushed, or put out the wick that still smoulders; but at last he will establish right order unfailing.⁵ Not with sternness, not with 4 violence; to set up right order on earth, that is his mission. He has a law to give;

in the far-off islands men wait for it eagerly.
Thus says the Lord God, he who created 5 the heavens and spread them out, craftsman of the world and all the world affords, he who gives being and breath to all that lives and moves on it: True to my purpose, 6 I, the Lord, have summoned thee, taking thee by the hand and protecting thee, to make, through thee, a covenant with my own people, to shed, through thee, light over the Gentiles: to give sight to blinded 7 eyes, to set the prisoner free from his captivity, from the dungeon where he lies in darkness. I am the Lord, whose name tells 8 of power; I will not let the boast that is mine pass to another, or share my renown with graven gods. What I told you long 9 since,⁶ has proved true under your eyes; I tell you now what is still to be; you shall hear of it before ever it comes to light.

Sing the Lord a new song; let his praise 10 sound from end to end of the earth. Praise him from the sea, all men that sail on it, and all creatures the sea contains; the islands and the island-dwellers. Let 11 wilderness, now, lift up its head,⁷ and the desert cities; the men of Cedar shall have villages to dwell in.⁸ Give praise, then, rock-dwellers; the mountain-tops shall ring with their cries. All shall give God his 12 praise, till the renown of him reaches the islands far away.

Like a giant the Lord shall go out to 13

¹ The words 'these other gods' are not expressed in the original, but are inserted for the sake of clearness, being easily deducible from the context.

² There is the same uncertainty here about the person alluded to, as in verse 2 above.

³ In the Hebrew text, the verb is not expressed, and it is generally understood as meaning, 'I will be the first'. In that case, the following clause should read, 'and I will send a messenger with good news to Jerusalem'.
⁴ The servant of the Lord, frequently mentioned in these later chapters of the prophecy, is beyond doubt a type of our Lord (cf. Mt. 12. 18). It is not clear whether the prophet was also referring to events nearer his own time; and, if so, who was meant by 'the servant'. Some think the Servant means primarily the people of Israel, or at any rate that portion of it which returned from the exile at Babylon (cf. verse 19 below). Others would identify him with some individual figure, as king Ezechias, Zorobabel (who brought back the exiles), or Cyrus king of Persia; many other names have been suggested. Meanwhile, it is to be observed that there are numerous quotations in the New Testament from this part of the prophet's writings; e.g. Mt. 12. 18 (from the present passage), Phil. 2. 19 (from 45. 24), Acts 13. 27 (from 49. 6), Rom. 15. 21 (from 52. 15), Mt. 8. 17 (from 53. 4), Acts 8. 33 (from 53. 7), 1 Pet. 2. 22 (from 53. 9), Mk. 15. 28 (from 53. 12), Acts 13. 34 (from 55. 3), Rom. 11. 26 (from 59. 20) Rom. 10. 20 (from 65. 1).

⁵ Cf. Mt. 12. 18, where the text differs considerably from the text here. 'A lover of faction'; literally, 'an accepter of persons'; the Hebrew text here is obscure, but it is generally taken to mean 'lift up his voice' (as in St Matthew).

⁶ Literally, 'the things which were first', but the context makes the meaning clear.

⁷ The Hebrew text probably implies 'its voice', as in verse 2 above.

⁸ According to the Hebrew text, 'and those, too, who dwell in the settlements of Cedar'.

battle, like a warrior that stirs up his own rage, with hue and cry, flouting his ene-14 mies.¹ Too long I have been dumb, eaten my heart out, held myself in like a woman in labour;² now I will have my say, I will 15 destroy, and as I destroy, devour! I will turn mountain and hill into a waste, withering all their verdure, make barren islands of the rivers, dry up the marshes; 16 and I will lead men blindfold by unfamiliar ways, guide their steps by paths unknown to them; I will make the darkness light, and the winding ways straight for them. Such was my promise to them, and were they 17 disappointed of it? See how they are routed, how they blush and blench, the men who trust in graven images, and say to the idols they have cast, You are gods of ours!

18 Listen now, you that are deaf; look up, 19 blind eyes, and see. Who so blind as my servant, who so deaf as he, to whom my messengers were sent?³ Who so blind, as he that has forfeited his liberty? Who so 20 blind, as the Lord's servant is? Eyes that have seen so much, must they be still unheeding; ears open to every rumour, will 21 they never hear? It was ever the Lord's will to sanctify him; so great, so glorious 22 the law he gave him; yet here is a people robbed and spoiled, caught by warriors that have hidden it away in dungeons, a prey there is none to deliver, spoil none 23 bids them restore. Which of you will listen to this, and mark it, and give a hearing to 24 prophecy? Who was it that made Jacob a spoil, gave Israel up into the hands of the conqueror? It was that Lord, against whom we have sinned. Because his ways 25 lay untrodden, his laws went unheeded, he poured out on Israel his angry retribution, war without mercy; and they? The flames burned round them, and they could not read the lesson, scorched them, and still they could not understand.

43 And now, here is a message from the Lord to Jacob, his creature, to the Israel he fashioned: Do not be afraid, I have bought thee for myself, and given thee the name thou bearest: thou be-longest to me. Pass through water, and I will be with thee, so that the flood shall not drown thee; walk amid the flames, and thou shalt not be burnt, the fire shall have no power to catch thee. I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy deliverer;

 I have bartered away Egypt to win thee, Ethiopia and Saba for thy ransom. So prized, so honoured, so dearly loved, that I am ready to give up mankind in thy place, a world to save thee. Do not be afraid, I am with thee; I will restore thy sons from the east, the west shall hear the calling of their muster-roll; I will say to the north wind, Give them back; to the south wind, Restrain them no more;
 bring back these sons of mine from far away, these daughters of mine from the world's end. Whoever owns my name⁴ is my creature, made and fashioned for my glory.

Bring them out, then, into the light of day, this people of mine that have eyes, and still cannot see, have ears, and cannot hear.
 Round about us, all the nations of the world are gathered, all its tribes assemble.
 And now, which among you can make this claim, give us an account of events foretold long ago?⁵ Let them produce witnesses to justify their claim, so that all may listen and say, It is the truth. I call you to witness, the Lord says, you and this servant of mine, on whom my choice has fallen; will you not recognize the truth, and believe me? Will you not learn to understand that I am the God you seek?⁶ None ever came into being before me, or will after me. It is I, I, the Lord; no other can bring deliverance. It was I who promised that deliverance, I who bought it; I told you of it, when there was no alien god worshipped among you; you are my witnesses to that, the Lord says. I am God, and what I was,
 I am;⁷ from my power there is no escaping;

¹ Some think that verses 13-17 allude to the events of the Exodus (see verses 15, 16); if so, they should probably be enclosed in inverted commas, as a quotation, as far as the words, 'such was my promise'.

² It is not certain whether the words 'like a woman in labour' should be taken with the verb which precedes, or with the verb which follows them. The second part of the sentence, according to the Hebrew text is generally interpreted as meaning, 'I will cry out, and gasp, and pant, all at once'; but the verbs used are rare, and their meaning is somewhat doubtful.

³ According to the Hebrew text, 'he whom I sent as a messenger'.

⁴ Literally, 'calls upon my name'; in the Hebrew text; 'is called by my name'.

⁵ Literally, 'the first things'; cf. note on 42. 9 above.

⁶ Literally, 'I am he'; cf. note on Jn. 8. 24.

⁷ Literally, 'I am he', as in verse 10, but here the predominant sense is perhaps 'I am the same God who brought you out of Egypt', cf. verses 16, 17.

when I execute my designs, none can avert them.

14 Thus says the Lord, your ransom, the Holy One of Israel, If I send my emissaries to Babylon, casting down all its barriers,¹ casting down the Chaldeans, with all the pride of their navies, it is for your sakes.

15 I, the Lord, am your Holy One, I, the maker of Israel, am your king. A message to you from that same Lord, who could once lead you through the sea, make a passage for you through the foaming waters; could bring out chariots and horses, rank and file and chieftain together in pursuit, to fall there and never to rise again, crushed like a wick, and their light quenched. Do not remember those old things, he says, as if you had eyes for nothing but what happened long ago; I mean to perform new wonders; even now they are coming to the birth; surely you will understand at last? I mean to make a causeway over the desert, with streams flowing beside it in the waste.

20 The wild things will do me honour, the serpents and the ostriches, for thus giving them water in the desert, streams in the waste; but it was for my people's sake that I did it, to give drink to my chosen people.

21 I made them for myself, surely they too will have praise to give me!

22 Alas, Jacob, that my name should be forgotten, alas, Israel, that thou shouldst have troubled thyself about me so little!

23 No ram of thine offered in burnt-sacrifice to me, no victims of thine to do me honour; little burden have my offerings been to thee, little trouble my meed of incense!

24 Scented cane² thou wouldst not buy to burn for me, nor think to cheer me with the fat of sacrifice; rather, it was I that was burdened, burdened with thy sins; I that was troubled, troubled with thy faithlessness. It was I, ever I, that must be blotting out thy offences, for my own honour's sake, effacing the memory of thy sins. Time, now, thou shouldst remember me; come, let us settle the matter by arbitration, thou and I; tell me what plea thou hast to bring forward. For the guilt of thy first father, for the rebellions of thy own spokesmen against me,³ I brought thy inviolable princes to dishonour, gave up Jacob to destruction, Israel to the scorn of his enemies.

44 Listen, then, Jacob, my servant, Israel, the people of my choice. Here is a message to thee from the Lord that made and fashioned thee in the womb, thy protector: do not be afraid, my servant, Jacob, my true, my chosen people. I will pour out water on the thirsty plain, streams over the land that once was dry; I will pour out my spirit upon thy race, my blessing on all thy line, and where the grass springs up they shall spring up too, like willows by running water. Now, a man will say openly, The Lord's servant I; make his boast of Jacob's name; write with his own hand,⁴ Dedicated to the Lord, and lay claim to the title of Israelite. Thus says the Lord, Israel's king and ransom, the Lord of hosts: I am before all; there is no other God but I. What other is like me? Let him proclaim it, tell us of it; let him expound the history of the past, ever since I established the primal race of man; then let him make known the future that is yet to come.⁵ Do not be afraid, or bewildered; you can bear me witness that from the first I proclaimed it in your hearing, there is no other God but I, no other Powers to rival me.

What empty minds be theirs, that idols fashion! What help found any of them yet in his own darling inventions? Confess they, and to their shame, that these have neither sight nor thought. Who was it framed this god, moulded this image that nothing avails? What can they do, yonder whole conspiracy, but stand there blushing? They are but craftsmen with human power. See them met there in a body, all struck dumb, every one abashed as his neighbour! Here is blacksmith that works away with his file, beats out image with

¹ The word in the Hebrew text which the Latin translates 'barriers' is understood by some as meaning fugitives; it is also possible, in the Hebrew text, to interpret what follows as meaning, 'I cast down the Chaldeans into the ships which are their pride'.

² The scented cane was used in making holy oils for the service of the Temple, cf. Ex. 30. 23. ³ Since Adam was the first father of the whole human race, not merely of the Jews, the reference here is probably to one of the later patriarchs; the 'spokesmen' may be Moses and Aaron (cf. Num. 20. 12), or the false prophets of a later time. ⁴ Or possibly 'on his own hand', as if branding himself with the mark of the divine service. ⁵ The text of this verse seems confused, and it seems possible that the heathen gods are once more being challenged to produce proofs of successful prophecies; cf. 42. 9; 43. 9 above.

furnace and hammer, his strong arm the whole author of it; faints he, like other men, if he be hungry, tires at his task if 13 water he have none to drink! Here is carpenter unfolding his rule; plane smooths the wood, square and compasses must do their work; and what has he made for you? The figure of a man, that has but human beauty, a man that must have a roof to 14 shelter him. For such ends, cedar must fall, ilex and oak be cut away from their place in the forest; for this, pine-tree was planted where rains should nourish it.

15 Logs yonder carpenter will cut, a human hearth to feed; some he brings in to warm himself, kindles more when the bread is a-baking; and the rest? With the rest he makes himself a god to worship, bows down before the thing his own hands have 16 carved! Well enough that hearth and oven should claim a share, that he should brew broth and fill his belly, that he should warm him, and boast of the warmth, at 17 sight of his own chimney-corner. But that he should take the rest to make a god for himself! That he should fall down before an image, worship it, cry out to it, Save me, thou art my god! Ignorance and folly, 18 bleared eyes that cannot see, dull hearts that cannot understand! Minds without 19 reason, or sense, or thought, that cannot learn their lesson! Logs that fed the flame, embers that baked for me; now that my dinner is cooked and eaten, shall I take the rest and make an idol of it, fall down before 20 a stump of wood? Dust and ashes are his portion; the fool goes on worshipping, cannot free his own soul from bondage, nor ask if he shelters himself under a lie.¹

21 Remember it, Jacob, remember it, my servant Israel; it was I, Israel, that made thee; thou art my servant, and wilt thou 22 forget me? The cloud of thy guilt, the haze of thy sinfulness, I have swept away; come 23 back to me, thy ransom. The Lord has been merciful; you heavens, sing your praises; depths of the earth, rejoice; echo the song of praise, mountain and forest and every forest tree; the Lord has ransomed Jacob, Israel shall make his boast in him.
 24 Thus says the Lord, thy ransom, he who fashioned thee in the womb: I am the Lord, the author of all things; alone I spread out heaven's canopy, looked for no help when I laid the floor of the earth. Mine to disappoint the soothsayers of their prophecies, and bewilder the diviner's wits, send the wise men back to school, their wisdom all exposed as folly, vindicate my own servant, and justify the counsel my own messengers have given. It is my voice that bids Jerusalem grow populous, and the cities of Juda rise again, while I restore their ruins; my voice that bids the deep turn into a desert, and threatens to dry up all its floods; my voice that says to Cyrus, I give thee a shepherd's part to play; it is for thee to carry out my whole purpose. And to Jerusalem it says, Thou shalt be built up; and to the Temple, Thou shalt be founded again.

45 A message from the Lord to the king he has anointed, to Cyrus. I have caught him by his right hand, ready to subdue nations at his coming, put kings to flight, open every gateway before him, so that no door can keep him out. And now (says the Lord) I will still lead thee on thy way, bending the pride of earth low before thee; I will break open gates of bronze, and cleave through bars of iron; their hidden treasures, their most secret hoards, I will hand over to thee. Know by this that it is I, the Lord, the God of Israel, who am calling upon thee by thy name; and that I do it for love of my servant Jacob, of Israel, my chosen people. Yes, I have called thee by thy name; I have found a title for thee,² when thou of me hadst no knowledge as yet. It is the Lord that speaks, and there is no other to rival me, no God but I; I, still unknown to thee, was fain to make thee strong, to what end? Because I would proclaim it from east to west that there is no other God. It is the Lord that speaks, and there is no other to rival me; I, the fashioner of darkness, the creator of light, I, the maker of peace, the author of calamity. I, the Lord, am the doer of all this.

(You heavens, send dew from above, you skies, pour down upon us the rain we long for, him, the Just One; may he, the Saviour, spring from the closed womb of earth, and with him let right order take its being.¹)

¹ Literally, 'if there is a lie at his right hand'; it was the right side that was exposed in ancient warfare.

² Literally, 'a comparison for thee', i.e. in describing Cyrus as his shepherd (44. 28).

9 I, the Lord, have made my servant what he is. At his peril does man, poor shard of earthly clay, bandy words with his own Fashioner; shall the clay dare ask the potter who moulds it, What ails thee? Or tell 10 him he is no craftsman? Strange, if a man should be asked by his own son, why he begot him, or a woman, why she gave 11 birth!² Thus says the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, and Israel's maker, Of me you must learn, what times they be that are coming; trust me to do what I will with my 12 sons, with my own creatures. It was I framed the earth, and created man to dwell in it; it was my hands that spread out the heavens, my voice that marshalled the 13 starry host; I, too, have summoned this man to perform my designs faithfully; go he where he will, my guidance shall be his. He shall build up my own city, he shall let my captives go free, without bribe or ransom, says the Lord of hosts.

14 This, too, the Lord says: all the toil of Egypt, all the merchandise of Ethiopia, and tall slaves from Sabaea shall come into thy power and be thine; they shall walk behind thee, their hands manacled as they go, paying thee reverence, and crying out, God is with thee, with thee only; there is no God where thou art not.³

15 Truly, God of Israel, our Saviour, thou art a God of hidden ways! All the makers of false gods must needs be disappointed, 16 must go away ashamed and abashed. Israel has found deliverance in the Lord, eternal deliverance; while ages last, no shame, no 17 disappointment for you. The Lord has pronounced it; the Lord who made the heavens, and the whole frame and fashion of earth, moulded to his will. He did not create it to lie idle, he shaped it to be man's home. And he says, It is the Lord that 18 speaks, there is no other to rival me; it was not in secret, not in some dark recess of earth, that my word was spoken. Not in vain I bade the sons of Jacob search for me; I am the Lord, faithful to my promises, truthful in all I proclaim. Gather yourselves and come near, flock together to my side, heathen men that have found deliverance; who still, in your ignorance, set up wooden images of your own fashioning, and pray to a god that cannot save. Tell us your thoughts, come, take counsel among yourselves; who was it that proclaimed this from the first, prophesied it long ago? Was it not I, the Lord? There is no God where I am not. Was it not I, the faithful God? There is no other that can save. Turn back to me, and win deliverance, all you that dwell in the remotest corners of the earth; I am God, there is no other. By my own honour I have sworn it, nor shall it echo in vain, this faithful promise I have made, that every knee shall bow before me, and every tongue swear by my name. Then shall men say of the Lord, that redress and dominion come from him;⁴ all those who rebelled against him shall appear in his presence abashed. Through the Lord, the whole race of Israel shall be righted and brought to honour.

46 Here is Bel fallen in pieces, Nabo shattered;⁵ their idols a gazing-stock for wild beasts and cattle! Heavy enough the burden you had to carry; these must be left to moulder in a common ruin; comfort they had none for their toiling worshippers,⁶ living souls that have gone off into captivity. Listen to me, sons of Jacob, and all the rest of Israel's race, you whose weight has ever been my burden, like an unborn child, a babe in the womb. You grow old, but I am still the same; the grey hairs come, but I ever uphold you; I must carry you, I that created you, I must bear you away to safety. What comparison, ¹ The Hebrew text has, not 'the Just One', but 'justice' (that is, God's faithful mercies to his people, or their acquittal from sin); not 'the Saviour', but 'salvation'. This verse seems to interrupt the thread of the argument; unless indeed it is put in the mouths of those Jews who would not expect deliverance from the king of Persia, but only from a Messias. Some would include the first sentence of verse 9 within the parenthesis.

² 'Why he begot him', 'why she gave birth'; it is equally possible to translate, both from the Hebrew and from the Latin, 'what he has begotten' and 'to what she has given birth'.

³ It is not certain whether this promise relates to the people of Israel or to king Cyrus. ⁴ The Latin version is here somewhat confused, and reads, 'Therefore in the Lord he shall say mine are deeds of justice and empire', but the sense intended is probably that given above; the Hebrew text, also, is obscure.

⁵ The verbs used in the Hebrew text do not bear any stronger sense than that of 'fall down', or even 'stoop down'. Some would interpret this verse as meaning that the idols of Babylon have been loaded on pack-animals, but proved too heavy to carry away. ⁶ Literally, 'for him who was carrying'; in the Hebrew text, 'for the burden'.

what match will you find for me, what likeness to resemble me? Fools that fetch gold out of a sack, weigh silver in the balance, bid some craftsman make a god they should fall down and worship!

Shoulder-high it must be borne, set down on its pedestal; there it stands, powerless to move from its place, deaf to their cry, and in their need bringing no deliverance.

This, for your confusion, call to mind; think well on it, unbelieving hearts. Remember the lesson of times long since, that I am God, and there is no other, none to rival me; did I not tell you from the first the events of latter days, from the beginning what had not yet come to be? My purpose, I promised, should not fail, my whole will must needs be done. See where I have summoned a bird of prey from the east, a man from a distant country, to do this will of mine! I, that spoke, will make my word good; I, that purposed it, my purpose will accomplish. Redress far off? Nay, faithless hearts, listen to me; here is redress I bring you, close at hand. Distance there is none to be travelled, nor lingers deliverance on the way. Delivered Sion's mountain shall be, Jerusalem have sight of my glory.

47 Come down, sit in the dust, poor maid of Babylon; the ground thy seat shall be; no throne any longer for that queen of the Chaldean folk we knew once, so dainty, so delicate. Get thee to the mill-stones and grind there, ready to expose thy nakedness; off with thy veil, here are streams to be crossed bare of leg. Thou shalt be exposed to shame, thy naked form uncovered; I mean to take vengeance on thee, and no man shall stay my hand.

(But we have one to ransom us; who but the Lord of hosts, the Holy One of Israel?)

Sit dumb, bury thyself in darkness, lady of Chaldea; thou shalt rule the nations no longer. Angry with my people, turned enemy against the land of my choice, I gave them into thy power; and thou, what mercy didst thou shew them? Heavy the yoke thou didst lay on aged shoulders.

Thou wouldst surely be a queen for ever; thou didst it light-heartedly, not recking what the end should be. And now, here is a word for those delicate ears, lady of the careless heart, who sittest there telling thyself, I am Babylon, the unrivalled; no lonely widowhood, no childless lot for me. These two things shall fall on thee suddenly in a single day, childlessness and widowhood; fall upon thee in full measure, so blind amid all thy sorceries, through the crass folly of thy wizards so blind.

Such was thy trust in these wicked arts of thine, thou hadst no fear of discovery; thy very wisdom, thy very knowledge were a snare; I am Babylon, thy heart told thee, rival I have none. And now comes ruin unforeseen, comes doom no sacrifice can avert; sudden and strange thy encounter with sorrow. All that multitude of wizards, and wilt thou not persevere with thy enchantments, the hard-earned lore of thy youth? Maybe it will turn to thy advantage; thou shalt be formidable yet! But no, thou art wearied of those many consultations. Let them come to thy side now and save thee if they can, diviners that gaze up at the stars, count days of the month, to tell thy future for thee! Like stubble burn they one and all; their own lives they cannot rescue from the flame. Here is no brazier to warm them, no ingle-nook to sit by! And this is the end of all thy long study; trusted counsellors of thy youth, all have gone astray in their reckoning; deliverance for thee is none.

48 A message for you, sons of Jacob, heirs of Israel's name, sprung from the stock of Juda, that take oath in the Lord's name, of Israel's God the memory preserve, but not in faith, but not in loyalty! Townsmen they are still reckoned of a holy city; still on Israel's God, the Lord of hosts, lean they for support. What happened in times past, I had foretold long before; warning was uttered, and in the public ear; then, suddenly, I would set to work, and the prophecy was fulfilled. I knew well what an untamed creature thou art, neck stubborn as an iron hawser, forehead intractable as bronze; I would warn thee from the first, tell thee what was coming before it came; never shouldst thou say this was the work of thy false gods, the will of idols thou didst carve and cast. Consider closely the things I warned thee of, was there any foretelling them? Ever I reveal to thee, long before, things kept secret from thy knowledge; events that are coming about now, unheard of then.¹ When they are yet beyond knowledge, I reveal them; not thine to boast, it was no news to thee. And still thou wouldst not listen, thou wouldst be ignorant still; when I prophesied to thee in times past, I could get no hearing; what hope from the traitor but of treason? I know thee a rebel from thy birth. If I reprove thee from my vengeance, it is my own honour demands it; curb thee I must, for my own sake, or wouldst thou rush to thy doom. I have tested thee, but not as silver is tested; even in the furnace of affliction, thou wast already my choice. Honour, my own honour demands it; how should I suffer my name to be reviled, or the worship that belongs to me given to another?

¹ It is difficult to see either what is the relevance of this verse in its present context; or how it could have strayed into that context from elsewhere. As it stands, it appears to be a triumphant refrain sung by the Israelites, interrupting God's message to the Babylonians.

Listen then, Jacob; listen to me, thou Israel to whom my call was sent. I am still the same; before all, and at the end of all, I am. My hand fashioned the heavens, my fingers measured the span of earth; it is my command holds them in their place. Assemble, all you nations, and listen to me; tell me which of your gods has prophesied it,² The Lord, in his great love for Israel,³ means to subdue Babylon to his will, to bare his arm among the Chaldeans? But I did, I foretold it; it was I that brought the conqueror on his way, so that it lay smooth before him.

Gather round me and listen; from the first I have been telling you this openly enough; was I not there among you long since, before it happened? And now that it is happening, it is the Lord God, it is the spirit of the Lord God, that sends me to you.⁴ Here is a message from the Lord, thy ransom, the Holy One of Israel:

I am the Lord thy God, ever ready to teach thee what it concerns thee to know, guide thee on the path thou treadest. If thou hadst but heeded my warnings! Then had a flowing stream of peace been with thee, a full tide of the Lord's favour; thy own race, thy own stock, should have been numberless as the sand or the pebbles on the sea-beach; the remembrance of thee should never have been cut off from my merciful regard.⁵ Away from Babylon, ²⁰ have done with Chaldea, let this be your triumphant watchword; make it heard everywhere, publish it to the ends of the earth, tell them the Lord has ransomed his servant Jacob; they did not go thirsty when ²¹ he led them through the desert; he could bring water out of the rock for them, cleave the hard rock and make the water flow. But for the rebellious, the Lord says, there ²² is no peace.

49 Listen, remote islands; pay heed to me, nations from far away. Ere ever I was born, the Lord sent me his summons, kept me in mind already, when I lay in my mother's womb.⁶ Word of mine is sword of his, ready sharpened, under cover of his hand; arrow he has chosen out carefully, hidden yet in his quiver. Thou art my servant, he whispers, thou art the Israel I claim for my own.⁷ To me, all my labour seemed useless, my strength worn out in vain; his to judge me, he, my God, must reward my work as he would. But now a new message he sends me; I am his servant, appointed ever since I lay in the womb, to bring Jacob back to him. What if Israel will not answer the summons? None the less, the Lord destines me to honour; none the less, he, my God, protects me. Use thee I will, he promises, nor with thy service be content, when the tribes of Jacob thou hast summoned, brought back the poor remnant of Israel; nay, I have appointed thee to be the

¹ The exact sense of verses 6 and 7 is doubtful; both the Hebrew text and the Latin version, which differs from it considerably, give 'then' instead of 'now' as the time when the 'things kept secret' were revealed.

² Or perhaps, 'assemble, all you Israelites, and listen to me, tell me which of the heathen gods'. The context makes it clear that one sense or the other is intended by the original text, which gives simply, 'assemble, all of you, and listen to me, tell me which of them'. ³ In the original, simply 'him'.

⁴ It is presumably the prophet who speaks here in his own person. ⁵ In the Latin version, these sentences express regret for the past; in the Hebrew text, they might express a hope for the future.

⁶ It is not certain whether the speaker here is the prophet himself, or the servant of the Lord referred to in 42. 1 and elsewhere. ⁷ Perhaps in the sense that this one man is all the Israel left, at a time of general apostasy. The sentence may also be rendered, 'Thou, Israel, art my servant'; but verse 6 below seems to indicate that the person addressed is a messenger sent to Israel, not the people itself.

light of the Gentiles, in thee I will send out my salvation to the furthest corners of the earth.

7 A message from the Lord, Israel's ransom, Israel's Holy One, to the despised one, to the nation that is abhorred,¹ to the slave of tyrants: Kings, when they see this, shall rise up from their thrones, princes too, and fall down to worship, in honour of the Lord, that keeps his promise so faithfully, the Holy One of Israel, that claims thee still.

8 Thus says the Lord, Here is a time of pardon, when prayer of thine shall be answered, a day of salvation, when I will bring thee aid. I have kept thee in readiness, to make, by thy means, a covenant with my people.² Thine to revive a ruined country, to parcel out the forfeited lands 9 anew, men that are bound in darkness restoring to freedom and to the light. There shall be pasture for my flock by the wayside, feeding-grounds they shall have 10 on all the barren uplands; they will hunger and thirst no more, noonday heat nor sun overpower them; theirs is a merciful shepherd, that will lead them to welling fountains and give them drink. And I will turn 11 all these mountains of mine into a highroad for you; safe through the uplands my path 12 shall lead. See how they come from far away! Exiles from north and west, exiles 13 from the south country return. Ring out, heaven, with praise; let earth keep holiday, and its mountains echo that praise again; the Lord brings consolation to his people, takes pity on their need.

14 Did Zion complain, the Lord has forsaken me, my own Master gives me never 15 a thought? What, can a woman forget her child that is still unweaned, pity no longer the son she bore in her womb? Let her 16 forget; I will not be forgetful of thee. Why, I have cut thy image on the palms of my hands; those walls of thine dwell before 17 my eyes continually. Here are craftsmen ready to build thee again; vanished, now, 18 the spoilers that plundered thee. Look about thee, and see thy children met together, coming back to thee; As I am living God, the Lord says, all these shall be a robe to deck thee, shall ring thee round like a bride's jewels; the silent homes, the lonely places of a ruined country-side, shall have no room, now, for thy many inhabitants, when all that robbed thee of thy lands have fled far away. Sons born to thee in the days of thy barrenness shall cry out, Here all is confined, give me room to live! Who has begotten me these? thou wilt ask. Barren days of exile, when I could not give birth; who has reared me these, when I was left solitary? Where were these all the while? Even now, says the Lord God, I will beckon to the nations, lift up a signal for all the world to see; son and daughter of thine shall be nursed in their arms, carried on their shoulders. Thou shalt have kings to foster them, queens to nurse them for thee; kings and queens shall bow to earth before thee, kissing the dust thy feet have trodden. And thou shalt know at last what a Lord I am, a Lord none ever trusted in vain.

Shall the strong be robbed of his spoil? Who shall deliver the captives from a warrior's hand?³ Captives of the strong, the Lord says, shall be taken away from him, the valiant warrior shall lose his spoil. I will pass judgement on the men who have been thy judges, and thy own children shall escape. I will feed thy enemies on their own flesh, give them their own blood to make them drunk, and all mankind shall know that I, the Lord, have delivered thee, that I, the Prince of Israel, have brought thee rescue.

50 Thus says the Lord, Who can shew writ of separation your mother had from me when I sent her away? Was I in debt, that I must needs sell you as slaves? Nay, if I sold you, it was for your disobedience; it was wanton wife I thrust out of doors. And now must I come to you, and find none to greet me,⁴ call you, and hear no answer to my call? What, has arm of mine grown shrunk and shrivelled, lost its power to save? Have I strength no longer to set men free? Nay, with a word I can yet turn sea into desert, dry up rivers, till the fish lie rotting on the

¹ In the Hebrew text, the probable meaning is 'to him that is abhorred by the nation'. This would mean that the promise is made to the Servant of the Lord (or perhaps to the prophet), not to the Jewish nation. Whatever explanation be given, it is not easy to be sure of the connexion of this verse either with what precedes it or with what follows it. ² Cf. II Cor. 6. 2. ³ Cf. Mt. 12. 29. ⁴ 'I find none to greet me'; literally, 'there was not a man'.

3 banks, dead of thirst; I can yet cover the heavens with darkness, and give them mourning weeds to wear.

4 Ever the Lord schools my tongue to utterance that shall refresh the weary; awakes my dull ears, morning after morning, their Master's bidding to heed. An attentive ear the Lord has given me; not mine to withstand him; not mine to shrink from the task. I offered my body defenceless to the men who would smite me, my cheeks to all who plucked at my beard; I did not turn away my face when they reviled me and spat upon me. The Lord God is my helper; and that help cannot play me false; meet them I will, and with a face unmoved as flint; not mine to suffer the shame of defeat; here is One stands by to see right done me. Come, who pleads? Meet me, and try the issue; let him come forward who will, and accuse me. Here is the Lord God ready to aid me; who dares pass sentence on me now? One and all they shall be brought to nothing, like garment the moth has eaten!

10 Who is here that fears the Lord, listens to his servant's message? Who would make his way through dark places, with no glimmer of light? Let him trust in the name of the Lord, and lean upon his God. 11 For you others, with brand at girdle, that your own fire would make, with fire your own brands have kindled light the path if you can; this is all the gift I have for you, a bed of anguish.¹

51 Listen to me, then, you who follow the true path, you that have recourse to the Lord. Think of the rock you were quarried from, of the hidden depths whence you came, of Abraham that begot you, of Sara that was your mother; he was a childless man when I called him, and blessed him, and granted him a posterity. And has the Lord no pity for Sion, left desolate, no pity on her ruined state? Doubt not he will turn that wilderness into a garden of delight, that loneliness into a paradise; in her, too, mirth and gladness shall be found, there shall be thanksgiving and songs of praise. People of mine, men of a chosen race, give heed and hearing! Henceforth, my law shall be promulgated, my decrees be ratified, for a whole world's enlightening. Soon, now, my faithful servant will come, even now he is on his way to deliver you; these arms of mine shall execute judgement on the nations; the remote islands are waiting for me, are looking for my aid. Lift up your eyes to the heavens, cast them down to earth again; those heavens shall vanish like smoke, that earth be fretted away like a garment, and all who dwell on it share the same destruction; my saving power is eternal, my faithfulness inexhaustible. Listen to me, you that can discern the right, my own people, with my law written in your hearts; not yours to be afraid of men's taunts, shrink from them when they revile you; crumble away they must, like garment the worms have eaten, like wool fretted by the moth; my saving power is eternal, my faithfulness lives on from age to age.

Up, up, arm of the Lord, array thyself in strength; up, as in the days that are past, long ages since. What other power was it that smote our insolent enemy,² wounded the dragon; what other power dried up the sea, with its deep rolling waters, made the sea's caverns a highway, for a ransomed people to cross? Now, too, men the Lord has ransomed will come home again to Sion, praising him as they go. Eternal happiness crowns them, joy and happiness in their grasp now, sorrow and sighing fled far away.

It is I, still it is I, that will bring thee consolation. And it is thou that art afraid of mortal man, of earth-born things that die like grass? Is it thou that dost forget the Lord, thy maker, who spread out the heavens and laid the foundations of the earth? What, go in fear all day long of yonder angry tyrant, sworn to undo thee? What of the tyrant's anger now? Comes he³ with hurried step to release his prisoner, persecuted to the death no longer, nor suffered to starve for want of bread! I am the Lord thy God, the same power

¹ The meaning of this verse is very obscure, and is variously explained. The context is perhaps best suited if we understand it of such Jews as were plotting rebellion against the governing powers, instead of waiting confidently for God's help, like those referred to in the previous verse. ² Literally, 'the proud one', but the word used in the Hebrew text is probably a proper name, Rahab. This is used as a title for Egypt, as in Ps. 88. 11; and 'the dragon' is no doubt another symbol of the Egyptian power, as perhaps in Ps. 73. 14. ³ Or possibly 'One is coming'.

that stirs up the sea till waves rise high on 16 it; the Lord of hosts is the name I bear. To thy lips I have entrusted my message, kept thee under cover of my hand, to replant heaven and refound earth, to tell Sion, Thou art my people.¹

17 Up, up, Jerusalem, bestir thyself! It was a draught of his vengeance the Lord gave thee to drink; ay, thou hast drunk 18 deep of a cup that numbs the senses, drained it to the dregs. So many children she has borne and reared, and none to give her support, none to take her by the hand!
 19 Who is to mourn for thee, the sport of a double calamity, by want and war dismantled and unmanned? Who is here to 20 console thee? They are left to lie at every street corner, those sons of thine, dazed as wild bull caught in a net, brought down by the Lord's anger, by the punishment he, 21 thy God, has sent them. Listen thou, the unbefriended, thy wits bemused with sor-22 row, not with wine, here is the message thy master has for thee, thy Lord and God, ready to fight in his people's cause! I am taking it away from thy hand, this draught that numbs the senses, the dregs of the vengeance I had poured out for thee; thou 23 shalt drink it no longer. Cruel oppressors that bade thee lie down and let them walk over thee, dust under their feet, a pathway for them to tread, shall find the cup has passed from this hand to theirs.

52 Up, up, array thyself, Sion, in all thy strength; clothe thyself as befits thy new glory, Jerusalem, city of the Holy One! The uncircumcised, the un-2 clean, shall enter thee no more. Shake the dust from thee, Jerusalem, rise up and take 3 thy throne; rid thy neck of the chains that bound it, Sion, once captive queen! This is the Lord's promise, You were bartered away for nothing, and you shall be ran-4 somed without cost.² Time was, the Lord God says, long ago, when my people went down into Egypt and dwelt among strangers there; time was, since then, they were oppressed, beyond all reason, by the Assyrians; what needs it,³ the Lord says, then 5 or now, my people should be carried off thus wantonly into exile? Their new masters sin defiantly, bring my name con-6 tinually into reproach. The day comes when my own people my own name will recognize, nor doubt that I, who promised to be with them, am with them now.

Welcome, welcome on the mountain 7 heights the messenger that cries, All is well! Good news brings he, deliverance cries he, telling Sion, Thy God has claimed his throne! A shout goes up from the 8 watchmen; they are crying out all at once, all at once echoing their praise; their own eyes shall witness it, when the Lord brings Sion deliverance. Rejoice, echo all at once 9 with rejoicing, ruined homes of Jerusalem; comfort from the Lord for the Lord's people, Jerusalem redeemed! The Lord 10 bares his holy arm for all the nations to see it; to the remotest corners of earth he, our God, makes known his saving power. Re-11 turn, return; no more of Babylon; touch nothing defiled as you come out from the heart of her, keep yourselves unsullied, you that have the vessels of the Lord's 12 worship in your charge. No need for confusion at the time of your going; this shall be no hasty flight, with the Lord himself to march before you, the God of Israel to rally you.

See, here is my servant, one who will be 13 prudent in all his dealings. To what height he shall be raised, how exalted, how ex-14 tolled! So many there be that stand gazing in horror; was ever a human form so mishandled, human beauty ever so defaced?
 15 Yet this is he that will purify a multitude of nations; kings shall stand dumb in his presence; seen, now, where men had no tidings of him, made known to such as never heard his name.⁴

¹ From this verse it appears that the dialogue, verses 9-16, is either between the Lord and his prophet, or between the Lord and his Servant, cf. 49. 2.

² The sense is probably, 'I gained nothing in return when I sent you into exile at Babylon' (cf. 50. 1 above, Ps. 43. 13); 'I did not engage the gratitude of the Chaldeans, who remain idolaters; I am free therefore, to remit your sentence of exile whenever I will'. The interpretation, 'You were sent into exile for no fault of your own, and you shall be reprieved for no merits of your own' is neither probable in itself nor suited to the context.

³ 'What needs it, then or now?' Literally, 'And now, what is to me here?'—though this is less accurate as a rendering of the Hebrew text. The idiomatic sense which this phrase commonly has (cf. 22. 16 above, and many other passages) would be 'And what business have I to interfere here?' But this is evidently inappropriate, and it is best to take the words literally, as in Gen. 19. 12. Cf. note on verse 3.

⁴ 'Purify'; literally 'sprinkle'; but wherever this word occurs elsewhere, the thing, not the person, is its object (i.e. you sprinkle something on a person), and various attempts have been made to amend the Hebrew text, e.g.

53 What credence for such news as ours? Whom reaches it, this new revelation of the Lord's strength?¹ He will watch this servant of his appear among us, unregarded as² brushwood shoot, as a plant in waterless soil; no stateliness here, no majesty, no beauty, as we gaze upon him, to win our hearts. Nay, here is one despised, left out of all human reckoning; bowed with misery, and no stranger to weakness; how should we recognize that face?³ How should we take any account of him, a man so despised? Our weakness, and it was he who carried the weight of it, our miseries, and it was he who bore them.⁴ A leper, so we thought of him, a man God had smitten and brought low; and all the while it was for our sins he was wounded, it was guilt of ours crushed him down; on him the punishment fell that brought us peace, by his bruises we were healed. Strayed sheep all of us, each following his own path; and God laid on his shoulders our guilt, the guilt of us all.

A victim? Yet he himself bows to the stroke;⁵ no word comes from him. Sheep led away to the slaughter-house, lamb that stands dumb while it is shorn; no word from him. Imprisoned, brought to judgement, and carried off, he, whose birth is beyond our knowing; numbered among the living no more! Be sure it is for my people's guilt I have smitten him.⁶ Takes he leave of the rich, the goddess, to win but a grave, to win but the gift of death;⁷ he, that wrong did never, nor had treason on his lips! Ay, the Lord's will it was, overwhelmed he should be with trouble. His life laid down for guilt's atoning, he shall yet be rewarded; father of a long posterity, instrument of the divine purpose; for all his heart's anguish, rewarded in full. The Just One, my servant; many shall he claim for his own, win their acquittal, on his shoulders bearing their guilt. So many lives ransomed, foes so violent balked of their spoil! Such is his due, that gave himself up to death, and would be counted among the wrong-doers; bore those many sins, and made intercession for the guilty.

54 Sing with praise, barren city that art childless still; echo thy praise, cry aloud, wife that wast never brought to bed; forsaken, she is to have more children now, the Lord says, than wife whose husband remains with her.⁸ Make more room for thy tent, stretch wide—what hinders thee?—the curtains of thy dwelling-place; long be the ropes, and firm the pegs that fasten them. Right and left thou shalt spread, till thy race dispossesses the heathen, peoples the ruined cities. Not thine to fear disappointment, not thine to blush for hopes unfulfilled; forget, henceforward, the shame of younger days, the reproach of thy widowed state; think upon it no more. Husband now thou hast, and the name of him is the Lord of hosts, thy creator; he, the Holy One of Israel, that will now be called God of the whole earth, makes thee his own. The Lord calls thee back, a woman forsaken and forlorn, the wife of his youth, long cast away; thy God sends thee word, If I abandoned thee, it was but for a little moment, and now, in my great compassion, I bring thee home again. Hid I my face from thee, it was for a short while, till my anger should be spent; love that takes pity on thee shall be eternal, says the Lord, thy ransom. The days of Noe have come again; I swore to

'startle'. The end of this verse, in the Hebrew text, will equally well yield the sense, 'they shall see that of which they had no tidings, that which they had never heard shall be made known to them'. But the other sense, which is given by the Latin version, is clearly assumed by St Paul in Rom. 15. 21.

¹ Cf. Rom. 10. 16. ² 'Unregarded as' in the original, simply 'like', but this sense appears most probable, in view of what follows. The second part of the verse may also be interpreted as meaning, 'there is no stateliness, no majesty here to catch our eyes, no beauty to win our hearts'. ³ Literally, 'his face was as it were hidden'. In the Hebrew text, it is not clear whether the face of the Servant is hidden from the onlookers, or theirs (in disgust) from him. ⁴ Mt. 8. 17. ⁵ Literally, according to the Latin version, 'He has been offered up because he himself willed it'. The meaning of the Hebrew text seems to be rather, 'he has been cruelly treated, and all the while he abased himself'.

⁶ The beginning of this verse in the Hebrew text runs literally, 'He was taken away from the restraint and from judgement, and his generation—who will meditate?' The meaning usually given to the passage uses almost every word in a strange sense, and it seems probable that there has been a corruption in the text; cf. the Septuagint Greek version, quoted in Ac. 8. 33. ⁷ The Hebrew text here yields a more simple translation, 'He (God) gave him burial with the wicked, and with the rich (man) in his death'; but the bearing of the phrase is difficult to determine. The Latin can only be interpreted (on the lines of verse 3 above) as meaning that the Servant renounced all fellowship with the wicked and the rich in order to win himself a felon's grave. ⁸ Gal. 4. 27.

Noe that I would bring no more floods on the earth such as his; thou, too, hast my oath for it, I will be angry with thee no more, rebuke thee no more. Let the mountains be moved, the hills shake; my compassion towards thee stands immovable, my promise still unshaken, says the Lord, thy comforter.

11 Thou, the friendless, the storm-beaten, the inconsolable, shalt have a pavement of patterned stones, and thy foundations shall be of sapphire; thou shalt have turrets of jasper, and gates of carved gems, and all thy boundary stones shall be jewels. All thy children, then, shall be disciples of the Lord; thy children, blessed how abundantly with peace! Justice shall be thy sure foundation; far from thy thoughts be all oppression, now thou hast nothing to fear, all tumult of the mind,¹ when peril is none to threaten thee. Aliens that had no part with me shall come to thy side; strangers shall throw in their lot with thine.² See where the smith blows the coals at his forge, fashioning each weapon according to its use! Who but I made him? And who but I made the slayer that goes out to destroy? No weapon that is forged against thee shall go true; no voice that is raised to condemn thee, but thou shalt give it the lie. Such their lot shall be that are the Lord's servants; such protection shall they have of me, says the Lord.

55 So many athirst; who will not come to the water? So many destitute; who will come and get him food, get wine and milk free, no price to be paid? 2 What, always spending, and no bread to eat, always toiling, and never a full belly? Do but listen, here you shall find content; here are dainties shall ravish your hearts. 3 To my summons give heed and hearing; so your spirits shall revive; a fresh covenant awaits you, this time eternal; gracious promise of mine to David shall be ratified now.³ 4 Before all the world my witness thou, a prince and a ruler among the nations!⁴

¹ 'Tumult of the mind'; the word in the Hebrew text means either 'dismay' or 'ruin'; neither seems a very good parallel for the word 'oppression', and some have suspected corruption in the text. ² The Latin version, probably through misunderstanding a word that is three times repeated, differs widely here from the Hebrew text, whose meaning seems to be 'Let men strive against thee as they will, it is with no sanction of mine; whoever strives against thee shall fall because of thee (or perhaps, shall be compelled to fall in with thee)'. ³ Cf. Ps. 88. 35-38; Ac. 13. 34. ⁴ This is ordinarily assumed to refer to David, but the description is not very suitable, and it seems possible that the prophet, with one of his sudden transitions, has gone back to the Lord's Servant here. ⁵ The person mentioned in verse 4 is more probably the subject of this address, than the people of Israel.

Summons of thine shall go out to a nation thou never knewest; peoples that never heard of thee shall hasten to thy call; such the glory thy God, the Holy One of Israel, has bestowed on thee.⁵

To the Lord betake you, while he may yet be found; cry out, while he is close at hand to hear. Leave rebel his ill-doing, sinner his guilty thoughts, and come back to the Lord, sure of his mercy, our God, so rich in pardon. Not mine, the Lord says, to think as you think, deal as you deal; by the full height of heaven above earth, my dealings are higher than your dealings, my thoughts than your thoughts. Once fallen from the sky, does rain or snow return to it? Nay, it refreshes earth, soaking into it and making it fruitful, to provide the sower with fresh seed, the hungry mouths with bread. So it is with the word by these lips of mine once uttered; it will not come back, an empty echo, the way it went; all my will it carries out, speeds on its errand. Doubt not, then, yours shall be a happy departure, a peaceful return; doubt not mountain and hill shall escort you with their praises, and the woods echo their applause. Tall pine-trees shall grow where valerian grew, and myrtles spring from yonder nettle-beds; great glory the Lord shall win, such a blazon as eternity cannot efface.

56 Keep right order, the Lord says, faithful to your duty still; ere long I will send deliverance, my own faithfulness shall be revealed. Blessed, every man that so lives, every mother's son that by this rule holds fast, keeps the sabbath holy, and his own hands clear of mischief. Proselyte let him be, of alien birth, will the Lord deny him citizenship? Eunuch let him be, is he no better than a barren trunk, cut down as worthless? Nay, for yonder eunuch the Lord has this message: Who keeps my sabbath? Who makes my will his choice, true to my covenant? A place he shall have in this house, within these walls of mine a memorial; son nor daughter his name could so perpetuate; such a memorial I will grant him as time shall never efface.

6 And so it shall be with the alien born, will they but throw in their lot with the Lord's worshippers, that cherish the love of his name; the Lord's servants that keep the sabbath inviolate, and are true to his covenant. Free of the mountain that is my sanctuary, welcome guests in the house where men pray to me, not vainly to my altar they shall bring burnt-offering and sacrifice. Claimed my house shall be, for 8 a house of prayer, by all the nations.¹ Such promise the Lord God makes, that now brings home the exiled sons of Israel: I have others to bring, that must yet rally to thy side.

9 Come, all you wild things, all you beasts 10 of the forest, your prey awaits you! Here are none but blind watchmen, all un-awares; here are dumb dogs that cannot bark, false seers that lie sleeping, in love 11 with their dreams; shameless dogs that cannot tell when they are gorged with food. The very shepherds have forgotten their craft; see them go their ways, each busy, first and last, with gorging his own 12 appetite: Fetch we wine, and drink ourselves drunk! To-morrow shall be as to-day was, and braver, braver yet!²

57 Alas, that none takes warning! See how good men die, how the friends of God are borne away from us; and none has the wit to see trouble is coming, and the good must be spared the sight of it!³

2 Peace be his lot, easy let him rest, that followed ever the straight path.

3 But you, come and answer for yourselves, brood of the sorceress, children of the adulterer and the harlot! Over whom would you make merry, with open mouth and hanging tongue? What are you but the 5 sons of shame, a bastard race? You, that dally with idols under the first spreading tree, that sacrifice little children in the rock-caves among the glens?

Where the valleys part,⁴ there is thy part and lot; to those thou wilt pour out libations, wilt offer sacrifice; and must I look on unmoved? Thou hast set down thy bed on the peak of a high mountain; there thou hast gone up to offer victims. Keepsake of mine must be put behind the door, where the posts should hide it, now thou wouldst strip thee naked and let in a gallant in my place, make free with my marriage-bed!
With such as these thou didst exchange vows, greedily thou didst buy their good will. A king's favour to win,⁵ with ointments thou wouldst cover thee, wouldst spare no kind of perfume; on a far errand thy envoys went out, and ever thy pride was humbled, low as hell itself. So wearied with long journeying, and never didst thou cry, Enough; still obstinate, confess thy need thou wouldst not. Alas, what anxious fears were these, that to my service made thee false, of me no memory left thee, no thought? And all because I nothing said, made as if I nothing saw, till at last thou hadst forgotten me! Yet, wouldst thou have right, it is I that must declare it; thy own striving is all in vain. Let them deliver thee, if they can, at thy summons, these new allies thou hast made! See how they are carried away on the wind, how a breath will scatter them! His the prize, that in me has confidence; on my holy mountain he shall find a resting-place.
Hark, how the cry goes up, A road, there, a road; let them have free passage! These are my people; clear of every hindrance be their path!

A message from the high God, the great God, whose habitation is eternity, whose name is hallowed! He, dwelling in that high and holy place, dwells also among chastened and humbled souls, bidding the humble spirit, the chastened soul, rise and live! I will not be always claiming my due, I will not cherish my anger eternally; what

¹ Mt. 21. 13. ² The denunciations in verses 9-12 would be suitable to Babylon on the eve of its capture by the Persians (Dan. 5); but they are usually regarded as continuous with the succeeding chapter, which seems to be addressed to unworthy rulers of God's own people. ³ There is no agreement among scholars, what is the situation here alluded to. Some think the prophecies are made against the half-heathen remnant of Israelites which occupied Samaria when the Jews returned from exile; others would identify the 'good man' of verses 1 and 2 as king Ezechias, and apply what follows to the idolatry of Manasses.

⁴ Some would interpret the Hebrew text as meaning 'in the smooth stones of the valleys', which lends more force to the play upon words. ⁵ The king is identified by some with the god Moloch (whose name means 'king'); by others with the king of Assyria. From the context, some reference to foreign alliances seems probable.

soul but takes its origin from me? Am I not the maker of all that breathes?¹ 17 Greedy wrong-doer that defies me I must needs smite down; hide my face from him in anger, let him follow the path his own 18 erring will has chosen. Now to pity his plight, now to bring him remedy! Home-coming at last, consolation at last, for him 19 and all that bemoan him! The harvest of men's thanks, it is I that bring it to the birth.² Peace, the Lord says, peace to those who are far away, and to those who are near at hand; I have brought him 20 remedy. But rebellious hearts are like the tempestuous sea that can never find repose; its waters must ever be churning up mire and scum. For the rebellious, the 21 Lord says, there is no peace.

58 Cry aloud, never ceasing, raise thy voice like a trumpet-call, and tell my people of their transgressions, call the 2 sons of Jacob to account. Day after day they besiege me, arraign my dealings with them, a nation, you would think, ever dutiful, one that never swerved from the divine will. Proof they ask of my faithfulness, would fain bring a plea against their 3 God.³ Why hadst thou no eyes for it, say they, when we fasted; why didst thou pass by unheeding, when we humbled ourselves before thee?

Fasting, when you follow your own whim, distract upon all your debtors!
 4 Naught comes of it but law-suit and quarrelling; angry blows profane it. A better fast you must keep than of old, ere plea of 5 yours makes itself heard above. With such fasting, with a day's penance, should I be content? Is it enough that a man should bow down to earth, make his bed on sack-cloth and ashes? Think you, by such a 6 fasting-day, to win the Lord's favour? Nay, fast of mine is something other. The false claim learn to forgo, ease the insupportable burden, set free the over-driven; 7 away with every yoke that galls! Share thy bread with the hungry, give the poor and the vagrant a welcome to thy house; meet thou the naked, clothe him; from thy own flesh and blood turn not away. Then, sudden as the dawn, the welcome light shall 8 break on thee, in a moment thy health shall find a new spring; divine favour shall lead thee on thy journey, brightness of the Lord's presence close thy ranks behind. Then the Lord will listen to thee when thou callest on him; cry out, and he will answer, I am here at thy side.

Banish from thy midst oppression, and the finger pointed scornfully, and the plotting of harm, spend thyself giving food to the hungry, relieving the afflicted; then shall light spring up for thee in the darkness, and thy dusk shall be noonday; the 11 Lord will give thee rest⁴ continually, fill thy soul with comfort, thy body with ease.⁵ Not more secure the well-watered garden, the spring whose waters never fail. Re-built, in thy land, the immemorial ruins; restored, the foundations of long ago; this thy task shall be, to repair the broken walls, to reclaim the by-ways. Walk warily, keep 13 my sabbath unprofaned. Here is a day I have sanctified, not for thy self-pleasing; a precious thing the Lord has made holy and honourable; and wilt thou dishonour it? Wilt thou go thy own way, use it for thy own pleasure, while it away in gossip? Thou shalt yet have joy in the Lord; I will carry thee aloft, high above the high places of the land, satisfy thy longing for Jacob's patrimony; the Lord's lips have promised it.

59 Doubt you the Lord's hand can reach far as ever, to bring deliverance? Think you his ear has grown deaf, that you cry out in vain? Nay, sin of yours has come between you and your God; guilt of yours has estranged him that he denies you audience; the bloodstained hands, the itching fingers, lying lips, and tongues that whisper of treachery. Who 4 owns the claim of justice, who judges honourably? A lie their confidence, folly their watchword, they carry mischief in the

¹ The latter part of this verse, in the Hebrew text, is usually interpreted, 'for the (human) spirit would faint away, (and) the breathing souls which I have made'; but this rendering lacks the parallelism we should expect in Hebrew poetry. The Latin reads literally, 'a spirit shall go out from my face, and I will give breaths'; the interpretation offered above is that of St Jerome and other Fathers.

² Literally, 'I have created the fruit of the lips'; cf. Heb. 13. 15.
³ 'Bring a plea against', literally, 'approach', but the context shows that the verb is used in a legal sense, as in 57. 3 above and elsewhere.
⁴ The sense of the Hebrew text is, 'guide thee'.
⁵ Literally, 'he will fill thy soul with brightness and deliver thy bones'. But the Hebrew text means rather, 'he will satisfy thy desire in time of drought, and refresh thy bones', though the authority for this last verb is uncertain.

5 womb, bring shame to birth. Eggs the cockatrice may hatch, yet there is death in the taste of them, a brood of basilisks; 6 deftly the spider weaves, yet web of hers will never make cloth, none will be the warmer for her toil; so it is with these; all unprofitable their schemes, their doing all 7 undoing. Swift ministers of evil, hot-foot they scent down the blood of innocence,¹ their aim ever to destroy, leave a trail of 8 havoc and ruin. Where peace should be found they know not, nor ever set their hearts on right; still stray by crooked paths where safety is none.

9 What wonder if redress is still far from us, if reprieve linger on its way? Crave we light, and nothing see but darkness, hope 10 we for dawn, and walk in dusk. Blind men that grope along a wall, hands, not eyes, to shew the way, stumble we at noonday as though benighted; we are dead men in a 11 world of shadows. No better than growling bears, or doves that moan and mourn, still we hope for the redress that never comes, the deliverance that is far away.
12 Our guilt mounts up before thee, our sins accuse us; shame ever at our side, we con-13 fess the wrong done. Heinous our treason against the Lord, that turn away from his divine leading to plan cruelty and rebellion; false thoughts we conceive in our 14 hearts that still find utterance. Redress is withheld from us, because loyalty lies neglected in our streets, and honour finds no 15 entrance; alas that loyalty should be forgotten, innocence marked down for spoil!

All this the Lord has seen, and shame he 16 thought it there should be no redress. Was there no champion to come forward? None found he, and his heart misgave him. And so his own arm must bring the deliverance
he intended, his own faithfulness held him 17 to it.² That faithfulness is the breastplate that arms him, that saving power the helmet that guards his head; vengeance the garment he wears, jealous love the mantle 18 that wraps him round.³ Doubt not he will repay, wreak his anger upon the rebels,

give his enemies their due; no island so far off but it shall have its punishment, till the 19 name of the Lord strikes terror into western lands, and the east stands in awe of his fame. Here is a river coming upon them in full flood, driven on by the Lord's breath; here is one that brings deliverance 20 to Sion, and to all Jacob's children that turn away from their sins; the Lord has promised it. This covenant I will make 21 with them, the Lord says: Spirit of mine that dwells in thee, words of mine entrusted to thy lips, on thy lips shall dwell, on the lips of thy children and thy children's children, henceforth and for ever.

60 Rise up, Jerusalem, and shine forth; thy dawn has come, breaks the glory of the Lord upon thee! What 2 though darkness envelop the earth, though all the nations lie in gloom? Upon thee the Lord shall dawn, over thee his splendour shall be revealed. Those rays of thine shall 3 light the Gentiles on their path; kings shall walk in the splendour of thy sunrise. Lift 4 up thy eyes and look about thee; who are these that come flocking to thee? Sons of thine, daughters of thine, come from far away, or rising up close at hand.⁴ Heart of 5 thee shall overflow with wonder and gratitude, to see all the riches of ocean, all the treasure of the Gentiles pouring into thee!
A stream of camels thronging about thee, 6 dromedaries from Madian and Epha, bringing all the men of Saba⁵ with their gifts of gold and incense, their cry of praise to the Lord! Into thee all the herds of 7 Cedar shall be driven, the rams of Na-baioth shall be thy victims; gifts at my altar accepted, to make the fame of my temple more famous yet. Who are these 8 that come, swift as the cloud-wrack, as doves flying home to the dove-cot? These, 9 too, are thy sons; long since, the islands and the ocean-going ships have awaited my signal, when I would bring them home from far away, their silver and their gold with them, for the honour of the Lord thy

¹ Rom. 3. 15. ² The second part of this verse reads literally, 'His own arm delivered him, and his own justice strengthened him'. The notion is that of Almighty God interfering in person to help men because they cannot help themselves; cf. 63. 5 below (where, however, 'indignation' takes the place of 'justice'). ³ Eph. 6. 14, 17; I Thess. 5. 8. ⁴ The second part of this verse reads literally,

'Thy sons shall come from far, and thy daughters shall arise from the side'; it seems clear that St Jerome wrote, not 'arise', but 'suck', agreeing substantially with the Hebrew text, which has 'and thy daughters shall be carried at the side'. But this makes a weak parallel, and it is hard to see why infant daughters should come into the picture; it is possible that there was a corruption in the text. ⁵ 'All the men of Saba'; in the Hebrew text, 'All of them (i.e. the riders on the camels) from Saba'.

God, the Holy One of Israel, that has bestowed this glory on thee.

- 10 Strangers shall build up thy walls for thee, kings shall do thee service; great as my severity in chastising thee shall be my favour when I pardon thee. Thy gates shall stand open continually, no need to shut them day or night;¹ make way for the wealth of the nations that shall flow into thee, for the kings with their escorts!
- 12 Every nation and kingdom that refuses thee homage shall vanish away, whole provinces empty and forlorn. All the beauty of Lebanon shall be brought to thee, fir-wood and box-wood and pine-wood mingled together to adorn this place, my sanctuary; I will have honour paid to this,
- 14 the resting-place of my feet. See how they come bending low before thee, the race of thy former oppressors, how the men that once despised thee worship the ground thou hast trodden, calling thee The City of the Lord, Zion, dear to the Holy One of Israel! Thou, the desolate, thou, the unbefriended, a place unvisited by man, shalt be the pride of ages, the joy of succeeding generations; thou shalt have nations to suckle thee, kings to foster thee, and acknowledge at last that I, the Lord, am thy deliverer, the Lord that rules in Jacob has paid thy ransom.
- 17 I will exchange thy brass for gold, thy iron for silver, thy wood for brass, thy stone for iron; I will give thee peace itself to be thy government, justice itself to be thy magistracy; there shall be no more talk of wrong in that land of thine, no tidings of wreck and ruin within those frontiers; all thy walls shall be deliverance, and all thy gates renown. No longer wilt thou have the sun to shine by day, or the moon's beam to enlighten thee; the Lord shall be thy everlasting light, thy God shall be all thy splendour.² No more, for thee, the setting of suns, the waning of moons, now that the Lord is thy everlasting light, and the days of thy widowhood are over. Thy people, all guiltless now, shall inherit the land eternally, the flower I planted, the pride of my workmanship. The meanest of them shall be ancestor to a thousand, the least regarded, to a great nation; swift and sudden shall be the doing of it, when once the hour is come.

61 The Lord has anointed me, on me his spirit has fallen; he has sent me to bring good news to men that are humbled, to heal broken hearts, promising the release of captives, the opening of prison doors, proclaiming the year of the Lord's pardon, the day when he, our God, will give us redress. Comfort for every mourner; Zion's mourners, what decree should I make for them, what gift offer them? Heads shall be garlanded, that once were strewn with ashes; bright with oil, the faces that were marred with grief; gaily they shall be clad, that went sorrowing. Sturdy growths (men will say) that fulfil hope reposed in them,³ pride of the Lord's planting! Theirs to rebuild what long has lain desolate, repair the ruins of past days, restore the forsaken cities that were lost, we thought, for ever.

Strangers they shall be that tend your flocks for you, farm and vineyard alien hands shall till; for you, a higher name, a greater calling, priests and chosen ministers of the Lord our God. All the wealth of the nations shall be yours to enjoy, their spoils shall be your boast; for double portion of shame and contempt, you shall be twice honoured now. Twice happy that home-coming, eternal that content;⁴ I am the Lord, that love to give each his due, resent the wrong, when men rob me of my sacrifice. Faithfully I will give them their recompense, bind myself, now, by an eternal covenant. Such a race shall spring from them, as all the nations of the world shall acknowledge; none that sees them but shall know them for a people the Lord has blessed.

Well may I rejoice in the Lord, well may this heart triumph in my God. The deliverance he sends is like a garment that wraps me about, his mercy like a cloak enfolding me; no bridegroom so proud of garland that crowns him, no bride of the necklace she wears. See how yonder earth gives promise of spring, how the garden

¹ Apoc. 21. 25.

² Apoc. 21, 23; 22. 5.

³ 'Sturdy growths that fulfil hope reposed in them'; or possibly, 'that tell of protecting care'. It is not easy to be certain whether the word 'justice' in the original implies, here, faithfulness on the part of man or faithfulness on the part of God.

⁴ The interpretation of this verse is obscure, whether in the Hebrew text or in the Latin.

seeds give promise of flower! And the Lord God will make good his promise for all the world to see; a spring-time of deliverance and renew.

labour, the achievement of his task!¹ A holy people they shall be called, of the Lord's ransoming, and thou the city of his choice, no more forsaken.

62 For love of Sion I will no more be silent, for love of Jerusalem I will never rest, until he, the Just One, is revealed to her like the dawn, until he, her deliverer, shines out like a flame. All the nations, all the kings of the nations, shall see him, the just, the glorious¹, and a new name shall be given thee by the Lord's own lips. The Lord upholds thee, his crown, his pride; thy God upholds thee, his royal diadem. No longer shall men call thee Forsaken, or thy land Desolate; thou shalt be called My Beloved, and thy land a Home, now the Lord takes delight in thee, now thy land is populous once again.² Gladly as a man takes home the maiden of his choice, thy sons shall come home to thee; gladly the Lord shall greet thee, as bridegroom his bride.

I have set watchmen, Jerusalem, upon thy walls, that shall never cease crying aloud, day or night; you that keep the Lord in remembrance,³ take no rest, nor let him rest neither, till he has restored Jerusalem, spread her fame over all the earth. The Lord has sworn by his own right hand, by that arm which makes known his power: Never again shall thy enemies eat the harvest of thy corn-fields, alien folk drink the wine thou hast toiled to win; harvester and waggoner, here in my precincts, shall eat and drink together, praising the Lord.

Out, out through the city gates! Give my people free passage; a road, there, a smooth road, away with the boulders on it! Raise a signal for all the nations to see. To the furthest corners of the earth the Lord proclaims it, A message to queen Sion: Look, where thy deliverer comes, look, how they come with him, the reward of his 63 Who is this, coming from Edom, coming on the road from Bosra, with garments deep-dyed? Who is this, so gaily clad, marching so valiantly?

I am one who is faithful to his promises, a champion bringing deliverance.⁵

And why are thy garments stained with red? Why dost thou go clad like the men who tread out the wine-press?

None other has trodden the wine-press but I only; out of all the nations, no champion can to stand at my side. I have been treading them down in my anger, trampling on them, full of vengeance; their blood has been sprinkled on the clothes about me; I come in garments deep-dyed. My heart told me the time had come for vengeance, this was my destined year of ransom; looked I all around, there was none to help me; vainly I called for aid. My own arm should bring the deliverance I intended; my own indignation uphold me.⁶ I have trampled the peoples down in my anger, stunned them⁷ with my fury, brought down their strength to the dust.

Listen, while I tell again the story of the Lord's mercies, what renown the Lord has won; all the Lord has done for us, all the wealth of blessings his pardoning love, his abounding pity has lavished on the race of Israel. They are my own people, he would say; my own children cannot be false to me; and with that, he delivered them. In all their straits, power of his was not straitened;⁸ his angel, token of his presence, brought them deliverance. In love and pity he ransomed them, lifted them in his arms and raised them up, all through the days gone by. Only when they rebelled against him, when they distressed the spirit of his chosen servant,⁹ he would turn their ¹ Instead of 'Just One', 'the just' and 'the glorious', the Hebrew text has 'justice' (i.e. redress, restoration), 'deliverance' and 'glory'.

² In the Hebrew text, the land is to be called not 'a Home', but 'a Wife', and it is to be 'espoused', not 'populous', once again.

³ 'Keep the Lord in remembrance'; that is, according to the Latin version, remember him; according to the Hebrew text, remind him (of his promises).

⁴ See note on 40. 10 above.

⁵ The speaker here is probably the Lord himself; cf. 59. 16.

⁶ Cf. 59. 16, note.

⁷ 'Stunned them'; literally, 'made them drunk'. Some Hebrew MSS read 'broke them in pieces'.

⁸ There is a doubt, here, in the Hebrew text, whether we should read 'he was not afflicted (constrained)' or 'he was afflicted'.

⁹ 'The spirit of his chosen servant'; literally, 'of his holy one', which may refer to Moses in verse 11, to other national heroes in this verse. But the Hebrew text has 'the spirit of his holiness', which in Hebrew idiom is nearly equivalent to 'his holy spirit'; and this is the translation given by the Septuagint Greek (cf. Eph. 4. 30).

11 enemy, and fight against them. And even yet he would bethink him of times past, of Moses and the people that once was his.

Where is he now, the God that led them through the sea, his flock with his own appointed shepherds; gave his holy spirit to the man of his choice?¹ Majestic power, that led Moses by the hand; that parted the sea at their coming, to win his name renown. Through its waters they passed, sure of their foothold as horse that is led through the desert; carefully as driver on some treacherous hill-side, the Lord's spirit guided his people. Thus didst thou bring them home, and win thyself honour. 15 Bethink thee now, in heaven; look down from the palace where thou dwellest, holy and glorious. Where, now, is thy jealous love, where thy warrior's strength? Where is thy yearning of heart, thy compassion? For me, compassion is none.

16 Yet, who is our father, Lord, if not thou? Let Abraham disown us, Israel disclaim his own blood, we are thy sons still; is it not thy boast of old, thou hast paid a price for us? And now, Lord, wouldst thou drive us away from following thee, harden our hearts till worship we have none to give thee? For love of thy own servants, relent, for love of the land that by right is thine. 18 Is it nothing to thee, enemies of thy holy people should have the mastery, trample thy sanctuary down? Fared we worse in old days, before ever we called thee King, ever took thy holy name for our watchword?

doing, we ourselves cannot bear the sight; so it was when thou earnest down, and the hills shrank away before thee, long ago.¹

Such things as were never known from the beginning, as ear never heard, eye never saw, save at thy command, thou, O God, hast made ready for all that await thy aid. Graciously thou goest out to meet them, loyal lovers of thine that keep thee ever in mind, ever follow thy bidding.³

And now thou art angry with us; we have sinned; so it has been a long while, and shall we find deliverance? We are men defiled; what are all our claims on thy mercy? No better than the clout a woman casts away; we are like fallen leaves, every one of us, by the wind of our own transgressions whirled along. There is none left that calls on thy name, that bestirs himself to lay hold of thee. Thou hidest thy face from us, broken men caught in the grip of their wrong-doing. Yet, Lord, thou art our father; we are but clay, and thou the craftsman who has fashioned us; wilt thou crush us, Lord, with thy anger, wilt thou keep our sins ever in mind? We are thy people, all of us. A desert, the city thy chosen servant knew, a desert, the Sion we love; Jerusalem lies forlorn. Given over to the flames, the house that was our sanctuary and our pride, the house in which our fathers praised thee; all that we loved lies in ruins; Lord, wilt thou have patience still? Wilt thou keep silent still, and overwhelm us with calamity?

64 Wouldst thou but part heaven asunder, and come down, the hills shrinking from thy presence, melting away as if burnt by fire; the waters, too, boiling with that fire! So should the fame of thee go abroad among thy enemies; a world should tremble at thy presence! Of thy marvellous

65 So ready I to answer, and ask they will not; so easy to be found, and search for me is none! A people that will not call on my name; else my own voice should whisper, I am here, I am close at hand.⁴ Outstretched these hands of mine, all the day long, to a nation of rebels, stray-

¹ The second half of this verse is usually joined to the first, as if it were the thought in the mind of the person there mentioned. But, if so, we must understand 'Israel' as the subject of 'bethought himself', which is a very abrupt transition.

² The Hebrew text can be translated so as to make this verse part of the wish contained in verses 1 and 2; 'Oh that thou wouldst do marvellous things such as we do not expect, while the hills shrank away before thee'. But the verb does not mean 'expect'; it means 'hope for'. The use of the perfect tense, 'thou didst come down', in the Latin is difficult to account for, unless we suppose it to be a reference to mount Sinai (Ex. 20. 18, 19), suggested by the historical reminiscences of the foregoing chapter.

³ The meaning of verses 4 and 5 is obscure. The Hebrew text of verse 4 is usually taken to mean, 'No one has ever seen or heard of a God, other than thee, that acts on behalf of those who wait for him (literally, for thee)'. But the construction is awkward, and the passage was early taken in the sense which the Latin gives it; cf. I Cor. 2. 9. It seems likely there has been some corruption in the text. The end of verse 5 is very abrupt if we translate it as a statement, 'and we shall be delivered'.

⁴ This verse may be interpreted in either of two ways: (i) that the Lord offers mercy to the Gentiles, although they have not asked for it, or (ii) that he offers mercy to the Jews, and yet they do not accept it. The latter sense is probably foremost in the author's mind; St Paul gives the opposite side of the picture (Rom. 10. 20, 21).

ing this way and that as the mood takes 3 them, openly defying me. Shrines hidden 4 away in gardens, altars of brick! See how they lodge in tombs, pass the night in the precincts of strange gods;¹ eat swine's 5 flesh, and stew themselves broth of for-bidden things! And all the while so scrupulous: Touch of thine would defile me!
 What marvel, if my indignation smoulders yet? Nay, fire it is that burns continually.
 6 See where the decree stands written in my presence, This shall not be passed over;
 I will take vengeance, pour it out into their 7 laps. Sin of yours, the Lord says, sin of your fathers, that sacrificed on mountaintops, worshipped on the hill-sides in defiance of me; for all these I must repay due measure, poured out into the lap; that is my first task.

8 Thus says the Lord: If one sound grape is found in a cluster, the cry is, Do not destroy it, there is a blessing in it. And I, for the sake of my true servants, will not 9 destroy root and branch; I will leave Jacob a stock to breed from, settlers enough in Judah for these mountains of mine; the men of my choice shall have their portion, my 10 servant shall dwell there. Flocks there shall be, folded on the Plain,² and cattle resting in the valley of Achor; of my people none shall be disappointed that had re-11 course to me. But you that forsook the Lord, left his mountain sanctuary forgotten, 12 Fortune, and poured out wine at it,³ fortune that awaits you is the sword, you shall bow down to death. My call unanswered, my voice unheard, you did ever what I 13 forbade, chose ever what I hated. This, then, is the sentence the Lord God pronounces;
 you shall be hungry, while my servants have food, you shall be thirsty, 14 while my servants drink, you shall be disappointed, while my servants are glad. My servants shall be light-hearted and sing, while you, with sad hearts, cry aloud, groan 15 in the heaviness of your spirits. A name you shall leave behind you to serve my chosen people as a curse; the Lord God takes full toll. For his own servants he will have a new name instead; By the God of 16 truth shall be the blessing men invoke, By the God of truth shall be the oath men take, in this land of mine henceforward.⁴ Forgotten, the sorrows of past days, hidden away from my eyes.

See where I create new heavens and a 17 new earth; old things shall be remembered no longer, have no place in men's thoughts.
 Joy of yours, pride of yours, this new 18 creation shall be; joy of mine, pride of mine, Jerusalem and her folk, created anew. I will rejoice in Jerusalem, take 19 pride in my people, and the sound of weeping and lament shall be heard among them no more. None shall die there unweaned 20 from life; never an old man but lives out his full time; young he dies that dies a hundred years old; so brief a span, it shall be the curse pronounced on a sinner.⁵ Live 21 they now to occupy the houses they built, enjoy the fruit of the vines they planted,
 that once built houses for others to occupy, 22 planted what others should enjoy; my people shall live to the age of trees and see the work of their own hands wear out before them. Not in vain they shall toil, 23 these, my chosen, nor beget children to see them overwhelmed by calamity; their race the Lord blesses, their children shall be 24 spared to them. Answer shall come ere cry for help is uttered, prayer find audience while it is yet on their lips. Wolf and lamb 25 shall feed together, lion and ox eat straw side by side, and the serpent be content with dust for its food; all over this mountain, my sanctuary, there shall be no hurt done, the Lord says, no life shall be forfeit.

66 Thus says the Lord, Heaven is my throne, earth the footstool under my feet. What home will you build for me, what place can be my resting-place?⁶ Nothing you see about you but I fashioned

¹ It was one of the heathen methods of divination to sleep in some reputedly holy place and expect inspiration to be given by dreams. ² The Plain, that is, Saron. ³ In the Hebrew text, 'poured out wine to Destiny'.

⁴ The name of Israel will be used as a curse, cf. the formula in Jer. 29. 22. (Some think the words which follow, literally 'And the Lord shall slay thee', are meant as an abbreviation for some such formula as 'May the Lord slay thee as he slew Israel'.) The faithful remnant will be given a different name instead of Israel, and God himself will no longer be invoked under the familiar name, 'the God of Jacob', but as 'the God of truth' instead. The name, with its painful associations, must be forgotten. ⁵ Literally, 'There shall not be there (in the Hebrew text, from there) an unweaned child of days (or years), or an old man who does not fill up his span of life; for a young man of a hundred years shall die, and a sinner of a hundred years shall be cursed'.

⁶ Ac. 7. 49.

it, the Lord says; my hand gave it being. From whom, then, shall I accept an offering?¹ Patient he must be and humbled, one who stands in dread of my warnings. To the rest it is all one; slaughter they an ox, or murder a human victim,² cut sheep's throat, or dash out a dog's brains, make offering of meal, or of swine's blood, in my honour burn incense, or bless the name of a false god. In all this, it is but caprice guides their choice, in all manner of abominations; trust me, at my own caprice I will choose the terrors I bring down upon them.³ My call unanswered, my voice unheard, they did ever what I forbade, chose ever what I hated.

Listen to the word of the Lord, you that hold it in reverence! Foiled their hopes shall be, that hate and shun you because my name you bear; that say, Come, let us see the Lord reveal himself in majesty, let us witness this triumph of yours! Hark, a stir of tumult in the city, a stir in the temple! It is the stir the Lord makes, as he brings retribution on his enemies! Without travail, the mother has given birth; before her time a mother of men. Never till now was such a tale heard, such a sight witnessed; should a nation's pangs come upon it in a day, a whole people be born at once? Such are the pangs of Sion, such is the birth of her children. What, says the Lord thy God, shall I, that bring children to the birth, want power to bring them forth? Shall I, that give life to the womb, want strength to open it? Lovers of Jerusalem, rejoice with her, be glad for her sake; make holiday with her, you that mourned for her till now. So shall you be her foster-children, suckled plentifully with her consolations, drinking in, to your hearts' content, the abundant glory that is hers. Thus says the Lord, Peace shall flow through her like a river, the wealth of the nations shall pour into her like a torrent in flood; this shall be the milk you drain, like children carried at the breast, fondled on a mother's lap. I will console you then, like a mother caressing her son, and all your consolation shall be in Jerusalem; your eyes feasted with it, your hearts content, vigorous as the fresh grass your whole frame.

Thus to his servants the Lord makes known his power; his enemies shall have no quarter given them. See, where the Lord comes with fire about him, with chariots that drive like the storm, angry his retribution, his vengeance like a scorching flame! Fire and sword shall be the world's purging, till the Lord has taken full toll. Vainly they sought holiness, that would purify themselves in secret gardens, behind shut doors, and all the while ate flesh of swine and field-mouse and other meats abominable; one end there shall be for all of them, the Lord says.⁴

Trust me, I will hold assize upon all such deeds and devices of theirs; ay, upon all nations and races. All must come and see my glory revealed, and I will set a mark upon each of them. What of those that find deliverance? I have an errand for them, to be my messengers across the sea; to Africa, and to Lydia where men draw the bow, to Italy, and to Greece, and to the Islands far away.⁵ They shall go out where men never heard of my name, never saw my glory yet, to reveal that glory among the nations. And out of all nations they shall bring your brethren back, an offering to the Lord, with horse and chariot, with litter and mule and waggon, to Jerusalem, the Lord says, to this mountain, my sanctuary. A bloodless offering this, for the sons of Israel to bring, in its sanctified vessel, to the Lord's house! And some among these newcomers, the Lord says, I will choose out to be priests and Levites.

This, too, he promises: Enduring your race and name shall be as the new heavens, the new earth I fashion, to stand continually in my presence. Month after month, sabbath after sabbath shall go by, and still all mankind shall come to bow down before me, the Lord says. And ever as they leave the gates, mortal remains they shall see of the men that rebelled against me long since; a prey now, to worm undying, to fire unquenchable;⁶ none that sees it but shall turn with loathing from the sight.

¹ 'From whom shall I accept an offering?'; literally, 'to whom shall I have regard?' cf. Gen. 4. 4. ² Literally, 'he who slays an ox (is as) he who murders a man', etc. ³ 'At my own caprice I will choose the terrors'; literally, 'I will choose the wanton outrages and the terrors'. ⁴ The Hebrew text of verses 17 and 18, which differs from the Latin version, is probably corrupt, and has called forth a variety of interpretations. ⁵ The geographical identifications found in the Latin text are by no means certain. ⁶ Mk. 9. 48.

THE PROPHECY OF JEREMIAS

THESE are the words of Jeremias, son of Helcias, one of the priests who dwelt at Anathoth, in the lands of Benjamin. The word of the Lord came to him during the reign of Josias, son of Amon, over Juda, in the thirteenth year of it; came to him during the reign of Josias' son, Joachim, and did not cease till the men of Jerusalem went into exile, when Sedecias, that was also son to Josias, had been reigning eleven years and five months.

The word of the Lord came to me, and his message was: I claimed thee for my own before ever I fashioned thee in thy mother's womb; before ever thou camest to the birth, I set thee apart for myself; I have a prophet's errand for thee among the nations. Alas, alas, Lord God (said I), I am but a child that has never learned to speak. A child, sayest thou? the Lord answered. Nay, I have a mission for thee to undertake, a message to entrust to thee.

Have no human fears; am I not at thy side, to protect thee from harm? the Lord says. And with that, the Lord put out his hand, and touched me on the mouth; See, he told me, I have inspired thy lips with utterance. Here and now I give thee authority over nations and kingdoms everywhere; with a word thou shalt root them up and pull them down, overthrow and lay them in ruins; with a word thou shalt build them up and plant them anew.

Then the Lord's word came to me, Tell me, Jeremias, what is this thou seest? A branch of a tree, I told him, with the eyes already open.¹ Well seen, he answered; and I too have my eyes open, watching for the opportunity to carry out the threats I utter. And again it came, Tell me, what is this thou seest? A boiling caldron, said I, that is coming from the north. And it is from the north, the Lord told me, that calamity is brewing for all thy fellow-countrymen. All the tribes the northern kings rule I mean to muster, the Lord says; hither they will march, and each will set up his throne where gate of Jerusalem stands, or encircling wall, or fortified city of Juda. And there I will plead my cause against the men of Juda, charging them with their rebellion in forsaking me; in offering libation to gods not theirs, and worshipping idols of their own making.

Up, then, gird thee like a man, and speak out all the message I give thee. Meet them undaunted, and they shall have no power to daunt thee. Strong I mean to make thee this day as fortified city, or pillar of iron, or wall of bronze, to meet king, prince, priest of Juda, and common folk all the country through; impregnable thou shalt be to their attack; am I not at thy side, the Lord says, to deliver thee?

Then the Lord's word came to me: Go and cry out so that all Jerusalem may hear, with this message from the Lord: What memories I have of thee, gracious memories of thy youth, of the love that plighted troth between us, when I led thee through the desert; alone in the barren wastes, thou and I! Israel was set apart for the Lord, first-fruits vowed to be his revenue; he lay under a ban that plucked them, and must rue his rashness, the Lord says.

Listen, then, to the Lord's word, men of Jacob; listen, every clan that bears the name of Israel, to the Lord's message: What fault did they find in me, those fathers of yours, that they should keep their distance from me, and court false gods, false as themselves? And never a thought to ask where I, the Lord, was, that rescued them from Egypt, and led them on their way through the desert, wild and solitary, parched and dead, far from haunt

¹ 'Eyes'; that is, buds. In the Hebrew text, there is a play upon the similarity of the word 'to watch' and the word 'almond-tree', which is derived from it. This is perhaps because the almond is the first tree to awake from its winter sleep.

7 of traveller and the homes of men! Into a land of plenty I brought you, to enjoy the fruits and the blessings of it; and you had no sooner entered it than you must needs defile it, my own land, turn my chosen 8 home into a place abominable. Never a priest to ask where I, the Lord, was; never a man of law but made a stranger of me, never a ruler but played me false, never a prophet but took Baal for his oracle, and had recourse to powers that were im-9 potent. Against you, the Lord says, my appeal still lies, and with your children I will yet be at issue.

10 Sail the seas till you reach the isles of Cethim; send envoys out to the wilds of Cedar; look for yourselves and make earnest enquiry, to know if the like was 11 ever heard! What nation ever changed its gods, though gods indeed they were not? And should my people barter away the glory that dwelt among them, for 12 powers that power have none? In horror and dismay witness, ye heavens, the 13 sight; crumble in ruins!¹ Two wrongs this people of mine committed; me they forsook, the fountain of living water, and thereupon they dug cisterns of their own, leaking cisterns, that water had none to give them.

14 What, is the race of Israel a slave, a chattel, that it should pass from hand to 15 hand as the prize of war? Roaring lions have claimed it for their prey; the land lies waste, the cities burnt and desolate. Even the Egyptians have come from Memphis 16 and Taphne, to strip thee bare; tell me, Israel, how came this? Was it not because thou hadst forsaken the Lord thy God, that till then had led thee?²

18 What, wouldst thou turn to Egypt, to Assyria, and slake thy thirst with Nile or 19 Euphrates?³ Here is the very proof of thy wickedness, the measure of thy unfaithfulness; see how ill it has gone with thee, says the Lord, the God of hosts, ever since thou didst forsake the Lord thy God, ever since thou didst banish the fear of me! It is an old tale, now, how thou didst break in pieces the yoke of my dominion, didst sever all the bonds between us, crying out, I will serve no more! Thou wast off to play the wanton, the nearest hill-top or secret forest for thy bower. Alas, vineyard of mine, that I planted with such care, never a worthless shoot! How is it thou hast played me false, and art no vineyard of mine?

Ay, use nitre for thy cleansing, spread potash as thou mayst, foul with guilt I shall still find thee, says the Lord God. Nay, never boast that thou art undefiled, to countryside gods hast no recourse; be-think thee of thy traffickings in Ben-Ennom valley, and read there the story of thy doings. Camel never found its way so lightly; wild ass in its familiar desert, scenting its mate, never obeyed the fire in its blood more uncontrollably! Little search it needs to find thy haunts, as its mate in spring-time.⁴ Reckless of unshod feet, of parching throat, thou criest out despairingly, Return I cannot; to alien gods ρ ll my heart is vowed, and I must follow still!

Thief caught in the act has less cause to blush than the men of Israel, king and prince, priest and prophet, with the rest. Stock of wood and block of stone they hailed as the father that had begotten them; on me they turned their backs, and gave me never a glance. And now, in their distress, it is Up, Lord, and bring us rescue! Where are those other gods thou madest for thyself? Bid them rise up and aid thee in the hour of peril; gods thou hadst a many; no city of thine, Juda, but must have its own! And would you still implead me? Nay, says the Lord, you have forsaken me, one and all. In vain I have smitten them, all those sons of yours; still you turned your swords against the prophets, bloodthirsty as lions.

Out upon this age! Here is the Lord's

¹ There is some doubt whether the text of this verse has been rightly preserved; the meaning of the Hebrew text is given above, since the Latin has an improbable sentence: 'Be dismayed, ye heavens, over this, and crumble in ruins, ye gates of it'.

² vv. 14-17. Some think these verses have been misplaced. If they refer to the times of Josias, they must be understood as addressed, not to the kingdom of Juda, but to that Northern country which, since the Ten Tribes went into exile, had been debatable ground between the empires of Assyria and Egypt.

³ This verse is addressed to Juda, and refers to attempts made at the time to secure foreign alliances; cf. verse 36 below. For 'Nile' the Latin version gives 'turbid water', translating instead of transliterating.

⁴ The last part of the verse is not easy to interpret. It runs, literally, 'Those who look for her will have no laborious search; they will find her in her month (according to the Latin, her monthly times)'.

message, give good heed to it. Have I shewn myself unfriendly to Israel, like a desert, like a land overcast by shadows, that my own people has resolved to keep its distance, and come my way no more?

32 What, should maid forget her jewels, bribe her stomacher? And my own people, all these long days, has forgotten me!
 33 What avails it to justify myself, in hope of winning back my love, when thou thyself dost blazon so openly thy doings, thy foul misdoings? There is blood on thy hands, the blood of friendless folk and innocent. It is not thieves I have found, but men guilty of such crimes as these.¹ And still thou declarest thyself innocent of any fault, still thou biddest me withhold my vengeance! Come, let me answer thy plea of innocence.

36 How light a woman thou art, ever at thy old ways! Not less than thy hopes of Assyria, thy hopes of Egypt shall be disappointed; thence, too, thou shalt come away wringing thy hands; all the confidence thou hast the Lord means to destroy; thou shalt make no shift with Egypt.

3 What is the law of common life? Let wife that has been put away by her husband marry a second, can she afterwards return to the first? That were shame and defilement.² And thou with many lovers hast played the wanton; yet come back to me, the Lord says, and thou shalt find welcome. Lift up thy eyes to the bare hills, and tell me, which of them has not been the scene of thy shame? Like a highway robber thou didst lurk by the roadside, waiting for thy lovers; by thy heartless wantonness the whole land was defiled.
 3 I called thee to account for it; heaven's dews were stanch'd, and the late rains did not fall, and still never a blush on thy harlot's brow! Little wonder thou shouldst have been crying out to me, since then, calling me father, calling me the loved friend of thy girlhood's days; was there no quenching my anger? Would it smoulder on for ever? Ay, all this thou saidst, but still wouldst go on sinning, still wouldst have thy way.

It was in the days of king Josias the Lord said to me: Israel's apostasy thou hast seen, how she ever betook herself to the nearest high hill or leafy wood, to play the wanton there; and how, when I called her back to me in spite of it, she would not come. Now mark the treachery of her sister Juda. She too had seen it all, how I had bidden apostate Israel begone, and given her a writ of separation; and now treacherous Juda, unabashed, went off in her turn to play the wanton. So wayward, so wanton, she defiled all that land of hers, giving herself to lovers made of wood and stone! After all the warnings I had given, Juda, the treacherous, would never come back to me in good earnest, only with lying professions, the Lord says.

And the Lord told me: Better than Juda's treachery, the apostasy of Israel deserves to be acquitted. Carry this message of mine to the north country: Come back to me, apostate Israel, the Lord says, and there shall be no frown of mine awaiting you; I am merciful, the Lord says, and vengeance shall not last for ever. Only acknowledge thy fault, he tells thee, in deserting the Lord thy God and be-taking thyself to the bowers of strange lovers, deaf to my call. Wandering hearts, the Lord bids you come back to him, and renew your troth; by ones and twos, from this city or that, from this clan or that, he will claim you for his own and bring you back to Zion; and you shall have shepherds of his own choice to guide you well and prudently. After that, the Lord says, when all is growth and fertility, no longer shall you have the Ark of the Lord's Covenant for your rallying-cry; from thought and memory it will have passed away, nor any care shall be bestowed on the fashioning of it. It is Jerusalem men will speak of as the Lord's throne; there at Jerusalem all the nations of the world will meet in the Lord's name, the false aims of their

¹ vs. 33, 34. There is probably corruption in the text. In the Latin version it reads literally: 'Why dost thou strive to shew that thy way is good, in order to seek love, who moreover hast taught thy wickedness thy ways; and the blood of poor and innocent souls is found on thy wings? I have not found them in ditches, but over all the things which I have mentioned above'. In the Hebrew text, 'wings' means 'skirts'; and the word translated 'ditches' means housebreaking (Ex. 22. 1). The translation given assumes a reference to verse 26 above. ² To the woman herself, according to the Latin version; to the whole country, according to the Hebrew text (cf. Deut. 24. 4).

18 perverse hearts forgotten. When that time comes, Juda and Israel will be united; together they will come back from the north country to the land I gave your fathers for their home.

19 Must I ever be offering thee sonship, and a land so fair that all the peoples of the world might envy thee its possession? Must I ever be pleading with thee to acknowledge me as thy father, and forsake my guidance no more? Hitherto, the Lord 20 says, nothing could I win from Israel but a false jade's contempt. Now, from yonder hill-passes, another cry is heard; a cry of mourning and lament from the sons of Israel, over the wrong path they have chosen in forgetting the Lord their God.
21 Wandering hearts, come back to me, and all your rebel acts shall be pardoned.

22 See, we come to thee; art thou not the Lord our God? The many gods of hill-side and mountain-side have played us false; we know it now; we know now that Israel must look to the Lord our God for deliverance. Ever since the days of our youth all the hopes our fathers had, of flock and herd, of son and daughter, are lost; the 23 worship of shame has cheated us.¹ Lie down with shame for our bed, and let reproach be all our covering; sinners from our youth upwards, and we our fathers before us, against the Lord our God; the Lord our God, and we would not listen to his voice!

4 Do but retrace thy steps, Israel, and return to me, do but cast away the abominations that offend my sight, and in 2 that mind persist; let but thy oath, As the Lord is a living God! be a true oath, in loyal duty uttered; then shall all the nations learn to bless and to praise him.

3 And to the men of Juda, to Jerusalem, this is the Lord's message: Yours to drive a new furrow, nor sow any longer among 4 the briers. You must be circumcised afresh, men of Juda; citizens of Jerusalem, of heart's defilement rid yourselves, if you would not see my vengeance burst into flame unquenchable, as your scheming malice has deserved.

News for Juda, news that shall echo through Jerusalem; tell it out, sound the trumpet over the country-side! Loud be the cry raised, for all to muster and to man the fortified cities! Raise the standard in Sion, and rally to it with all haste! Here is peril I am bringing upon you from the north country, here is great calamity. Roused is the lion from his lair; he is astir, ready to prey on the nations; he is marching out to make earth a desert, and thy cities too shall be laid waste, and stand there untenanted. Well may you gird yourselves with sackcloth, well may you beat the breast and cry aloud; fire of the Lord's vengeance has not passed us by. When that day comes, the Lord says, heart of king and heart of prince shall be dismayed; dumb-stricken the priest, the prophet unmanned.

Alas, alas, Lord God, said I,² can it be that thou hast deceived thy people, deceived Jerusalem, by telling them they should have peace, and here is the sword threatening our very lives?

When that time comes, verdict shall be passed on this people of mine, and on Jerusalem: My people's wanton ways are like the hot wind³ that blows from the desert slopes, that will neither winnow nor sift. And in return, I will summon to my side a wind that blows full, and so I will plead my cause against them. An overshadowing cloud the invader shall be, his chariots outspread like the storm-wrack, his horses swifter than eagles. Alas the day, we are ruined!

Now, Jerusalem, as thy life thou lovest, rid thy heart of guile; wilt thou never cease to harbour those false thoughts of thine? Here is news cried from Dan, here are monstrous tidings⁴ from the hill-country of Ephraim; tell it far and wide, Jerusalem has heard the bruit of her besiegers coming from a distant land, that even now raise their battle-cry among the cities of Juda; even now they keep watch over the country-side about her, the Lord says, and all

¹ Literally, 'Ever since the days of our youth shame has devoured the earnings of our fathers, their flocks and herds, sons and daughters'. But it is most probable that the word 'shame' stands here as a pious substitute for the name of the god Baal.

² According to some manuscripts of the Septuagint Greek, the true reading is 'said they'. This would evidently improve the run of the context.

³ The Hebrew text may also be interpreted as meaning 'A hot wind is coming in the direction of the daughter of my people'. But the use of language is in any case forced, and it may be doubted whether the true text of verses 11 and 12 has been preserved to us.

⁴ Literally, 'the making known of an idol'; according to the Hebrew text, 'the making known of distress'.

because she defied my vengeance. Ill deeds and ill counsel of thine have brought all this upon thee; the due reward of thy wickedness, how bitter the taste of it, how it wrings thy heart! Deep, deep rankles the wound; my very heart-strings echo lament; no rest is mine, since my ear caught bray of trumpet and cry of battle. Tale upon tale of ruin; a whole land laid waste, no cabin or hovel spared, suddenly, all in a moment! Always the sight of men fleeing, always the sound of the trumpet in my ears!

Ah, reckless people of mine, that would not acknowledge me; blind fools, for mischief so shrewd, in well-doing so untutored!¹

Earthward I looked, and all was void and empty; heavenward, and in heaven no light shone; looked at mountain and hill-side, and saw them stir and tremble; looked for some sign of man, and in vain; the very birds in heaven had all taken flight. It was a garden I looked at, but a garden untenanted; no city in it but had perished at the Lord's glance, before the frown of his vengeance. For it was so the Lord's sentence ran; the whole country-side should be abandoned, and still he will not have taken full toll. At his sentence, earth should mourn and heaven grow dark with sorrow, yet of his decree there should be no repenting; he would not go back from it. Everywhere, at the noise of archer and horseman, the townfolk flee away, take to the hills² and climb their high rocks; never a town but is left deserted of its inhabitants. And thou, Jerusalem, when thy turn comes to be despoiled, what shift wilt thou make? Vain was it to dress in scarlet, and deck thyself with chains of gold, and with antimony darken thy eyes; vain were those arts, thy lovers are weary of thee now, and thy life is forfeit. Cries of anguish I hear, as from a woman in the throes of travail; it is queen Sion, gasping out her life, and crying with hands outspread, Woe is me, I swoon away, here in the slaughter-house!

5 Go the rounds of Jerusalem, search the streets of it with hue and cry; and if you find one man there that faithfully does his duty, and keeps troth, then the city shall be pardoned. Nay, though they call on the living God to be their witness, they forswear themselves none the less.

On faithfulness, Lord, thy eyes are set. And these, when thou smitest them, are unrepentant still; when thou crushest them to earth, will not heed reproof; brows are theirs unyielding as rock, and return they will not. But indeed, thought I, perhaps they are poor men and foolish, that have never learnt the divine command, or what their God requires of them. I will go and have speech with the men of rank; what the divine command is, what their God requires of them, these will surely know. And these I found conspiring, as none other, to throw off the yoke, to break through their bonds. What wonder if they are attacked and despoiled by robbers, that leave the woods at night-time, stealthily as lion or wolf or prowling leopard, to beleaguer their towns and catch all who venture forth? So many their rebellions, so obstinate their defiance!

For all this, how should I pardon thee? Thy sons have deserted me, by gods that are no gods their vows are taken; full-fed with my bounty, they left their wedded troth, to wanton in the bower of a mistress; bold in their adultery as stallion at grass neighing for its mate. What, shall I let all this pass me by, the Lord says; shall I not take my fill of vengeance against such a nation as this? Scale those ramparts, and fall to pillage, not taking full toll even yet; root out the slips of yonder vine, the Lord will not claim them. Obstinate they have defied me, the Lord says, Israel and Juda both; they disown me; Nay, they tell one another, this is none of his doing, harm shall never befall us, we shall have neither slaughter nor famine here; the prophets did but waste breath, no word of revelation made to them; on their own heads be it!

Vain words; but not vainly the Lord, the God of hosts, has spoken; flaming words of his he has entrusted to my lips, and fuel this people shall be for their devouring. A nation from far away I am summoning, even now, Israel, to the attack; a warlike nation, of ancient lineage, whose very tongue shall be strange to thee, 16 no word of it well understood; greedily as the tomb their quivers gape, and they are 17 warriors all. They shall rob thee of harvest and of food, rob thee of son and daughter, rob thee of flock and herd, rob thee of vine and fig-tree; and all the strongholds, wherein thy hope lies, at the sword's point 18 shall be overthrown. Yet even then, the Lord says, I will not take full toll of thee. 19 Ask you why the Lord has so much mis-used you, this is to be my answer: Did you not forsake me, to worship alien gods in your own land? Alien gods you shall worship in an alien land, for your punishment.

¹ The sudden introduction of Almighty God as the speaker in this verse mars the unity of the passage, and some attribute it to textual error.

² In the Hebrew text, 'thickets'.

20 To Israel's race proclaim it, for all Juda 21 to hear, Listen, foolish folk and unperceiving, with sightless eyes, ears that had as well been deaf! Have you no fear of me, the Lord says, will you stand unmoved in my presence? Was it not I gave the sea its frontier of sand, by my eternal decree inviolate? Vainly the waves boil and toss, 23 they cannot pass beyond it. A faithless heart, a rebellious heart this people of mine has; in a moment they swerve aside 24 from the path, and are gone; never a thought of reverence for the Lord their God, who gives them autumn and spring rains when the time comes, and secures 25 them a full harvest. It is your wrong-doing that has altered their course; to guilt such as yours, blessings are denied.

26 Godless men there are among my people that lie in wait like any fowler, but noose and trap of theirs is set to catch men. 27 Never was cage so full of birds, as their homes of wealth ill gotten; men of power and riches, pampered and sleek, they defy my will past all bearing; redress they deny to the widow, right to the orphan, 28 justice to the poor. What, shall I let all this pass me by, the Lord says, shall I not take my fill of vengeance against such a nation as this? A wonder this land has seen beyond all belief; here are prophets that utter a lying message, priests that clap their hands in applause, and this people of mine is well content. And what shift will you make when the end comes?

6 Rally, tribesmen of Benjamin that live in the midst of Jerusalem; at Thecua sound the trumpet, raise the standard on Bethacarem; it is from the north peril may be seen coming, peril of great calamity.¹ Poor Sion, all too fair she seems, all too delicate! Alas, what strange shepherds are these, what troops that follow them? See how they pitch their tents about her! See how many each has at his back, and there must be pasture for them all! Sound we the attack on the city; to move now were best, and march up under the light of noon! Plague upon it, the day is already spent, the shadows of evening lengthen already; up, then, march we on by night, by night plunder their houses!

Down with yonder trees, the Lord of hosts says, and build siege-works about Jerusalem; here is a city must be called to account for all the oppression that is harboured there. Never cistern kept its waters so fresh, as she her store of wickedness; no news from her but of wrong and waste, no sight I see there but distress and violence. Jerusalem, be warned in time; else my love thou shalt forfeit, and I will make a ruin of thee, a land uninhabited.

Israel, says the Lord of hosts, is a vineyard for the gleaning; no cluster shall be left; back with thee, vintager, to the baskets! Vain appeal, whom shall I cite for witness of it? Oh that it should fall on ears uncircumcised, oh that God's word should be slighted, and find no welcome! Nay, but the divine anger burns within me, I can forbear no longer. I must blurt out my message to all, children playing in the streets, no less than warriors met in council; none shall be spared, husband or wife, greybeard or man of many summers. Homes, lands and wedded wives, all must pass into other hands; none that dwells in Juda, the Lord says, but shall feel my vengeance. High and low, ill-gotten gains they covet; treacherous the ways alike of prophet and of priest; here lies my people grievously hurt, and they tend her unconcernedly; All's well, they say, all's well, when in truth all goes amiss. Shamed they needs must be, that did so detestably; shamed, but never ashamed, for indeed they have lost the power to blush;¹ theirs to fall amid the common ruin, crushed to earth, the Lord says, when I call all to account.

¹ The Latin version does not make clear, what is evidently intended, that the men of Benjamin (to whose country the prophet belonged) are invited to escape from Jerusalem, and hold their own in the hill-country of the south.

16 The Lord's message was, Halt at the cross-roads, look well, and ask yourselves which path it was that stood you in good stead long ago. That path follow, and you shall find rest for your souls. But follow 17 they would not; and next, I would set watchmen on the heights; let them only listen, when these sounded the trumpet; 18 but listen they would not. To the nations, then, I proclaim it; let my doom be pronounced in the public ear; all earth shall hear it. I mean to bring upon this people 19 of mine the punishment their scheming wickedness has earned, so deaf to my calls, 20 of my law so defiant. What avails it to offer me incense from Saba, and the fragrant calamus that grows far away? Unwelcome to me your burnt-sacrifice, undesired your 21 victims. This doom the Lord pronounces; I mean so to entangle this people of mine that they shall stumble to their undoing 22 all of them, father and son together, neighbour with neighbour, friend with friend.

22 Here is a people marching from the north country, the Lord says, a great nation 23 from the world's end. Arrow and shield² they ply, and their hard hearts pity none; loud their battle-cry as the roaring of the sea. So they ride on, as warriors 24 ride, poor Sion, thy enemies. Unnerved our hands droop at the very rumour of it; grief overmasters us, sharp as the pangs of 25 travail; forbidden is the country-side, the high roads untravelled; the drawn sword threatens, and peril is all about us. Juda, 26 poor widowed queen, put sackcloth about thee and strew thyself with ashes; as for an only son make loud lament; without warning the spoiler will be upon us.

27 I have a task for thee to perform among my people; thou shalt be my trusty assayer, putting the quality of their lives to the test.
28 These faithless rulers that go about on their slanderous errands, what are they but 29 copper and iron, base metal all? Bellows have done their work, the lead streams away in the fire, carrying nothing with it; vain, smelter, thy toil, the dross remains unpurged. Refuse-silver they shall be 30 called; has not the Lord refused them?

7 A message came from the Lord to Jeremias, bidding him take his stand 2 at the temple gate, and there proclaim aloud: Listen to this word of the Lord, men of Juda, that make your way in 3 through these gates to worship him. Thus says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, Amend your lives and your likings, if you 4 would have me dwell here among you. Trust never in the false assurances that 5 proclaim this place The Lord's temple, The Lord's temple, The Lord's temple.³ Will you but amend your lives and your 6 likings, giving one man redress against another, not oppressing the alien, the orphan, the widow, nor in these precincts
7 putting innocent men to death, nor courting, to your ruin, the gods of other nations, then indeed I will make my dwelling here 8 among you, in the land which was my gift to your fathers from the beginning to the end of time. You put your trust in flatter-9 ing hopes, which can nothing avail you; theft, murder, adultery, the false oath, 10 libations to Baal, the courting of alien gods that are no gods of yours, nothing comes amiss, if only you can come and stand in 11 my presence, here in this house, the shrine of my name, and tell yourselves you have made amends for all these your detestable 12 doings! What, does this house, the shrine of such a name, count for no more than a den of thieves, in eyes like yours? Think 13 you, the Lord says, that eternal God has no eyes to see it?⁴ Go and visit that sanctuary of mine at Silo, where of old my 14 power rested; look well, what havoc I have made of it, to punish the misdeeds of Israel, that was my people too. Because of 15 so much done amiss, the Lord says; because you would not listen when I cried early at your doors, or answer any call of mine; this house, shrine of my name and

¹ The text here apparently says, 'They are confounded, because they have done abominably; or rather they are not confounded, they do not know how to blush'. Probably the verb 'to be confounded' is used in two different senses, (i) to be ignominiously disappointed of one's aim, (ii) to express shame, own oneself in the wrong.

² According to the Hebrew text, 'bow and javelin'.
³ This verse becomes more easily intelligible if we suppose that the prophet's audience were within sight of written notices, or within earshot of Temple officials, calling attention to the sanctity of the various buildings around them.

⁴ Literally, in the Latin version, 'I, I am, I have seen, the Lord says'. The Hebrew text has merely, 'Behold, I also have seen it, the Lord says'.

centre of your hopes, this home I gave to you and to your fathers, shall fare as Silo 15 fared. All those brethren of yours, the whole stock of Ephraim, I banished from my presence, and you shall be banished in your turn.

16 Nor do thou, Jeremias,¹ think to plead for this people of mine, or take up in their name the burden of praise and prayer; thwart my will, thou shalt have no hearing; 17 Canst thou not see for thyself what ill deeds are done in the townships of Juda, in the 18 very streets of Jerusalem? See the children gathering sticks, the father lighting a fire, the mother kneading dough, and all to make cakes for the queen of heaven! See how they offer libation to alien gods, to 19 despite me! Yet not to me they do despite, the Lord says, rather to themselves; every 20 hope of theirs shall fail them. This warning, then, the Lord God sends them: Fury and indignation of mine are brewing against this place, man and beast, wood-land tree and growing crop; and when that fire is lit, there shall be no quenching it.

21 A message from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: No more be at pains to distinguish between burnt-sacrifice and offering; use for your own eating the flesh of all 22 alike! Burnt-sacrifices, offerings, not of these was my theme when I gave commandments to your fathers at the time of 23 their deliverance from Egypt;² my word of command to them was, Obey my bidding, if I am to be your God, you my 24 people; follow the path I have marked out for you, as you hope to prosper. And did they listen? Hearing they gave me none; their own whim, the false aim of their corrupt hearts was all the rule they lived by; still turned their backs on me, and refused 25 to look my way; so it has been since your fathers left Egypt, so it is yet. No day 26 dawned but I was at work betimes, sending my servants to prophesy to them, but still they would not listen, still hearing they gave me none; stubborn under my yoke, they outdid their own fathers in wicked-27 ness. All this thou shalt say to them, but they will not listen to thee; thy call shall go unheeded. Then tell them, Here is a people 28 who will not listen to the voice of their own God, or accept reproof from him; loyalty is dead, the word is on their lips no more.

Cut off, Jerusalem,³ those locks of thine, 29 and cast them away from thee; loud let the hills echo with thy lament; on a guilty age, the Lord has pronounced sentence of banishment and rejection. The men of 30 Juda have defied my will, the Lord says; foul idols they have set up in the house that is the sanctuary of my name, and utterly profaned it; in the valley of Ben-Ennom 31 stands the hill-shrine of Topheth, where they sacrifice their own sons and daughters in the furnace, a rite not of my bidding, not 32 of my imagining. And now, the Lord says, a time is coming when no more will be heard of Topheth or Ben-Ennom; it will be called The Valley of the Slain; men will be finding room for their dead in Topheth, because other burying-ground is none.
 33 Nay, Juda shall be carrion for birds that fly in air, for beasts that roam the earth; and never a man left to drive them away. In the townships of Juda, in the streets of 34 Jerusalem, cries of joy and mirth shall be heard no more, voice of bridegroom and of bride shall be heard no more; the whole land will have turned into a wilderness.

8 All the tombs in Jerusalem will be rifed, the Lord says, when that day comes, tomb of king and prince of Juda's line, tomb of priest and prophet, tomb of common citizen; naked their bones shall 2 lie, with sun and moon and all the starry host to witness it, their gods aforesaid; gods so loved, so well served, so hailed, so courted, so adored! Those bones there shall be none to gather, none to bury; they shall lie like dung on the bare ground. And 3 the living shall envy the dead; so poor a home shall be left, the Lord of hosts says, to the remnant of a guilty race, in the far lands to which I have banished them.

Give them this message from the Lord:
 4 A man falls but to rise, errs but to retrieve

¹ The word 'Jeremias' is not expressed in the original. ² vv. 21-23. The burnt-sacrifice was offered to God whole, unlike the other sacrifices (e.g. the welcome-offering) in which the victim was shared between God and his worshipper. Here, the prophet ironically suggests that ceremonial distinctions of this kind may well be abandoned, since the sins of Juda have in any case made their offerings unacceptable. Verses 22 and 23 should probably be understood as implying, not that the moral law was anterior in time to the ceremonial precepts, but that it wholly overshadowed them in importance.

³ The name is not expressed in the original.

5 his path; how is it that this rebellious people of mine at Jerusalem has rebelled so obstinately? They cling to their illu-6 sion, and return no more. Listen I never so attentively, wholesome word I hear none; never a man that repents of his sin, asks himself what his life has been. No, each one follows his own bent, reckless as 7 war-horse charging into battle. Yet the kite, circling in air, knows its time; turtledove can guess, and swallow, and stork, when they should return;¹ only for my people the divine appointment passes un-8 observed. What, still boasting that you are wise, that the Lord's law finds its home among you? Nay, but the scribes, with their false penmanship, have construed all 9 amiss. In all their wisdom, how disappointed, how bewildered, how entrapped!
 God's word they cast away, and wisdom 10 left them. Alien lords their wives shall have, alien masters their lands; (high and low, ill-gotten gains they covet; treacherous the ways alike of prophet and of 11 priest; here lies my people grievously hurt, and they tend her unconcernedly; All's well, they say, all's well, when in truth all 12 goes amiss. Shamed they needs must be, that did so detestably; shamed, but never ashamed, for indeed they have lost the power to blush; theirs to fall in the common ruin, crushed to earth, the Lord says, 13 when I call all to account).² I will make an end of them once for all, the Lord says; never a grape on the vine, or a fig on the fig-tree, every leaf withered; and I have given them . . . what has passed them by.³ 14 Why do we linger here?⁴ Muster we, and man the stronghold, and wait there un-complaining; silence the Lord our God has imposed on us, given us a draught to dull the senses; the Lord, whom our sins 15 have offended.⁴ How we long for better times, and no relief comes to us; for remedy at last, and danger still threatens!
 16 All the way from Dan the noise of horses reaches us, gallant chargers neighing in their pride, till earth trembles with the echoes of it; on they come, bearing ruin to field and crop, to city and citizen! With 17 such a brood of deadly serpents I am plaguing you, the Lord says, charm is none shall rid you of its bite.

Grief beyond all grief, that bows down 18 my heart within me! So cries my own 19 people in its distress from a country far away. Does the Lord dwell in Sion no longer? Is she forsaken by her king?

And she? What of the idols, what of the alien gods that turned me into her enemy?

Harvest-time is over, summer is gone, 20 and still no deliverance has come to us.
 Wounded she lies, my own people, and is 21 not her wound mine? Shall I not go mourning, bewildered by grief? Grows the 22 balm in Galaad no more, is the healer's art lost there, that the people I love should lie wounded, and the wound will not close?

9 Well-head were this head of mine, eyes of a fountain these eyes,⁵ day nor night should serve me to weep enough for my country's dead. Oh that some lodging-2 place in the wilderness for me were dwelling-place, far from the haunts of my own people, that are faithless lovers, rebel subjects all!

Deceitful tongues, treacherous as the 3 hidden archer's bow, hearts that lord it over their fellow-countrymen, wrong leading to wrong, and my claims forgotten! the Lord says. Neighbour of neighbour be-4 ware, kinsman let kinsman never trust; none goes about to overthrow thee more craftily than brother of thine or friend.
 None but will overreach his fellow with 5 lies; all their schooling is in falsehood, all their striving for ill-gotten gain. In what 6 a nest of treason thou dwellest! And such treason, the Lord says, as will acknowledge no claim of mine. This warning, then, he utters, the Lord of hosts: The fire 7 for them! They must be tried in the cru-cible; what other choice has my faithless 8 people left me? Tongues that would like an arrow, with deceit for poison, ever the

¹ The birds cannot be certainly identified; some would alter 'kite' to 'stork', and 'stork' to 'crane'.
² ev. 10-12. The repetition of 6. 13-15 may be intentional, but is more probably due to a copyist's error; they are wanting here in some Greek manuscripts.

³ The last clause of this verse does not yield any natural sense, either in the Hebrew or in the Latin, and it seems likely that the text as we have it is defective.
⁴ 'Uncomplaining' and 'silence' represent a Hebrew verb which normally has that sense, but is interpreted by some, here and in a few other passages, as meaning 'to die'. 'A draught to dull the senses'; literally, 'waters of a root'; the potion so described in Hebrew is probably the 'gall' offered to our Lord at his Crucifixion (Mt. 27. 34).
⁵ 'Eyes' of a fountain, in the sense of openings. The Hebrew words for 'head' and 'eye' are also used for springs of water.

smooth word of friend laying snare for 9 friend; what, shall I let all this pass me by, the Lord says; shall I not take my fill of vengeance against such a nation as this?

10 Sad dirge be made for the hills, lament for all the wide pasture-lands, that are scorched bare, and left untravelled; silent the herdsman's call; birds that nested there, cattle that grazed there, fled and gone.

11 I mean to turn Jerusalem into a heap of dust, the lair of serpents;¹ the cities of 12 Juda shall stand desolate, with none to inhabit them. Come now, who is wise enough to read the riddle, to what spokesman shall the Lord's proclamation be entrusted, when he tells us why the land lies ruined, burnt up like the wilderness, 13 and never a passer-by? It is because they forsook the commandment I gave them, the Lord says, would not heed my call or 14 follow it; because they had recourse to ill devices of their own, and to the gods of the country-side, whose worship their fathers 15 taught them. This doom, then, the Lord of hosts pronounces, the God of Israel: On wormwood I will feed this people of mine, 16 gall shall be the drink I give them; far away I will scatter them, in countries never they, never their fathers knew; and the sword shall follow close behind, to exter-17minate them.

17 This too the Lord of hosts says, the God of Israel: Search all about, and find mourners, mistresses of their craft, and such as will answer your summons with 18 all haste; no time let them lose in making dole for us; weep every eye, be every eye-19 lid blubbered with tears. Listen to Sion's lament: Alas, what scathe, alas, what shame! Our land lies deserted, our homes 20 in ruins! To you, women, the Lord's word comes; this is matter for your hearing. To daughters of yours, neighbours of yours, teach the sad melody of yonder 21 lament; here is death looking in at our windows, finding its way into our palaces, and soon there will be no children playing out of doors, nor grown men passing to and fro in the streets. A message from the Lord: Like dung they shall lie on the ground, the corpses of the dead, like the sheaf left after reaping is done, that none is at pains to gather.

This, too, is the Lord's message: Never boast, if thou art wise, of thy wisdom, if thou art strong, of thy strength, if thou art rich, of thy riches; boast is none worth having, save that insight which gives knowledge of me; in all my dealings with mankind so merciful a Lord, the Lord says, so just, so faithful, and a lover of such dealings where they are found.²

A time of reckoning there shall be, the Lord says, for all the nations that practice circumcision, Egypt, Juda, Edom, Ammon, Moab; ay, and the desert folk that clip their foreheads bare. The whole world is uncircumcised; all have hearts uncircumcised, and Israel with the rest.³

10 Listen, men of Israel, to the Lord's utterance concerning you.⁴ Thus says the Lord: Do not learn to follow Gentile ways, or be dismayed by portents in the heavens, as the Gentiles are. How empty the observances the heathen use!
 What is the stuff upon which the carver works but a trunk of wood, felled by an ax out in the forest? Only he has tricked it out with gold and silver, hammer and nail must do their work, lest it should fall to pieces. Idols cunningly plated as palm-trees,⁵ yet dumb as they, and men must carry them to and fro, for movement they have none! To these give no reverence; they can neither mar nor make thee.

No, Lord, thou hast no rival; so great thou art, so great is the sovereignty of thy name. King of all nations, how should we not fear thee in that majesty of thine?
 Boast the world as it will of wisdom or of empire, none can rival thee. Ah, folly and blindness, ah, fond teaching, lifeless as wood itself! Ay, bring plates of silver from Tharsis, gold from Ophaz, it is all man's work, fresh from the smithy; bring robes of blue and purple, they are man's work still! But the Lord is God in good earnest, a God that lives, that has eternal dominion, and can make earth tremble with his frown, strike the nations powerless when he threatens them.

¹ The word in the Hebrew text here represented by 'serpents' is generally translated 'jackals' by modern commentators. ² This paragraph is thought by some to have been accidentally misplaced; it has little apparent connexion with its present context. ³ vv. 25, 26. This appears to be the sense intended by a passage of considerable obscurity. ⁴ vv. 1-25. It may be doubted whether this chapter is more than a collection of certain isolated utterances made by the prophet. Verses 2-16, for instance, read as if they were addressed to men already in exile, not to men threatened with exile as a punishment for their own idolatries. ⁵ 'Cunningly-plated as palm-trees'; literally, 'fashioned into the similitude of a palm-tree'; the plates of metal in which the wooden core of the idol was sheathed may have suggested the figure of a palm-trunk. But some understand the Hebrew text as meaning 'like a scare-crow in a garden of melons'; cf. Bar. 6. 69.

1 No place on earth or under heaven, you must tell the nations, for gods that could fashion neither heaven nor earth.¹

2 Power that made the earth, wisdom that orders nature, foresight that spread out the heavens! At the sound of his voice, what mustering of the waters overhead! He summons up the cloud-wrack from the world's end, turns the lightning into a rain-storm, brings the winds out of his store-house;² how puny, then, is man's skill, how sorry a thing is the carver's workmanship; after all his pains, only a lifeless counterfeit! Fond imaginations, fantastic figures, when the time comes for reckoning, they will be heard of no more. 3 Not such the worship that is the heirloom of Jacob's line; their God is the God who made all things, Israel his patrimony, the Lord of hosts his name.

7 Take up from the ground, poor besieged one, thy load of shame.³ This time, the Lord says, I mean to hurl them far away, the dwellers in this land, and great distress shall be theirs, that they may be found. . . .⁴

9 Alas, for my wounding, for the grievous hurt that is mine! Hitherto I had thought to bear my sickness, if this were all; but now what am I? A tent broken down, all its ropes severed: all my citizens have deserted me, and are no more to be found; who shall raise the pole, who shall stretch the curtains now? And the cause of it? Unskilful shepherds that would have no recourse to the Lord; see how their art has failed them, and all the flock is scattered far and wide! A sound comes to me that brings tidings with it, a great stir from the north country; all Juda is to become a desert, a lair for serpents⁵ now.

Lord, I know it well enough, it is not for you to choose his lot; not human wisdom guides our steps aright. Chasten me, Lord, but with due measure kept; not as thy anger demands, or thou wilt grind me to dust. Pour out this indignation of thine upon the nations that do not acknowledge thee, on the tribes that never invoke thy name; by whom Jacob is devoured, devoured and devastated, and all his pride scattered to the winds.⁶

11 Here is a message which came from the Lord to Jeremias about the covenant: Listen well to the terms of it, and be the spokesmen of it to all the race of Juda, all the citizens of Jerusalem.⁷ This warning thou shalt give them from the Lord God of Israel: Cursed be the man who will not obey the terms of this covenant, the commandment which I enjoined on your fathers when I rescued them from Egypt's furnace of iron. Give heed to my call, I told them, and do as I bid you; then you shall be my people, and I will be your God. So would I fulfil the promise made on oath to their fathers before them; the promise of a land all milk and honey, that land which is yours to-day.

So be it, Lord, said I; and he bade me cry the message aloud all through the townships of Juda, all through the streets of Jerusalem: Listen to the terms of this covenant, and keep them well; ever since I rescued them from Egypt I have been adjuring those fathers of yours, day in, day out, to listen to me, and listen they would not. No hearing would they give me, but went each his own way, perverse as ever, till at last I must carry out the threats contained in this covenant, still proclaimed and still defied.

Why, the Lord said to me, here is a conspiracy among Juda's folk, Jerusalem's folk! They have gone back to the old guilty ways of their rebellious fathers; they in their turn have betaken themselves to

¹ This verse is phrased, not in pure Hebrew, but in the Aramaic dialect, as if it were written under the influence of the Captivity. ² For the later part of this verse cf. Ps. 134. 7. ³ In the Hebrew text simply 'thy load'.

⁴ It seems clear that there must be some omission at the end of this verse, whether we read 'that they may be found', or (as in the Hebrew text), 'that they may find'.

⁵ Or perhaps 'jackals' as in 9. 11 above. ⁶ Cf. Ps. 78. 6, 7. ⁷ 'The covenant'; this alludes, presumably, to the rediscovery of the Law under king Josias (IV Kg. 22. 8). 'Spokesmen' implies that the rulers are addressed; the Septuagint Greek gives 'spokesman'.

the worship of alien gods; my immemorial covenant with Israel and Juda is void; they 11 have rescinded it! And now, the Lord says, I mean to visit them with punishment inevitable, punishment inexorable; 12 let Juda and Jerusalem have recourse, if they will, to the gods they honour with their sacrifices, it will avail them nothing 13 in their distress. No township of thine, Juda, but must have its own deity, no street in Jerusalem but thou wouldst set up there altars abominable, where sacrifice is offered to the gods of the country-side!

14 Nor do thou, Jeremias, think to intercede for this people of mine, or take up in their name the burden of praise and prayer; when they cry to me in their distress, hearing they shall have none. A people so well beloved, that so haunts my house, yet stained with crime! What, dost thou think the consecrated flesh will avail 15 to rid thee of thy wanton guilt?¹ An olive-tree, sturdy and fair and fruitful, so it was the Lord loved to think of thee; and now, at the sound of his majestic voice,² fire breaks out in it, and all those shoots are 16 burned away. Yes, it is the Lord of hosts, who once planted thee, that has now decreed the undoing of Israel and Juda, undoing for their own ill-doing, when they sacrificed to the gods of the country-side in defiance of me.

18 Thou, Lord, didst make it all known to me past doubt, warning me beforehand of 19 their devices. Hitherto, I had been unsuspecting as a cade lamb that is led off to the slaughter-house; I knew nothing of the plots they were hatching against me, as they whispered, Let us give him a taste of the gallows-tree;³ let us rid the world of him, so that his very name will be forgotten!
 20 But thou, Lord of hosts, true judge that canst read the inmost thoughts of man's heart, let me live to see thee punish them; to thee I have made my plea known. And now the Lord has a word for yonder men of Anathoth, who conspired to kill me, and would have stopped me prophesying in the Lord's name, on pain of my life. I will call them to account for it, says the Lord of hosts; by the sword their warriors shall perish, and their sons and daughters by famine. None shall be left; woe betide the men of Anathoth, when the year comes for my reckoning with them.

12 Lord, I know well that right is on thy side, if I plead against thee, yet remonstrate with thee I must; why is it that the affairs of the wicked prosper; never a traitor double-dyed but all goes well with him? Deep roots they strike, so firmly thou hast planted them, thrive and bear fruit; yet all the while their hearts keep thee at a distance, only their lips proclaim thee. Yet it is I, Lord, that hold thy warrant; with favour thou regardest me, hast proof of my heart's loyalty; wilt thou not herd them together like sheep, and mark them down for slaughter? How long must this land go in mourning, all the verdure of its fields be parched up, to avenge the ill-doing of its inhabitants? Neither beast nor bird left in it; and still their hope is, I shall not live to see their end come!⁴

What, tired out so soon when thy rivals were on foot? And hast thou the mettle to challenge horsemen? Easy to keep thy confidence, here on safe ground; what shift wilt thou make in the fens of Jordan? Even by thy own clansmen, thy own father's kin, thou art betrayed; these too will join in the hue and cry after thee; never trust soft words of theirs.⁵

Farewell, my home; I have done with my chosen people; the life that was so dear to me I have handed over to its enemies.⁶ My people grown strange to me, as lion snarling in its forest lair; what marvel if I

¹ The Hebrew text here is untranslatable, and evidently corrupt. ² 'His majestic voice'; in the Hebrew text, 'a great tempest'.

³ This is perhaps the best interpretation of the reading, adopted by the Vulgate and by the Septuagint Greek, 'let us put wood into his bread'. The Hebrew text gives, 'Let us destroy the tree in its bread'; that is, presumably, 'with its fruits', but such an expression finds no parallel elsewhere.

⁴ 'I shall not live to see their end come'; or possibly, 'God does not care what becomes of them'.

⁵ v. v. 5, 6. This is apparently the divine answer to the prophet's impatience with the men of Anathoth; what he has experienced so far is nothing to the disappointments which await him at Jerusalem. The fens (literally, the 'Pride') of Jordan were a lair of wild beasts (49, 19); it is not clear whether peril from wild beasts or peril from flood is here envisaged.

⁶ The way in which Jeremias has been treated by his fellow-citizens resembles the way in which God has been treated as a stranger by his chosen people.

9 am weary of it? My people grown strange to me as carrion-bird, its mottled plumage all bathed in blood!¹

Gather here, beasts that roam the earth, 10 eager for your prey. Drovers a many have laid waste my vineyard, trampled down my lands; the land I loved so, turned into a 11 lonely wilderness! Desolate they have made it, and desolate it mourns for me now; a very picture of desolation, and all for the want of men with heeding hearts. 12 No track over the uplands but has seen the freebooters coming by; from end to end of the country the sword of divine vengeance must pass, leaving no peace for any living 13 thing; where wheat was sown, the harvest shall be of briars, where men hold lands, they shall get no advantage of it; all your harvests shall disappoint you, so fierce the Lord's anger burns.

14 And this message comes from the Lord to those ill neighbours of his, that encroach upon the domain he has granted to his people of Israel: I mean to uproot them from their homes, when I uproot the men of 15 Juda from the land that lies between them. Yet I will relent towards them, so uprooted, and have pity on them; to their scattered homes and countries they shall 16 all return. Then, if they will but learn the traditions of my own people, and take their oaths by the Lord, the living God, as they once taught my people to take oaths by 17 Baal, their fortunes shall be founded anew in the midst of Juda. But wherever my call goes unheeded, the Lord says, that people's uprooting shall be that people's undoing.

13 The Lord's word came to me: Go and buy a girdle of linen, and put it about thy loins, one that was never yet 2 soaked in water. Girdle I bought me as the 3 Lord had bidden, and wore it; and now 4 the Lord spoke again: Is the girdle bought and worn? Up, take it with thee to 5 Euphrates river, and hide it there in a crevice of the rock. So I went obediently, 6 and hid it away in the Euphrates. Many days afterwards, the Lord sent me on my travels again to the Euphrates, to recover the girdle hidden there at his command; so thither I went, and unearthed the girdle from its hiding-place, to find it all perished and useless. Whereupon the Lord's word 8 came to me, and this was his message: Not 9 less the great pride of Juda, the great pride of Jerusalem, must perish. Here is a rebel- 10 lious people that will not listen to my call; they must needs take their own false path, courting alien gods and submitting to their worship. No better, then, than yonder 11 useless girdle; close as a man's girdle fits about his loins I had bound Israel and Juda to myself; my people they were to be, my renew and prize and pride; but no, they would not listen.²

Tell them this, too, from the Lord God 12 of Israel, Flagons must have wine to fill them. And when they answer, it is no news to them that flagons are for wine, give 13 them this message from the Lord: Ay, but the people of this land, king of David's line sitting on David's throne, priest and prophet and citizens of Jerusalem every one, are flagons waiting to be filled. I mean to bemuse them, as with wine, and then 14 shatter³ them; brother torn away from brother, and fathers from their children; ruth and respite none shall have, nor be spared in the common ruin.

Hear and heed and humble yourselves; 15 it is the Lord who speaks. Give God his due, ere the shadows fall, and your feet begin to stumble on the dark mountain- 16 ways. For day you shall long, but he will have turned it into night; dark as death the lowering of the storm. Sirs, if you will not 17 listen now, give me leave to hide myself away and bemoan your proud hearts; weep I must and wail, and my eyes run down with tears, if the Lord's flock is doomed to captivity.

To king⁴ and queen-mother say this, 18 Come down and take your places with the rest, disrowned of your royalty. Shut off 19 are the cities of the south, entry is none; dispeopled lies Juda, of all her sons

¹ The first half of verse 9 runs literally, 'Has my people become a speckled bird to me, a bird dyed all over?' The Hebrew text gives, 'Has my people become a speckled vulture to me? The (other) vultures around are against it'; the Septuagint Greek, 'Is my people a hyena's cave to me, or a cave round it?' Probably the true reading is lost.

² vv. 1-11. According to the opinion of St Jerome, the events here described happened only in a vision.

³ The Latin verb has rather the sense of 'scatter', but this loses the idea of the parable.

⁴ There can be no certainty which king is alluded to; if it was Joakim or Joachin, the 'cities of the south' may perhaps be the border-cities of Egypt (cf. IV Kg. 24. 7).

20 dispeopled. New-comers from the north country, look about you and see! . . .¹
 . . . Ah, Jerusalem, what has become of the flock once entrusted to thee, thy 21 honourable care? What wilt thou say when thou art called to give account of it? Thy enemies are such as thou hast taught how to attack thee; thy schooling has recoiled on thy own head; sharper than travail-throws the anguish that shall overtake thee. And wilt thou find room for 22 surmise, why this should have befallen thee? Doubt not it is thy own wrongdoing that has stripped thee naked, and plunged thy steps deep in defilement. Sooner may Ethiop turn white, leopard's 23 hide unmarked, than Juda unlearn the lesson of ill-doing and amend. Far and wide I will scatter thy sons, like straws caught in the desert wind; such is the 24 fortune sent thee, such thy retribution exactly awarded, because thou hast forgotten me, and in lying fables put thy trust. That is 25 why I will pull thy skirts about thy ears and manifest thy shame; adulteries of thine, and lasciviousness, and all the guilt of thy 26 debauchery, the foul deeds I have seen done on hill-tops, in the open country-side. Fie on thee, Jerusalem, that wilt not come 27 back to me and be cleansed! Shall it last for ever?

14 How the Lord answered Jeremias in the matter of the drought.
 2 Lamentation in Juda, faint hearts and the dress of mourners in the market-place, loud the cry that goes up from Jerusalem!
 3 Master sends man to fetch water, but when cistern is reached, water is none; back go the pails empty, and disappointed vexation 4 veils its head. Vexation, too, and veiled heads among the country folk, so languish 5 the fields for lack of rain; hind forsakes its new-born young, out on the plain, because 6 grass has failed it, and the wild ass on the hill-side gasps for air, crocodile-fashion,² eyes dim with the vain search for pasture.
 7 What though we have guilt to plead against us? For thy own honour, Lord, bring us aid, rebels so often, yet confessing how we have wronged thee! Thou, Israel's hope, in time of calamity its refuge still, wilt thou pass us by, like stranger in a land that is none of his, like some traveller that will ask for a night's lodging and be gone? Why dost thou hang back like a man irresolute, a warrior that has forgotten his strength? Lord, thy dwelling-place is among us; thy holy name we bear; wilt thou abandon us?

Hearts ever in love with wandering, never at rest, what answer will the Lord make them? That his favour is not for them; at this hour he keeps their guilt in memory, for all their misdoings calls them to account. Nay, the Lord said to me, do not pray for the welfare of such a people as this. Fast they, their prayers shall go unheard; offer they burnt-sacrifice and victim, I will have none of it; sword, and famine, and the pestilence shall wear them down. Alas, alas, Lord God, said I, here are their prophets telling them they shall never see sword drawn, famine shall be none among them; theirs shall be a land of lasting content. These are but false promises, the Lord said, that they utter in my name; warrant they never had from me, nor errand, nor message; of false visions they tell you, and soothsayings, and trickery, and their own hearts' inventions. Here is the Lord's sentence upon prophets not of his sending, who speak to you in his name of a land unhurt by sword or famine; by sword and famine those prophets shall be devoured. Slain by sword and famine, the common folk that listen to them shall lie in the streets of Jerusalem, with none to bury them; wives and sons and daughters shall die with them; their own misdoings shall be a flood to drown them.

This too thou shalt say to them . . .³

. . . Weep, eyes, day and night, never resting, at the great hurt, the grievous wound she suffers, my people, inviolable till now! Nothing the country-side shews but massacre, nothing the city but faces pinched with famine; prophet and priest are gone, in a land of strangers they must

¹ In the Latin version, the new-comers from the north are addressed; the Hebrew text, which is evidently faulty, gives, 'Lift thou your eyes, and see thou the men coming from the north'. The connexion between the two halves of the verse is in any case obscure, and there may have been an omission. The word 'Jerusalem' is not expressed in the original until verse 27. ² Literally, 'as the dragons do'. Some would interpret, 'as the jackals do'. ³ It does not seem likely that the rubric 'This too thou shalt say to them' applies to the very human remonstrances which follow; an omission or a dislocation in the text is more probable.

19 ply their trade¹ now. Hast thou abandoned Juda once for all, art thou weary of Sion? Past all healing thou hast wounded us; how we long for better times, and no relief comes to us, for remedy at last, and danger still threatens! Lord, we acknowledge our rebelliousness, acknowledge our fathers' guilt, confess that we have wronged thee; for thy own honour, do not shame us, do not drag thy own royal glory in the dust; wilt thou forget, wilt thou annul the covenant that binds thee? Grant rain they cannot, the false gods of the heathen, the dumb skies have no showers of their own to give; for these, his creatures, wait we patiently on the Lord our God.

15 But it was thus the Lord answered me: Though Moses himself and Samuel made intercession for them, neither love nor liking would I have for this people of mine; banish them from my presence, to go where they will. If they ask whither, give them this message from the Lord: Whom the plague beckons, to the plague; whom the sword, to the sword; whom famine, to famine; whom exile, to exile. Escort they shall have of four kinds, the Lord says; the sword to slay and the dogs to tear them, birds in air and beasts on earth to devour and make an end of them. All the kingdoms of the world shall be in a ferment² over them; so will I punish the ill deeds done in Jerusalem by Manasses, son of Ezechias, when he was king of Juda. Nay, Jerusalem, who shall pity or bemoan thee, who shall turn aside, as he passes, to wish thee well? Thou hast forsaken me, the Lord says, and wouldst journey with me no more; now my hand is raised to strike, and make an end of thee; I am weary of wooing thee. Over the threshold of the land I blow my people away like chaff, bereaved, diminished, and unrepentant still. Widows there be, countless as the sea-sand; where is now the warrior son? In broad daylight I send the roving spoiler to strike terror into their cities. Sick at heart and faint she lies, that seven sons had borne; her noon is night, her hopes and her pride gone; and all that she has left, the Lord says, shall fall a prey to the sword in battle.

An ill day when thou, my own mother, didst bring me into the world! A world where all for me is strife, all is hostility; neither creditor I nor debtor to any man, yet they curse my name!

But the Lord answered, I promise that thou shalt leave behind thee good service done, and that in all distress and persecution I am coming to thy side, to save thee from thy enemies. What, should iron and bronze be in league with the iron that comes from the north?³

... (All the riches and treasures of thy land shall be despoiled, in punishment for all its guilt, and to no purpose; I am summoning enemies to attack thee from a land far away; it is your own persons that shall be burnt up in the fires of vengeance my anger has kindled)⁴...

Thou art my witness, Lord; bethink thee, and come to my defence against my persecutors; hold thy hand no longer, but claim me for thy own;⁵ if I have earned an ill name, it was in thy cause. When thy words were found,⁶ how greedily I devoured them! Great joy and content those words gave to my heart, heart of a prophet that bears thy name. Not for me the company of the merry-makers, I would not share in their boastfulness; under the threat of thy judgement I sat alone, filled with boding thoughts. Why are those sad thoughts still with me? Is my hurt desperate, beyond all remedy? Did it cheat me, like some empty water-course, my hope in thee?⁷

¹ This is definitely implied by the verb used in the Hebrew text; the Latin version has obscured its significance.

² According to the Hebrew text, 'in consternation'. ³ vs. 11, 12. The sense of these two verses is doubtful, and the Latin does not agree well with the Hebrew text in some points. Verse 12 perhaps implies that Jeremias was accused of being hand in glove with the invaders (37. 17); how could the 'pillar of iron', the 'wall of bronze' (1. 18) be in league with the iron yoke (28. 14) of Babylon? ⁴ vs. 13, 14. These verses are repeated, in part, lower down (17. 3); they hardly seem to be in place here. The words 'to no purpose' perhaps refer to the tribute exacted by Egypt (IV Kg. 23. 35), which left the men of Juda with no means of buying off the Chaldeans.

⁵ This is the best that can be made of the obscure (and perhaps corrupt) phrase, 'Do not take me in thy long-suffering'. ⁶ 'When thy words were found'; this is usually taken as referring to prophetic inspiration; but no parallel is adduced for such a forced way of talking. It may be suggested that Jeremias is here referring to his feelings when the Book of the Law was rediscovered under king Josias. The Septuagint Greek reads 'from those who despise thy words' (connected with verse 15).

⁷ This is the sense of the Hebrew; the Latin asks 'Did my hurt cheat me?'

19 Draw¹ near to me, the Lord said, and I will draw thee to myself, to wait upon me. When thou hast learned to separate worth from dross, thou shalt be my true spokesman, and thou shalt draw others to thyself, 20 not let thyself be drawn to them. This people of mine shall find thee a stout wall of bronze, impregnable to their attack; am I not at thy side, the Lord says, to protect and deliver thee? Let the wicked be never so powerful, I will engage for thy safety.

2 16 The Lord's word came to me:
 3 With such a land for thy dwelling-place, neither wife nor gender; for sons and daughters born in this land, for mothers who there gave them birth and fathers who begot them, the Lord has ill news to hear. Die they of the plague, they shall lie like dung on the ground, unwept, unburied; meet they their end by sword or famine, birds in air and beasts that roam the earth shall prey on the carrion of them.
 4 Where they hold wake for the dead, such is the Lord's bidding, never enter thou, condole and console thou never; friendship of mine this people shall never have, nor grace, nor mercy, the Lord says. Die rich, die poor in that country of theirs, burial and wake they shall have none; never a limb gashed or a head shaved to 5 honour them; none shall break bread with the mourner, nor give him a draught of wine for his comfort, though father or mother he bewail. Nor enter thou where men feast, to sit at meat and drink with 6 them; this doom he utters, the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: You shall live to see the day when cries of joy and mirth, voice of bridegroom and of bride, in this land are heard no more.

7 This warning uttered, if they ask thee why the divine sentence is so stern, wherein their guilt lies, what wrong they have done to the Lord their God, tell them this in his name: It is because your fathers have forsaken me, had recourse to alien gods, and submitted to the worship of them, my claim renounced, my laws defied. And you have out-done your fathers in malice, each of you following the ill bent of his own heart, and disobeying me.

Exiles far from home, in a land neither you nor those fathers of yours ever saw, you shall spend day and night in the service of alien gods, without respite. (Ay, the Lord says, a time is coming when the living Lord men swear by will no longer be the God who rescued Israel from Egypt; the living God will be one who has rescued Israel from the north country, and all the places of exile that are now designed for you, restoring them to the home which was once his gift to their fathers.²) Many fishermen I have, the Lord says, to spread the nets for them; and after that many huntsmen, to hunt them down among mountains and hill-sides and rocky caverns. Good watch I keep on their doings, never lose sight of them; no guilt of theirs can escape my scrutiny. Twice over they shall pay for guilt of theirs, misdoing of theirs, the men that have profaned my own land with dead idols, spread pollution through all my domain.

Strength and stronghold, Lord, refuge in time of peril, shall not the Gentiles themselves come to thee from the ends of the earth, confessing that all their patriotism is but a heritage of lies, that their idols cannot avail them? Shall men make gods for themselves, that gods in truth are none?³

Ay, it is the very lesson I mean to teach them now; that I act, and act with power; they shall learn to know the Lord's name at last.

17 Not more indelible were the guilt of Juda, if pen of steel or point of diamond had graven it with their hearts for tablet, or upon the rim of their altars; indelible, while there are sons of theirs to remember where altar stood once and sacred tree, shrine in the thick forest, shrine on the high hills; to offer sacrifice even yet in the open country-side. All the riches and treasures of thy land shall be destroyed, all its hill-shrines,³ in punishment for all its guilt. Lost to thee, the home that once I gave thee; in a land thou knowest not thou shalt be the slave of thy enemies; the fire of anger thou hast kindled in me can never be quenched.

¹ Literally, 'turn', throughout this verse. 7, 8), and some think they have been wrongly inserted here by accident.

² ov. 14, 15. These verses are repeated later on (23.

³ The mention of the hill-shrines here is not borne out by 15. 13.

Cursed shall he be, the Lord says, that puts his trust in man, and will have flesh and blood to aid him, his thoughts far from God. Never shall the sight of better times greet him; forlorn as some bush of tamarisk out in the desert, he dwells in a parched waste, the salt plains for all his company. Blessed shall he be that puts his trust in the Lord, makes the Lord his refuge. Not more favoured is tree planted by the water's edge, that pushes out its roots to catch the moisture, and defies the summer heat; its green leaves careless of the drought, its fruit unailing.

There is no riddle like the twists of the heart; who shall master them? Who but I, the Lord, that can see into man's heart, and read his inmost thoughts, to every life awarding what its doings have earned? Partridge that fosters a brood not its own is fit emblem for the man that wins riches unjustly; when life is but half done, he must take leave of them, a fool to the last.

Where from the first supreme majesty sits enthroned, there lies our sanctuary; thou, Lord, art Israel's hope; the men who forsake thee will be disappointed, the men who swerve from thy paths will be names written in sand; have they not forsaken that Lord who is the fountain of living water? If I am to be healed, it is thou, Lord, must heal me; if I am to find deliverance, it is thou must deliver me; thou art all my boast. What has become of the Lord's threat? (so men taunt me), we are waiting to see it accomplished! But this was no hasty word of mine, I did but lead where thou leddest; it was no wish of mine that calamity should befall mankind;¹ no word I uttered but had the warrant of thy scrutiny. Not for me thy terrors; the day of affliction is coming, but I shall find refuge in thee. They must be abashed, and I vindicated; they must cower, while I stand confident. It is on them the day of affliction will fall; reward them, then, with twofold hurt for the hurt they did.

The Lord bade me go and take my stand at the People's Gate, where the kings of Juda passed to and fro; and then, in turn, at the other gates of Jerusalem. This was to be my message from the Lord to king and people of Juda, to every citizen of Jerusalem that used those gates: No more, ²¹ on peril of your lives, shoulder those packs of yours and carry them through Jerusalem gates on the sabbath day. Never ²² a load must leave your houses, nor any work be done, on the sabbath; this was the command I gave to your fathers, only they ²³ would not listen or pay heed, chafed under the yoke of discipline and refused to obey me. And you, the Lord says, will you ²⁴ obey? Rid these gateways of their sabbath burdens, keep the sabbath holy by resting from work, and your kings and princes, ²⁵ David's own heirs, shall still go riding through them, with horses and chariots, with their retinue of nobles, with the men of Juda and Jerusalem's citizens in their train. Evermore your city shall be populous; from the townships of Juda, from ²⁶ your own country-side, from Benjamin, from plain and hill and the waste lands of the south, men shall come with burnt-sacrifice and victim and bloodless offering and incense to enrich the Lord's temple. Refuse to keep the sabbath holy, profane ²⁷ it with burdens borne and burdens admitted through the gates, and I will set those gates in a blaze that shall burn down all Jerusalem ere you can quench it.

18 The Lord's word came to Jeremias, bidding him betake himself to the potter's house; there a divine message awaited him. So I went to the potter's house, and found him working at his wheel; just then, the thing of clay he was a-fashioning broke in his hands, and he, as the whim took him, turned it into another thing of clay. Then it was the Lord's word came to me: You are in my hands, men of Israel, as the clay in the potter's; why may I not do as the potter did? All at once to a nation here, a kingdom there, I pronounced my sentence, for the uprooting and undoing of it, for its utter destruction. Let but that nation repent of the crimes I brought against it, I too will repent of the punishment I thought to exact. All at once to a nation here, a ⁹

¹ Literally, 'the heart of all men is perverse and inscrutable; who shall have knowledge of it?' The Hebrew text gives, 'the heart of man is perverse and diseased above all things; who shall have knowledge of it?' ² The word 'mankind' is not in the Hebrew text; its presence in the Latin seems due to a false interpretation.

kingdom there, I promise restoration of its 10 fortunes and new life. Let but that nation defy my will, shut its ears to my claim, I too will repent of all the fair promises I made it.

11 Be this, then, thy message from the Lord to Juda's folk, to the citizens of Jerusalem: Ill days I have in store for you; all my plans are laid; time that each one of you should 12 return from the false path, shape aims and thoughts anew. Ah no, they tell me, too late! Each one clings to his own course, 13 follows his own bent still. Search the world over, the Lord says, where were ever such deeds heard of as this deed Israel, 14 false maid, has most foully done? What, shall the snows of Lebanon melt from those wild peaks,¹ shall they be dried up at their source, those icy torrents that flow 15 down from it? Not less strange that this people of mine should forget me, and resort to vain sacrifices; that they should find their own paths too rough for them, the tracks marked out so long ago, and 16 journey on instead along by-paths untrod-den. Desolate their country shall lie, doomed to everlasting scorn; every passerby will shudder at it, or toss his head in 17 derision. I will sweep them away before the enemy's onset, as the east wind sweeps all before it; turn my back and never look their way in the hour of need.

18 Hereupon they summoned a conclave to plot against me, Jeremias; What, they said, would he have us believe we need no more priests to expound the law, no more wise men to counsel us, no more prophets to say their word? They thought to compass my death by their clamour; to all my 19 warnings would pay heed no longer. Lord, give me audience; listen to these pratings of my enemies. Must they make such a 20 return for my good will, laying a snare to take my life? Bethink thee, how I ever stood up before thee to plead for them, to 21 avert thy anger from them. Henceforth leave thy children to famish, or give them up to butchery; may their wives be childless widows, their grown men die of pestilence, their young men by the sword-thrust 22 in battle; let their homes ring with lamentation, a prey to the sudden onslaught of robbers! Cunning the snare they laid, deep the pit they dug to entrap me; but there is no hiding from thee, Lord, the designs they have on my life. Do not forgive their malice, keep their guilt ever in thy sight; cast them down to earth at thy presence, and in thy anger make an end of them.

19 Up, the Lord said to me, and get thee a jar of earthenware; take it to the valley of Ben-Ennom, close to the Earthenware Gate, with elders of the people and some of the older priests for thy company; there prophesy as I bid thee. To the dynasty of Juda, to all the citizens of Jerusalem, give this message from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: I mean to bring such calamity on this place, as shall ring in the ears of all that hear it. The place that once was mine, now alienated by the rebels that dwell there; to alien gods they never knew, no fathers of theirs, no kings of Juda ever knew, they have done sacrifice in this place, drenching it with the blood of the innocent. Here the gods of the country-side must have their hill-shrines, and children must be burnt as a sacrifice in their honour; a rite not of my prescribing, or enjoining, or imagining. And now, the Lord says, a time is coming when it will no more be called Topheth, or the Valley of Ben-Ennom; it will be called the Valley of the Slain. In this valley all the hopes of Juda and Jerusalem shall be poured away;
 at the sword's point they shall meet their enemy and fall into pitiless hands, and I will give leave to bird in air, beast on earth, to prey on the carrion of them. A thing of horror and scorn this city shall be; no passer-by but will shudder at it, or hiss derision at the memory of its sufferings.
 Nay, a pitiless enemy shall beleague them with so hard a siege, that I will leave them no food save the flesh of son and daughter;
 man shall eat man.

Then break that jar of thine, for all thy company to see, and give them this message from the Lord of hosts: Broken to pieces you shall be, nation and city, like yonder thing of clay that is past all repairing; men will be finding room for their dead in Topheth, because other buryingground is none. Such, the Lord says, is the doom I have pronounced on city and citizens; Jerusalem itself shall be a Topheth, all the houses in it, and yonder palace where the kings of Juda reigned, as Topheth unclean; it was there, on the roof-tops, they sacrificed to all the host of heaven, and made offering to alien gods.

¹ Literally, 'before the rock of the field'. The text may be corrupt, and perhaps conceals a proper name.

His errand at Topheth done, Jeremias took his stand in the temple courts, and gave the people this message from the Lord God of Israel: All these threats against Jerusalem and her daughter cities I mean to perform; the punishment of a yoke refused, a call unheeded.

20 When Jeremias uttered this prophecy, one of those who heard him was Phassur, son of Emmer, a priest who was entrusted with the care of the temple. This Phassur gave Jeremias a beating, and put him in the stocks at the upper gate of Benjamin, in the temple precincts, but next day released him. A new name the Lord has for thee, Jeremias told him, instead of Phassur; he means to call thee Danger-Everywhere. Danger enough thou shalt have, the Lord says, thou and those friends of thine; with thy own eyes thou shalt see the enemy put them to the sword, when I make the king of Babylon master of Juda; to Babylon he will take them, and put them to the sword there. All the wealth of this city, all the fruits of its toil, all that is of price, all the treasury of Juda's kings, those enemies shall have in their power, to plunder and carry off and take back to Babylon with them. And thou, Phassur, with all thy household, shalt go into exile; to Babylon thou shalt go, in Babylon thou shalt die, and there find burial with all such friends of thine as listened to thy lying prophecy.

Lord, thou hast sent me on a fool's errand; if I played a fool's part, a strength greater than mine overmastered me; morn to night, what a laughing-stock am I, every man's nay-word! Long have I prophesied, and still I clamoured against men's wickedness, and still cried ruin; day in, day out, nothing it earns me, this divine spokesmanhip, but reproach and mockery. Did I essay to put the Lord out of my thoughts, and speak no more in his name, all at once it seemed as though a raging fire were locked in my bosom, pierced my whole frame, till I was worn out with it, and could bear no more. For me, danger ¹⁰ everywhere; so many crying, Denounce him, and that contemptuous cry echoed by all the companions I trusted, ever at my side; Denounce him we will; he may be fooled yet! Then we can overmaster him, and take our vengeance! But the Lord ¹¹ stands at my side, a strong champion; fall and fail they must, my persecutors, and be disappointed of their hopes; fools, that cannot foresee shame eternal, shame indelible, awaiting them! But thou, Lord of ¹² hosts, true judge that canst read the inmost thoughts of man's heart, let me live to see thee punish them; to thee I have made my plea known.¹ Sing to the Lord yet, praise ¹³ the Lord yet; he does not leave a defenceless life at the mercy of the wicked.

Cursed be the day of my birth! A time ¹⁴ for cursing it was, not for blessing, when my mother brought me into the world. Cursed be the man who told my father a ¹⁵ son had been born to him, and brought gladness, ay, gladness, into his heart! For that good news, be he rewarded with the noise of battle-cry at morn, dirge at noon, like some city the Lord overthrows in anger unrelenting! Why did he not slay ¹⁷ me yet unborn, the womb for my tomb, and frustrate my mother's hope eternally? Why must I come out into the light of day, ¹⁸ where only labour and sorrow greet me, and in disappointed striving all my life is spent?

21 And this was the answer Jeremias had from the Lord, when king Sedecias sent two envoys to consult him; their names were Phassur son of Melchias, and Sophonias son of Maasias, a priest. The king sought a divine oracle about the ² war then levied on him by Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon; would the Lord grant his people wondrous deliverance as of old? Would the siege be raised? And ³ Jeremias sent them back to the royal presence, with this message from the Lord, ⁴ the God of Israel: All the strength you have put into the field,² to meet the king of Babylon and your Chaldaean besiegers at a distance from the walls, I mean to force back into the city and coop it up within.

¹ A repetition of 11. 20 above.

² Literally, 'all the weapons you have in your hands'.

5 Then my arm shall be raised to strike, then my power shall be exerted, but against you; I will be all anger, all indignation, all 6 resentment, smiting the inhabitants of this city with a great pestilence that shall slay 7 both man and beast. But not king Sedecias; he shall be left alive, and some of his courtiers and his retinue, some of the citizens will be left alive, plague and war and famine notwithstanding. And these shall fall into the hands of Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon, into the hands of a pitiless enemy, that will put them to the sword without ransom, or ruth, or respite.

8 And this warning the Lord gives to the common folk: Here is choice I offer you between life and death, take which course 9 you will. To remain in this city means death by sword, famine, or pestilence; leave it, and go over to the investing army of Chaldaeans, and you shall be spared, 10 glad enough to escape with your lives. For woe, not weal, I keep this city ever in regard; the king of Babylon shall be master of it, and burn it to the ground.

11 And for king and princes of Juda: Men of David's line, here is a message from the 12 Lord for your hearing. Learn betimes to make true award, and rob the oppressor of his prey, or my vengeance will blaze out against you for your ill-doings, like fire that still burns and will not be quenched.

13 Have at thee, proud city, the Lord says, the valley thy dwelling-place, rock-built guardian of the plain! Boast you, its townspeople, that on you no stroke shall fall, none shall reach your lair? You shall be called to account, the Lord says, as your ill-doings have deserved; in this forest I will light such a fire as shall consume all around it.¹

22 A message from the Lord, I must betake myself to the royal palace, and make proclamation there; Listen to a divine warning, king of Juda though thou be, and heir to David's throne; it is for thee and thy courtiers and thy retinue, all that claim entry here. Just sentence, the Lord says, and right award; rob the oppressor of his prey; to alien, orphan and widow do neither despite nor wrong; never, within these walls, be innocence condemned to death. This warning if you obey, through these palace gates the heirs of David and of David's throne, with horses and chariots, courtiers and retinue, shall yet pass to and fro. Disobey, the Lord says, and my own honour is engaged to make, of this palace, a ruin. On the royal house of Juda this is the Lord's sentence: Growth I found here once, generous as in Galaad or on Lebanon's height; now I have sworn to make a desert of it, no place for the haunts of men.² Who shall strike the blow, and with what arms, is decreed already; all those fair cedars shall be cut down, and cast into the fire.

Nations a many shall pass by those ruins; and when a man asks his neighbour what it meant, that the Lord should deal so hardly with a great city like this, the answer will be, It was because they forsook the covenant of the Lord their God, and worshipped alien gods, took alien gods for their masters.

Not for the dead your tears, not for him bow your heads; if weep you must, weep for him that must go and come again no more, never again see the land of his birth! Sellum,³ that followed his father Josias on the throne of Juda, is leaving Jerusalem, the Lord says, and will never come back to it; die he must in that country to which I have banished him, and see this land no more.

Alas, for the palace that is built with gains ill gotten, for halls founded only on wrong! Alas for the man that sets his fellow-man vainly drudging, and leaves his wages unpaid! A fine house I will make of it, says he, and wide rooms in it! Here he will throw out a window, there he will panel a wall with cedar, and paint it vermilion. Art thou hoping for a long reign, that thou shouldst challenge comparison with the cedar?⁴ Thy father was one that ate and drank at his ease, gave every man his just due, and was content; well for him that he gave the friendless and the poor redress, as men will when they bethink themselves of me. Thou hast no eyes, no thoughts, but for gain; for innocent men's undoing, for oppression, for the reckless pursuit of mischief. This, then, is the Lord's sentence upon Joachim, son to Josias and king of Juda: For him no cry shall be made, Brother, what grief! Sister of mine, what grief!¹ For him no cry shall be made, Ah, what a master! Ah, what renown! An ass's burial he shall have, cast out, a stinking corpse, beyond the gates of Jerusalem.

¹ vv. 13, 14. These verses are generally understood as referring to Jerusalem; but the geographical description makes this uncertain. ² Literally, 'For the Lord says this about the house of the king of Juda: Galaad thou to me, the summit of Lebanon; I swear to make thee a desert, uninhabitable cities'.

³ Sellum (also mentioned in I Par. 3. 15) is usually identified with Joachaz (IV Kg. 23. 30). ⁴ The first half of this verse is generally interpreted as asking, Does Joachim think that competitiveness in the matter of cedar panelling will make more of a king of him? The translation given above, which follows the Latin, perhaps demands less of the imagination. 'Ate and drank at his ease', i.e. took things as the came, instead of occupying himself with grandiose schemes; cf. Eccl. 2. 24 and passim.

Get thee gone, faithless people, to Lebanon, and cry out there; fill Basan with thy voice, and let Abarim² echo the cry again; ruin has overtaken all those lovers of thine. In the days of thy ease, I gave thee warning, but thou wouldst not listen; it was ever thus from thy girlhood's days, my voice went unheard. Drifting with the wind, the drovers thou once didst follow, captive all those that once held thy love! Be ashamed at last, and blush for all thy wickedness. High on Lebanon thy dwelling-place, high in the cedars that nest of thine, piteous shall be thy moan when pangs overtake thee, like the pangs of a woman in travail.

And of Joachim's son Jechonias, that is heir to the throne of Juda, the Lord says this: Were he the signet ring on my right hand, I would cast him off none the less. Thou hast sworn enemies to fear; Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, and his Chaldeans, shall have the mastery of thee. Cast away, thyself and the queen-mother who bore thee, into an alien land, far from the land of your birth, to die there; ever longing for home, and home returning never. What, is he but a broken piece of earthenware, this Jechonias, a useless shard, that he should be thrown away, and his sons with him, cast out into a land unknown? Alas, my country, alas, alas, my country, bitter hearing the Lord sends thee: Write him down a barren trunk, a life gone to waste; child of his race shall never mount David's throne, or govern this realm of Juda.

23 Out upon them, the Lord says, the shepherds who ravage and disperse my flock, sheep of my own pasturing! This is the Lord's word to the shepherds that guide his people: You are the men who have dispersed my flock, driven it to and fro, and made no account of it; account you must give it me, says the Lord, Israel's God, for all you have done amiss. Then will I reassemble all that is left of my flock, scattered over so many lands, and restore them to their old pasture-ground, to increase and grow numerous there; shepherds I mean to give them that will do shepherd's work; fears and alarms shall be none to daunt them, and none shall be missing from their full count, the Lord says. Nay, a time is coming, the Lord says, when I will raise up, from the stock of David, a faithful scion at last. The land shall have a king to reign over it, and reign over it wisely, giving just sentence and due award. When that time comes, Juda shall find deliverance, none shall disturb Israel's rest; and the name given to this king shall be, The Lord vindicates us. In those days to come, says the divine message, the living Lord men swear by will no longer be the God who rescued Israel from Egypt; the living God will be one who rescued Israel and brought them home from the north country, and from all the places of exile he had once designed for them, to live in their own land again.³

A message to the prophets: Crushed is the heart in me, and my whole being trembles; my thoughts whirl like a drunken man's, bemused by a divine presence, by awe of a divine voice. The whole land is a nest of adulterers; their guilt it is that widows the countryside, parches the upland meadows; reckless their pursuit of mischief, through the power they wield all goes amiss. Prophet and priest alike are impious; in my own house, the Lord says, those ill-doings of theirs are plain to view.

¹ The use of the word 'sister' would suggest that the mourners are represented as condoling with one another upon their common loss; the sense being 'Alas, O my sister', not 'Alas for my sister' (the common interpretation).

² For 'Abarim' the Latin version has 'the Passers-by', translating the word instead of transliterating it. 'Lovers' is understood by some to mean the kings of Juda; others would understand it of foreign countries, like Egypt, with which Juda had formed entangling alliances.

³ vs. 7, 8. See 16. 14, 15.

12 Perilously they shall fare as one that walks by night in slippery places; falter and fall they must; punishment awaits them, the Lord says, my audit-year is at hand. For the prophets of Samaria how was it I lost all liking?¹ Because they were the spokesmen of Baal, and did but lead Israel astray, that was my people. And now the same foul adultery I find in the prophets of Jerusalem, the same treacherous dealings; and the sinner is encouraged to go on in his evil ways, till city and citizens, for me, are one with Sodom and Gomorrhah. A warning to you then, prophets, from the Lord God of hosts, that he will give you wormwood to eat, gall to drink; you, the fountain-head of that pollution which overflows all the land.

16 Do not listen, says the Lord of hosts, to the prophets who prophesy only to fool you; fancy of theirs, not word of mine, inspires the utterance. To my blasphemers they bring divine assurance that all shall go well with them; never a man so set on his own false aims but they will tell him, Harm shall never touch thee. Never a one of them privy to the Lord's designs, never one looked and learned, listened and heard his message.

19 Like a whirlwind it will suddenly appear, the Lord's vengeance; will break in storm over rebel heads. Nor shall the divine anger be appeased till the blow has been struck and the decree executed; what his design was, you shall know all too well, all too late.²

21 An errand these prophets ran, but none of mine; a message they gave, but not of my sending. Privy to my design had they been, ah, then they should have uttered my own warnings, and so I might have turned my people aside from false paths, and erring thoughts! God am I, the Lord says, only when I stand near, and not when I am far away? Where, he would know, will you hide so close that he is not watching you, he, the Lord, that fills heaven and earth? No word, he says, but reaches my ears when one of these prophets gives false guidance in my name; I had a dream, he will tell you, I had a dream! Will they never have had enough of their lying divinations, their cheating fantasies? Dreams banded from mouth to mouth, for these would they have my people barter away the memory of me, as their fathers did for Baal? Nay, let the dreamer be content to tell his dreams, and the prophet to whom my word comes utter my word faithfully; chaff and grain must not be mingled. My word is a fire, the Lord says, a hammer to break rocks in pieces; out upon the prophets, I say, who proclaim divine utterances they have borrowed from their fellow men;³ out upon the prophets, I say, who let their tongues wag and then cry, Oracle. Out upon the prophets, I say, who dream all amiss and recount their dreams, leading my people astray with their lies and their mummeries; yet errand or warrant they had none from me, the Lord says, nor yet to this people of mine bring any advantage.

And if people, or prophet, or priest, should greet thee with the question, Pray, what burden⁴ is the Lord taking up to-day? thy answer shall be, You are the burden I bear, the Lord says, and I mean to cast you from my shoulders. Prophet, priest or simple citizen that asks thus about the Lord's burden does it at his own peril, and the peril of all his household; be content to ask friend or neighbour, What oracle, what message has the Lord given? Do not speak any more of his burden. If you do, you lay a heavy charge upon yourselves, by bandying words with the living God, the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel. Ask the prophet what the Lord's oracle, what the Lord's message is; if you ask after the Lord's burden, this warning I give you from him: For your disobedience to the message I sent, commanding you to use the word Burden no longer, I will make a burden of you, and carry you away, and leave you abandoned, you and your city, my gift to you and to your fathers. You shall be a laughing-stock for ever, a by-

¹ 'I lost all liking'; the Latin here probably means not 'I found foolishness', but 'I found insipidity', which is an exact rendering of the Hebrew.

² vv. 19, 20. See 30. 23, 24, where the same words are repeated; some think they have been included by error in the present context.

³ Literally, 'Steal my words each man from his neighbour', but the context (cf. verse 22 above) makes it clear that there is no allusion to genuine messages from Almighty God.

⁴ vv. 33-40. The Hebrews used the same word for (i) a load or pack, (ii) the content of a divine revelation; see Is. 13. 1 and psalm. The people of Jerusalem, weary of Jeremias' continual pessimism, used to mock him by asking what was the Lord's 'burden' (much as we talk about the burden of a song, the burden of a complaint). This levity of theirs is here rebuked, and threatened with punishment.

word eternally; time shall never efface the memory of your shame.

24 After king Nabuchodonosor, of Babylon, had carried off the king of Juda, Jechonias the son of Joachim, and taken him away to Babylon with all his nobles, and all the carpenters and smiths in Jerusalem, the Lord shewed me a vision. I saw two baskets of figs, set down at the gate of the Lord's temple. The figs in one basket were of excellent nature, like those which first ripen; in the other, most foul, so foul there was no eating them. What seest thou, Jeremias? the Lord asked, and I told him, Figs, the good ones excellent good, the foul ones very foul, too foul for eating. Then the Lord's word came to me, A message from the Lord God of Israel: This meaning the good figs have, that good will of mine goes with the men of Juda I have banished from their homes, and sent away into the country of Chaldaea. I will smile on them once more, and bring them back home, and all will be building now, not pulling down, planting now, not uprooting. And I will give them a heart to know me, know me by my divine name; they my people, and I their God, once in good earnest they have retraced their steps, and come back to me. And this meaning the foul figs have, that could not be eaten, they were so foul. Doom like theirs I have in store for Sedecias, king of Juda, the Lord says, and for his nobles, and for all those other men of Jerusalem that have either stayed in the city or taken up their abode in Egypt. Trouble¹ and conflict their destiny shall be in every kingdom of the world; they shall be a laughing-stock and a warning, a by-word and a name to curse by, in all the countries I have appointed for their banishment. Sword and famine and pestilence I will let loose upon them, till none of them is left in this land, my gift to them and to their fathers.

25 Here is a message for the whole people of Juda, entrusted to Jeremias in the fourth year of Joakim's reign

(that was son to Josias) in Juda, the first of Nabuchodonosor's in Babylon. To all Juda, and to all the citizens of Jerusalem, the prophet Jeremias delivered it: These twenty-three years, ever since the thirteenth year of Josias' reign, that was son to Amon, the Lord's word has been coming to me, and ever I was early at your doors repeating it, but you would not listen. Early to your doors the Lord sent all those prophets that were servants of his, but hearing there was none, nor heeding. False aims, he warned you, lead you by false paths astray; come back to me, and you shall dwell yet in this land, my gift to you and to your fathers from the beginning to the end of time. Would you court slavery by worshipping alien gods, defy my vengeance with your ill-doings, till I plague you? But you would not listen to me, the Lord says; ill was done yet, and my vengeance was yet defied. And now, says the Lord of hosts, finding you disobedient still, I mean to summon all the nations of the north country, with Nabuchodonosor, that servant of mine that is king in Babylon; I, the Lord, will bid him march on this land and its citizens, and all its neighbours. I mean to make an end of them, and leave it a thing to provoke wonder and scorn, desolate for all time. Never again cries of joy and mirth, never again the voice of bridegroom and of bride, never a mill turning, never a lamp to shine. For seventy years this whole land shall be a desert and a portent, and the king of Babylon shall have all these peoples for his slaves.

Then, when seventy years have passed, I will call the king of Babylon to account, the Lord says, for all the wrongs he has done, with his people and with that Chaldaean country of his; that country in its turn I will leave desolate for ever. The sentence I have pronounced against it shall be executed in full, all the doom Jeremias has foretold in this book of prophecy against all the nations of the world. Great nations, proud kings, have held Israel enslaved; now for their own lives, their own deeds, they too must make amends.²

¹ According to the Hebrew text, 'a source of shuddering'. The same word occurs in 15. 4, where the Latin version translates 'ferment'.

² vv. 12-14. Some think that these verses are wrongly inserted in their present context. And indeed, the order of the text from this point onwards remains uncertain. The Latin version follows the Hebrew; but the Septuagint Greek preserves quite a different tradition. The chapters which are numbered 26 to 31 in our text appear much later in the Greek, between ch. 50 and ch. 51, nor do they appear in precisely the same order.

- 15 The Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, bade me take the cup of vengeance that was in his hand, and give drink out of it to all the nations to which my errand lay; drink it they should, and reel to and fro, be-mused by the threat of his sword let loose among them. So I took the cup from the Lord's hand; nor was there any of the nations the Lord had sent me to threaten must drink, and the townships of Juda, kings and nobles with the rest; the land was doomed to become a desert, a thing of wonder and scorn, a name to be used in cursing, as it is at this day. Pharaoh king of Egypt and all his court and his nobles must drink, and all the mingled people of his realm. No king in the land of Hus but must drink of it, nor among the Philistine cities, Ascalon, Gaza, Accaron and Azotus, nor in Edom, Moab and Ammon, no king in Tyre, and the Sidonian country, and the islands that lie beyond the sea. Dedan must drink, and Thema, and Buz, and all the folk with shaven heads, all the kings of Arabia, and the western desert kings.¹ Nor any king in Zambri, Elam, and Media, nor any king in the north country, far or near, but must pledge his neighbour; all the kings of the earth must have their share, and Sesach² not till the last.
- 27 This message I was to give them from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, Drink, besot yourselves, and then fall to vomiting; and topple over at last, never to rise again, so well shall my sword do its work among you! If they made to refuse the cup I offered them, this more I should add: Nay, but drink you must, says the Lord of hosts; here am I beginning my work of vengeance with that city which is the shrine of my name, and shall you be acquitted, you others, and go scot-free? That shall never be, says the Lord of hosts; to the sword if I appeal, it is for a whole world's punishment.
- 30 With such words as these thou shalt prophesy to them: From on high, from his holy dwelling-place, the Lord makes his voice heard, terrible as lion roaring; as roar of lion against sheep-fold, and that fold his own! Loud echoes his vintage-cry as he treads down all the dwellers on earth; to the ends of the world it must echo; a whole world he calls to account, impleads the whole race of men; The sword's point for my adversaries, the Lord says. From nation to nation, says the Lord of hosts, calamity will spread, like a great whirlwind sprung up from the corners of the earth, and from end to end of it the bodies of the Lord's foes, unwept, ungathered, unburied, shall lie like dung on the ground. Cry out, make loud lament, shepherds of the nations, and you, the lordliest among their flocks, go strewn with ashes; your day is done, slain you must lie there, unvalued as some delicate vase broken to pieces. For shepherds, and the pride of the flock, no refuge now; hark how they lament, shepherds and pride of the flock, for pasture-grounds the Lord has laid waste! Silent they lie now, once happy fields, under ban of the Lord's vengeance. Lion springs not from his lair more suddenly; all their land lies waste, so pitiless the invader's onset,³ so pitiless the Lord's anger.

26 At the beginning of Joachim's reign in Juda, that was son to Josias, word came from the Lord, and this was his bidding: Go and stand in the temple porch, and there, to pilgrims from all the townships of Juda, deliver the message I have entrusted to thee; no word of it do thou retrench. It may be they will listen, and go astray no longer; then I will forgo the punishment I have devised for their ill-doings. This divine warning give them: Listen to me, and live by the law I have enjoined upon you, obeying the call of the prophets, those servants of mine whom I sent early to your doors, upon an errand that went unheeded; or this sanctuary, too, shall be deserted as Silo, and this city shall be an accursed name, all the world over.

Priests and prophets and townfolk heard if alike, this utterance of Jeremias in the temple; and when he had thus done the Lord's errand for all the people to hear, priests and prophets and townfolk laid hands upon him, crying out, His life must pay for it! What, would he threaten in the Lord's name that this temple is to share Silo's doom, this city to be left forlorn, uninhabited? There, in the Lord's house, Jeremias must confront the anger of a whole people. When they heard of it, the nobles of Juda left palace for temple, and there held assize, at the approaches of the New Gate. Before these, and before the general assembly, priest and prophet called for the death penalty; here was a man who had foretold, in the public hearing, calamity for Jerusalem. To nobles and to people Jeremias had but one defence: Nothing have I said against temple or city but what the Lord's errand bade me. Come, do but amend your lives and your likings, and listen to the Lord your God; he will spare you the doom he has pronounced upon you. As for me, I am in your hands; do with me what you will, what you think right. Only be sure of this, if you kill me, you will bring the guilt of murder on yourselves, your city, and all that dwell there; no word you have heard from me but has the Lord's true warrant.

¹ For the Arab custom of cutting the hair back from the temples, cf. 9. 26. The meaning of the Hebrew text is probably 'the kings of the desert steppes' rather than 'the western desert kings'. ² 'Sesach' is a cabalistic way of referring to Babylon; cf. 51. 41. This item in the catalogue, like certain others, is absent from the Septuagint Greek. ³ For 'the invader' the Latin version has 'the dove', which is a possible translation of the Hebrew, but yields no satisfactory sense.

And this answer both nobles and town-folk made to priest and prophet, There is no death sentence lies against this man; as the spokesman of the Lord our God he has given us his message. There were some of the older citizens that rose to defend him publicly; Remember the prophet Michaeas of Morasthi, they said, in the days of king Ezechias, who told the people of Juda: Sion shall be no better than a ploughed field, says the Lord of hosts, Jerusalem but a heap of stones, the temple height only a hanging wood.¹ Did Ezechias king of Juda, or his subjects, thereupon put him to death? Nay, they feared the Lord too well for that; went about to appease his anger, so that he spared them the punishment he had threatened. It were pity of our lives, did we so great a wrong!

Another prophet there was that came in the Lord's name, Urias, the son of Semei, a man of Cariathiarim, and used no gentler language about this city and country than Jeremias himself. King Joachim, and all his chieftains and his nobles, were for making away with him when they heard such warnings; and though he took alarm at the rumour of it and fled to Egypt, royal pursuivants were sent there under Elnathan, son of Achobor, to bring him back; whereupon king Joachim put him to the sword, and cast his body away among the tombs of the common folk. But Jeremias had a friend in Ahicam, the son of Saphan, who would not let him be handed over to the people and put to death.

27 At the beginning of the new king's² reign in Juda, that was son to Josias, word came from the Lord to Jeremias after this fashion. The Lord bade me make myself a yoke, band and bar, and put it about my neck; let it be the answer, he said, given by Sedecias, king of Juda, to the envoys that have come to him from the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Sidon. This message thou shalt give them, for their masters, from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: My strength it was, the exertion of my power, that made earth, made man and beast to walk on it; and I give dominion over it to the man on whom my choice falls. And all these countries I have handed over to my servant Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon, making even the wild beasts subject to him; all the world must obey him, and his son and his grandson after him, until the time has run out, for him and for his land both; nations a many and great kings shall pay him their homage. Nation or people that will not be vassal to Nabuchodonosor, will not bow to Babylon's yoke, I will punish with sword and famine and pestilence, until the last of them is left at his mercy. Do not listen, then, to those prophets of yours, diviner and dreamer, soothsayer and sorcerer, who bid you resist the king of Babylon; whither will they bring you, these lying prophecies? To a land far from your home, to sentence of banishment, and your undoing. But let a nation once bow to the king of Babylon's yoke, and become his vassal, to that nation, the Lord says, I will leave its own fields to till, its own home to dwell in.

¹ See Mic. 3. 12. ² The Hebrew text, and all the versions except the Syriac, give the name of the reigning monarch as Joachim. But it seems clear this must have been a scribe's error; cf. verses 3 and 12, where Sedecias is mentioned instead.

12 All this message I gave to Sedecias, king of Juda; Your lives shall be spared, I told him, if you will only bow your necks to the yoke, letting king and people of 13 Babylon be your masters; will you court death, king and people at once, from sword, famine, and pestilence, the Lord's threat against all who refuse submission?
 14 To the prophets who declare you shall never be vassals of Babylon, give no heed; they are cheating you with lies; warrant 15 from me they have none, yet falsely claim to be my spokesmen, to your own casting away and undoing, and theirs moreover who so prophesy.
 16 And this message I gave from the Lord to priests and people: Do not listen to those prophets of yours, who bid you expect the speedy return of the sacred treasures from Babylon. These are but lying prophecies; 17 do not let them deter you from submitting to the king of Babylon, your only hope of safety; shall this city become a desert?
 18 Prophets if they be, spokesmen of the Lord if they be, let them rather plead with him, the Lord of hosts, that the treasures still left in temple and palace and city may not 19 find their way to Babylon too. Doom the Lord of hosts has decreed upon all of them, pillars and brazen basin and stands, and those other treasures that remained here 20 untouched, when Joachim's son Jechonias, that once reigned in Juda, was carried off to Nabuchodonosor's capital at Babylon, with all the notables of this city and realm.
 21 This he would have you know, he, the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, that all the 22 treasures left in temple, palace or city shall be carried away to Babylon in their turn. There they shall remain, the Lord says, till the time comes for demanding an account of them, for bringing them back and setting them up again where they stood before.

28 Sedecias had then but lately come to the throne of Juda; it was the fourth year of his reign. In the fifth month of that year a prophet from Gabaa, Hananias son of Azur, came up to me in the temple, in full sight of priests and worshippers. A message, he said, from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: So much for the king of Babylon's yoke! I have 3 broken it to pieces. Two years must run their course, and then all shall come back again here; all the temple treasures Nabuchodonosor took away with him to his capital at Babylon, and the king of Juda too, Jechonias son of Joachim, with all the exiles from Juda Babylon now holds. I will bring them back, the Lord says, and break the yoke of the king of Babylon to pieces.

But from Jeremias this prophet Hananias had a prophet's answer, there in the presence of the priests, and of all who stood by in the Lord's house; Amen to that! Well indeed it were if the Lord would grant this prophecy of thine fulfilment, would bring all the temple treasure home, and all the exiles at Babylon! Only, here is a word for thy hearing, and for the general hearing no less. So many prophets before thy day and mine, so many nations, such proud empires their theme, and all alike told of battle, of distress, of famine; here is one at last that brings good news! Why then, when his words come true, none will doubt that his errand was from the Lord. At that, Hananias took the band from Jeremias' neck and broke it, crying out before all the people, A message from the Lord! Thus, when two years have run their course, I will break the yoke which king Nabuchodonosor of Babylon has laid on the necks of all the nations! And Jeremias said no more, but passed on.

Thus did Hananias break the band on the neck of his fellow prophet; and thereupon came the word of the Lord to Jeremias, Go and give Hananias this message from the Lord: Wooden yoke break, iron yoke make! The Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, tells thee that he is putting a yoke of iron on the necks of all the nations, subjecting them to Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon. His subjects they shall be; even over the wild beasts dominion is granted him. This, too, Jeremias said to his fellow prophet, Listen, Hananias; errand from the Lord thou hast none, thou art cheating yonder people with false hopes. And this doom the Lord has uttered: I mean to banish thee from this earth altogether; thou shalt die within the year, for this language of rebellion against the Lord. Hananias died that year, before seven months were over.

29 To those other elders, priests and prophets who had already gone into exile, to all the citizens Nabuchodonosor had carried off with him to Babylon, the prophet Jeremiah sent a message in writing. Among these were king Jeconias and the queen-mother, and the chamberlains, and all that were of note in realm or capital; nor were any carpenters or smiths left in Jerusalem. The new king of Juda, Sedecias, was sending Elasa, the son of Saphan, and Gamarias, the son of Helcias, on a mission to Nabuchodonosor at Babylon, and to their hands the letter of Jeremiah was entrusted.

It ran thus: A message from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, to the men of Jerusalem he has sent into exile at Babylon! I would have you build yourselves houses of your own to dwell in, plant yourselves gardens of your own to support you, wive and gender, and of your sons and daughters wed man with maid, maid with man, to breed sons and daughters in their turn; grow numerous, that are now so few, there in your land of exile. A new home I have given you; for the welfare of that realm be ever concerned, ever solicit the divine favour; its welfare is yours. And this warning he sends you, the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Never allow prophet and soothsayer that are of your company to mislead you; his dreams let the dreamer abandon; prophets there are, the Lord says, that claim falsely to be my spokesmen, and warrant from me have none. All but seventy years, he tells you, must have run their course before Babylon's time is up; then I will come to relieve you, and make good the promise of your return.

I have not lost sight of my plan for you, the Lord says, and it is your welfare I have in mind, not your undoing; for you, too, I have a destiny and a hope. Cry out to me then, and your suit shall prosper;¹ plead with me, and I will listen; look for me, and you shall find me, if you will but look for me in good earnest. Find me you shall, the Lord says, and your sentence of exile shall be reversed; the same Lord who scattered them among alien folk and in far countries will bring the exiles home. So much for your claim that² the Lord has revived the gift of prophecy among you, there in Babylon.

As for the king who now sits on David's throne, and the citizens who dwell here now, instead of sharing your exile, this is the divine sentence: I mean to plague them, says the Lord of hosts, with sword and famine and pestilence; of no more account will I make them than a basket of foul figs, so foul there is no eating them. Sword and famine and pestilence shall follow at their heels; bane they shall be to all the kingdoms of the world, a name to curse by, a thing of wonder and of scorn, a laughing-stock among all the countries I have appointed for their banishment. All this, because they would not listen to any word of mine, the Lord says; early to their doors I sent the prophets that were servants of mine, I, your Lord, and could get no hearing.

Listen, then, to the Lord's decree, men of Jerusalem I have sent into exile at Babylon. This doom the Lord has pronounced upon Achab, the son of Colias, and Sedecias the son of Maasias, false prophets both of them, that speak to you as in my name; I mean to hand them over for punishment to Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, and that punishment you shall witness for yourselves. Wherever exiles from Juda are found in the Chaldaean country, this shall be the curse they use: Such doom the Lord give thee as he gave to Sedecias and Achab, that the king of Babylon roasted over a fire! This is great shame they have brought on Israel, bedding with their neighbours' wives, and uttering in my name counterfeit prophecies that had no warrant of mine; of these misdoings I am judge and witness both.

And another message must be given to Semeias of Nehelam from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, about the letter he sent to the citizens left in Jerusalem, and namely to the high priest Sophonias, the son of Maasias, and his fellow priests. This letter ran, If the Lord would have thee follow Joiada in the high priesthood, it was to make thee master of his house, ready

¹ 'And your suit shall prosper'; literally, 'and you shall go'. The verb seems to be used as in Jg. 4. 24; the rendering 'and you shall go and plead with me and I will listen' breaks the run of the sentence.
² Literally, 'because you say that'. Some think the order of the text has become dislocated, and this verse ought to come between verses 20 and 21.

with stocks and gaol for any mad fellow 27 that came a-prophesying. Why does Jeremias of Anathoth go unrebuked, and prophesy among you still? He has written to us here in Babylon for the very purpose of telling us our exile shall be long; we must build ourselves houses to dwell in, we must 28 plant gardens to support us! This letter was read aloud to Jeremias by the high 29 priest; and then it was that the Lord's word came to Jeremias, with a message he must send to the exiles: This doom the Lord utters against Semeias of Nehelam. Would he prophesy in my name, a man that has no warrant from me, and give you 30 confidence in false hopes? I will call Semeias of Nehelam to account for it, the Lord says, and his children after him. Man of his race there shall be none surviving among this people of mine, the Lord says, to see my bounty bestowed on it. Against me, the Lord, he has used the language of rebellion.

30 Word came to Jeremias from the Lord, the God of Israel, bidding him write down in a book the revelation made known to him. A time is coming, the Lord says, when I will reverse the sentence of exile against my people of Israel and 31 Juda; I, the Lord, will restore them to possession of the land I gave to their fathers.

This is the divine promise made to Israel and Juda: A cry of terror, the Lord says, for all to hear! All is consternation, where all was peace. Why, here is a riddle and a wonder; can motherhood fall to the lot of men folk? Why is there none to be seen but goes by, hand on loins, cheeks blanched, 32 like a woman in travail? Alas for pity, what a day is this, none like it; what a time of distress for Jacob's race! Yet it shall leave them unharmed. A promise they have from the Lord of hosts that he will break the yoke they bear, when that day comes, and part their chains asunder; no more shall they be at the mercy of alien masters, 33 they shall obey the Lord their God only, and that David-king of theirs whom he will give them.

34 Have thou no fear, the Lord says, Jacob, that art my servant still; not for Israel is danger brewing. From that far country of exile I mean to restore thee, restore those children of thine; Jacob shall return, and live at ease, every blessing shall enjoy, and enemies have none to fear; I am at thy side, the Lord says, to protect thee. Of all the lands in which I have dispersed thee I will take full toll, but not of thee; I would but chasten thee with due measure kept, lest thou shouldst hold thyself altogether acquitted. Poor Sion, thine is a wound past curing, a grievous hurt, the Lord says; no man brings thee redress or remedy, salve to heal thee thou hast none; thy old lovers think of thee no more, woo thee no more. A shrewd blow I struck thee, unsparing of correction; so many thy misdoings, thy guilt so inveterate. Misdoings a many, and guilt inveterate, these be the cause of thy hurt, and I the doer of it; and wouldst thou cry out upon a grief there is no remedying? Only be sure of this, the enemies that prey on thee shall themselves fall a prey to exile; spoiled thy spoilers shall be, and all that plunder thee I will give up to plunder. Then I will heal that scar of thine, the Lord says, cure thee of thy wounds; too soon they called thee a neglected bride, Sion the unwooed!

Nay, says the Lord, I mean to bring tent-dwelling Jacob home, have pity on those ruined walls, build the city anew on its height, set up the temple and its ordinances anew; here songs of praise shall echo once again, and cries of mirth. They shall increase, that hitherto had dwindled, be exalted, that once were brought low. Then, as in days of old, the full muster of the tribes shall have its place in my regard; who wrongs them shall be called to account for it. A prince of their own race they shall have, a home-born ruler, singled out by my own call to serve me; that office, the Lord says, none may take on himself unbidden. You shall be my own people, and I your own God.

Like a whirlwind it will suddenly appear, the Lord's vengeance; will break in storm, and light upon rebel heads. Nor shall the divine anger be appeased till the blow has been struck and the decree executed; what his design was, will be known all too well, all too late.¹

¹ v. 23, 24. These verses are repeated from 23. 19, 20, and some think they are wrongly inserted here, where the prophet is more concerned to reassure his fellow-countrymen than to threaten them.

31 No clan in Israel, the Lord says, but shall own me as its God when that day comes, and all of them shall be my people. Out there in the solitudes they have won pardon, those exiles the sword left untouched; Israel shall find a home, the Lord says, the Lord, making himself known from far away.¹ With unchanging love I love thee, and now in mercy I have drawn thee to myself. Israel, poor homeless maid, I will build thy fortunes anew; built anew they shall be, and thou shalt go forth once more, thy tambour hung about thee, among the choir of dancers. Once more thou shalt plant vineyards over the hill-country of Samaria; planted they shall be, and the men who planted them await the appointed time before they gather the vintage.² Watchmen there shall be, when that day comes, in the hill-country of Ephraim that will cry aloud, Up, to Sion go we, and there worship the Lord our God! Rejoice, the Lord says, at Jacob's triumph, the proudest of nations greet with a glad cry;³ loud echo your songs of praise, Deliverance, Lord, for thy people, for the remnant of Israel! From the north country, from the very ends of earth, I mean to gather them and bring them home; blind men and lame, pregnant women and women brought to bed, so great the muster at their home-coming. Weeping they shall come, and I, moved to pity, will bring them to their journey's end; from mountain stream to mountain stream I will lead them, by a straight road where there is no stumbling; I, Israel, thy father again, and thou, Ephraim, my first-born son.

Listen, Gentiles, to the Lord's promise; his word must go out to the islands that are far away; word that he who scattered Israel will gather Israel in, will guard it faithfully as a shepherd guards his flock. The Lord means to ransom Jacob, to grant deliverance from the tyrant's power. The exiles will return, greeting mount Sion with cries of gladness; thronging in to take possession of the Lord's gifts, corn and oil and wine, increase of flock and herd. Revived their spirits shall be, like a garden when the stream flows full; they shall hunger no more. Glad the maidens shall dance, gladness there shall be for young and old alike; I will turn all their sorrow into joy, comfort and cheer their sad hearts. Full-fed my priests shall be with dainties; blessings my people shall have, the Lord says, till they ask no more.

Now, the Lord says, a voice is heard in Rama, of lamentation and bitter mourning; it is Rachel weeping for her children, and she will not be comforted, because none is left.⁴ But thus he reassures thee: Sad voice, lament, sad eyes, weep no more; I, the Lord, give thee promise of a reward for thy working-days, a return from the enemy's country. A hope is left for thee hereafter, the Lord says; to their own possessions thy sons shall return. Doubt not I heard it, the cry of Ephraim forlorn: Lord, it was thy task to chasten me, that must learn, like bullock untamed, to bear the yoke; grant me return, and I will return to thee;⁵ thou art the Lord my God. Only when thou calledst me back to thyself did I repent; only when my lesson was learnt did I cry out upon my shame.⁶ How did I blush with confusion, bearing the disgrace the sins of my youth had earned! Why, what a favourite son is this Ephraim, what a spoilt child of mine, that I should pronounce my doom on him, and care for him none the less! In truth, my heart goes out to him; I will be merciful to him yet, the Lord says.

Way-marks leave behind thee, sad trophies⁷ be raising as thou goest, to put thee in mind of the straight road thou hast trodden. Return thou must, poor Israel, return thou must to these, thy own cities; fickle maid, dally no longer. Here is a new order of things the Lord has established on earth; weak woman is to be the protectress of man's strength.⁸

¹ 'Making himself known'; according to the Latin, 'to me', which follows the Hebrew text; but the Septuagint Greek has 'to it', i.e. Israel. ² See Lev. 19. 23-25. ³ Literally, 'neigh against the head of the nations', a phrase which cannot be interpreted with certainty. ⁴ v. 15. Cf. Mt. 2. 18.

⁵ 'Grant me return', literally, 'turn me'; 'I will return to thee', literally, 'I will turn'; and in the next verse, 'when thou calledst me back to thyself', literally, 'at my turning'. The same verb is used in Hebrew, somewhat confusingly, to express turning away and turning back, whether in a literal or in a figurative sense. ⁶ Literally, 'did I smite the thigh', a Hebrew way of showing humiliated regret.

⁷ Literally, 'bitternesses', the same word as in verse 15. But modern scholars understand it here as meaning 'cairns', and derive it from a different root. ⁸ Literally, 'a female shall surround a male', a phrase much discussed but little elucidated by commentators.

- 23 A message from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: To town and country-side of Juda I will restore the exiled folk, and once again the greeting will be heard, A blessing on thee from the Lord, fair home of true
- 24 observance, holy mountain-side! Once again Juda and Juda's townfolk shall dwell there; fields shall be tilled and flocks led out to pasture; faint hearts shall be
- 25 refreshed, and hunger's craving satisfied.
- 26 Ah, to wake upon such a sight! Then were sleep welcome.¹
- 27 A time is coming, the Lord says, when I mean to enrich Israel's home, Juda's
- 28 home, with stock of men and of cattle both; jealous watch I will still keep over them, but not, as of old, to root up and to demolish, to scatter and lay waste and to do
- 29 hurt; all shall be building, the Lord says, all shall be planting now. When that time comes, no more shall be heard of the proverb, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are being set on
- 30 edge; tooth of eater shall ache now, and a man's own guilt shall be a man's own doom.²
- 31 A time is coming, the Lord says, when I mean to ratify a new covenant with the people of Israel and with the people of
- 32 Juda. It will not be like the covenant which I made with their fathers, on the day when I took them by the hand, to rescue them from Egypt; that they should break my covenant, and I, all the while,
- 33 their master, the Lord says. No, this is the covenant I will grant the people of Israel, the Lord says, when that time comes. I will implant my law in their innermost thoughts, engrave it in their hearts; I will be their God, and they shall be my people.
- 34 There will be no need for neighbour to teach neighbour, or brother to teach brother, the knowledge of the Lord; all will know me, from the highest to the lowest. I will pardon their wrong-doing; I will not
- 35 remember their sins any more.³ A message from the Lord, from him, the God of hosts, the same who brightens day with the sun's rays, night with the ordered service of moon and star, who can stir up the sea and set its waves a-roaring; All these laws of mine will fail me, he says, before the line of Israel fails me; a people it must remain until the end of time. You have the Lord's word for it; When you can measure heaven above, he tells you, and search the foundations of earth below, then I will cast away the whole line of Israel, for all its ill deserving.

Behold, says the divine promise, a time is coming when the city shall be rebuilt in the Lord's honour, from Hananeel's Tower as far as the Corner Gate; nay, in advance of that the limit of its range shall reach, across Gareb hill, to take in Goatha, burial-ground and ash-pit and all the dead soil as far as Cedron brook, and eastward as far as the corner by the Horsemen's Gate; all shall be consecrated to the Lord; tree shall not be uprooted there henceforward, nor house overthrown.

32 A message came from the Lord to Jeremias during the tenth year of Sedecias' reign in Juda, the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor's at Babylon; the Babylonian army was besieging Jerusalem at the time, and Jeremias was a prisoner there, confined in the guard-court that lay before the royal palace. It was for his prophesying that king Sedecias had imprisoned him; what meant this threat from the Lord, of giving Jerusalem over to capture by the king of Babylon? He had said, besides: King Sedecias of Juda shall not escape from the Chaldeans; the king of Babylon shall have the mastery of him; they shall have speech together, meet face to face.⁴ To Babylon Sedecias shall go, and there remain till I have entered into a reckoning with him. All shall go amiss, if you join battle with the Chaldeans.

And now Jeremias announced a new oracle the Lord had given him. The Lord told me, he said, that my cousin Hanameel, son of Sellum, would come and ask me to buy in certain land of his at Anathoth, which was my duty as his next of kin. And as the Lord foretold, so it fell out; Hanameel came to my prison doors, ¹ What is the exact meaning of this phrase, or who is the speaker, cannot be determined with certainty.

² Cf. Ez. 18. 2.

³ vv. 31-34. Cf. Heb. 8. 8 sqq. At the end of verse 32 the Septuagint Greek adopts a different reading in the Hebrew, and translates 'And I should abandon them, the Lord says'.

The quotation in the Epistle to the Hebrews follows the Greek.

⁴ See 34. 3 below.

and said, Pray buy in that field of mine at Anathoth in Benjamin; thou art the rightful heir, and thy duty it is, as next of kin, to buy it from me. Then I knew that I had received a divine warning, and buy it I did, this field at Anathoth, from Hanameel, that was son to my uncle Sellum. I paid him the price, that was but seventeen pieces of silver; wrote and signed the deed, called in witnesses, and weighed out the money on the scales. So here was the deed of possession sealed up, all its terms set down and attested, and characters written without; all this I handed over to Baruch, son of Neri, son of Maasias, still in the presence of my cousin Hanameel, and the witnesses that had signed it, and the Jews who sat around me in the court where I was confined. Before them all, I gave Baruch this charge: A message for thee from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: Take these two pieces of writing, the sealed deed within and the covering of it that is open to view, and keep them in some jar of clay, where they can remain long without damage. This is what he would tell thee, he, the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, that there shall yet be buying of house and field and vineyard, here in this land.

The deed once made over to Baruch, son of Neri, I prayed to the Lord thus: Alas, alas, Lord God! Thou art the maker of heaven and earth, so great is thy power, so wide thy reach; no task, for thee, is too difficult. A thousandfold thou shewest thy mercy; yet, when thou dost punish, into the son's lap the father's guilt overflows; how great, how strong that God, whose name is the Lord of hosts! How sublime thy counsels, thy thoughts how high above us! And still thou keepest watch over all mankind, ready to award each life what its own devices have earned. Such deeds thou didst as are signs and portents to this day in the land of Egypt, in Israel too and all the world over; didst win that renown which to this day is thine.¹ Signs and portents there must be, and the exercise of thy constraining power, and a great dread, before thou couldst rescue thy people Israel from Egypt; then thou wouldst bestow upon them this land, the home promised to their fathers, a land all milk and honey; they invaded it, they took possession of it.²³ But to thy voice they would not listen, thy law they would not follow; no duty thou hadst enjoined but lay neglected, and all the calamities we see about us are the issue. Here are siege-works raised to reduce the city; sword and famine and pestilence are giving it over to the Chaldeans for their prey; of all thou hast threatened thou seest here the fulfilment. And now, Lord God,²⁵ thou wouldst have me buy land, and call in witnesses of payment made; now, when this city lies at the mercy of the Chaldeans!

Hereupon the word of the Lord came to Jeremias: Am I not the Lord, the God of all that lives? How should any task be too difficult for me?

This is the divine sentence;² I mean to hand over this city to capture by the king of Babylon and his Chaldeans; they shall take it by storm, and set it alight, and burn all its houses to the ground; it was there, on the roof-tops, they sacrificed to Baal, and made offerings to alien gods in despite of me. From their youth up, Israel and Juda have defied my will unceasingly; even now, says the Lord, their ill-doings are a provocation to me. Anger and scorn this city of theirs has earned from me, nothing else, from the day they built it to this day when I purpose that it shall offend my sight no more; so long have Israel and Juda defied my vengeance with the wrong they did, king and prince, priest and prophet, country-folk and citizens of Jerusalem; always the back turned, never a glance my way, always the deaf ear, the warning unheeded, when I sent early to their doors to bring them to a better mind! Have they not profaned that house which is the sanctuary of my name, by setting up their idols in it? Have they not made hill-shrines for Baal in the valley of Ben-Ennom, and there initiated son and daughter with Moloch-rites that were never of my bidding? No thought was it of mine that they should do this foul deed, which has brought guilt on Juda.

¹ The beginning of this verse runs literally, 'Who hast set signs and portents in the land of Egypt to this day, and in Israel, and among mankind'; there is probably some slight corruption in the text.
² vs. 28-35. It may be doubted whether these verses appear here in their true context; if we suppose that they belong elsewhere, verse 36 follows much more naturally.

36 What, then, of this city, doomed in your eyes to fall into the power of Babylon's king, through sword and famine and pestilence? This is the message the Lord God 37 of Israel sends to it: I mean to gather its people again, scattered over so many lands by the vengeance my fierce anger brought; restore them to this place, and bid them 38 dwell there contentedly. They shall be my people, I their God; one will they shall have, and journey by one way, living ever-39 more in the fear of me, winning for themselves and for their sons a blessing. An 40 eternal covenant I will make with them, nor ever cease to speed them; inspire their hearts with the fear of me, that never 41 swerves aside. My welcome task it shall be to prosper them, and root their stock firmly in this land of theirs; this shall be all my 42 love and liking. Threat of mine and promise of mine, the Lord says, shall alike be fulfilled. This country of yours a desert, 43 man nor beast to dwell in it, given up to the power of Babylon? So your fears tell you; 44 but there shall be buying of lands in it yet, the price paid, the deed executed, the bond sealed, witnesses called in, all over Benjamin and round about Jerusalem, all through the cities of Juda, by hill and plain and the uplands of the south; I mean to bring the exiles home again, says the Lord.

33 Jeremias was still confined to his prison in the court when the word 2 of the Lord came to him a second time. It ran: Thus says the Lord, that all this will do, all this will devise and determine, so 3 great is his name: Cry out to me still, and thou shalt find audience; great mysteries that lie beyond thy ken I will make 4 known to thee. Ruined houses of Jerusalem, ruined palace of the kings of Juda, what has the Lord to tell thee about these?...

5 ... to siege and sword. Come they to fight against the Chaldeans, it is but to strew those earthworks with their own dead bodies; in anger and scorn I will smite them down, turning my back on the city they have stained with such guilt. ...¹

6 Closed and cured those wounds shall be; I myself will heal them, grant them peace and safety to their heart's content. The fortunes of Juda and Jerusalem I will reverse, and they shall be established as firmly as ever; all the guilt that offends me purged away, all the wrong and despite they did me forgiven. My pride and prize, my renown and triumph, to be their benefactor, so that all the world shall hear of it; everywhere the tale of my bounty and my blessing shall strike awe and dread into men's hearts. Where all seems to your eyes but a desert, man nor beast left in the townships of Juda and in Jerusalem, empty street, empty house, empty byre, there, says the Lord, you shall hear cries of joy and mirth, voice of bridegroom and voice of bride. There you shall hear men singing, Give thanks to the Lord, the Lord is gracious, his mercy endures for ever, as they bring to his temple the offerings they have vowed. Your country's doom shall be reversed, says the divine promise, and all shall be as of old. Juda and all its townships a desert, no living thing to dwell there? Nay, says the Lord of hosts, once again it shall be the abode of shepherds, a resting-place for their flocks. By hill and plain and the uplands of the south, all over Benjamin and round about Jerusalem, all through the cities of Juda, there shall be flocks passing to and fro, and their masters a-counting them, the Lord says.

Behold, he says, a time is coming when I will make good my promise to Israel and Juda; the day will dawn, the time be ripe at last for that faithful scion to bud from David's stock; the land shall have a king to reign over it, giving just sentence and due award. When that time comes, Juda shall find deliverance, none shall disturb Jerusalem's rest; and the name given to this king shall be, The Lord vindicates us.² Never a man wanting of David's line, the Lord says, to sit on Israel's throne; never a lack of priest and Levite to wait upon me, bring me burnt-sacrifice and burn the bloodless offering, and slaughter victims, day after day.

And the word of the Lord came to Jeremias, giving him this message: If you can rescind my ordinance of day and night, that there should be day-time and night-time no more, only then will I rescind the privilege granted to my servant David, and there shall be heirs of his throne no more, Levites and priests to wait on me no more. My servant David, the Levites that wait on me, these shall have a posterity countless as the stars of heaven, measureless as the sea-sand. This message, too, Jeremias had from the Lord: Mark well how they declare, the folk among whom thou dwellest,¹ that there are two families² the Lord has chosen, and both he has cast off; so that they despise my own people, and no longer count it a nation. But this is the divine answer: Laws if I have made none for day and night, for heaven and earth no ordinances prescribed, then let it be thought that I mean to cast Israel away, or depose the line of David from its headship over all who spring from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Trust me, their doom shall be reversed, their lot shall be pitied.

¹ vv. 4, 5. Although the Latin version conceals it, there is considerable confusion in the text here, which is probably due either to corruption or to omission. ² vv. 15, 16. Cf. 23, 5, 6 above. In the present passage, the Hebrew text represents the name 'The Lord vindicates us' as given, not to the king, but to the city of Jerusalem. The disparity is difficult to explain, and probably the manuscripts are at fault. The whole paragraph, verses 14-18, is lacking in the Septuagint Greek.

34 The word of the Lord came to Jeremias at the time when king Nabuchodonosor of Babylon, at the head of his own army, with vassal kingdoms and peoples to aid him, levied war on Jerusalem and its daughter cities. This was the message sent by the Lord God of Israel: Go and warn Sedecias, king of Juda, in my name that I mean to hand over this city to the Babylonian king, who will burn it to the ground. And add this besides: Thou thyself wilt not escape from him; they will catch thee, sure enough, and hand thee over to him; thou and the king of Babylon shall have speech together, meet face to face, and to Babylon thou shalt go. Wouldst thou but listen, King Sedecias of Juda, to the Lord's bidding!³ Die by the sword, he tells thee, thou shouldst not; peaceful thy death should be, and they should make such burning for thee as they made for thy fathers that reigned before thee, raise such cries of lamentation, Alas, what a king was this! This is my promise to thee, the Lord says. All this king Sedecias of Juda must hear from the prophet Jeremias, there in Jerusalem; and still the Babylonian army pressed hard on the city, and on those other cities of Juda that were left, Lachis and Azecha; the rest of the fortified cities had already been taken.

Here is another message the Lord entrusted to Jeremias, and this was the occasion of it. King Sedecias had bound the citizens of Jerusalem by a covenant; all alike were to set free their slaves and handmaids that were of Hebrew blood; would they play the master to their own Jewish kinsfolk? On hearing the proclamation, nobles and common people alike had agreed to release slave and handmaid, and exempt them from all service henceforward; and this they did obediently enough; but afterwards they changed their minds, haled them off, men and women, and reduced them to slavery once again. Then it was word came from the Lord to Jeremias, and thus the divine message ran: Word from the Lord God of Israel! I made a covenant with your fathers, when I rescued them from their place of bondage in Egypt. Seven years up, every slave sold in bondage to his fellow Hebrew must go free; six years of service, and then release. Your fathers would not listen, turned a deaf ear to me; but you, to-day, have thought better of it, and done my will, proclaiming liberty to your fellow-countrymen; you have sworn it in my presence, in the house that is the shrine of my name. And then you went back, and dragged my name in the dust! You would claim them afresh, men and women servants you had set free, now their own masters; they must be your servants and handmaids still.

This sentence, then, the Lord pronounces: You have not obeyed me, by granting freedom to your own brethren and neighbours, and here is the freedom I mean to grant you in return; freedom of the sword, freedom of the famine, freedom of the pestilence! A bane I will make you to all the kingdoms of earth. I will have no more of them, the men who transgress my covenant, have no respect for the agreement they made in my own presence, the calf they cut in two and walked between the slices of it, nobles of Juda and Jerusalem, chamberlains and priests, and all the common folk that passed between share and share. I mean to give them up into the hands of enemies that are sworn upon their lives; bird in air and beast on earth shall prey upon that carrion of theirs. Sedecias, king of Juda, and his nobles, shall fall into the hands of pitiless enemies, the armies of Babylon, that now give you a respite. These, at my command, shall march on this city again, lay siege to it, and capture it, and burn it to the ground; and I will make the townships of Juda into a desert, never a soul to dwell there.

¹ Literally, 'this people'. If the text is sound, the reference cannot (in the nature of the case) be to the Jews, but either to some foreign nation or, less probably, to Israel as distinct from Juda.

² Probably the tribes of Juda and Benjamin; they may, however, be Israel and Juda, or Levi and David (mentioned in the foregoing verses), or Jacob and David (see verse 26 below).

³ This might be translated, 'Listen to a message from the Lord, king Sedecias of Juda!' But probably the promise made in the rest of the verse is meant to be conditional upon Sedecias' obeying the Lord (and ceasing to resist the invader).

35 In the reign of Josias' son Joachim, word came to Jeremias from the Lord, Go, make thyself acquainted with the men of Rechab's clan; I would have thee entertain them in one of the treasury rooms at the temple, and there set wine before them. So Jezonias, son of Jeremias, son of Habsanias was my guest, with his brethren and his sons and the whole Rechabite clan; into the temple I brought them, to the apartment of Hanan's sons, that come down from God's servant Jegedelias. It was next to the apartment of the door-keeper, Maasias the son of Sellum. Here I set a bowl and goblet of wine before the men of Rechab's clan, and bade them drink, but drink wine they would not. Our father Jonadab, said they, the son of Rechab gave us a rule to live by. Wine neither we should drink, nor any son of ours in perpetuity; no house build, no crops sow, no vineyard plant or possess; in tents we were to live all our days, and long those days should last in this land that was none of ours. As our father Jonadab son of Rechab bade us live, so live we, so our wives and sons and daughters live, drinking no wine at any time. Houses we build none to dwell in, vineyards and fields and crops have none; tent-dwellers we remain, true to every command of our father Jonadab; it was only when king Nabuchodonosor of Babylon marched against us that we were fain to take shelter in Jerusalem from threats of Chaldaean and Syrian; that is why we make our abode in Jerusalem.

And now the Lord's word came to Jeremias: A message from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel! Go and tell all the men of Juda, all the citizens of Jerusalem. Great marvel it is, the Lord says, you are so unruly still, and will not heed my bidding. Here is Jonadab son of Rechab will have his sons drink no wine, and his word holds; wine they drink none to this day, for love of their father's rule; and I, that send word early to your doors, can win no obedience. Early I sent them to your doors, the prophets that were servants of mine, bidding you come back from your straying, and shape your thoughts anew; have recourse no longer to the worship of alien gods, if you would dwell securely in this land, my gift to you and to your fathers; but you gave me neither heed nor hearing. So loyal the Rechabites to the commands of their father Jonadab, and my people so disobedient! I mean, then, says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, to punish the citizens of Jerusalem for warnings unheeded, for calls refused, with all the punishments I have threatened. To the clan of Rechab Jeremias gave this message from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: For your obedience to your father Jonadab, for precept remembered and for duty done, he, the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, promises that this line of Rechab and Jonadab, long as time lasts, shall never want a posterity to do him service.

36 In the fourth year of Josias' son Joachim, the Lord gave Jeremias this commandment: Get thyself a scroll, and write down on it all the warnings I have uttered against Israel and Juda, and against the other nations of the world, ever since I first spoke to thee under king Josias. Maybe, when the men of Juda hear of all the mischief I mean to do them, they will leave off their straying in false paths, and so I will overlook the guilt of their wrongdoing.

So Jeremias sent for Baruch the son of Nerias; the Lord's utterances, every one, Jeremias rehearsed and Baruch wrote down on the scroll. And now Jeremias had an errand for him; I must keep my house, said he, go into the Lord's temple I may not.¹ Do thou, on a fasting day, go there

¹ Cf. Neh. 6. 10.

instead, and read out some of the divine utterances I have dictated to thee, in the temple itself, for all the citizens to hear, and all the men of Juda besides, that have come in from their several townships. Maybe their intercession will find its way into the Lord's presence; maybe they will leave off their straying in false paths; here are grievous threats from the Lord of angry vengeance against his people. So it was Baruch son of Nerias, but in fulfilment of Jeremiah's command, that took the scroll and read out, there in the Lord's house, the Lord's message. It was the ninth month, in the fifth year of Josias' son Joachim, when they proclaimed a fast, that was to be kept in the Lord's presence by all the citizens and all who had come in from the other towns of Juda. And there in the Lord's house, from the apartment of Gamarias, whose father, Saphan, had once been secretary, in the upper court, close by the entry of the new temple gate, Baruch read out Jeremiah's book of warning. No line he read of the divine utterance but had an eager listener in Gamarias' son Michaëas, who thereupon went down to the secretary's room, where he found all the notables assembled. There was the secretary, Elisama; there were Dalaïas son of Semeïas, and Elnathan son of Achobor, and Gamarias son of Saphan, and Sedecias son of Hananias, and all the notables in general. To these Michaëas repeated all he had heard Baruch read out from the scroll in public; and Judi, son of Nathanias, son of Selemias, son of Cushi, was sent on an errand to Baruch in the name of all present. Come thither he must, and bring the scroll he had read thus publicly with him. So it was Baruch, son of Nerias, that came before them, and the scroll with him; they bade him be seated, and read it aloud to them, so read it he did. When all the reading was over, they looked each at other in amazement, and told Baruch all this must be brought to the king's ears. Then they asked, How comes it that these are the words of Jeremiah, and yet of thy writing? Why, said he, Jeremiah gave them out, as if he were reading them aloud, and I sat by with paper and ink to write them down. Go into hiding, they told him, thou and

Jeremiah with thee, and be sure none knows where to find you.

Then they made their way into the palace court to find the king, leaving the book there in the secretary's room. When they had brought their news to his hearing, the king would have Judi fetch the book itself from Elisama's room; which he did, and read it out for the king to hear, and all the courtiers that stood about him. Since it was the ninth month, Joachim was in his winter parlour, and a brazier of coals in front of him; and when Judi had read but three columns or four, he took his pen-knife and began cutting the scroll into pieces, which he threw on to the brazier until the whole book had perished in the flames. King and courtiers listened to all these warnings, yet feared they never, nor rent their clothes; and although Elnathan, Dalaïas and Gamarias would have prevented Joachim from burning the scroll, he would not listen to them. Jeremiel son of Amalech,¹ Saraïas son of Ezriel, and Selemias son of Abdeel were bidden to attach the persons of the scribe Baruch and the prophet Jeremiah; but the Lord kept them in safe hiding.

And this was the Lord's word to the prophet Jeremiah, when the king burnt the scroll, and with it all the utterances he had dictated to Baruch: Get thee another scroll, and write down on it whatever was contained in the one king Joachim burnt. And to king Joachim give this message from the Lord: Burn book and hide prophet, if thou wilt, for warning thee that the king of Babylon will come back with all speed, and lay this country waste, leaving neither man nor beast to dwell in it. But this is the Lord's doom against king Joachim of Juda: No son of his shall follow him on the throne of David; his body shall be cast away in the open, to bear the day's heat and the night frost. With guilt of his, with guilt of household and court of his, I will reckon in full; all my unheeded threats against Jerusalem and Juda shall be made good.

So Jeremiah must get Baruch another scroll to write on, and all the contents of the book Joachim burnt must be dictated anew; much more was added besides to enlarge it.

¹ 'The son of Amelech'; the Hebrew text is probably better understood as meaning 'the king's son', that is, a prince of the royal blood.

37 In place of Jechonias, that was son to Joachim, Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon would have Sedecias, another of Josias' sons, mount the throne of Juda; but no heed would the new king give, nor his courtiers, nor his subjects, to the warnings uttered in the Lord's name by the prophet Jeremias. To him the king sent envoys, Juchal the son of Selemias and the priest Sophonias, son of Maasias, bidding him pray to the Lord their God for the common welfare. Jeremias was still free to come and go as he pleased among his fellow-citizens; they had not yet imprisoned him.

At this time, Pharaoh's army was on the march, advancing from the Egyptian frontier; and the Chaldaeans, this news reaching them, had raised the siege of Jerusalem. So the Lord's word came to the prophet Jeremias: Take back this message from the Lord God of Israel to the king who sent you to consult me. Back home to Egypt it shall march, the army of Pharaoh that has come out in your support; whereupon the Chaldaeans will return to the attack, will capture this city and burn it to the ground. Never cheat yourselves with the hope that the enemy will march away and leave you alone; march away they will not, the Lord says. Low though you should lay every Chaldaean that takes the field against you, save for some few wounded, those wounded men shall rise up from their tents, and burn this city to the ground notwithstanding.

And now, while Pharaoh still threatened, and the Chaldaeans had raised the siege, Jeremias took occasion to leave Jerusalem and make his way to Benjamin, where he must divide up some property in the presence of his fellow-citizens. When he reached the Benjamin gate, the officer whose turn it was to mount guard there, Jerias, the son of Selemias, the son of Hananias, put the prophet under arrest, under the charge of deserting to the Chaldaeans. In vain did Jeremias protest, What, I desert to the Chaldaeans? There is no truth in it! Jerias led him away into the presence of the nobles; and these, in a rage, first had him beaten, then confined him in the house of the secretary, Jonathan, who had charge of the prisoners at this time. So came Jeremias to a dungeon cell, and long remained there.

It was king Sedecias who released him, sending for him and questioning him privately in the palace. Has the Lord any message for me? he asked. Yes, said Jeremias; that thou shalt be at the mercy of Nabuchodonosor. Then he asked the king, What wrong have I done to thee, to thy courtiers or thy subjects, that thou hast thrown me into prison? Tell me, how have they sped, those prophets of yours who foretold that the king of Babylon should never reach you, never invade this land of yours? Listen to me, my lord king, I entreat thee, and look favourably on my suit. Do not send me back to the house of yonder secretary Jonathan, for there I needs must die! So king Sedecias had him confined in the court without, and given a loaf of bread each day, with seasoning added,¹ as long as bread there should be in the city. And there Jeremias was left, among the prisoners in the courtyard.

38 Still Jeremias would speak out before all the people; and among those who listened to him were Saphatias son of Mathan, Gedelias son of Phassur, Juchal son of Selemias, and Phassur son of Melchias. This message they heard him proclaim from the Lord: To remain in this city means death by sword, famine and pestilence; go over to the Chaldaeans, you shall have your lives for guerdon, and be spared. And this: Past doubt, the city will fall into the hands of the king of Babylon, by right of capture. And they urged the king, these notables, to make an end of him; He goes about, said they, to weaken the resolve of the garrison, and of the people at large, by talking in this fashion; there is malice here, not good will. He is at your disposal, king Sedecias answered; not for a king to withstand you! So they had their way with Jeremias; he should be left helpless in the cistern of Melchias the son of Amelech,² there in the court where the prisoners were kept. Into the cistern they lowered him with ropes; there was no water in it now, only mire, and into the mire he sank.

¹ 'With seasoning added'; according to the Hebrew text, 'from the Street of the Bakers'.
note on 36. 26.

² See

But there was an Ethiopian chamberlain at the court, named Abdemelech, that heard how Jeremias had been let down into the cistern; and as the king was sitting at the Benjamin Gate, this Abdemelech came out from the palace and remonstrated with him. My lord king, he said, here is foul wrong done to the prophet Jeremias; they have let him down into a cistern, where he will die of hunger, such lack of bread there is in the city. Why then, said the king to Abdemelech the Ethiopian, take thirty¹ men with thee, and rescue Jeremias from the cistern while there is yet life in him. So Abdemelech took the men with him, made his way into the palace, beneath the store-chamber, took old rags and clouts that lay mouldering there, and let them down by ropes to Jeremias in the cistern. Here be torn things and mouldering, the Ethiopian said to Jeremias, but thou mayst put these under thy arm-pits, and the ropes under these again. Jeremias obeyed, and they pulled him up by the ropes till he was clear of the cistern; but the courtyard was his prison still.

Then king Sedecias would have the prophet come to him by the third door of the palace, the one that leads to the temple. I have a question to ask thee, he said to Jeremias; hide nothing from me. Why, Jeremias answered, if I tell thee what I know, thou wilt but kill me, and if I give thee advice, thou wilt not heed it. But king Sedecias took a secret oath, As the Lord is a living God, the Lord who gave us this breath we breathe, slay thee I will not, nor hand thee over to thy mortal enemies. Thereupon Jeremias told him a message from the Lord, the God of hosts: Go out and give thyself up to Nabuchodonosor's chieftains, and thy life shall be safe, nor shall there be any burning of the city; thou and thine shall be spared. If thou dost not give thyself up to them, then the Chaldeans shall gain mastery of the city and burn it to the ground, and for thyself there is no escaping them. Yet my heart misgives me, Sedecias told him, over the Jews that have already made their submission; what if I should be handed over to these, and they wreak their spite on me? That shall not be, Jeremias answered. Give heed, only give heed, to this message from the Lord I bear thee; so thou shalt speed well, and life be granted thee. Refuse to yield, and here is the doom he has made known to me. Never a woman that is left in the palace of the kings of Juda but shall be spoil for the chieftains of the king of Babylon! And as they are led away, this shall be their lament: False friend fooled thee, and had the better of thee; feet fast in the treacherous morass has left thee! Wife of thine and son of thine led away into the enemy's camp, and thou thyself powerless to escape; thyself the king of Babylon shall take prisoner, and burn thy city to the ground.

On peril of thy life, king Sedecias warned him, let none hear what has passed between us. If it reach the ears of the nobles that we have had speech together, and they bid thee repeat what thou saidst, or what said the king, hiding nothing as thou holdest thy life dear, then be this thy answer, Why, I pleaded my suit with the king's grace that he would not have me sent back to Jonathan's house, to die there.² Come and ask him they did, and he answered as the king bade him; so with that they let him be; nothing had been overheard. This imprisonment of Jeremias in the courtyard lasted until the taking of Jerusalem; for, sure enough, Jerusalem was taken.

39 Sedecias had been reigning for eight years and ten months in Juda when Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon led his armies to the siege of Jerusalem; in the eleventh year, on the fifth day of the fourth month, the city wall was breached. In they marched, Neregel, Sereser, Semegarnabu, Sarsachim, Rabsares, (Neregel, Sereser), and Rebmag,³ and all the king of Babylon's other chieftains, and occupied the central gate. Sedecias king of Juda and all his warriors fled at their approach, leaving the city at dead of night by way of the royal garden and the gate between the two walls; it was the desert road they took

¹ Some suspect the word 'thirty' of being a copyist's mistake for 'three'.

² Some authors hold that Jeremias had in fact repeated, on this occasion, the appeal made in 37. 19 above; otherwise he would not have been induced to adopt the king's expedient.

³ Some of these names appear to have been repeated by a copyist's error. Rabsares and Rebmag are probably titles, not names.

5 when they left it. The Chaldaean army went in pursuit, and overtook Sedecias in the open plain of Jericho; captured him, and brought him before Nabuchodonosor at Reblatha, in the Emath country; and there sentence was pronounced on him.

6 Slain by the king of Babylon were all his sons, there in their father's sight; slain by the king of Babylon were all the nobles of

7 Juda; and as for Sedecias himself, his eyes were put out, and he was carried off, loaded

8 with chains, to Babylon. King's palace and poor man's house the Chaldaeans burnt to the ground, and threw down the walls of Jerusalem in ruins. All the rest

9 who survived, defenders and deserters alike, were carried off by Nabuzardan, the captain of the royal bodyguard, to Baby-

10 lon; he left none except the poorest of the inhabitants, landless men, in Juda, who found themselves enriched, that day, with vineyards and cisterns of their own.

11 This Nabuzardan, captain of the royal bodyguard had orders from king Nabuchodonosor about Jeremias; Take him

12 under thy loving charge, said he, and let him have what cheer he will. So here were

13 Nabuzardan, captain of the royal bodyguard, and Nabusezban, and Rabsares, and Neregel, and Sereser, and Rebmag, and all the king of Babylon's great chief-

14 tains, sending out to free Jeremias from his prison in the courtyard. And they entrusted him to the care of Godolias, son of Ahicam; with him Jeremias should dwell, and make his home among his own people.

15 While he was still in the courtyard prison, Jeremias had been entrusted with a message from the Lord for the Ethiopian, Abdemelech: All my doom against this city, says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, I mean to fulfil; ban it is and not

17 blessing, and thou shalt live to see it; but to thee I will grant safety, the Lord says. Never shall dreaded foe have the mastery, 18 when I am there to deliver thee; thou art marked out for safety, that didst put thy confidence in me, the Lord says.

40 To Jeremias the word of the Lord still came, after the captain of the bodyguard, Nabuzardan, had set him at liberty. This happened at Rama, where he was singled out, still in chains, among the prisoners from Jerusalem and Juda who were on their way to Babylon. As he took him apart from the rest, the captain of the bodyguard said to him, With calamity the Lord thy God threatened this land of thine, and calamity he has brought upon it; his threat is fulfilled. What guilt was this, to refuse the Lord obedience! And here is the issue. From thy hands I have struck the chains, as thou seest; bear me company, if thou wilt, to Babylon, and I will take good care of thee; if thou wilt not go my way, then abide where thou art. The whole land is at thy disposal, and thou art free to take thy own path; none may constrain thee to go with me. Here is Godolias, son of Ahicam, son of Saphan, that is entrusted by the king of Babylon with the charge of all Juda; dwell with him if thou wilt, here among thy own people, or where thou hast a mind betake thee. And with that, the captain of the bodyguard furnished him with provisions, and made him a present besides, and so took leave of him. It was to Godolias son of Ahicam, at Maspath, that Jeremias repaired, and dwelt with him among the remnant of the land's inhabitants.

Men, women, and children, to Godolias son of Ahicam the king of Babylon entrusted them, all these landless folk who had not been carried off into exile. And when the news of this appointment reached the army chieftains, scattered here and there with their men, they rallied to Godolias at Maspha. Here were Ismahel, son of Nathanias, Johanan and Jonathan, sons of Caree, Sareas, son of Thanethmeth, the sons of Ophi from Netophathi, and Jezonias, son of Maachathi, all with men at their backs. To these, chiefs and men alike, Godolias son of Ahicam son of Saphan took an oath. They need have no fear of living under Chaldaean rule; let them remain in the country as the king of Babylon's vassals, and all should go well with them. I am living here in Maspath, said he, to take the orders sent me from Chaldea; it is for you to gather in vintage and harvest and olive-yield, each of you abiding in the city he now occupies. There were other Jews living in Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the countries round about; these, when they heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant in Juda, and put Godolias, son of Ahicam, son of Saphan, in charge of them, came back from the countries where they had taken refuge into Judaea, came to Godolias at Masphath; and abundant was the store they brought in, of grapes and grain both.

And now, at Masphath, Godolias was visited by Johanan son of Caree, and the other chieftains from the countryside, with this warning: We have information that Ismahel, son of Nathanias, was sent here by Baalis, king of Ammon, to take thy life. But Godolias would not believe it. When Johanan was at Masphath he took Godolias aside; Let me go and make away with Ismahel secretly, he urged; if he should take thy life, all the Jews that have rallied about thee will be scattered again, and Juda have a remnant no more. But Godolias would have none of it; Nay, said he to Johanan, leave off thy purpose; it is but a false report thou tellest me concerning Ismahel.

41 The seventh month had come; and now Ismahel, son of Nathanias, son of Elisama, one of the royal princes and the king's vassals,¹ came with ten followers to Masphath, where Godolias was, and at Masphath they sat at table together. There and then, at the sword's point, Ismahel and his ten men put Godolias to death. So perished Godolias, son of Ahicam, son of Saphan, that held the king of Babylon's warrant to rule the country. Such Jews as were with Godolias at Masphath, such Chaldaean soldiers as he found there, Ismahel despatched at the same time. And the day after Godolias' murder, before the news of it was out, came eighty pilgrims from Sicheim, Silo, and Samaria, beards shaven, garments rent, in mourning all of them, with bloodless offerings and incense for the Lord's temple. Out came Ismahel son of Nathanias from Masphath to meet them, and wept ever as he went; Welcome, said he, from Godolias son of Ahicam! And when they had reached the middle of the town, just by the cistern,² they were slain by Ismahel and his men; all except ten of them, who pleaded for their lives and told Ismahel they had a hoard of wheat, barley, oil and honey hidden away under their lands; these were spared the fate of the rest. When he slew the companions of Godolias, Ismahel had thrown their bodies into the cistern; it was one which king Asa had made to defend the place against Baasa, king of Israel; now, Ismahel's massacre filled it to the brim.

Thus there was no longer a remnant at Masphath; the king's daughters, and all the other folk left there by Nabuzardan under the care of Godolias, Ismahel took off with him as his captives, and so would have marched away into the Ammonite country. But Johanan, son of Caree, and the other army chieftains that were on his side, no sooner heard the ill news of what Ismahel had done than they mustered all their men to give him battle, and caught up with him at the pool of Gabaon. A welcome sight it was to Ismahel's company, when they saw Johanan, son of Caree, and the other chieftains approaching; back went all the prisoners to Masphath, and threw in their lot with Johanan instead; Ismahel fled at the sight of him, and reached the Ammonite country with only eight men at his back.

Johanan and his fellow chieftains would not leave at Masphath this remnant they had rescued from Ismahel after the murder of Godolias; all the fighting men, the women and children, the eunuchs, who had returned with them from Gabaon. They went off and made their home for a time at Chamaan, near Bethlehem, thinking to take refuge in Egypt from the vengeance of the Chaldaeans. From these they had much to fear, now that Ismahel son of Nathanias had murdered Godolias son of Ahicam, the king of Babylon's own representative in Juda.

42 And now all the army chieftains, Johanan son of Caree and Jezonias son of Osaias and their followers, high and low, came to consult Jeremias. Look kindly, they said, on our request; we would have thee intercede with the Lord thy God for this poor remnant, left so few in number, as thou seest. Whither go we? What shift make we? Please it the Lord thy God to make all this known to us. And the prophet Jeremias said, Your request shall be granted. Pray I will, as you bid me pray, to the Lord your God, and his answer you shall hear in full, no word kept hidden from you. And this promise they made on their part: The Lord himself bear witness against us, unerring and unailing, if we are not true to every word of that message the Lord sends us through thy means. Be it for weal or woe, it is the voice of the Lord our God; to him lies thy errand, and him we will obey; heed we the commands of the Lord our God, nothing can go amiss.

¹ This reads in the original, presumably by a copyist's error, as if it meant that Ismahel was accompanied by some of the king's vassals. ² Literally, 'into the middle of the cistern', a phrase which can hardly have been intended.

Ten days passed, and then the Lord's word came to Jeremias. Johanan son of Caree he summoned to him, and all the army chieftains, and their followers, high and low; and thus spoke to them: A message to you from the Lord, the God of Israel! To him I went on your errand, and laid your prayers before him. Wait on quietly, he says, in this land of yours, and all shall be building now, not destroying, all shall be planting now, not uprooting; amends enough is the calamity I have brought on you. What, does the king of Babylon daunt you with his terrors? Of him have no fear; danger from him is none, the Lord says, when I am at your side to protect you, and deliver you from his power. I will take pity on you now; only pity shall you find, and on your native soil an abiding home.

But if you refuse to make it your home, if you disobey the divine command; if you are heard crying, No! To Egypt! There we will dwell, where are no sights of bloodshed, no sound of trumpet-call, no famine to be endured! then, last of the Jews, listen to this, the Lord's message. This he tells you, he, the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel! If you turn your faces towards Egypt, and thither repair to find a refuge, the sword you dread shall overtake you, there in Egypt, the famine that haunts you shall be with you still, there in Egypt, and in Egypt you shall die. None that turns his face towards Egypt for refuge but sword or famine or pestilence shall be the undoing of him; such calamity I mean to bring on it as none shall survive, none shall escape. Thus says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: Go you to Egypt, my angry vengeance shall blaze out against you no less than when you dwelt once at Jerusalem; yours shall be a name of execration and horror, a name to curse by and to revile, and this land you shall never see more. Last of the Jews, this is the Lord's message: Go to Egypt you must not. Bear me witness, all of you, that I have given you solemn warning this day. But no, you did but hoodwink yourselves; you would have me do your errand to the Lord our God, and so you promised, Pray to the Lord our God for us, make known to us whatever is his divine will, and it shall be done; but now I have told it you, and where is your obedience to that divine will, to the message he bade me deliver to you? Here then is full warning that the land where you mean to take refuge shall be the undoing of you, by war and famine and pestilence.

43 Such was the errand upon which the Lord now sent Jeremias to his people. And when Jeremias had delivered all this message to them from the Lord their God, Azarias, son of Osaia, contradicted him; Johanan, too, the son of Caree, and the other malcontents¹ held the same language. Thou liest, they said, warrant thou hast none from the Lord our God to prevent us taking refuge in Egypt; it is Baruch, son of Nerias, who sets thee on, thinking to betray us to the Chaldaeans, and have us put to death, or carried away to Babylon. Thus Johanan, son of Caree, with the army chieftains and all their men in his support, refused to obey the Lord's bidding and remain where they were in Juda. He and his fellow chieftains took all the remaining Jews away with them; some of these had been scattered in distant parts, but had now come back to live at home with their wives and children; others, the king's daughters among them, had been entrusted by Nabuzardan, the captain of the bodyguard, to Godolias, son of Ahicam, son of Saphan, that had the prophet Jeremias and Baruch son of Nerias at his side. With all these at their back they crossed the Egyptian frontier, in defiance of the Lord's bidding, and made their way to Taphnis.

And at Taphnis the word of the Lord came to Jeremias: Take a load of great stones with thee, and go to the vault¹ under the brick wall by the gate of Pharaoh's palace at Taphnis; there bury them, with Jewish folk by to watch thee. And this message thou shalt give them from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: I mean to summon one that is my servant, Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, and set up a throne for him on these foundations; where these stones lie buried, his canopy shall rise. He it is that shall come and doom the Egyptians; whom the plague beckons, to the plague, whom exile, to exile, whom the sword, to the sword. The idols of Egypt he shall carry away into banishment, first setting light to their temples and burning them down. Lightly as shepherd dons cloak, he shall invest himself with sovereignty over its people, and unmolested go his way, breaking in pieces the statues that adorn Egypt's sun-temple, the shrines of Egypt burning to the ground.

¹ Literally, 'and all the proud men, saying'. The text is probably corrupt.

44 Here is a message that was sent through Jeremias to all the Jews living in Egypt, whether in Magdalu or Taphnis or Memphis or the Phatures country: Thus says the Lord, the God of hosts: You have seen for yourselves what calamity I brought on Jerusalem and the cities of Juda, how this day they are empty of inhabitants. By their own guilt they earned it, when they defied my vengeance, courting the sacrifices and the worship of alien gods they had never known till then, they and you and your fathers alike. Early to your doors I sent those prophets that were servants of mine, bidding you leave off such foul doings of yours, doings most hateful to me; but heed and hearing they gave me none, still went astray, to alien gods still made sacrifice. At last my angry vengeance blazed up, and lit such a fire in the townships of Juda, in the streets of Jerusalem, as has left them, this day, a barren wilderness. And now, says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, what of yourselves? Would you fasten a noose round your own necks, court death for man and woman, child and weanling, till remnant of Juda there is none? For rivals must I have images of your own making? Will you sacrifice to gods not yours, there in Egypt? Why would you take refuge there, to your own undoing, to be a name all the world should curse by and revile?

Have you forgotten them, ill deeds done in your fathers' days by king and queen, by man and wife, throughout Juda and the streets of Jerusalem? Alas, to this day there is no amending; no dread of me, no living by the divine law, by the rule I held up for a pattern to you and to your fathers! Thus, then he threatens you, he, the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: It is my frown you shall see henceforward; the whole of Juda shall be cut away. The remnant that looked to find a refuge in Egypt, in Egypt shall perish, sword and famine their undoing, sword and famine for all of them, high and low. Theirs shall be a name of execration and of wonder, a name to curse by and to revile. Sword, famine and pestilence, so I called Jerusalem to account, and so I will call Egypt to account; for those Jewish survivors that have taken refuge in Egypt there is no escaping with their lives, no returning to Juda, home of their eager desire; only fugitives shall return.

Jeremias did not go unanswered; there were men there who knew well their wives made offering to alien gods; of the women themselves, many were standing by. They had but one thought, all these exiles that were making their home at Phatures in Egypt; Ay, so the Lord bids thee tell us, but we will have none of it. Sworn we are, and by that oath we mean to stand, that we will do sacrifice to the queen of heaven, and make offering of cakes to her, as we ever did, we and our fathers, kings and rulers of ours, in the townships of Juda and in Jerusalem streets; bread we had in those days to our heart's content, and all went well with us; bad times we never saw. It is only since we left off doing sacrifice to the queen of heaven, and paid tribute of cakes no more, that all is woe and want, sword wasting us and famine. Sacrifice when we women make to the queen of heaven, and pour libation to her, be sure our men-folk know in whose honour cake is made, and wine is poured!

But Jeremias turned upon them all, men and women alike, all that had given him

¹ 'The vault'; this represents a noun in the Hebrew which is not found elsewhere. Modern commentators give the rendering 'mortal'.

21 his answer. Nay, said he, when you did sacrifice all through Juda and in Jerusalem streets, and your fathers before you, king and noble and plain citizen, be sure the Lord was heeding you, and marked it well.

22 It was when the Lord could bear no longer with false aims and foul deeds of yours, that your land became a wilderness, a thing of wonder, a name to curse by, a land empty of inhabitants, as it is this day. It was because you sacrificed, in the Lord's despite, to false gods, because you would not obey him, would not follow law and decree and ordinance of his, that all the calamity of these times has come upon you.

23 This, too, Jeremias said to the crowd about him, and to their women-folk besides: Jews of Egypt, listen to the message he sends you, he, the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel. So you will be as good as your word; sacrifice and libation you have vowed to the queen of heaven, and must pay it; all is accomplished, will has turned into act! Then listen, Jews of Egypt, to the doom which the Lord pronounces: By the honour of my own name I have sworn it, the Lord says, never Jew shall be heard more taking his oath by the living God, in all this land of Egypt! For woe, not for weal, these eyes of mine shall watch over them, till sword and famine have done their work, and Jew in Egypt is none. To Juda from Egypt they shall return, such few as have escaped the sword's point, and the remnant that took refuge here shall learn to their cost whose prophecy was fulfilled, theirs or mine. Here is a sign I mean to give you, the Lord says, here in this land, in proof that my threats shall be accomplished. Thus says the Lord: I, that gave up Sedecias of Juda to Nabuchodonosor, his mortal enemy, will give up to his mortal enemies yonder Ephree,¹ that is now Pharao in Egypt.

45 When Baruch, son of Nerias, had written down the words dictated to him by Jeremias, in the fourth year of Joachim's reign in Juda, this comfort Jeremias gave him:² A message from the Lord, the God of Israel, to thee, Baruch! Woe is thee, heavy is thy heart; sorrow upon sorrow the Lord gives thee, and respite thou canst find none. Yet this message the Lord has for thee: Here am I destroying what my own hands built, uprooting what my own hands planted; and for thee must it be all prizes? For prizes never look thou; enough for thee that, go thou where thou wilt, safe-conduct of thy life I am granting thee.

46 Here follows the doom which the Lord pronounced to the prophet Jeremias against the nations of the world. And first against Egypt, whose army stood at Charcamis, by the river Euphrates, under its king Pharao Nechao, and there was defeated by Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, in the fourth year of Joachim's reign over Juda, that was son to Josias.

Buckler, there, and shield; march ye to battle! Yoke steed, and, horsemen, mount; stand to your ranks, helmeted; scour lance, and don breastplate! What means it? Here be cowards turning their backs, here be great warriors slain; pell-mell they flee, and never a glance behind; peril is all around, the Lord says. For the swift no escape, for the strong no prevailing; there in the north, by Euphrates banks, they fail and fall!

Can it be a river that comes up in flood, eddies are these of a foaming torrent? Like river in flood, like foaming torrent marches Egypt to battle, threatening to cover earth with its advance, drown city and citizen. Ay, mount horse, dizzily reel the chariot; way there for the warriors, Ethiop and Libyan with their great shields, men of Lydia that ply bow and shoot arrow so well! Alas, not yours the day; this day the Lord, the God of hosts, has chosen for his day of vengeance, when he will take toll of his enemies; fed and glutted his sword shall be, drink deep of men's blood; here, on Euphrates banks, the Lord, the God of hosts, will claim his sacrifice. Egypt, poor maid, to Galaad betake thee, to find balm for thy wounds! Salve after salve thou wilt try in vain; there is no healing thee. Thy shame has come to all men's ears, earth echoes with thy lament; warrior leaned upon warrior of thine for support, and they fell both together.

And thus the Lord prophesied to Jeremias the coming of Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon, and his victory over Egypt.

¹ That is Apries, or Hophra, deposed by Amasis in B.C. 571.

² Cf. ch. 36.

Here is news for Egypt; cry it in Magdalu, wake the echoes of Memphis, in Taphnis tell it abroad! Stand to arms, make ready for battle; thy border countries have fallen a prey to the sword already! Why have thy warriors melted away?¹ Stand they could not, when the Lord was minded to overthrow them. Many he brought to earth; stumbled they, man over his fellow, crying out, Up, to men of our own race return we, to the land of our birth; escape we from the invader's sword!²

What name shall we give to Pharaoh? Call him, Din of Battle at Last.³ By his own life he has sworn it, that King whose name is the Lord of hosts; Pharaoh's conqueror is on the way, towering high as Thabor among the hills, as Carmel above the sea.

Poor maid of Egypt, an exile's pack provide thee! A lonely wilderness Memphis shall be, where none may dwell henceforward.

Fitting emblem of Egypt, a heifer lithe and graceful; from the north a gad-fly⁴ shall come to trouble her rest. But those mercenaries of hers that went to and fro like bullocks full-fed, see how they have turned about and taken flight all at once, none ready to stand his ground! The day has come when they are marked down for slaughter; they shall be called to account at last. Loud her voice shall rise above the clash of bronze,⁵ now that the invader's army draws near, pitiless as woodmen that go a-hewing; forest is none so deep they shall not lay it bare, numberless as the locust-swarm. Poor Egypt, all shame and confusion, prey of the northern folk! The Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, has pronounced his doom: I mean to have a reckoning now with Ammon of Thebes,⁶ with Pharaoh and Egypt, with all its gods and all its kings, with Pharaoh and all who trust in Pharaoh's aid! I mean to give them up into the hands of their mortal enemies, Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon and his vassals; then Egypt shall have rest, as Egypt did of old.

Have thou no fear, the Lord says, Jacob, that art my servant still; not for Israel is danger brewing. From that far country of exile I mean to restore thee, restore those children of thine; Jacob shall return, and live at ease, every blessing shall enjoy, and enemies have none to fear. For thee no terrors, Jacob that art my servant, the Lord says; am I not at thy side? Of all the lands in which I have dispersed thee I will take full toll, but not of thee; I would but chastise thee with due measures kept, lest I should leave thee altogether acquitted.⁷

47 And this doom the Lord pronounced to the prophet Jeremias against the Philistines, before the defeat of Gaza by king Pharaoh.

Waters rising in the north,⁸ the Lord says, a river that overflows its banks, covering earth and earth's increase, city and citizen! Loud the cries everywhere, a whole world in lament, as the sound of armed hosts draws nearer, groan of chariot and rattle of wheels; listless hang hands, father for son has never a glance to spare. So comes the day when Philistia shall be plundered, all of it, Tyre and Sidon of all their defenders shall be stripped; Philistia the Lord despoils, and all that is left of the island-dwellers from Capthor. Shorn heads in Gaza; Ascalon is silent now, silent all their valleys. Long wilt thou bear the marks of thy mourning! Rest thee, sword of the Lord! Back into thy scabbard, calm thyself, and rest! Nay, rest how should it? It holds the Lord's warrant to subdue Ascalon and the sea-board country; there he has made tryst with it.

¹ Literally, 'Why has thy strong one been thrown down' (in the Latin version, 'become rotten'). Some think there is an allusion to the god Apis here, perhaps concealed by a false reading. ² See note on 25, 38.

³ Literally, 'The (appointed) time has brought tumult'. The sense of the Hebrew is probably 'Tumult has passed its appointed time', perhaps meaning that it is too late now to do anything about it.

⁴ If 'gad-fly' is the right rendering of a word not found elsewhere, it is impossible not to suspect a reference to the Greek myth of Io (regularly identified with the Egyptian goddess Isis). Io was changed by Zeus into a heifer and pursued by a gad-fly as the result of Hera's jealousy. ⁵ Literally, 'as if of bronze'. The Hebrew text gives 'as if of a serpent'.

⁶ The Latin version has read the name of the god Ammon as a common noun, 'multitude'; and, somewhat strangely, identifies the town of No not with Thebes, but with Alexandria, which was founded two centuries after Jeremias' date. ⁷ vv. 27, 28. A repetition of 30, 10, 11. ⁸ The mention of the north suggests that we are still dealing with the conquests of Nabuchodonosor. If so, the time-indication of verse 1 must be regarded as having an a fortiori value; even before the invasion of Philistia by Pharaoh Necho, Jeremias prophesied its invasion by Nabuchodonosor some years later.

48 And thus to Moab speaks the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel. Alas for Nabo, spoiled and shamed, for Cariathaim taken, the high fortress humbled, a prey to alarms! For Moab, scant triumph; against Hesebon there are plots a-brewing, Away with it, a nation let it be no more! Silence for thee, a long silence; the sword is at thy heels. From Oronaim the cry goes up, rack and ruin everywhere; Moab lies crushed, let Segorecho the cry! Weep they and wail, that climb the slopes of Luith; all the way down from Oronaim their foes may hear it, the cry of desolation. Fly he must that would escape with life, stripped though he be as the desert tamarisk. Ill reposed that confidence in ramparts of thine, stores of thine; taken thou shalt be like the rest, and Chamos go into exile, all his priests and all his votary chiefs with him. Of all thy cities, none shall be safe from the spoiler's entry; wasted thy valleys shall be, swept bare the hill-sides; the Lord decrees it. Weave a coronal¹ for Moab; in the flower of her pride she goes into exile, and all her cities lie desolate, none to dwell there. Cursed the man who goes about the Lord's work grudgingly, nor with blood stains his sword! Since those first days of his, ever was Moab too rich; he, that knew not exile, is like a wine that has settled on its lees, never decanted; tang and reek of it were never lost; a time is coming now, the Lord says, when I mean to send certain stewards of mine that shall tilt those jars; draw wine, drain goblet, and break jar to pieces! Chamos will play Moab false, as Bethel played Israel false, when Israel trusted in its sanctuary. Ay, boast on of your bravery, tell us you are warriors all! Yet Moab is laid waste, its townships aflame, all the flower of its chivalry gone to their death; so that king decrees, whose name is the Lord of hosts. Not long delayed, Moab's last hour; runs on swift feet his calamity. Mourn with him, you that are his neighbours, you that are his familiars; so trusty a rod broken, a staff so fair.

Poor maid of Dibon, come down from thy splendour and sit on the parched ground; the spoiler of Moab has scaled thy heights, dismantled thy walls; poor maid of Aroer, by the wayside linger and look around thee; ask of the fugitives, How went the day? Alas, Moab's hope is lost; Moab lies conquered. Loud be the cry of lament in Arnon, that tells of fields laid waste; doom on the hill-country, on Helon, Jasa, and Mephaath, Dibon, Nabo, and Beth-Deblathaim, Cariathaim, Bethgamul, Bethmaon, Carioth, and Bosra, and all the cities of Moab, far and near. Blunted now is that horn, the Lord says, crushed that strong arm! Senseless let him fall, that once for the divine power vaunted himself a match; a laughing-stock let him be, that once, vomiting over his wine, clapped hands in derision to make a laughing-stock of Israel! An interloper thou didst call him, and now, for this ill speaking of thine, thyself shalt be cast into exile.² Leave your cities, Moabites, and take to the hills; make the dove your model, that ever at the outermost edge of cave will build her nest.

The boasting of Moab has long been in our ears,³ as it was ever boastful; proud, scornful, boastful Moab, with head so high in air! Well I know, the Lord says, those high pretensions of hers, that have no strength to warrant them, those dreams that never come true! So, from one end of Moab to the other, there is dole and dirge, mournful hearing for the men behind those walls of hardened brick. Jazer laments for thee, vineyard of Sabama, and with Jazer I too will mourn; thy shoots reached from Jazer itself to the Dead Sea and beyond; now, harvest of thine and vintage of thine the spoiler has overrun. From the garden-lands of Moab joy and triumph have died away; all the presses I have emptied of their wine, no vintage-song, no treading the grapes as of old. The dirge goes up from Hesebon, from Eleale and Jasa; goes up all the way from Segor to Oronaim, like the lowing of heifer full-grown; foul run the waters of Nemrim. None will I leave in Moab, the Lord says, to worship at the hill-shrines, or do sacrifice to its gods. For Moab my heart wails like the wailing of flutes, wailing of flutes for those brick-walled cities of hers; too high she aimed, and see, they lie in ruins. Every head is shorn, every beard shaved in mourning; with bound¹ hands men go, sackcloth on their backs. Roof-top and street in Moab is none but echoes with grief; I have cast Moab away, the Lord says, like a jar past mending.

¹ Literally, 'give a flower'. The Hebrew text is generally rendered 'wings', with 'flying' instead of 'flourishing' in the second part of the verse, but the justification of this sense is doubtful. ² vv. 26, 27. The sense here is very doubtful. 'Interloper'; literally, 'thief'; the reference is perhaps to Israel's comparatively late arrival in Palestine. ³ vv. 29-38. Most of these phrases are to be found, though some of them in a different form, in chs. 15, 16 of Isaias. The simplest explanation seems to be, that both prophets, at this point, wrote in certain appropriate lines from an older poem. The 'walls of hardened brick' and the 'heifer full-grown' perhaps conceal proper names.

Lament for Moab in defeat, bowed heads for Moab's shame! A laughing-stock it will be and a by-word for all its neighbours. An eagle's flight yonder conqueror has, the Lord says, and will sweep down on Moab too. Now Carioth² is lost, and all the strongholds taken; cowed as woman's heart in child-bearing are those warrior hearts; Moab, that set the Lord at defiance, shall be a people no more. Terror in front of its people, the Lord says, trap and toil behind them; from terror flee thou, into trap fall thou; from the trap free thee, toils shall fasten thee. Such shall be my year of reckoning with the men of Moab, the Lord says. From the toils escaped, who turns to Hesebon for shelter? Helpless he stands; such a fire comes out from Hesebon, all Seon's capital aflame, till cheek and head of blustering Moab are consumed. Alas, Moab, alas, people of Chamos, for thy undoing! Gone into exile now thy sons and daughters!³ Yet a time shall come at last, the Lord says, when her lot shall be reversed.

Thus far the doom of Moab.

49 And thus the Lord speaks to the Ammonites: Did Israel, then, leave no sons, no heirs to follow him? How comes it that Melchom boasts possession of Gad, and worshippers of his dwell in yonder cities? A time is coming, the Lord says, when Rabbath Ammon shall hear the din of fighting, and shall be thrown down in ruins; when her daughter cities shall be burnt to the ground, and Israel, so runs the divine promise, shall drive out the intruder. Shall Hesebon mourn for Hai laid waste, and the women of Rabbath for Rabbath make no lament?⁴ Nay, put on sackcloth, raise the dirge as you scatter among the hedge-rows; Melchom goes into banishment, his priests and his votary chieftains with him. So proud of thy valleys! Wasted away, now, is that vale of thine, pampered maiden; confident in thy rich store, thou didst flatter thyself none should come near to harm thee, but I mean to fill thee with dread, says the Lord, the God of hosts, dread of all thy neighbours. Each man shall take his own path, scattering in flight, and there shall be none to rally the fugitives. Yet afterwards, the Lord says, I will bring the exiled sons of Ammon back to their home.

And for Edom, this. No more is Theman wise, as of old, says the Lord of hosts; the prudence of that breed is lost, its wisdom all gone to waste. Flee away, men of Dedan, and never look behind you, or hide deep in earth; I am bringing ruin upon Esau, calling him to account at last. Here are such vintagers as will leave thee never a cluster, such night-robbers as will have their fill; mine to strip Esau bare, dig up his lairs till there is no hiding in them. The whole brood of him must be destroyed, never a kinsman or neighbour left, that will say,⁵ To my care entrust thy orphans, to me let thy widows look for support. So many there are, the Lord says, that must drink the cup of vengeance all undeserving; and wouldst thou be spared, wouldst thou be acquitted? Acquittal for thee is none; thou shalt drain it to the dregs. By my own honour I have sworn it, the Lord says, that Bosra shall be an empty wilderness, a name to revile and to curse by; that her daughter cities shall for ever be desolate.

Hue and cry the Lord has brought to my ears, that even now goes out among the ¹ According to the Hebrew text 'lacerated' (in sign of mourning). ² Or perhaps the Hebrew word should be read as a common noun, 'cities'. ³ vs. 45, 46. Here again the prophet seems to be quoting from an older poem, which may or may not be the same as that already alluded to; cf. Num. 21, 28, 29. ⁴ The original runs simply, 'Mourn, Hesebon, for Hai is laid waste; lament, daughters of Rabbath'. But it seems clear that Hesebon, which had no connexion with the Ammonites, is only brought in by way of comparison. No town of Hai is elsewhere mentioned east of the Jordan, and many think the text is corrupt. ⁵ vs. 10, 11. The words 'that will say' are not expressed in the original, but it seems necessary to supply them; otherwise the two verses are in direct contradiction, and the mention of 'neighbours' is inexplicable.

nations, Muster we and march we against 15 her; on to battle! A little thing I mean thee to be in the world's eyes henceforward, 16 unregarded among the nations; till now, pride and the insolence of thy heart deduced thee, so safe thy nest among the rock-crevices, so close thou didst cling to the mountain summits; but now, be thy eyrie high as the eagle's, I will yet drag 17 thee down, the Lord says.¹ A very desert Edom shall be; no passer-by but will stand amazed, and hiss derision at its sufferings; 18 not more ruinously Sodom fell, and Gomorrah, and their neighbour cities, that lie uninhabited,
 far from the homes of men.
 19 See how lion from the fens of Jordan sallies out against yonder protected fold! Not less sudden the alarm shall be;² and the flock shall have a master of my own choosing.
 Match for me is none, there is none dare 20 implead me, no rival shepherd may challenge a claim like mine! Would you know what the Lord's design is for Edom, what plans he is devising against the homesteads of Theman? Why, he says, it will but need an array of weaklings to dislodge them,³ pull 21 their dwelling-place down about their ears!
 And with the crash of that ruin earth shakes, far as the Red Sea ring the 22 echoes of it. An eagle's flight yonder conqueror has, to soar high and sweep down on Bosra; cowed as woman's heart in child-bearing are the warrior hearts of Edom.
 23 And for Damascus, this. Hamath and Arphad see their hopes betray them; grievous the news that reaches them, and they are 24 rocked on a sea of doubt; anxiety gives them no respite. As for Damascus, her strength has left her; no thought has she but for flight, daunted by her peril, 25 overcome, like woman in child-bearing, with sharp pangs. City so renowned, home of such delights, must all abandon her?
 26 In her streets they lie slain, all the flower of her youth, all her brave warriors lie 27 silent now, the Lord says; and such a fire I will light within Damascus walls as shall feed on the palaces of Benadad.
 28 And this for Cedar, and the realms of Asor, that were destroyed by Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon. Word comes from the Lord: Up, march against Cedar, despoil we these children of the East! Pillage there shall be of home and herd, plundering of tents and gear and camels, and cries of Danger everywhere. Flee away, wander far away, men of Asor; deep, says the Lord, be your hiding-places! Here is Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon holding a council of war, devising plans against you.

Up, march against a people that lives at ease, fearing no attack, the Lord says;
 gates and bars they have none, dwelling there in the wilderness; camels for your plunder, herds a many for your prey!
 Scattered they shall be to all the winds,
 the folk that clip their foreheads bare,
 and from every corner of their lands death shall threaten them, the Lord says. Asor shall be a lair for serpents, a land for ever desolate; uninhabited it shall lie, far from the homes of men.

And here is the doom the Lord pronounced to the prophet Jeremias against Aelam, at the beginning of Sedecias' reign in Juda. A message from the Lord of hosts!
 I mean to break the bows of yonder Aelamites, wherein lies all their strength.
 Upon Aelam I will bid the winds blow from the four corners of heaven, and before each scatter them like chaff, till nation is none that has not seen their fugitives. Daunted the Aelamites shall be by the onset of their mortal enemies;
 my angry vengeance I will let loose against them, the Lord says, and my sword shall go at their heels till I have taken full toll of them. In Aelam I will set up my throne, he says, and rid it altogether of kings and princes. Yet afterwards, so runs the divine promise, I will bring the exiled sons of Aelam back to their home.

50 And here is the doom the Lord pronounced, with Jeremias for his spokesman, against Babylon and Chaldaea.

Tell it out, proclaim it for all the world

¹ ev. 14-16. The prophecy of Abdias opens with (substantially) the same expressions, and Abd. 5 is a reminiscence of verse 9 above. The use of common material by the two prophets seems the most probable explanation; cf. note on 48. 29-38.

² Literally, 'I will suddenly make him run to it', but the Hebrew text has, 'I will make him (Edom) suddenly run away from it'. ³ Literally, 'the little ones of the flock will throw them down'; the Hebrew text can be interpreted as meaning, 'they will throw down the little ones of the flock'.

to hear; set up a trophy, and cry the news, leave nothing untold! News of Babylon taken, and Bel thwarted, and Merodach overcome; all the idols put to shame, routed, all the false gods! Here is a people on the march from the north country that shall attack Babylon and turn her land into a desert; man nor beast shall dwell there, all are fled and gone.

So the day shall dawn, the time be ripe at last, the Lord says, when Israel and Juda both together shall come back, weeping as they hasten on their journey to find the Lord their God. For Sion every voice asking, every face towards Sion turned, they will come back, and bind themselves to the Lord by an eternal covenant, never to be forgotten. My people, all this while, has been but a flock gone astray; their shepherds led them by false paths, and left them to roam the hill-side; hill and mountain-side they crossed, and their own resting-place lay forgotten. None passed by but preyed on them; nor did the oppressor's conscience smite him; had they not set the Lord at defiance, that Lord who was the home of their loyalty, the hope of their race?

Flee, Israel, from Babylon; from Chaldaea's land be foremost to depart, like buck-goats that lead the way for their fellows. See what a confederacy of great nations I am mustering, there in the north country, to besiege and take Babylon, death-dealing archers that never speed arrow in vain! Chaldaea shall be a prize of war, the Lord says, and all her spoilers be content. Ay, boast and brag, trample on my own domain, like calves at grass or bellowing bull! Shame waits for the mother that bore you, her pride must be lowered in the dust; least regarded of all realms, a desert, pathless and parched! Doomed, all of her, by the Lord's vengeance to empty desolation; no passer-by but shall stand amazed at Babylon, or hiss derision at her sufferings. To your posts, archers, around the walls of Babylon; shoot, never spare arrow; to the Lord her life is forfeit. Now, raise the cry! Everywhere she is yielding; falls buttress and gapes wall, the Lord is avenged! Ay, take your fill of vengeance, pay her what she has earned. Leave none in Babylon to sow the fields, or carry scythe in harvest-time; fled, each to his own, before the invader's sword, fled, this way and that, to the countries of their birth.

Poor Israel, a flock so scattered! Lions have chased them away; first the Assyrian king would prey on them, and since then yonder Nabuchodonosor, of Babylon, has mangled their bones! And now, says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, I mean to have a reckoning with the Babylonian king, and his realm, as once with Assyria. And Israel I will restore to his home; Carmel and Basan shall be his pasture-ground again, hill-country of Ephraim and Galaad his hunger shall content. When that day dawns, the Lord says, when the time is ripe for it, guilt shall be found in Israel no more, for the record of Juda's sins you shall search in vain; the remnant which I leave shall win my pardon.

March on, the Lord says, into the land of tyranny, and call its citizens to account; bale and ban at their heels! All my command see thou execute. Din of battle sounds through the land, and the crash of ruin; rack and ruin everywhere! And this Babylon was once a hammer to smite the world; now it lies by all the world abandoned! I laid a trap for thee, Babylon, and thou wast caught unawares; thy long defiance of the Lord has found thee out and overtaken thee at last. Now the Lord opens his armoury, takes out from it the tools that shall wreak his vengeance; he, the Lord of hosts, has work for them to do in the country of the Chaldaeans. From the furthest confines of the land draw near; open a way for the spoilers; pile up stones from the road in heaps; make an end of her, leave nothing to survive. An end of all her warriors, to the slaughter-house with them! Woe betide them, their day has come, the time when they must meet their reckoning.

Listen to the buzz of voices, as the fugitives escaped from Babylon come back to Sion, spreading the news how the Lord has been avenged, how the Lord's temple has been avenged.

¹ The sense of the Hebrew text is probably 'heifer treading out the corn or neighing stallion'.
² The Latin version here seems to have misunderstood the Hebrew text, which refers to the opening of store-rooms and the piling up of their contents as forfeit to the Lord and therefore unavailable for booty (Tos. 6. 17, 18; 7. 11, 12).

- 29 Archers a many with bent bows, give them orders how the city must fare: Stand about in a ring, let never a man escape, pay it what its deeds have earned; to Babylon do as Babylon did to others, the city that was the Lord's enemy, defied the holy One 30 of Israel. In her streets they lie slain, all the flower of her youth, all her brave warriors lie silent now, the Lord says.¹ Have at thee, says the Lord, the God of hosts; thy day has come, the time when thou 32 must meet thy reckoning! Stumbles the tyrant and falls, with none there to raise him; and in those cities of his I will kindle such a fire as shall consume all around it.

- 33 Thus says the Lord of hosts: Here is great wrong done to Israel and to Juda both; he that has them holds them fast, 34 and let them go he will not. Yet they have a strong champion that claims them as his own; his name is the Lord of hosts; right and redress he will bring them in such a fashion as will shake earth,² and 35 make the homes of Babylon tremble. The sword it must be, the Lord says, for the men of Chaldaeae, for citizen of Babylon, and prince, and councillor; the sword for 36 their wise men, that shall be fools, and their brave men, that shall be cowards; the sword for horse and chariot, the sword for 37 all the mixed breed in it, that shall be weak as women, the sword for all their treasure-houses, that shall be given up to plunder.
38 And for their waters, not a sword, but drought to dry them up; is not this a land of idols, that loves to see portents befall?³
39 It shall be a lair for serpents and strange monsters,⁴ a haunt of the ostrich, but never again shall man dwell there; age after age, 40 it shall never be rebuilt; not more ruinously the Lord overthrew Sodom and Gomorrhah and their neighbour cities, that lie uninhabited, far from the homes of men.⁵

- 41 Here is a people marching from the north country, the Lord says, a great nation from the world's end, and vassal kings

a many. Bow and shield they ply, and their hard hearts pity none; loud their battle-cry as the roaring of the sea. So they ride on, as warriors ride, poor Babylon, thy enemies. Unnerved the king's hands droop at the very rumour of it; grief overmasters him, sharp as the pangs of travail.⁶ See how lion from the fens of Jordan sallies out against yonder protected fold! Not less sudden the alarm shall be; and the flock shall have a master of my own choosing. Match for me is none, there is none dare implead me, no rival shepherd may challenge a claim like mine! Would you know what the Lord's design is for Babylon, what plans he is devising against the realm of Chaldaeae? Why, he says, it will need but an array of weaklings to dislodge them, pull their dwelling-place down about their ears!⁷ Babylon has fallen; earth trembles at the sound of it; a great cry goes up for all the world to hear.

51 Thus says the Lord, I mean to let loose on Babylon, and the whole of Defiance-land,⁸ a destroying blast; winnowers of mine shall reach Babylon and fall to winnowing it, till all the heaps are gone; an ill day for Babylon, cut off on every side. Let not a man live to bend bow agrin, or don breastplate for battle; never a warrior spare, army she must have none left. Everywhere in country-side and street of Chaldaeae the mangled corpses lie; Juda's God, the Lord of hosts, has not altogether forsaken her, and to that holy One of Israel the whole land is forfeit. Flee away from the confines of Babylon, flee for your lives; would you meekly accept her punishment? The time has come when the Lord will take vengeance on her, he it is that sends this retribution. Babylon, that was once a golden cup in the Lord's hand, for a whole world's bemusing! Drank nations of that cup, how they reeled and tottered! And now, all in a moment, Babylon herself falls to her ruin. Raise the dirge, go find balm to heal those wounds

¹ Repeated from 49. 26.

² 'Shake earth'; or perhaps (deriving the Hebrew verb from a different root) 'bring repose to earth'.

³ There is here a play upon words in the Hebrew; 'sword' and 'drought' differ only by a single point. The second half of the verse is of doubtful interpretation. Herodotus affirms (i. 191) that Cyrus took Babylon by diverting the course of the Euphrates.

⁴ Literally, 'dragons and fig-fauns'. Cf. Is. 34. 14, where the Latin version renders the same Hebrew phrase 'demons and onocentours'. There can be no certainty what creatures are really alluded to; some think wild cats and jackals.

⁵ Repeated from 49. 18.

⁶ vv. 44, 45. Repeated from 49. 19-21.

⁷ vv. 44, 45. Repeated from 49. 19-21.

⁸ The Hebrew letters of this word form a cipher equivalent for the name 'Chaldaeae'.

9 of hers! Alas, we sought a cure for Babylon, but curing her there was none; time it is we left her, and went back each to his own land; towers heaven-high the measure of her punishment, and is lost 10 among the clouds. Come, then, since he has given us the redress we needed, recount we in Sion the great doings of the Lord our God.

11 Whet arrow, and fill quiver; the Lord has put a resolve into the heart of the Median king; he will have Babylon overthrown. The Lord shall be avenged, his 12 temple shall be avenged! Against Babylon's walls display the standard, keep strict watch, post sentinels, lay ambush; the 13 doom of its folk, long since devised, long since denounced, he will execute. Land by all those tributary streams so enriched, thy 14 end is reached, thy thread is spun. By his own honour the Lord of hosts has sworn it, thy enemies shall swarm about thee like locusts, raising their vintage-song.

15 His the power that made the earth,¹ the wisdom that orders nature, the foresight that spread out the heavens. At the sound of his voice, what mustering of the waters overhead! He summons up the cloud-wrack from the world's end, turning the lightning into a rain-storm, bringing the 17 winds out of his store-house; how puny, then, is man's skill, how sorry a thing is the metal-caster's workmanship; after all his labour at the forge, only a lifeless counterfeit! Fond imaginations, fantastic figures, when the time comes for reckoning, 18 they will be heard of no more. Not such the worship that is the heirloom of Jacob's line; their God is the God who made all things, Israel his patrimony, the Lord of hosts, his name.

20 Great conqueror, the weapon I wield! By thy means I crush the nations, undo 21 empires;² crush horse and rider, crush chariot and charioteer, crush man and woman, crush old and young, crush lad 22 and lass, crush shepherd and flock, crush ploughman and team, crush prince and 23 ruler! And now I mean to repay Babylon, and all the people of Chaldea, for the wrongs they did, says the Lord, and your eyes shall see it. Have at thee, stronghold 25 of ruin, the Lord says, a whole world's ruin! My hand is raised to smite thee, and tear thee from thy rocky bed; a calcined heap thou shalt be, that never corner-26 stone, never foundation-stone shall yield; the Lord dooms thee to lie for ever desolate.

Display your standard for all the world 27 to see, sound the trumpet far and wide, enrol the nations against her; make tryst with the kings of Ararat, Menni, and Ascenez, and count Taphsar among her enemies; like locusts in bristling array swarm your cavalry. Plight all the nations 28 to make war on her, the kings of Media with their chieftains and satraps, all their wide dominion; a whole world in turmoil 29 and travail with the stir of the divine resolve to crush Babylon, make Babylon an empty desert. See how her warriors quit 30 the field, to garrison their strongholds, how their valour dies away and grows womanish, how her roofs blaze, the bars of her gates are shattered! Courier meets 31 courier, post to post hands the tidings on; tell the king of Babylon how his capital has fallen, length and breadth of it, the fords 32 occupied, the reed-beds aflame, dismayed the defenders. Thus says the Lord of hosts, 33 the God of Israel: Babylon is a threshing-floor time has worn smooth; wait but a little, and it is ready for harvest.

Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, how 34 he has preyed on me, feasted on me, left me but an empty shell; a devouring monster that with kernel fills his maw, throws husk away! Thus Sion, for her torn flesh, 35 thus Jerusalem, for her blood spilt, arraigns Babylon and all yonder Chaldaean folk; and now the Lord of hosts promises 36 to maintain their quarrel, to redress their wrongs. I will turn her sea into desert sand, he tells you, dry up her flow of waters; Babylon shall remain a heap of 37 ruins, a lair for serpents, a thing of wonder and derision, and never a soul to dwell in it. What though they rage like roaring lion, 38 like young lion that tosses his mane? I have a medicine for this thirst of theirs, 39 to bemuse them and steal away their

¹ vv. 15-19. These verses are repeated from 10. 12-16; it is not easy to see how they are relevant in their present context.

² Some think Babylon itself is addressed, as having been previously the instrument of the divine vengeance. But it seems better to understand the passage as referring to king Cyrus, like verse 11 above and verse 28 below.

senses; they shall sleep on, the Lord says, with that eternal sleep from which there is 40 no waking. Never was lamb led to the slaughter-house, never ram or buck-goat, 41 so unsuspecting. Sesach¹ taken, the paragon of kingdoms fallen! Babylon turned into a sight of horror for all the world to 42 see! Babylon foundered and gone, the waste waves closing over her! All her cities a picture of desolation, an empty desert, uninhabited, untrampled by mortal 43 foot. Bel, too, the God of Babylon, I will call to account, and make him disgorge his treasures; no more shall pilgrims flock into his temple from distant lands; Babylon's defences are down.

45 You that are my own people, separate yourselves from her, flee all of you from the Lord's vengeance; else you shall be ever faint with alarms,² ever daunted by the news that reaches you, each year a fresh rumour of wrongs done in this land, of rulers struggling for preeminence.

47 A time is coming when I mean to have a reckoning with the idols of Babylon; the land will learn that they have played it false, when corpses lie thick in the heart of it.
 48 Heaven and earth, and all they contain, will be triumphing over Babylon, says the Lord, as they see the spoilers marching against her from the north country; through Babylon so many slain in Israel, of Babylon so many slain, in every corner 49 of their land! Come, linger not, you that have escaped the sword; exiled far away, bethink you still of the Lord, still let the thought of Jerusalem return to your hearts.

51 Alas, we are all confusion; what taunts we must listen to, shame-faced, now that the Lord's holy temple by alien intruders is defiled!³

53 A time is coming, the Lord says, when I mean to have a reckoning with those false gods of hers. Everywhere in Chaldaea there shall be wounded men a-groaning; let Babylon scale the skies, fortify her walls heaven-high, they shall yet find their way in, the spoilers that do my errand, the Lord says. Babylon shall be all lament, Chaldaea a crash of ruin; the mighty stir of the city will be drowned, when the Lord lays it waste, by the surge of armies, wave upon wave, and the noise of their shouting. The spoiler has come upon Babylon; her warriors are caught in a trap, their bows are useless now; the Lord's vengeance is irresistible, and he pays full measure. Bemoaned they shall be, prince and councillor and chieftain and ruler and warrior; all shall sleep eternally the sleep from which there is no waking; such is the decree of that King whose name is the Lord of hosts.

That wide wall of Babylon, says the Lord of hosts, shall be dismantled at last, those high gates burnt. So men labour for nothing; so the toil of nations perishes in the fire.⁴

And now Jeremias had an errand for Saraias, son of Nerias, son of Maasias. When king Sedecias departed to Babylon, in the fourth year of his reign, Saraias went with him as his principal spokesman.⁵ Jeremias had written down on a single scroll all the doom that was to befall Babylon, all the prophecy against Babylon aforegoing. When thou reachest Babylon, he told Saraias, be sure thou readest all this. And say, in reading it: Lord, thou dost threaten this place with destruction; man nor beast shall dwell there, it shall lie desolate for ever. Then, when thou hast finished reading the scroll, tie a stone to it and sink it in the midst of Euphrates; and this add: Thus Babylon shall sink, and rise no more out of the calamity I mean to bring upon it; Babylon shall melt away.⁶

Here ends the prophecy of Jeremias.

52 Sedecias was twenty-one years old when he came to the throne,⁷ and his reign at Jerusalem lasted eleven years; his mother's name was Amital, daughter of Jeremias of Lobna. He disobeyed the Lord's will, as Joachim had; for now the Lord's anger hung over Juda and Jerusalem, ready to banish them from his ¹ As in 25. 26, a cipher name for Babylon.

² Literally, 'and lest you should (continue to) be faint-hearted'. The common rendering 'And do not be faint with alarms' does not suit the context; escape would make alarm unnecessary.

³ This verse is generally understood as a protest from the exiles, who dare not return to Judaea from a sense of shame. But its appearance here is curiously inappropriate, and some suspect that, through accident, it has been misplaced.

⁴ The second half of this verse is also found in Hab. 2. 13.

⁵ According to the Hebrew text, 'his chief of resting-place', perhaps in the sense of quartermaster.

⁶ The words 'Babylon shall melt away' represent what is probably an error of copying in the Hebrew text.

⁷ The whole of this chapter, except verses 28-30, is repeated from IV Kg. 24 and 25. There are a few very slight differences, some of which suggest errors of transcription.

presence. And Sedecias in his turn revolted from the king of Babylon.

4 And now, in the ninth year of Sedecias' reign, on the tenth day of the tenth month, Nabuchodonosor reached Jerusalem at the head of his army. They surrounded it and threw up siege works about it, and so the city continued beleaguered until king Sedecias' eleventh year. Then, on the ninth day of the fourth month, when famine had broken out in the city and the poorer folk had nothing left to eat, a breach was made in the walls; and that night all the fighting men made their escape by way of the gate between the two walls, by the royal garden, leaving the Chaldeans to continue the siege of the city. They chose for their flight 8 the road which leads to the desert, and in the desert by Jericho Sedecias was overtaken by the Chaldeans, who had set out in pursuit. All his retinue deserted him; 9 and so, a prisoner, the king was borne away to Reblatha, in the Emath country, where Nabuchodonosor passed sentence 10 on him. Slain by the king of Babylon were all his sons, there in their father's sight; slain by the king of Babylon, at Reblatha, 11 were all the nobles of Juda; and as for Sedecias himself, his eyes were put out, and he was carried off, loaded with chains, to Babylon, where he remained a prisoner till the day of his death.

12 On the tenth day of the fifth month in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor's reign, the commander of his bodyguard, Nabuzardan, came on his master's errand 13 to Jerusalem, where he burned down temple and palace and private dwellings too; no house of note but he set it on fire. 14 The troops he brought with him were employed in dismantling the walls on every 15 side of it. Then Nabuzardan carried off the remnants of the people that were left in the city, the deserters who had gone over to Nabuchodonosor, and the common folk 16 generally; leaving only such of the poorer sort as were vine-dressers and farm labourers. Brazen pillars and brazen stands 17 and the great basin of bronze that stood in the Lord's temple the Chaldeans broke up, and took away all the bronze to Babylon; for bronze, too, they carried away pot and fork, ladle and cup and saucer, all the 18 appurtenances of worship that were of bronze; for gold, too, and for silver, bowl and censer and urn and basin and lampstand and spoon and goblet; nothing did Nabuzardan leave behind him. There was 20 no reckoning the weight of bronze, when the two pillars, the great basin, and the twelve calves supporting it, all set up by Solomon in the temple, are included; each 21 pillar was eighteen cubits high, twelve cubits round, and four fingers thick, and they were hollow within. On each rested 22 a brazen capital, five cubits in height, with network and pomegranate mouldings on the rim; the pattern of each was the same. There were ninety-six pomegranates be- 23 sides, making a hundred in all, and all had network around them.

Prisoners, too, Nabuzardan carried 24 away with him, the two chief priests, Saraïas and Sophonias, the three doorkeepers from the temple, and among the 25 citizens, the chamberlain who commanded the army, seven other courtiers who were left in the city, the secretary who was charged with the army and had the levying of recruits, and sixty surviving citizens of the common sort. All these were carried 26 away by Nabuzardan to Reblatha, into Nabuchodonosor's presence; and there at 27 Reblatha, in the Emath country, Nabuchodonosor put them to death. So the men of Juda were exiled from their country. Three thousand and twenty-three 28 Jewish citizens Nabuchodonosor banished in the seventh year of his reign, and another eight hundred and thirty-two, from 29 Jerusalem, in the eighteenth year of it; then, in his twenty-third year, seven hundred and forty-five were banished by Nabuzardan, the captain of the bodyguard; four thousand six hundred in all.

On the twenty-fifth day of the twelfth 31 month, in the thirty-seventh year after king Joachim of Juda had been carried into exile, the new king of Babylon, Evil-Merodach, in this first year of his reign, gave redress to his captive and released him from prison. Graciously did Evil-Merodach receive him, gave him a seat of honour above the other captive kings, and relieved him of his prisoner's garb. All the 32 rest of his life he was entertained at the royal table; all the rest of his life he received, day and day, a perpetual allowance granted to him, as long as he should live, 34 by the king's bounty.

THE LAMENTATIONS OF THE PROPHET JEREMIAS

WHEN Israel was brought into captivity, and Jerusalem left deserted, the prophet Jeremias sat down there and wept, with this mournful lamentation following. And as he spoke, ever he sighed and moaned in the bitterness of his heart.

1 Alone she dwells, the city erewhile so populous; a widow now, once a queen among the nations; tributary now, that once had provinces at her command.

2 Be sure she weeps; there in the darkness her cheeks are wet with tears; of all that courted her, none left to console her, all those lovers grown weary of her, and turned into enemies.

3 Cruel the suffering and the bondage of Juda's exile;¹ that she must needs dwell among the heathen! Nor respite can she find; close at her heels the pursuit, and peril on either hand.

4 Desolate, the streets of Sion; no flocking, now, to the assembly; the gateways lie deserted. Sighs priest, and the maidens go in mourning, so bitter the grief that hangs over all.

5 Exultant, now, her invaders; with her enemies nothing goes amiss. For her many sins, the Lord has brought doom on her, and all her children have gone into exile, driven before the oppressor.

6 Fled is her beauty, the Sion that was once so fair; her chieftains have yielded their ground before the pursuer, strengthless as rams² that can find no pasture.

7 Grievous the memories she holds, of the hour when all her ancient glories passed from her, when her people fell defenceless before the invader, unresisting before an enemy that derided them.³

Heinously Jerusalem sinned; what wonder if she became an outlaw?⁴ How they fell to despising her when they saw her shame, that once flattered her! Deeply she sighed, and turned away her head.

Ill might skirts of her robe the defilement conceal; alas, so reckless of her doom, alas, fallen so low, with none to comfort her! Mark it well, Lord; see how humbled I, how exultant my adversary!

Jealous hands were laid on all she treasured; so it was that she must see Gentiles profane her sanctuary, Gentiles, by thy ordinance from the assembly debarred.

Kindred was none but went sighing for lack of bread, offered its precious heirlooms for food to revive men's hearts. Mark it well, Lord, and see my pride abased!

Look well, you that pass by, and say if there was ever grief like this grief of mine; never a grape on the vineyard left to glean, when the Lord's threat of vengeance is fulfilled.⁵

Must fire from heaven waste my whole being, ere I can learn my lesson? Must he catch me in a net, to drag me back from my course? Desolate he leaves me, to pine away all the day long with grief.

No respite it gives me, the yoke of guilt I bear, by his hand fastened down upon my neck; see, I faint under it! The Lord has given me up a prisoner to duress there is no escaping.

Of all I had, the Lord has taken away the noblest; lost to me, all the flower of my chivalry, under his strict audit; Sion, poor

¹ Literally, this verse appears to imply that Juda has gone into exile because of affliction; and some think the reference is to refugee Jews in Egypt and elsewhere. But the word used for 'exile' really means 'deportation'. ² In the Hebrew text, 'stags'. ³ Literally, 'her enemies derided her sabbath', that is, her quiescence. The Hebrew text is generally interpreted as meaning that Sion, in her affliction, remembers her past glories; but the expression is obscure. ⁴ 'An outlaw'; literally, 'unable to hold her ground'; but the word used in the Hebrew text implies ceremonial defilement. ⁵ The opening of this verse, in the Hebrew text, is of uncertain interpretation; some think the meaning is, 'May it never happen to you!' The vineyard metaphor used here and in verse 22 seems due to a mistaken interpretation in the Latin.

maid, here was a wine-press well trodden down!

16 Pray you, should I not weep? Fountains these eyes are, that needs must flow; comforter is none at hand, that should revive my spirits. Lost to me, all those sons of mine, outmatched by their enemy.

17 Quest for consolation is vain, let her plead where she will; neighbours of Jacob, so the Lord decrees, are Jacob's enemies, and all around they shrink from her, as from a thing unclean.

18 Right the Lord has in his quarrel; I have set his commands at defiance. O world, take warning; see what pangs I suffer, all my folk gone into exile, both man and maid.

19 So false the friends that were once my suitors! And now the city lacks priests and elders both, that went begging their bread, to revive the heart in them.

20 Take note, Lord, of my anguish, how my bosom burns, and my heart melts within me, in bitter ruth.¹ And all the while, sword threatens without, and death not less cruel within.

21 Uncomforted my sorrow, but not unheard; my enemies hear it, and rejoice that my miseries are of thy contriving. Ah, but when thy promise comes true, they shall feel my pangs!

22 Vintager who didst leave my boughs so bare, for my much offending, mark well their cruelty, and strip these too in their turn; here be sighs a many, and a sad heart to claim it.

2 Alas, what mantle of cloud is this, the divine anger has thrown over unhappy Zion? The pride of Israel cast down from heaven to earth; the ground where the Lord's feet once rested, now, in his anger, forgotten?

² Blessed abodes of Jacob, by the Lord's unsparing vengeance engulfed; towers that kept Juda inviolable hurled to the ground in ruin; kingdom and throne dragged in the dust!

³ Crushed lay all the defences of Israel, under his displeasure; failed us, at the enemy's onset, the protection of his right hand; Jacob must be hedged about, as by flames of a consuming fire.

⁴ Deadly his bent bow, steady the play of his right hand assailing us; all that was fairest in poor Zion's dwelling-place needs must perish, under the fiery rain of his vengeance.

Enemies he counts us, and has engulfed the whole of Israel in ruin; gone the palaces, gone the strongholds; Alas, poor Zion! weeps man, weeps maid, with cowed spirits.⁴

Fallen, as it had been some garden shed, his own tabernacle; his own trysting-place with men he would pull down! Feast-day and sabbath should be forgotten in Zion; for king and priest, only anger and scorn.

Grown weary of his altar, from his own sanctuary turning away in abhorrence, the Lord has given up yonder embattled towers to the enemy; their cries ring through the temple like shout of holiday.

Heedfully the Lord went about his work, to strip the inviolable city of her walls; exact his measuring-line, busy his hand with the task of overthrow, till wall and rampart should lament their common ruin.

Idly the gates of her sag towards earth, bars riven and rent; king and chieftain are far away, exiled among the heathen; tradition is dead, nor any prophet learns, in vision, the Lord's will.

Jerusalem's aged folk sit there in the dust, dumb with sorrow; dust scattered over their heads, and sackcloth their garb; never a maid shall you see but has her head bowed down to earth.

Keen anguish for the overthrow of an unhappy race, that dims eye with tears, that stirs my being to its depths, as my heart goes out in boundless compassion!⁵ Child and babe lie fainting in the streets.

Listen, how they ask where all the bread and wine is gone to! Wound they have none, yet there in the open streets you shall see them faint away, sighing out their lives on their mothers' bosoms.

Might I but confront thee with such another as thyself! What queen so unhappy as Jerusalem, what maid as Zion desolate? How shall I comfort thee? Sea-deep is thy ruin, and past all cure.

Never a true vision or a wise thy prophets have for thee, never shew thee where thy guilt rests, and urge thee to repentance; lies and lures are all the burden of their revealing.

¹ Literally, 'for I am full of bitterness'. But the Hebrew text has, 'for truth it is that I have rebelled against thee'. ² The Latin here describes God as filling Juda with 'humiliated men and humiliated women'; the sense of the Hebrew is rather 'lamentation and lament', as in Is. 29. 2. ³ Literally, 'my liver is poured out on the ground'.

15 Openly the passers-by deride thee, poor maid; clap hands, and hiss, and wag their heads at thee; So much, they cry, for the city that was once the nonpareil of beauty, pride of the whole earth!

16 Pale¹ envy mops and mows at thee; how they hiss and gnash their teeth! Now to prey on her carrion! What fortune, that we should have lived to see this day, so long looked for in vain!

17 Quit is the Lord of his oath taken in times past; all his purpose is fulfilled; for thee, ruin relentless, for thy bitter enemy, triumph and high achievement.

18 Round those inviolable defences, cry they upon the Lord in good earnest. Day and night, Sion, lethy tears stream down; never rest thou, never let that eye weary of its task.²

19 Sleepless in the night-watches raise thy song; flow thy heart's prayer unceasingly; lift ever thy hands in supplication for infant lives; yonder, at the street corner, they are dying of famine.

20 Think well, Lord, is there any other people of whom thou hast taken such toll? Shall woman eat her own child, so tiny, hands can still clasp it? In the Lord's sanctuary, priest and prophet be slain?

21 Untended they lie on the bare earth, the young and the aged; maid and warrior slain by the sword! This day of thy vengeance was to be all massacre, thou wouldst kill unsparingly.

22 Vengeance this day all around me; what musterin^c of thy terrors,³ as for a solemn assembly! Escape is none, nor any remnant left; of all I fondled and fostered, the enemy has taken full toll.

3 Ah, what straits have I not known, under the avenging rod!⁴

2 Asked I for light, into deeper shadow the Lord's guidance led me;

3 Always upon me, none other, falls endlessly the blow.

4 Broken this frame, under the wrinkled skin, the sunk flesh.

¹ The Hebrew letters Pe and Ain are unaccountably transposed, here and in 3. 46-51; 4. 16 and 17.

² The first part of this verse is perhaps corrupt; the Hebrew text of it gives a rather improbable sense.

³ Some think that we should interpret the Hebrew text as meaning '(some) of my neighbours', not 'terrors'.

⁴ There is no general agreement whether this chapter (and especially the concluding part of it) refers to the personal experiences of Jeremiah, or describes poetically the misfortunes of the Jewish race.

⁵ The sense given here is that of the Septuagint Greek; the Latin version gives in the first half, 'He has broken my teeth one and all'; the Hebrew text in the second half is usually rendered, 'he has bowed me down among the ashes'.

An Alphabet of Patience in Misery

Bitterness of despair fills my prospect, walled in on every side;

Buried in darkness, and, like the dead, interminably.

Closely he fences me in, beyond hope of rescue; loads me with fetters.

Cry out for mercy as I will, prayer of mine wins no audience;

Climb these smooth walls I may not; every way of escape he has undone.

Deep ambushed he lies, as lurking bear or lion from the covert;

Drawn aside from my path, I fall a lonely prey to his ravening.

Dread archer, of me he makes a target for all his arrows;

Each shaft of his quiver at my vitals taught to strike home!

Evermore for me the taunts of my neighbours, their songs of derision.

Entertainment of bitter herbs he gives me, and of wormwood my fill,

Files all my teeth with hard gravel-stones, bids me feed on ashes.⁵

Far away is my old contentment, happier days forgotten;

Farewell, my hopes of long continuance, my patient trust in the Lord!

Guilt and suffering, gall and wormwood, keep all this well in memory.

God knows it shall be remembered, and with sinking of the heart;

Gage there can be none other of remaining confidence.

His be the thanks if we are not extinguished; his mercies never weary;

Hope comes with each dawn; art thou not faithful, Lord, to thy promise?

Heart whispers, The Lord is my portion; I will trust him yet.

In him be thy trust, for him thy heart's longing, gracious thou shalt find him;

If deliverance thou wouldst have from the Lord, in silence await it.

It is well thou shouldst learn to bear the yoke, now in thy youth,

Just burden, in solitude and silence justly borne.

29 Joy may yet be thine, for mouth that kisses the dust, 30 Jeering of the multitude, and cheek buffeted in scorn, bravely endured.
 31 Know for certain, the Lord has not finally abandoned thee; 32 Kind welcome the outcast shall have,
 from one so rich in kindness.
 33 Kin of Adam he will not crush or cast away wantonly; 34 Let there be oppression of the poor under duress, 35 Law's right denied, such as the most High grants to all men, 36 Lying perversion of justice, then he cannot overlook it.¹ 37 Man may foretell; only the Lord brings his word to pass; 38 Mingled good and evil proceed both from the will of the most High; 39 Mortal is none may repine; let each his own sins remember.
 40 Narrowly our path scan we, and to the Lord return;
 41 Never hand or heart but must point heavenward this day!
 42 Nothing but defiant transgression on our part; and shouldst thou relent?
 43 Over our heads thy angry vengeance lowered; smiting, thou wouldst not spare.
 44 Oh, barrier of cloud, our prayers had no strength to pierce!
 45 Offscouring and refuse of mankind thou hast made us, 46 Put to shame by the mocking grimaces of our enemies.
 47 Prophets we had, but their word was peril and pitfall, and ruin at the last.² 48 Poor Sion, for thy calamity these cheeks are furrowed with tears; 49 Quell if thou wouldst the restless fever of my weeping, 50 Quickly, Lord, look down from heaven and pay heed to us, 51 Quite forspent, eye and soul, with grief Jerusalem's daughters bear.³ 52 Relentless as hawk in air they pursued me, enemies unprovoked, 53 Reft me of life itself, sealed with a stone my prison door.

Round my head the waters closed, and 54
 I had given myself up for lost, Save for one hope; to thee, Lord, I cried 55
 from the pit's depth, Sure of thy audience; wouldst thou turn 56
 a deaf ear to sighs of complaint?
 Summoned, thou didst come to my 57
 side, whispering, Do not be afraid.
 Thine, Lord, to take my part; thine to 58
 rescue me from death;
 The malice of my enemies to discover, 59
 my wrongs to redress.
 Thrust away from thy sight, the grudge 60
 they bear me, the ill they purpose, Unheard by thee their taunts, their 61 whispered plotings?
 Uttered aloud or in secret, their malice 62
 assails me from morn till night;
 Up in arms, or met in secret conclave, 63
 ever against me they raise the battle-song.
 Visit them with the punishment their 64 ill deeds have earned; Veiled be those blind hearts with fresh 65 blindness of thy own making; Vanish from the earth their whole brood, 66
 ere thy vengeance leaves off pursuing them!

4 All dim, now, and discoloured, the gold that once shone so fair! Heaped up at every street-corner lie hallowed stones.

Bright they shone once in all their re- 2 nown, the men of Sion, and now what are they? Little regarded as common earthenware, of the potter's fashioning.

Cub of jackal⁴ is fed at its dam's breast; 3 and has my people grown unnatural to wards its own children, like some ostrich in the desert?

Dry throat and parching tongue for babe 4
 at the breast; children asking for bread, and never a crust to share with them!

Ever they fared daintily, that now lie 5 starved in the streets; ever went richly arrayed, and now their fingers clutch at the dung-hill.

Faithless Juda! Heavier punishment 6
 she must needs undergo than guilty Sodom, that perished all in a moment, and never a blow struck.

¹ vv. 33-36. This is perhaps the least unnatural of the various interpretations suggested for this difficult passage. It assumes that the word 'wantonly' is emphatic, and that the end of verse 36 is a question, 'Does the Lord take no notice?' ² In the Hebrew text, 'Peril and pitfall, rack and ruin have overtaken us'. ³ Literally, 'My eye has treated my soul harshly as the result of all the daughters of my city'; the text is perhaps corrupt. ⁴ This is the accepted meaning of the word used in the Hebrew text, here represented in the Latin by an obscure and inappropriate rendering.

- 7 Gone, the fair bloom of princely cheeks,¹ snowy-pure, cream-white, red as tinted ivory,² and all sapphire-clear;
- 8 Here is no recognizing them, out in the streets, coal-black, skin clinging to bones, dry as wood!
- 9 It were better to have fallen at the sword's point than yield thus to the stab of hunger, wasted away through famine.
- 10 Juda brought low, and mother-love forgotten; that women should eat their own children, cooked with their own hands!
- 11 Kindled at last is the Lord's anger; rains down from heaven the storm of his vengeance, lighting a flame that burns Sion to the ground.
- 12 Little dreamed they, king and common folk the world over, that any assault of the foe should storm Jerusalem gates;
- 13 Malice and lawlessness it was of priest and prophet, whereby innocent men came to their deaths, that brought such punishment.
- 14 Now, as they walk blindly through the streets, they are defiled with blood; no help for it, gather their skirts about them as they may;
- 15 Out of my way! cries one to another; Back, pollution, do not touch me! The very Gentiles protest in alarm, Here is no place for them!
- 16 Protection the Lord gives them no longer, they are dispersed under his frown; the priesthood no honour claims, old age no pity.³
- 17 Quenched is the hope our eyes strained for, while hope was left us; looking for help so eagerly to a nation that had none to give!
- 18 Refuge for us in the treacherous highways is none; we are near the end; all is over, this is the end;
- 19 Swifter than flight of eagles the pursuit; even on the mountains they give chase, even in the desert take us by surprise.
- 20 Through our fault he who is breath of life to us, our anointed king, is led away captive;⁴ under his shadow we hoped our race should thrive.

Until thy turn comes, shout on, Edom, triumph on, land of Hus; the same cup thou thou shalt drink, and be drunken, and stripped bare.

Vengeful audit-day! Sion's account closed, recovered her fortunes; Edom called to account, discovered her guilt!

5 Bethink thee, Lord, of our ill case; see where we lie humiliated, and seeing take pity! New tenants our lands have, our homes foreign masters; orphaned sons of widowed mothers were not more defenceless. Ours to buy the very water we drink, pay a price for every stick of fire-wood; led hither and thither under the yoke, with no respite given, we must make our peace with men of Egypt or Assyria, for a belly-full of bread. So must we bear the guilt of our fathers, that sinned and are gone! Slaves for our masters now, and none to ransom us; bread won out in the desert, and at peril of our lives from the sword's point! What wonder if our skins are burnt dry as an oven, seared by long famine?

Never a woman in Sion, never a maid in all Juda's cities, but has met with dishonour; merciless hands hurry our princes to the gallows; reverence is none for grey hairs. Toiling at the mill, the flower of our youth, or staggering under loads of wood;⁵ never an old man left to sit at the gate, or a young man to wake the echoes of the harp; gone, all our mirth, all our music drowned in sadness. Alas, we are sinners; the wreath has faded from our brows; there are sad hearts everywhere, and dim eyes. What, does not the hill of Sion lie desolate, ravaged by the foxes?

Lord, thou abidest ever; age after age thy throne endures; and wilt thou still be forgetful of us, through the long years leave us forsaken? Bring us back to thee, Lord, and let us find our home; bring back to us the days of our youth; wouldst thou altogether abandon us, shall thy indignation know no measure?

¹ 'Princely cheeks'; the word 'Nazirite' can hardly be used in its technical sense (Num. 6), and is better taken in its wider meaning of 'consecrated person'. That royal princes are referred to is only a conjecture based on the context. ² Literally, 'ancient ivory'; the Hebrew word perhaps means 'coral'. ³ vv. 14-16. The interpretation of this passage is very doubtful. The Latin version is not always in accordance with the Hebrew text, and gives 'him' instead of 'them' in verse 15, perhaps with the idea that Almighty God is referred to (cf. verse 16). ⁴ It is generally held that the literal and primary reference of this verse is to king Sedecias. The Hebrew text has, not 'through our fault', but 'through the trap they have laid'. ⁵ The sense given is that of the Hebrew text; cf. Jg. 16. 21.

THE PROPHECY OF BARUCH

THE words which follow were committed to writing in the country of Babylon. The writer of them, Baruch, was descended from Helcias, through Nerias, Maasias, Sedecias and Sedi, and wrote in the fifth year, . . . on the seventh day of the month, at the time when the Chaldaeans took Jerusalem and burnt it to the ground.¹ Baruch read this book of his aloud to Jechonias, son of Joakim, king of Juda. All the people, too, flocked to hear the reading of it, nobles and royal princes, and elders, and common folk high and low; all that were then living in the country of Babylon, near the river Sodi.

And as they heard it, all was weeping and fasting and prayer offered in the Lord's presence; they made a collection of money besides, each according to his means, which they sent to the chief priest, Joachim, son of Helcias, son of Salom, and his fellow priests and fellow citizens at Jerusalem. . . . when he² travelled to Juda on the tenth day of Sivan, taking with him the sanctuary ornaments which had been removed from the temple, and were now to be restored. They were of silver; Sedecias, the son of Josias, that now reigned in Juda, had had them made, when Jechonias, with the princes and all the nobles and many other citizens of Jerusalem, was carried off by Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon, to his own country.

¹ It seems almost certain that the text is defective here; to mention the day of the month and not mention which month it was, would be most unusual. But probably the omission was a more considerable one. It is difficult to see how the events referred to in verses 6-8 could have happened in or near the year 587, when Jerusalem was burnt; it had been closely besieged for two years already. It looks as if these prophecies of Baruch had been dated over a period of years, like those of his master Jeremias (Jer. 1. 2, 3), and only the earlier part of them had been sent to Jerusalem at the time indicated. The text will have run: 'in the fifth year of Sedecias' reign, right up to the eleventh year of it, the fifth month and the seventh day of the month, when the Chaldaeans took Jerusalem'. Some think, however, that the words 'at the time when' indicate an anniversary, as in Deut. 16. 6. ² 'He' can hardly be Joakim; and the last mention of Baruch is too far away to justify a reference by pronoun. Another short deficiency in the text seems probable; the money was sent to Jerusalem 'by the hand of' some person named, Baruch or another. It is commonly assumed that Sedecias had made silver ornaments at Jerusalem, to replace the old ones which had been carried off; that these silver ones were carried off in their turn (on some unspecified occasion), and were then restored to Juda (for some unspecified reason). All this seems unduly elaborate. The gold ornaments were removed with Jechonias (IV Kg. 24. 13), and at the same time all metal-workers were exiled (ib. 16). Sedecias, who was still in favour, had to get models made not in Jerusalem but in Babylon; and with these silver models the prophecy of Baruch, or rather such parts of it as had already been committed to writing, could conveniently be despatched. ³ Literally 'manna', but it is clear that the Septuagint Greek has confused two separate Hebrew words, and the Latin version has come to us through the Greek.

Here is money, they said, with which you are to buy victims for burnt-sacrifice, and incense; bloodless offerings³ too you must make, and amends for fault committed, at the altar of the Lord our God. You shall pray long life for king Nabuchodonosor of Babylon, and his son Baltassar, that their reign on earth may last as long as heaven itself. May the Lord grant courage to all of us, and send us a gleam of hope; long thrive we under the protection of king Nabuchodonosor and his son Baltassar, persevering loyally in their service and winning their favour! And intercede with the Lord our God for us exiles; against his divine will we have rebelled, and to this hour he has not relented. Scan closely, too, this book we are sending to you; it is to be read aloud on feast-days and in times of solemn assembly. You shall make your prayer in these words following.

The fault was never with him, the Lord our God; ours the blush of shame, as all Juda this day and all the citizens of Jerusalem can witness. With king and prince of ours, priest and prophet of ours the fault lies, and with our fathers before us. We have defied the will of the Lord our God; trust and loyalty we had none to give him, nor ever shewed him submission, by listening to his divine voice and following the commands he gave us. Ever since the day when he rescued our fathers from

Egypt we have been in rebellion against the Lord our God, straying ever further 20 from the sound of his voice; till at last, as these times can witness, bale and ban have caught us by the heels, the very same he pronounced to his servant Moses long ago, when he had rescued our fathers from 21 Egypt and was leading them on to a land all milk and honey. Unheeded, that divine voice, when message after message came to 22 us through his prophets; each must follow the whim of his own false heart, doing sacrifice to alien gods, and setting the will of the Lord, our own God, at defiance.

2 That is why the Lord our God has made good his threats against us; against the rulers of Israel, whether kings or nobles, and against the common folk of 2 Israel and Juda. Here was a threat made in the law of Moses, that went beyond all hitherto seen on earth, and yet in Jeru-3 salem it came true; that men would be eating the flesh of their own sons and 4 daughters! Neighbouring kings had the mastery, and in all the far countries to which the Lord had banished us, we be-5 came a thing of scorn and horror. Slaves are we, that might have ruled; and the reason of it? Because by sinning we 6 offended the Lord our God, and left his voice unheeded; his was never the fault; for us and for our fathers the blush of 7 shame, as this day can witness. No calamity has befallen us but he, the Lord, had 8 prophesied it; and still we would not sue for the divine mercy, but each of us went 9 on straying by false paths. That is why the Lord's jealous care was for our undoing; he has but fulfilled what he threatened; in 10 all he has imposed upon us,¹ the Lord our God is without fault. It was our fault if we would not listen to his warnings, would not follow the divine commands which he set before us.

11 Lord God of Israel, whose constraining hand rescued thy people from Egypt with portents and wonders, with sovereign power signally manifested, and won thee 12 renown that is thine yet, we are sinners!

We have wronged thee, revolted against every claim thou hast upon us. But oh, would thy vengeance give over the pursuit! So wide thou hast parted us, and we are left so few. Grant a hearing, Lord, to this our plaint and plea; for thy own honour, be our rescuer still, and win over the hearts of our captors; prove to the whole world that thou art the Lord our God, that it was thy name Israel bore, and Israel's race yet bears. Look down upon us, Lord, from the sanctuary where thou dwellest; thine be the attentive ear, the watchful eye! Once breath has left body, and a man lies in the grave, honour and devoir is none he can pay thee; but let a man be downcast over his great misfortune, so that he goes bowed and tottering, dim eyes and hungry belly, there, Lord, thou shalt have the honour that is thy due.

Well for us, O Lord our God, as we pour out our supplications for thy mercy, if we could plead that fathers of ours, kings of ours, did loyally thy will. But no; thou hadst given them due warning, through those prophets that were servants of thine, before letting thy angry vengeance have its way, and the warning went unheeded.² Bow shoulder and bow neck, said the divine voice, and be vassals to the king of Babylon; and the land I gave to your fathers shall still be your home. Refuse to serve the king of Babylon at my divine bidding, and Jerusalem with her daughter cities shall mourn their loss; no more the cry of joy and mirth, no more the voice of bridegroom and of bride; untrodden the whole land shall be, and uninhabited. But all thy threats could not persuade them to be the king of Babylon's vassals; thy servants prophesied in vain. And so thy threats were performed; kings of ours and fathers of ours might not rest quiet in their graves; their bones were cast out to endure sun's heat and night frost, and great anguish they endured in their deaths, from the sword, and famine, and pestilence.³ As for the temple that was the shrine of thy name, thou madest it into the thing it is this day, for Israel's sin, for Juda's sin.

¹ This is usually understood of God's commandments, but the context suggests rather a reference to his chastisements. ² 'And the warning went unheeded'; these words are not in the original, but are supplied here from the context in order to make the connexion between verses 19 and 20 intelligible.

³ The Greek word used here (of which the Latin gives a literal rendering) means 'a despatching of envoys', and does not justify the translation 'banishment'. It is probably used here, as in Jer. 32. 36, to represent the Hebrew word for 'pestilence', as something specially sent by Almighty God.

27 No greater proof we could have had of thy consideration, of that abundant mercy¹ 28 which is thine. And merciful was the promise thou didst make to thy servant
Moses, when thou badest him write down 29 thy law for Israel's acceptance. Out of all this swarming multitude, thou didst say to him, what a sorry remnant of scattered exiles will be left, if my voice goes un-30 heeded! And go unheeded it will; this is a race that ever spurns the yoke. What then if they come back to a right mind, there in 31 the country of their banishment? What if they learn to recognize that I, the Lord, am their God (the heedful heart, the listen-32 ing ear, are mine to give them); what if they remember to honour me, to invoke 33 my name, in their exile? What if they follow the example of their fathers, that were sinners before them, repent of their stubborn indifference and of all their ill 34 doings? Then they shall come home again; back to the country I promised to their fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; they shall be masters of it, and their 35 dwindled strength shall thrive anew. A fresh covenant I will make with them, that shall last for ever; I their God, and they my people; never again will I banish my people, the sons of Israel, from the land
I have made theirs.

3 Lord Almighty, God of Israel, here be lives in jeopardy, here be troubled 2 hearts, that plead with thee! Listen, Lord, and have mercy, none so merciful as thou;
pardon the sins that lie open in thy sight.
3 Thou reignest for ever; must we for ever 4 be lost? Lord Almighty, God of Israel, listen to the prayer Israel makes to thee from the grave!² Our fathers it was that defied the Lord their God, and gave no heed to him; and to us, their sons, the 5 punishment clings. Forget the wrong they did, those fathers of ours; remember thy ancient power, thy own honour, this day; 6 only to thee, the Lord our God, shall praise 7 of ours be given. Why else hast thou inspired us with such dread of thee? Thou wouldest have us learn to invoke thy name,

to utter thy praise, here as exiles, in proof that we disown the wrong our fathers did, when their sins defied thee. Exiles we are 8 this day, dispersed by thee to suffer scorn and reviling, until we have made amends for all the wrong our fathers did when they abandoned thee, abandoned the Lord our God.

Listen, Israel, to the warnings that shall 9 bring thee life; give attentive audience, if thou wouldest learn to be wise. What means 10 it, Israel, that thou findest thyself in the enemy's land, grown old in exile, unclean 11 as a dead body, no more taken into account than men who have gone down into their graves? It is because thou hast forsaken 12 the fountains whence all wisdom comes.
If thou hadst but followed the path God 13 shewed thee, thou mightest have lived in peace eternally. Learn where to find wis-14 dom, and strength, and discernment; so thou wilt find length of years, too, and true life, and cheerfulness, and peace. Who 15 can tell where wisdom dwells, who has made his way into her store-house? What 16 has become of those heathen princes, who gained mastery of the beasts that roam the earth, tamed the birds for their pastime; 17 heaping up silver and gold, man's con-18 fidence, man's interminable quest? How anxiously they toiled for wealth! And now these devices of theirs are beyond our tracing.

They disappeared, went to their graves, 19 and other succeeded them; a younger 20 generation saw the light and peopled the earth in its turn; but still they could not find their way to the true wisdom, the path 21 to it was hidden still. Their children, too, clutched at it in vain, it was as far as ever from their reach. In Chanaan, none had 22 heard tell of it, in Theman none had caught sight of it; even the sons of Agar, so well 23 schooled in earthly wisdom, even the merchants of Merrha and Theman, with all their store of legend, their skill and cunning laboriously gained, never found the track of true wisdom, or told us what its haunts were.

Israel, how wide is God's house, how 24

¹ In verses 19-26, the divine mercy has been shewn in the warning issued to the Jews against further resistance. In verses 27-35 the same mercy is shewn in the promise of ultimate restoration. ² Literally, 'the prayer of the dead of Israel'. Some think this refers to prayer offered by the dead on behalf of the living; others, that the race of Israel is, by a metaphor, described as 'dead'; others, that the Hebrew text had simply 'the folk of Israel', and that the Greek translator, having no vowel-points to guide him, was deceived by the identical form of the two words.

11 what harlots wore, the gods.¹ From rust they cannot protect themselves, nor from 12 the moth; alas for the purple robes that deck them! And the temple dust lies thick upon them, so that their faces must be 13 wiped clean. Here is an idol bearing a sceptre, human-fashion, as though it ruled the country-side, yet has it no power to kill 14 the blasphemer; another carries sword or axe, yet from alarm of war or of robbers cannot defend itself; be sure, then, gods 15 they are not. Never fear them; broken jar a man throws away as useless can be matched with such gods as these.

16 There they sit in their temples, with eyes full of dust from the feet of passers-by, 17 mewed up by their priests with bolt and bar for fear of robbery, like king's enemy in his dungeon, dead man in his tomb; of 18 all the lights that burn before them, they see none; roof-beam is not more senseless.
 19 Yet men will have it that serpents creep out of the earth and drink in the secrets of their hearts! Worms, more like, that eat the idol up, clothes and all, and it none the 20 wiser.² Smoke of the temple blackens their faces; about their bodies and heads fly owl and swallow; birds hover and cats prowl.
 21 Be sure they are no gods; never fear them.
 22 Fair, golden faces! Yet will they not shine on the worshipper, till he rub off the stains on them; cast once for all in a mould, 23 without feeling.³ Cost what they will, there is never a breath of life in them; never a pace they walk, but must still be carried on men's shoulders, putting their own worshippers to shame by the betrayal 24 of their impotence. Fall they to earth, they cannot rise from it, and though they be set up again, it is in no power of their own that they stand. As well bring gifts to dead men as to these; the victim thou offerest yonder priest will sell, or put to his own use, nor ever a slice his wife cuts shall find its way to the sick and the needy. Those offerings every woman may touch if she will, child-birth and monthly times notwithstanding. And are these gods? Are these to be feared? Things of silver and gold and wood, that have women for their ministers, shall the divine name be theirs?

In their temples you shall find priests sitting by with clothes rent, shaven and shorn, heads uncovered, raising lament over their gods as at a dead man's dirge. Vestments their idols wore they will carry away, to dress their wives and children; so powerless are these gods to requite injury or reward service done. Not theirs to make kings or unmake them, grant riches, or wreak vengeance; the unpaid vow they cannot exact, nor deliver men from death, and the tyrant's oppression, give sight to the blind, succour in time of peril, shew mercy to the widow, or cheer the orphan's lot. Things of wood and stone, gold and silver, no more than rock on the mountain-side can they speed their worshippers; gods do we reckon them, gods do we call them?

And indeed the Chaldaean themselves have but scant reverence for these idols of theirs; hear they of a dumb child that can utter no word, Bel's image must be brought to it and petitioned for the gift of speech; as if the senseless thing which cannot move could yet hear them! Sense neither god nor worshipper has, else god should find no worship.⁴ See where their women sit in the streets, with ropes about them, each before a fire of olive-stones,⁵ each waiting till some passer-by drags her away and beds her, then taunting her less coveted neighbours, that have ropes about them still! All lies, the worship of them, and shall they claim the title of gods?

¹ Literally, 'They give some of it to prostitutes, and deck out harlots, and again when they have received it from harlots, they deck out their gods'. The Greek has 'They give some of it to the harlots on the roof; and they deck out the gods in clothes, like men, gods of silver and gold and wood'. Such a variation between the two versions must indicate that the Hebrew original was very obscure, or that its text had suffered from corruptions. And indeed, throughout this chapter it is impossible to feel that the versions have always caught the meaning of the original exactly. ² Literally, 'And they say that serpents from the earth lick out their hearts, while they eat them and their clothes, unfelt by them'. The Greek has 'creeping things' instead of serpents. If the meaning of the original has been preserved, the reference is perhaps to the belief in snakes as an incarnation of heathen divinities; cf. Aristophanes, Plutus 733. ³ Literally, 'The gold, too, which they have is for appearance; unless a man rubs off the stains, they will not shine, and if it comes to that, they had no feeling while they were being cast'. The Greek has, 'Unless a man rubs off the stains, they will not cause to shine the gold with which they are beautiful...' etc. ⁴ et. 40, 41. The meaning here is very uncertain. The Greek almost certainly implies that Bel's image was brought to the patient, not the patient to the image, and the meaning is perhaps that it was absurd to expect help from a statue which had to be carried because it could not walk (cf. verse 25). There are several differences between the Greek and the Latin; the Greek, for example, has 'sick person' in the masculine, whereas the neuter gender used in the Latin presumably implies a child in arms. ⁵ This ceremony of general prostitution is described by Herodorus, i. 199; he does not mention the fires of olive-stones (or bran, according to the Greek).

45 Carpenters made them and goldsmiths, only at the priests' whim; and shall the handicraft of mortal craftsmen be divine?

47 One day, their descendants will reproach them with a legacy of imposture. Come 48 war, come peril, the priest thinks only of hiding himself and his gods both; gods who shall think them, that from war and peril their own selves cannot deliver?

50 Recognize it at last they will, kings and peoples everywhere, that gods of wood, gold and silver are false gods, creatures of 51 man, not creators. Man's handiwork, with nothing in them of the divine, who can doubt it? Not through them comes king

52 to throne, comes rain to country folk; redress wrong they may not, nor rid a

53 people of tyranny; dead crow hung between heaven and earth is not more powerless.

54 Does a temple catch fire? You shall see priests taking refuge in flight, and the wooden gods, for all the silver and gold on them, burning among the woodwork.

55 Against the king's power, against the enemy's attack, they can make no head; who shall reckon them or name them divine?

56 Wood and stone, gold and silver, how to protect themselves against the superior

57 strength of house-breaker and robber, that will carry off sheathes of silver and gold, 58 carry off the clothes from their backs, and leave them powerless? Better some golden emblem of royal prowess, cup of silver

meant for use, not only for display, door of wood that keeps safe the treasures of a house, than these deceiving idols!¹ How fair to look upon are sun and moon and stars!

Yet theirs is loyal and useful service; and so it is with yonder lightning, that dazzles the view. Everywhere winds blowing, clouds drifting across the earth as God bade them, fulfil an appointed task;

an appointed task, too, has the heaven-lit fire that burns mountain-side and forest.

What beauty have the idols, or what power, that they should be compared with any of these? Gods never think them, gods never call them, that have no power to execute judgement, to do men good or ill.

And, since gods they are not, need is none to fear them; can they pronounce a curse or a blessing on kings? Can they startle the world with portents, shine like the sun, light up darkness like the moon? Why, the very beasts are their betters, that know at least how to take shelter for their own safety!

Fear we never the gods that ungod themselves so plainly! Wood and silver and gold, that watch over the world as a scare-crow over a herb-garden; wood and silver and gold, patient of the birds that perch on them as bush of white-thorn, or corpse left to lie in a dark alley! From the purple robes that rot on them, you may learn they are no gods; they, too, shall be eaten away when their time comes, and be a disgrace to the country-side.

Well it is for God's loyal servants, that eschew idolatry, and live from all censure far removed.

¹ Literally, 'So it is better to be a king making display of his power, or a useful vessel in a house of which its owner is proud, or a door in a house which guards its contents, than false gods'. The Greek adds, 'or a wooden pillar in a palace' after the word 'contents'.

13 Beat of wing against wing as the living figures moved onwards, and whirr of the wheels that followed them, great stirring there was all about me; and I, in a transport borne up and on, set out on my journey, unwillingly enough, and vexed at heart, but the Lord's hand was there to hold me to my purpose. So I made my way to the settlement of exiles at Tel-Abib,¹ near the river Chobar; and when I had found them, I sat there for seven days in their company, dumb all the while with grief.

16 Then, when seven days had passed, the Lord's word came to me. Son of man, he told me, I am posting thee here as a sentry, to give the sons of Israel warning; no message I send thee but thou must pass it on in my name. When I threaten the sinner with doom of death, it is for thee to give him word, and warn him, as he loves his life, to have done with sinning. If not, he shall die as he deserves, but for his undoing thyself shalt be called to account. If thou warn him, and leave his rebellious sinning he will not, die he shall as he deserves, and thou go free. Or if the upright man leaves his innocence, and I take him unawares in his wrong-doing, dies he for want of warning? Die he shall, his good deeds all forgotten, but thou for his undoing shalt be called to account. Thine to warn the upright man against the marring of his innocence; and he, sin avoiding, shall owe his life to thy remonstrance; thy duty is done.²

22 Then the power of the Lord came over me, bidding me rise up and keep tryst with him, out in the open plain. Rise up I did, and when I reached the open plain, there was the glory of the Lord rising above it, such as I had seen it by the banks of Chobar; and I fell face to earth. But a divine force mastered me and raised me to my feet again. Now go within doors, he said, and shut thyself in there... And thou, son of man... here are bonds confining thee; closely thy fellow-countrymen shall keep thee imprisoned, so that thou canst not escape from them. And I, meanwhile, will keep tongue of thine fast fixed in thy mouth; dumb thou shalt be, when thou wouldst fain expostulate with a rebellious brood. Then, when my message I give thee, I will unseal thy lips, and thou shalt speak to that rebellious brood in the name of the Lord God, hear they or deny thee hearing.³

4 And now, son of man, go and get thee a tile; set it before thee and make marks on it, to represent the city of Jerusalem. This thou art to beleaguer; siegeworks built, mound raised, camp pitched, battering-rams all around.⁴ And therewithal get thee an iron cooking-pan, that shall make a ring of iron between thee and this city of thine; look closely as thou wilt, here is siege complete. So thou shalt beleaguer it; a sign, this, for the race of Israel.

This, too, thou must do; ever on thy left side lie down to sleep, weighing it down, day after day as thou sleepest upon it, with the guilt of Israel; bear it thou must. Three hundred and ninety days of guilt-bearing I have allotted thee, one day for every year of Israel's guilt; this done, Juda's guilt thou must bear for forty days yet, sleeping on thy right side; a day for a year, for every year a day. And ever towards beleaguered Jerusalem thou shalt turn thy face, and hold thy arm stretched out, prophesying its doom; I hold thee enchained, and never shalt thou turn from one side to other, till the days of thy siege are over.⁵

¹ Tel-Abib (not the modern Tel-Aviv, in Palestine) is translated, instead of being transliterated, in the Latin version; 'to the Mound of New Crops'.

² vv. 16-21. The sense of these verses, and in great part the actual language of them, can be found repeated in ch. 33, and some think they have been misplaced here through an error. ³ vv. 24-27. There has perhaps been some fault in the manuscript transmission of these verses, which run very awkwardly. The Hebrew text has 'so that thou canst not go out among them' instead of 'so that thou canst not escape from them'. ⁴ vv. 1, 2. It is not clear whether the prophet was to draw a map, or simply to write the name, of Jerusalem. The directions in verse 2 may be simply an anticipation of verse 3; the rim of the iron cooking-vessel was to represent the continuous cordon of besiegers. ⁵ vv. 4-8. The word rendered 'to sleep' in the Latin may also mean 'to lie', and it is generally understood that the prophet was to remain all day and all night in the same posture. The figures are extremely perplexing. We should have expected that the days would be equal in number with those of the siege, but this, according to IV Kg. 25, lasted about 500 days. The forty years do not match the interval between the taking of Samaria in 722 and the taking of Jerusalem in 587. And we should expect the other figure to correspond with the number of years between the division of the Kingdom and the fall of Samaria, i.e. about 410 years; instead of which the Hebrew text gives 390, and the Septuagint Greek 190.

9 For thy food, wheat thou must have by thee, and barley, and beans, and lentils, and spelt, and vetch; all in one pan mix them, and make thee bread, while thou art sleeping ever on thy same side; for three hundred and ninety days thou shalt eat it.¹ 10 Nine ounces shall be all thy daily food, at 11 set times apportioned, and water thou shalt drink at set times, two pints by 12 measure. Cooked in the ashes thy bread, like barley cakes, and dung of man shall be 13 thy fuel, for all to see. Polluted as this, the Lord says, shall be the bread Israel eats, in the land I have decreed for his exile.
 14 Alas, alas, Lord God, said I, here is a soul that never knew defilement; from childhood's days, beast I never ate that died by chance or lay mangled, nor ever 15 did food unclean cross my lips. Be it so, he answered; for dung of man droppings of cattle thou shalt have, and cook thy 16 bread with these. But be sure of this, son of man; I mean to cut off from Jerusalem every source of bread; weighed out to them their bread shall be, and anxiously, measured out to them their water, and in great 17 lack. And at last, for want of bread and water, every man's face shall fall as he looks at other, and they shall pine away in their guilt.

5 And next, son of man, to the sharp sword betake thee! A razor thou must take, and pass it over head and beard both; then weigh thy hair in the scales and 7 make equal portions of it. A third of it thou shalt set alight and burn up within this city of thine, when the days of its besieging are over; a third thou shalt cut to pieces with the blade thou carriest, round about it; and a third thou shalt scatter to the winds, for my unsheathed 3 sword to go in pursuit. Of this last third, gather some few hairs and secure them in 4 the fold of thy cloak; yet even of these take some away and throw them into the heart of the fire, to burn there; fire enough to kindle the whole race of Israel!²

5 Look you, says the Lord God, here is Jerusalem, that I have set down at earth's 6 very midst, the nations all about her, and she has defied my will, than the very heathen more rebellious, defied my commandments, as neighbouring peoples never did. My bidding they have cast to the winds, followed never where my commandments led. All your neighbours, the 7 Lord God says, outdone in wickedness, my paths untrodden, my bidding unheeded! False even to the heathen traditions of yonder country-side! Have at thee, 8 says the Lord God; in thy very heart I will execute judgement for all the world to see; such punishment I will inflict as never was 9 before, never shall be again, for thy detestable doings. Men's flesh men shall eat, 10 father of son and son of father; then, when my sentence is executed, I will scatter all that is left of thee to the four winds.

As I am a living God, the Lord says, 11 since thou hast not scrupled to profane my sanctuary with vile things and detestable things a many, I will make havoc of thee, and my eye shall not melt with pity; I will not scruple in my turn. A third of thy sons 12 shall die of pestilence, or with famine pine away; a third shall fall in thy defence; a third I will scatter to the four winds, and my sword unsheathed in pursuit. And at 13 last, my anger spent, my vengeance glutted, my grief healed, doubt they shall not that the God whom they slighted has decreed it; my sentence shall take full toll 14 of them. Desolate, and the scorn of thy neighbours, so every passer-by shall see thee. A name of scorn and reproach, a by-15 word thou shalt be and a thing of horror, to all the nations about thee, when thy punishment is done, so fierce the anger, so shrewd the blow; I, the Lord, have decreed 16 it. Hungry arrows³ of mine shall fly abroad, dolorous and deadly, for your minishing; famine that grows worse and worse as the stocks of bread fail, and with 17 the famine wild beasts to bereave you, visitations of plague and violent death; and the sword too, I will let loose upon you; I, the Lord, have decreed it.

6 And now the Lord's word came to me: Turn thy eyes, son of man, 2 towards the hills of thy own country, and

¹ The different kinds of crop are probably meant to symbolize the simultaneous deficiency of all bread-stuffs; cf. verse 16. ² It is not clear what is meant by the last clause of this verse. ³ Literally, 'arrows of hunger', but it seems likely that the other plagues about to be mentioned are included, as well as the famine.

3 prophesy their doom. Mountains of Israel, thou shalt say, listen to the word of the Lord God; here is a message from the Lord God to mountain and hill, to rocky slope and river-bed. I mean to let the sword 4 loose on you, pull shrine down, overthrow altar, break column, pile corpses before the 5 false god's feet; before every idol, sons of Israel prostrate in death, before every altar, the ground strewn with their bones.
6 In all your confines, every city desolate, every shrine wrecked and ruined; deserted and defaced the altars, forlorn the idols, shattered the columns, obliterated all the 7 work of man; and ever the dead lying in the midst of you. Will you doubt, then, the power of the Lord?¹

8 I will leave a remnant of you; some shall escape the sword, to live on among the 9 Gentiles, dispersed far and wide; and these survivors, in their land of exile, shall once again bethink themselves of me. Wanton heart that played me false, eyes that hankered still after idols, shall be tamed now; they will look back with loathing on all the 10 foul wrong they did, and confess it was no empty boast, when I threatened this calamity.²

11 Clap hands and stamp feet, the Lord God says, and cry aloud, Out upon the foul wrong the men of Israel did, that are now doomed to perish by sword, famine and pestilence! Keep their distance, the plague shall smite them, come they to grips, the sword; safe behind the battlements, they shall die of famine; so shall my 12 vengeance take toll of them. Who shall doubt the Lord's power, when the dead lie thick at the feet of your idols and about your altars; on hill-top and mountain height, in forest covert and under spreading oak, where once men would burn 13 fragrant incense to their false gods? When the blow falls, I will make their countryside, once so thickly inhabited, into a wilderness; Deblatha³ itself is not more forlorn. And who shall doubt the Lord's power?

7 Then the Lord's word came to me: And thou, son of man . . .⁴ A message to the land of Israel from the Lord God! For this land, for every corner of it, here is doom, here is doom. Doom for thee at last; I mean to wreak vengeance on thee, pass sentence on thy evil life, bring home to thee thy foul deeds. Nor shall my eye melt with pity; I will not spare. All thy evil life brought home to thee, all thy foul deeds confronting thee; who shall doubt that it comes from the Lord? The blow, the first blow has fallen, says the Lord God; all is over now, all is over; the day dawns, and for thee doom comes with day. Dwellers in the land, this is the end of you; your time is up, your day has come; a day when your mountains shall echo with tumult, not with harvest-home.⁵ Close at hand, now, I will rain down my vengeance upon you, give my anger full play, no crime unjudged, no weight of punishment unborne. Never shall my eye melt with pity for thee; all thy evil life shall be accounted for, all thy foul deeds brought to light; and none shall doubt that I, the Lord, punish.

It has come, the day has come; the wheel full circle,⁶ the branch in full bloom, pride bears its harvest. Violence has grown up into a shoot of rebellion . . . and not by their means, not through clamouring multitude of theirs; rest they shall have none. The time is up, the day of reckoning come; who buys now, of his purchase shall have no joy, who sells now, shall not feel his loss; the Lord's vengeance will overtake the whole throng of citizens alike;⁷ alas! here is property alienated for ever, though buyer and seller count among the living yet. The vision is for the whole throng of

¹ vv. 6, 7. It is not clear whether we should take these verses as part of the first paragraph (addressed to the mountains) or as part of the second (addressed to the Israelites themselves). ² vv. 8-10. These verses seem to interrupt the thread of the chapter, and some think they have been accidentally misplaced. ³ No such place as Deblatha is elsewhere heard of, and there may be some error in the text.

⁴ It seems probable that there is some slight omission in the manuscripts here. ⁵ v. 7. 'This is the end of you'; literally, in the Latin version, 'ruin has come upon you', but this is probably a guess, the word translated 'ruin' being of quite uncertain significance. The root idea seems to be that of 'a garland'. 'When your mountains shall echo with tumult, not with harvest-home'; literally, 'of slaying (in the Hebrew, of tumult) and not of the glory (in the Hebrew, of the shout) of the mountains'. ⁶ 'The wheel full circle' is only a guess at the sense of the Hebrew phrase 'the garland (see note on verse 7) has gone out'. The text of this and the next two verses is hopelessly obscure, and may well be corrupt. ⁷ Literally, here and in verse 13, 'her multitude'; Jerusalem is presumably meant.

citizens; there is no reversing it; never a man of that guilty race shall survive.¹

14 Sound the trumpet there, rally all to arms! But none goes out to war; on the whole throng of citizens my vengeance has 15 fallen; sword without, pestilence and famine within; sword for the straggler, pestilence and famine for the besieged.
16 Fugitives there shall be that make good their flight, but these must take to the mountains, fluttered as the doves that 17 haunt their ravines, sinners all; hands that hang listless, knees weak as water. See 18 where men go clad in sackcloth, trembling in every limb, with downcast faces, and their heads shorn! See where they cast 19 their silver out of doors, their gold on to the dung-hill; how should precious metal speed them in this day of the Lord's vengeance? Hunger it sates not, belly it fills 20 not; and this, all the while, was the very occasion of their guilt! Did they not pride themselves on the beauty of their workmanship, was it not from this they made 21 images of their detestable false gods? And now there it lies, all defilement! Now I am giving it over to strangers for spoil; the vilest of earth's inhabitants shall plunder 22 it. Still my eyes shall be averted, while my own treasure-chamber is broken open, while the enemy's pursuivants enter and 23 profane it. Make short work of it,² a land where innocent lives are forfeit, a nest of 24 wrong! The very refuse of the heathen I will summon to dispossess them of their homes, to be masters of their holy places, that proud 25 boast of theirs³ now for ever silenced.
26 Days of despair, when they will look about them for a respite, and respite shall be none! Fresh anxieties still, and fresh 27 alarms; vainly they ask the prophet for revelation; tradition among the priests, counsel among the elders is none. Mourns king, princes go covered with dismay, numb with despair the common folk; ill they shall fare, that ill did, cruelly be judged, that were cruel judges; they shall know what manner of God they serve.

8 The sixth year of King Sedecias⁴ came; and on the fifth day of the sixth month, as I sat in my house with the elders of Juda for my company, the power of the Lord God came over me there. I had a 2 vision; a figure was there before me all aglow, fire beneath where his loins shewed, and from the loins upwards, brightness
3 made visible, like amber to see. It seemed as if an outstretched hand caught me by a lock of my hair; and with that, a force 4 lifted me up between heaven and earth, and I was carried away in a divine transport to Jerusalem. There was the gateway of the inner court, looking northwards, and there 5 was that image of rival deity God sees and hates. There, too, was the bright presence 6 of Israel's God, as I had seen it earlier on the river plain; Son of man, he told me, look northwards; so northwards I looked 7 from the altar-gate, and saw the image of rival deity standing at the very entrance. Foul deeds a-doing, son of man, said he;
8 little wonder if I was fain to withdraw from my sanctuary, where the men of Israel do me such wrong. But thou art not finished 9 with them; thou hast fouler yet to see.

And with that, he brought me close up 7 to the door of the court, where I found a hole in the wall. Then he would have me 8 dig through the wall; so dig I did, and there was a door facing me. Now go in, he 9 told me, and see for thyself what foul deeds are done here. And when I went in to look, 10 what should I find painted on the walls but likenesses of reptile and of beast! A very 11 foul sight it was; no idol Israel worships but it was there; and in front of these pictures stood Jezonias, the son of Saphan, 12 with seventy elders of Israel about him, censer in hand each of them, so that a thick cloud of incense went up. Now, son of 13 man, he told me, thou canst see for thyself what work they make in the darkness, these elders of Israel, each hidden where hide he may; Fear is none, they say, the Lord should see us; he has forsaken the land for good and all, the Lord has.

¹ The sense of the first clause is perhaps that property which changes hands now, in B.C. 587, will not revert to its owner at the time of jubilee (Lev. 25. 13), because the population will still be in exile. Some think 'the vision' should be 'the vengeance'; it is doubtful, in spite of Is. 55. 11, whether 'shall not return' can mean 'it is irreversible'. 'Never a man of that guilty race shall survive'; literally, in the Latin, 'a man shall not be strengthened in the wickedness of his life', but a comparison of the Hebrew text with the Septuagint Greek suggests that the true meaning is 'a man in his wickedness shall not lay hold of life'.
² Literally, 'make a conclusion'; in the Hebrew text, 'make a chain'.
³ Literally, 'the pride of the powerful'; this seems to be a phrase regularly applied to local sanctuaries (24. 21, 30. 18 below).
⁴ 'Of King Sedecias' is not expressed in the original. So in 26. 1; 29. 1.

13 Thou hast not seen all yet, he told me; 14 thou shalt see still fouler things done; and he took me through the northern gate of the temple, and there what found I but 15 women that sat weeping for Adonis? Hast thou marked it well, son of man? he asked.
 16 Prepare thyself for a sight fouler yet. Then he took me into the inner court of the temple, and there, at the door of the Lord's own house, between porch and altar, some five and twenty men were standing with their backs to the temple, that worshipped 17 the eastern sun. Hast thou marked it well, son of man? he asked. And are they not content, the men of Juda, with such detestable doings as these, that they must provoke me further yet, filling the whole land with wrong? See how they hold 18 branch to nostril!¹ For their busy wickedness, busy shall my vengeance be; unmelting this eye, this heart unpyting, deaf these ears to their cry of complaint.

9 Then I heard him cry aloud, Make way there for the plagues that must befall the city, for the weapon-bearers of 2 death! And with that, from the upper gate which looks northwards, I saw six men coming on their way, and none of them but bore his deadly weapon; in their midst walked another, clad in linen, with a writer's ink-horn at his girdle. All, when they had entered, took their stand by the 3 brazen altar; and now, borne on cherub wings, the glory of Israel's God rose above the threshold of the house, summoning him of the linen clothes and the ink-horn 4 to set about his task. Make thy way, the Lord said to him, all through the city, from end to end of Jerusalem; and where thou findest men that weep and wail over the foul deeds done in it, mark their brows with 5 a cross.² To the others I heard him say, Yours it is to traverse the city at his heels, and smite. Never let eye of yours melt with 6 pity; old and young, man and maid, mother and child, all alike destroy till none is left, save only where you see the cross marked on them. And begin first with the temple itself.

7 So they began with the elders in the court. Desecrate yonder temple, said he, and fill its precincts with the slain; then go out on your errand. So out they went, and now it was on the city their strokes came.

 And I, left alone amid that carnage, fell 8 face to earth; Alas, alas, Lord God, cried I, wilt thou destroy all the poor remnant of Israel, pouring out thy vengeance on Jerusalem thus? Nay, he told me, the guilt 9 of Israel and Juda is past bound or measure; all bloodshed the country-side, the city all wrong-doing; The Lord has forsaken the land for good and all, say they; fear is none the Lord will see it. And 10 should eye of mine melt with pity? Nay, they shall rue yet the false paths they have taken. And sure enough, the man clad in 11 linen stood there with the ink-horn at his side to give account of himself, and reported, I have done thy errand.

10 And now I looked up at the vault over the cherubim, and there was the hue of sapphire, and the likeness of a throne.

And his word came to the man clad in 2 linen, Make thy way in where the whirring is loudest, beneath the cherubim, take a handful of the coals that lie there among them, and pour these out over the city. So I watched him make his way in; and all the 3 while, as he did so, the cherubs were standing close to the right of the temple, and the inner court was full of smoke. And 4 the brightness of the Lord's presence, cherub-throned, rose up above the threshold, till the house was all smoke, and all the precincts filled with the divine radi-5 ance; and ever the beating of the cherubs' wings could be heard in the outer court, loud as the voice of the Omnipotent heard in thunder.³ There by the wheels 6 stood the man clad in linen, ready to receive the cherub-guarded flame as he was bidden; and one cherub, parting from the rest, reached hand out, took fire from the midst, and gave it him; so he went on his errand. Cherub hand shewed under every 8 cherub wing.

Such was the vision I saw; four wheels 9 beside four cherubim, one by each, and

¹ We have no means of determining what is the sense of the phrase which concludes this verse. Some think it is a forgotten proverb; others, that it refers to idolatrous ceremonies. ² Literally, 'with a tau'. This was the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and in the old script a cross was the symbol for it.

³ See note on i. 24.

10 their colour shewed like aquamarine; all 11 alike had the same appearance, of a wheel within a wheel. Moved they to this quarter or that, they followed ever without ado the 12 lead of the foremost; there was no turning about when they moved. Eyes were every-13 where, on body and neck and hand and wing and wheel too, for each cherub had its 14 own wheel. (It was these wheels I had heard spoken of as the whirring.¹) Four-15 fold was the semblance of them, now cherub, now man, now lion, now eagle.
 16 They rose aloft, these cherubim, (such living figures as I had seen by Chobar; the wheels accompanying them as they went,
 never left behind, but still at their side 17 when they spread their wings for flight, resting when they rested, rising when they rose; these too had a living impulse in 18 them), and therewith the bright presence of the Lord left the temple threshold, and 19 stood there, cherub-throned. With my own eyes I saw them, as they spread their wings and rose aloft; saw the wheels follow as they went; saw a halt made² at the eastern gate of the temple, and the Lord's 20 bright presence resting above them. Full well I knew that cherubs they were, living figures I had seen bearing God's throne by 21 Chobar, each with four semblances, and four wings, and human hands shewing 22 under their wings; the same faces, the same looks, I had seen by Chobar, the same onward impulse of their journeying.

11 Thereupon a transport seized me, carrying me off to the gate of the temple that looks eastward; and here were twenty-five men at the gate's threshold, with two nobles, Jezonias son of Azur and Pheltias son of Banaias, plain to be seen 2 among them. Son of man, the divine voice said to me, here are folk that plot mischief, 3 and give the city ruinous counsel. What, say they, have we not houses here newly built? We may lie as snug here as meat in 4 a cooking-pot.³ Tell them of their doom, son of man, tell them of their doom.

5 With that, the spirit of the Lord came full upon me, and bade me speak. This message I gave them from the Lord of hosts, These are your own words, men of Israel; can I not read your hearts? So 6 many done to death in this city, you have filled all the streets of it with bodies of the slain! You have peopled it with the dead, 7 says the Lord God; their flesh it is shall line yonder cooking-pot; as for you, I will fetch you out of it. The sword it is you 8 dread, and to the sword I doom you, the Lord God says; out of it you shall come, 9 and fall into the enemy's hands, and be punished as you deserve. Doomed to fall 10 by the sword, up and down the countryside of Israel; then you shall learn what manner of God the Lord is! Cooking-pot 11 is none here to shelter you; up and down the country-side you shall meet your sentence, and learn what manner of God it is 12 whose paths you have left untrodden, whose will you have disobeyed, to follow

 the ill customs of your neighbours!

So, in my vision, I prophesied, and 13 while I was prophesying, Pheltias the son of Banaias sank down dead. Thereupon I fell face to earth, crying aloud, Alas, alas, Lord God, wilt thou take full toll of the remnant left to Israel? But the Lord's 14 answer came to me: Thou hast brethren, 15 son of man, thou hast brethren still. They are nearest of kin to thee that are far away, exiled sons of Israel. What though these dwellers at Jerusalem cry, Keep your distance, the land is ours? Not such is the 16 message the Lord God sends them; Far away I have banished them, says he, widely scattered them; yet, go they where they will, a sanctuary in little they shall find in my companionship. Tell them this, from 17 the Lord God, Lost among the peoples, I will gather you, scattered over the world, I will muster you, and give you the land of Israel for your home. To it they shall find 18 their way, and rid it of all that is foul, all that is abominable there; one mind they 19 shall have, and a new spirit shall fill their inmost being; gone the heart of stone, and a human heart theirs in place of it. My 20 paths they shall tread, my will jealously obey, they my people, and I their God.
 21 Only where men's hearts are set on their

¹ Literally, 'And in my hearing he called (to) the wheels (to) them rotation (in the Latin, rotatory)'. This obscure phrase is perhaps best understood as a note on verse 2, where the same word is used in the Hebrew.

² Literally, 'I saw it (or, him) halt'. It is not easy to see what noun should be supplied.

³ The attitude here condemned is perhaps that of the citizens who refused to surrender, trusting in the strength of their walls; cf. Jer. 21. 9. For the metaphor of the cooking-pot, cf. 4. 3 above.

own foul abominations, the Lord God says, they shall bear their punishment.

- 22 And now the cherubim spread their wings for flight, the wheels beside them, the bright presence of the Lord above them; and that presence, withdrawn from the city's midst, came to rest upon the mountain height eastwards of it. With that, a fresh transport seized me, and I was back among the exiles in Chaldaeae, still in a trance, still full of the divine impulse.
- 23 the vision faded from my eyes, and I told the exiles all the Lord had made known to me.

- 12 Word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, thou dwellest among a brood of rebels, that have eyes to see with, ears to hear with, yet see and hear nothing, so bent are they on rebellion. Do thou, then, son of man, provide thee with an exile's pack, and while it is daylight, let them see thee marching to and fro; in their full view, if those rebellious eyes will but mark it, remove from one place to another, carrying those goods of thine with thee, as if ready for a journey. Then, at nightfall, take thy leave in public, as if thou wert going into exile. Let them see thee dig a hole through the wall of thy house, to escape by; let them see thee carried out on men's shoulders, darkness all around, blindfold, so that thou canst not view the land about thee. A portent of doom thou shalt be to the men of Israel.¹

- 7 His bidding was done; while daylight served, I brought my exile's pack out into the open; then, at nightfall, dug wall through and went out on my dark journey, borne on men's shoulders, plain to view.
- 8 And word came to me from the Lord: 9 What of the rebel brood? Have the Israelites asked to know what thou meanest? 10 This tell them from the Lord God, A princely burden!² Here went the prince that rules over Jerusalem, and over all such Israelites as dwell in their native country.

Tell them, This is your own doom I foreshadow; the men of Israel shall fare as I do, exile and prison their lot, and he who rules among them shall be fain to escape in the darkness, borne on men's shoulders. They shall breach wall to make way for him, and he shall go with his face covered, so that he will look on the land no more. But my net is spread; I have him in the noose; Babylon for him, the Chaldaean country for him; that land, too, he shall not see, yet die in that land he must.³ Retinue and bodyguard of his, nay, all his army, I will scatter to the four winds, with my naked sword at their heels. Then at last they shall learn what manner of God I am, when they find themselves lost among the nations, dispersed all the world over! A few shall survive, in despite of sword, famine, and pestilence, to tell these new neighbours of theirs what foul deeds they did; so shall the Gentiles⁴ learn to know me.

Word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, tremble still when bread thou eatest, nor ever drink water but with anxious fear; and this message send from the Lord God to thy countrymen that are left at home: Never citizen of Jerusalem, never inhabitant of Israel, but must eat in fear, put cup to his lips unmanned, till at last unmanned it lies, the whole country-side around them, for their guilt that dwelt in it. Lonely the crowded streets, wasted the country-side must be, ere you learn to know me.

Word came to me from the Lord: What means this saying you have in Israel, The days drag on, and never a warning comes true? Tell them this from the Lord God: Here is a proverb shall be heard in Israel no more; I mean to do away with it. Tell them the time is close at hand now for the fulfilling of all my warnings. Vain vision and flattering hopes Israel shall know no longer; the divine foretelling shall not wait for the divine fulfilling; in your own days,

¹ Here, and in verses 7 and 12, the fugitive is represented by the Septuagint Greek, and by the Latin version, as being carried on men's shoulders; by the Hebrew text, as carrying his pack on his shoulders. It is doubtful whether the Hebrew verbs are rightly pointed; the more so, as they have no pronoun to express the object they refer to. The implication is perhaps that it will be impossible or unsafe for Sedecias to escape on horseback. Presumably he has his face muffled so as to be unrecognizable; the darkness is perhaps only the effect of the blindfolding, since the escape must have taken place at twilight if the men of Israel were to see it.

² In the Hebrew text, there is a play upon words, the burden being 'that which is lifted up' and the prince 'he who is lifted up'. Curiously, the Hebrew text here represents Sedecias as being carried, the Latin as being weighed down with a burden.

³ See IV Kg. 25: 7.

⁴ In the original simply 'they', which can be read, less probably, as referring to the exiles themselves.

brood of rebels, you shall witness both, the 26 Lord God says. And the Lord's word came 27 to me: Fond hope of Israel, that these should be distant things thou foretellest, 28 the prophet of a later age! Give them word from the Lord God: Warning of mine knows no delay; here and now, the Lord says, it shall be accomplished.

13 Word came to me from the Lord:
 2 Son of man, on the prophets pronounce my doom, the prophets whom Israel heeds; would they prophesy after their own devices? Give them this message 3 from the Lord: Out upon the reckless prophets, the Lord God says, that follow their own whim, and vision have none!
 4 Poor Israel, that such foxes as these should 5 burrow among thy ruins! What did you do to restore the fortunes of the day, when the Lord's stroke fell? Not for you to man the breach, to throw up a wall about Israel!¹ 6 Vain vision and cheating hopes are theirs, that warrant from me have none, yet speak in the Lord's name, and look to see their 7 word fulfilled; has the Lord spoken? Not the Lord, only your empty dreams, your 8 lying oracles. For these vain visions, these cheating hopes of yours, have at you! says 9 the Lord God. On false prophet and sightless seer my hand is raised in judgement; never shall they take part in the assembly of Israel, or have their names written in its muster-roll, or find a home in Israel's land! So shall you learn what manner of God the Lord is.

10 How dared they cheat my people with false hopes, crying, All's well, when in truth all went amiss? My people, that strove to build a wall, and here were the prophets plastering it with clay that had 11 no straw in it! Thine to warn these unskilful plasterers that the wall must needs crumble; here is a rain-storm brewing, and I mean to ply it with a volley of great hailstones, and a tempestuous wind that scatters all before it; crumble your wall, shall 12 no one ask what became of the mortar that went to its plastering? Like a tempestuous 13 wind my anger shall break out, the Lord God says; like the rain-storm my indignation shall be, and like a volley of hail-stones

 my vengeance shall take toll of you; down 14 shall come the wall you plastered so ill, razed to earth, and all its foundations shewing, overthrown to your common ruin; so you shall learn what manner of God the Lord is. Wall nor plaster my 15 vengeance shall spare; Down with the wall, my sentence is, and down with the plasterers that plastered it so unworkmanly, Israel's prophets, that gave Jerusalem comfort, the Lord says, promising all should be well when all went amiss.

There are women, too, among this 17 people of mine who would play the prophetess as their own whim bids them.
 Turn upon these, son of man, and tell them their doom: Out upon them, says the Lord 18 God, the women who stitch an elbow-cushion for every comer, make a soft pillow for the heads of young and old!² Men's lives are their prey; shall they cast a net about the lives of Israelites, and save their own? For a handful of meal, or a crust of 19 bread, they will put me to shame³ before my own people; will doom to life or death the undeserving, such credence they win from a people ever credulous. Have at 20 those elbow-cushions of yours, the Lord God says, the nets yonder silly birds are caught in! I mean to snatch them away from your grasp, and set the birds free, those lives you have ensnared with your prophesying.⁴ Your pillows shall be torn 21 in pieces; I will rescue my people from your power, and they shall no longer be yours to ensnare; then you will learn what 22 manner of God the Lord is. You have brought woe on innocent lives, when I was

¹ The military expressions in this verse are probably no more than a metaphor to illustrate the uselessness of the false prophets, like the building metaphor which follows. ² vv. 17-23. This passage remains hopelessly obscure. Some have thought that 'cushions' and 'pillows' are only a metaphor describing the false hopes raised by these diviners. But more probably they were magical contrivances; if the rare words used in the Hebrew have been rightly translated, we may perhaps suppose that the enquirer slept on pillows that were stuffed with magical herbs, etc., and took omens from his dream (cf. Virgil, Aeneid vii. 89). Even so, it is not clear whether these prophetesses were content to tell people's fortunes, or whether (as the text seems to imply) they were in a position to swear away innocent lives by false accusations.

³ Literally, 'profane me', an unusual expression. The meaning seems to be that by fathering their impostures on divine revelation the prophetesses brought religion into disrepute. ⁴ 'The nets yonder silly birds are caught in'; literally, 'by which you catch flying souls'; 'set the birds free, those lives you have ensnared', literally, 'set free the souls you catch, souls for flying'. The Hebrew text is no less obscure than the Latin.

fain to comfort them, confirmed the sinner in those evil ways that shall be his undoing; now there shall be no more of your empty visions, there shall be no more divinings; I mean to save my people from your clutches, and you shall know the Lord's power at last.

14 At a time when some of the Israelite leaders had come to visit me, and sat closeted with me, this message I had from the Lord: Son of man, here be folk that have cumbered their own hearts with false gods, entangled their own feet with guilt; wouldst thou have me answer when I am consulted by such as these? Speak to them, thou, and tell them this from the Lord God: When a man of Israel's race comes to consult me through a prophet, his own heart yet cumbered with false gods, his own feet yet entangled with guilt, shall I, the Lord, give him answer in his idolatry?¹ Nay, the faithless heart that leaves me for the worship of false gods shall be Israel's undoing. This warning give them in the name of the Lord God: Come back to me, leave those idols of yours, have no eyes henceforward for sights detestable! If a man of Israel's race, or any of alien breed among them, forsakes me, cumber his heart with false gods, entangles his feet with guilt, and then comes to consult me through a prophet, shall I, in my own name, answer him? Nay, that man, under my frown, shall become a warning and a by-word, lost to his people, and you shall doubt the Lord's power no longer. Or, if misguided the prophet speaks, it is I, the Lord, that have guided that prophet amiss.² And thereupon I will exert my power, and rid my people Israel of his company; both alike shall be held guilty, the prophet and his dupe; till Israel learns to wander from me no more, stain itself with guilt no more.

So they shall be my people, and I will be their God, says the Lord of hosts.

And word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, if a land lies deep in guilt, sin upon sin, and I cut off every source of bread; sending famine upon it to slay man and beast, though three such men as Noe, Daniel, and Job were counted among its citizens, innocence of theirs no life but theirs should save. If I send beasts to make a pathless wilderness of it, none daring to pass for fear of their encounter; as I am a living God, the Lord says, man nor maid should those three rescue by their companionship; in a desert land they alone should live. The sword if I let loose, bid the sword pass through that land to destroy man and beast, as I am a living God, the Lord says, their own lives those three should ransom, and neither man nor maid besides. Or if pestilence does my errand of punishment, taking deadly toll of man and beast; though Noe dwell there, and Daniel, and Job, as I am a living God, the Lord says, only their own lives they shall ransom, neither man nor maid besides. And what of Jerusalem, says the Lord God, when I send all four plagues on her at once, sword and famine and wild beast and pestilence, till men nor cattle are left alive there? A remnant only shall survive, sons and daughters of your race led out into exile. When these reach you, and you find out what manner of folk they are in thought and deed, for the sorrows of Jerusalem you shall weep no more, though I have plagued her so abundantly. From thought and deed of theirs you shall take consolation, nor doubt it was with good reason I used her thus, says the Lord God.³

15 Word came to me from the Lord: So much timber in the forest, son of man! And what of the vine that grows wild there? What avails the wood of it for

¹ At the end of this verse, and at the end of verse 7, the original would be more naturally rendered as a statement, not a question: 'I will give him answer.' This is usually understood as meaning, 'I will give him a practical answer, i.e. inflict punishments on him'. But this leaves a great deal to the imagination, and there is no parallel for such use of language elsewhere. It is perhaps better, therefore, to translate by a question, as above, and treat verses 5 and 8 as depending loosely on their context.

² See III Kg. 22. 21-23, where it will be observed that Almighty God is described as the author of an effect which was directly attributable to the angel. Here, as there, a false prophet is in question; and his guilt lies in the pride which makes him take some omen or presentiment, of a common sort, as proof that God is speaking through him.

³ cp. 22, 23. These verses imply, according to the common opinion, that the exiles will recognize the justice of Jerusalem's fate, when they witness the idolatrous behaviour of the new arrivals from that city. But it seems curious that this recognition should be described as 'consoling' the exiles, and conceivably the prophet means us to think of the new arrivals as attesting, by their amended lives, the good effects of the chastisement they have undergone.

any manner of craftsmanship? Who will use it to make so much as a peg that pot 4 or pan should hang from? And now it has been thrown away to feed the fire; now either end is burnt up altogether, and the middle of it no better than charcoal; of 5 what use is it now, that use had none even when it was whole? Half burned away, half scorched, here is right unserviceable 6 timber! And I, the Lord says, that destined yonder wild vine to feed the oven, have decreed for the citizens of Jerusalem 7 no other destiny. My frown shall meet them yet; if they have escaped the fire, it is to be consumed by fire anew. Under my frown, they shall learn what manner of God 8 I am; their land all pathless and desolate, for their guilt's rewarding, says the Lord God.

2 16 Word came to me from the Lord: And now, son of man, do thou confront Jerusalem with the record of her 3 misdoings. Tell her this, in the name of the Lord God: Root of thee, stock of thee, spring from yonder soil of Chanaan; an 4 Amorrite it was begot thee, a Hethite bore thee. Born when thou wast, there was none to cut navel-string, in healing 5 water wash thee, with salt harden thee, wrap thee in swaddling-clothes; never an eye melted with pity, none befriended 6 thee; on the bare ground thou wert cast away, a thing of abhorrence, that day of 7 thy birth. Who but I found thee, as I passed on my way, blood-bespattered as thou wert, and trodden under foot; in that 8 plight preserved thee, bade it live on, this defiled thing?

9 Swift as the wild blossoms I bade thee grow; grow thou didst and thrive, and camest to woman's estate, the breasts formed, new hair shewing; and still thou 10 wast all naked, and blushing for thy nakedness. Who but I came upon thee, as I 11 passed on my way? And already thou wert ripe for love; cloak of mine should be thrown about thee, to hide thy shame; my 12 troth I plighted to thee, the Lord God says, and thou wert mine. Water to wash thee, all thy stains gone, oil I brought to 13 anoint thee; clad thee with embroidery, shod thy feet with leather; of fine linen thy 14 tiring should be, of silk thy wear. How I decked thee with ornaments! Bracelets for those arms, a collar for that neck; a frontlet 12 on thy brow, rings in thy ears, on thy head a crown magnifical. Of gold and silver thy 13 adorning, of fine linen and silk and embroidery thy apparel, of wheat and honey and oil thy nourishment; matchless beauty, 14 too, was thine, such beauty as brought thee to a throne. All the world heard the fame 15 of thy loveliness; I had made thee so fair, says the Lord God, utterly fair!

Fatal beauty, fatal renown, which em-16 boldened thee to play the harlot, lavish thy favours on every passer-by, and be his! That thou shouldst use those garments of 17 thine to make curtains for thy hall-shrines, what age can match the villainy of it? Silver and gold of mine, thy adornment 18 and my gift, should they be turned into gods of male form, at thy harlot's whim? And these wouldst thou clothe with thy 19 own embroideries, offer them the perfume and incense that was mine by right, set 20 before them the bread, the oil, the honey I gave thee, to appease them with the smell of burnt-sacrifice? More happened be-21 sides (he, the Lord God, reminds thee); to these gods thou wouldst bring sons and 22 daughters of thine and mine, consecrating them to death. Could not thy wanton desires rest content, without immolating 23 my own sons as victims to such as these? Most foul deeds and most lecherous, that 24 quite put thy youth out of mind, the days when thou wast naked, and overcome with shame, blood-bespattered and trodden 25 under foot.

And at last, to crown thy misdoings (Fie 26 on thee, fie on thee for shame! says the Lord God), thou wouldst build thee a 27 brothel, a common stew, in every street; no cross-roads but should carry the blazon 28 of thy harlotry. O the dishonour done to thy beauty, when thou didst welcome 29 every passer-by to thy favours, insatiable in thy dalliance! With those lusty neigh-30 bours of thine, the Egyptians, thou wouldst play the wanton; these should be my 31 rivals! What wonder I should interpose, and abridge the rights thou didst enjoy, 32 handing thee over for a prey to the maids of Philistia, rivals of thy own, and such as 33 blushed to witness thy ill-doings?¹ It was

¹ Sennacherib claims, on an inscription, that he took certain towns from Ezechias and handed them over to the Philistine princes.

not enough; thou must needs dally with the men of Assur, nor might their dalliance 29 content thee; thou wouldst extend thy trade as far as Chaldaeae, where all is for sale, insatiable to the last.¹

30 Salve is none, says the Lord God, for such a heart as thine, set on following a 31 harlot's ways. Never a cross-roads, never a street, but thou hast set up some brothel for public resort; no harlot thou, to bargain 32 over a hateful trade. Thine was the craving of the false wife, that must ever bring a stranger between her husband's sheets.
 33 The price of love other harlots claim, thou wouldst offer; gifts of thine should entice gallants from every side to thy bower.
 34 Never did wanton the like, nor shall again; it is out of all nature, a harlot that gives, not takes.

35 Here then, poor wanton, is the Lord's doom; this message he has for thee. Because all thy bronze was put to such ill use,² because thou didst wanton so shamelessly with those lovers of thine, idols most foul, in whose honour the lives of thy own 37 children were sacrificed, I mean to have a reckoning with thee. All the gallants that have enjoyed thee, men that love thee and men that hate, I will muster together; muster them from all around, and then lay thy shame bare, expose thy nakedness for all to see. Such punishment thou shalt have as unfaithful wives have, or murderers; to my jealous anger thy life must make amends; I mean to leave thee at their mercy. Ruined thy bower, ransacked thy brothel shall be; thy garments stripped off thee, plundered thy fair adornment; naked they shall leave thee, and overcome with 40 shame. Hue and cry they shall raise against thee, stone thee and put thee to the sword; house of thine the flames shall not spare. Before all womankind they will make an example of thee; no more dalliance, no more hired lovers now. Then at last my vengeance shall be complete, my jealous anger appeased; thou shalt have a 43 respite from my ill-will. So forgetful of thy youth, so obstinate in thy provocations, what wonder if I pay thee what thou hast earned? the Lord says. Yet even now I have not required thee as thy most foul crimes have deserved.

Like mother, like daughter; so runs the 44 proverb, and of thee it shall be spoken. Thou art thy mother's daughter, that was 45 false to husband and child; false to husband and child were those sisters of thine; thy mother a Hethite, thy father an Amorrite, sure enough. Here was thy elder 46 sister on thy left, Samaria, thy younger sister on thy right, Sodom, with daughter towns both of them. Didst thou follow 47 their example, share their misdoings? Nay, that was not enough for thee; it should go hard but thou wouldst outdo them in their crimes. As I am a living God, the Lord 48 says, never were Sodom and her daughters guilty as thou and thine. Pride was the fault of her, this sister of thine; pride and a full belly; the peace and plenty she and her daughters had, with no thought for the poor that stood in need! So it was they 50 rebelled against me, ever I must see foul deeds done, till I rid myself of them, as thou seest. Nor was Samaria in her turn half so guilty as thou. It remained for thee to outvie thy sisters in crime, till thy more abominable doings put them in countenance. Their lesser guilt, that somewhat 52 excuses them, is the measure of thy shame; of that shame thou must bear the brand, while thy sisters go free. When I reverse the doom of exile against Sodom and her daughters, Samaria and her daughters, then, in their company, thy own exiles shall return; a sorry boast for thee, that thou hast cheered, in such fashion, their loneliness! Only when Sodom and her daughters, Samaria and her daughters, to their former state return, is there any hope for thy daughters and for thee.

Time was, when no mention of Sodom's 56 name might soil thy proud lips; that was before thy own sins came to light, that now disgrace thee before Syria's daughters, Philistia's daughters, thy watchful neighbours north and south. Now it is thy turn, 58

¹ Literally, in the Hebrew text, 'And thou didst multiply thy harlotries to the land of merchants (or, of Chanaan), as if to the Chaldaeans, and even with that thou wast not satisfied'. The meaning can only be a matter of conjecture; the Latin version, 'thou didst multiply thy harlotries with the Chaldaeans in the land of Chanaan' is not likely to be right. ² Literally, 'thou didst pour out all thy bronze'. This can hardly mean money, which is never thus described in the Old Testament; if the text has been correctly preserved, it is perhaps best to suppose a reference to the accessories of heathen worship. But some would derive the word from a different root altogether, and give it the sense of 'thy favours'.

the Lord God says, to undergo the shame 59 of thy guilt. And this is his doom:¹ False to thy oath, thou hast forsworn our covenant, and thou shalt have the punishment 60 thou hast earned. That covenant I made with thee in thy youth shall not be for-61 gotten; nay, I will ratify it eternally, but humbled thou shalt be with memories of past days, when thou must needs take thy sisters, older and younger, to thyself.
 Daughters of thine they shall be, strangers 62 to the covenant no longer. My covenant thus ratified with thee, thou shalt know my 63 power at last; remembering still, shame-faced and tongue-tied still, even when I have pardoned all thy ill-doing, says the Lord God.

17 Word came to me from the Lord:
 2 A riddle, son of man, a parable for the 3 men of Israel to interpret! This shall be thy message from the Lord God:
 A great eagle there was, strong of wing,
 long of limb; thick and gay his plumage.
 And this eagle flew to Lebanon, where he 4 robbed cedar of cedar's very pith; tore away its crown of leaves and carried it off to Merchant-land,² set it down in Traffic 5 City. Then back he flew to that same country, chose out both seed and seed-ground there; it was on a level lawn by a 6 brimming stream he planted it. When the plant grew, it proved to be a spreading vine, low of stature, and ever branch curled inwards and root struck downwards, yet vine it was, with sprig that burgeoned, 7 shoot that sprang. But now, here is a second eagle comes in sight, another great eagle, strong of wing, thick-plumed; and it seems as if the vine, in the garden where it grows, were stretching out its roots, waving its tendrils, to ask this second eagle 8 for water instead. What, when it was planted in ground so fair, by waters so abundant, with such promise of leaf and 9 fruit, a vine so destined to greatness! Will any good come of this? asks the Lord God.
 Nay, roots shall be plucked up, fruit ravaged, branches left to wither; fade it must, nor is it like to need great strength or many hands for its unearthing. Take root is not thrive; rich soil or none, when the 10 sirocco parches it, the vine must wither.

Then the Lord's word came to me, 11 bidding me ask the rebel brood, Were they 12 at a loss for the meaning of it? This tells how Nabuchodonosor came to Jerusalem, carried off the king and princes and took them away to Babylon; yet spared a prince of the blood royal, making a treaty with 13 him and exacting an oath of allegiance. All the flower of the citizens he carried away;
 the kingdom should be submissive hence-14 forward, and rebel no more, should keep troth with him loyally.³ Straightway 15 the new king revolted from Nabuchodonosor, and sent envoys to Egypt, asking for horses, asking for the despatch of a great army in his support. Speeds he, finds he deliverance? Should broken faith avail him? As I am a living God, the Lord says, 16 Babylon that made a king of him, Babylon that trusted in his false oath of allegiance, shall be the place of his death. Nor think 17 that his enemy⁴ will need great strength, a great muster of men, to overcome him, mound here, trench there, and the loss of many lives; for the man that did so ill, held 18 his faith a light thing and broke the bond he had set his hand to, there is no escape.
 This doom the Lord pronounces: As I am 19 a living God, false troth and broken treaty shall be the undoing of him! My net 20 spread; I have him in the noose; Babylon for him! There I will call him to account for the dishonour he has done to my name by his treachery; and all that escape with 21 him, nay, his whole army, must fall by the sword, or survive scattered to the four winds; you shall learn what manner of God you worship.

And here is a message from the Lord 22 God: Pith of the tall cedar I will take and set it firm, young branch from its crest of branches I will snap off, and plant it on a mountain that stands high above the rest.

¹ vv. 59-63. The precise emphasis of this passage is a matter of dispute; the rendering given above assumes that the reference to 'thy older and younger sisters' alludes to the call of the Gentiles.

² 'Merchant-land'; the Latin version here transliterates, 'Chanaan', instead of translating. Chaldaea is evidently meant.

³ vv. 12-14. The Latin here, like the Septuagint Greek, has the verbs in the future tense. But the reference is clearly to the banishment of Joachin, which had already taken place, not to that of Sedecias.

⁴ In the original, 'Pharao'. But it seems probable that the text is at fault; Nabuchodonosor, not Pharao, was the enemy. And although the Hebrew text can be read as implying that Pharao with his great army will not be able to save Sedecias, this is not the sense required; cf. the parallel in verse 9 above.

23 High in the hill-country of Israel I will plant it, and there it shall grow into a great cedar-tree; no bird on the wing but shall find rest under its shade, nestle among its branches; till all the forest learns its lesson, that I, the Lord, bring high tree low, raise low tree high, wither the burgeoning trunk, give life to the barren. What the Lord promises, the Lord fulfils.

2 18 Word came to me from the Lord: Strange, that a proverb should be current in Israel. The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are being set on edge! As I am a living God, the Lord says, this proverb shall be current in Israel no more. What, is not every soul at my disposal, father and son alike? It is the guilty soul that must die. Is a man loyal to me, does he live innocently and uprightly? Is he one who never feasted at mountain-shrines, or looked for help to the false gods that are worshipped in Israel; never came between his neighbour's sheets or had commerce with a woman when she was defiled? Does he keep clear of oppression, giving back the pledge he took from his neighbour, and seizing nothing by violence? Does he feed the hungry, clothe the naked? Does he shun usury and extortion? Does he refuse the bribe, and judge honestly between man and man? Does he follow my commandments, hold fast to my ordinances, as a true man should? Here is a loyal servant of mine; life for him, he shall live on, says the Lord God.

10 But now, what if son he begets that is a man of violence, a murderer; lends himself to any of those practices which his father ever shunned? At hill-shrine eats he, neighbour's wife wrongs he, the friendless poor oppresses; gets him ill gains, withholds the pledge, betakes himself to false god and foul rite; a usurer besides and an extortioner. Shall he live on? Nay, no life for him; he must die the death his foul crimes have earned him. Son of his, in turn, warned by such a father's doom, forswears that ill example. Not for him the hill-feast, the false gods of the country-side, the luxurious bed; never a wrong done, a pledge withheld, gain dishonestly come by; feeds he the hungry, clothes the naked, and keeps clear of oppression, and usury, and extortion; what of him? Doer of my will, keeper of my law, he shall not die for his father's sins; he shall live on. His father, a man of wrong and violence, that deserved ill of his countrymen, has paid for his guilt by death; would you have the son, too, make amends for it? Nay, but here is a man upright and honest, that holds fast by decrees of mine and obeys them; he must live on.

It is the guilty soul that must die; not for the son the father's punishment, not for the father the son's; good shall befall the good, evil the evil. It may be the wicked man will repent of all his sinful deeds, and learn to keep my commandments, and live honestly and uprightly; if so, he shall live on; life, not death, for him. All his transgressions shall be forgotten, and his uprightness shall bring him life. What pleasure should I find in the death of a sinner, the Lord God says, when he might have turned back from his evil ways, and found life instead? It may be the innocent man will lose his innocence, and begin to live as foul a life as that other in his wickedness; if so, shall he be spared? No, all his upright life shall be forgotten; a traitor, shall he not die in his treachery, a sinner in his sins? And yet you say, The Lord is inconsiderate in his dealings! Listen, sons of Israel; it is your dealings that are inconsiderate, not mine. The innocent man loses his innocence, and lives amiss; it is death I deal to him; he dies for his guilty deeds. The wicked man abandons his wicked ways, and learns to live honestly and uprightly; he wins life by it. He bethinks himself, and turns away from his evil doings; there is life, not death, for him.

What, should the sons of Israel hold the Lord inconsiderate? It is you who are inconsiderate, men of Israel, not he. Each by his own life you shall be judged, men of Israel, the Lord God says. Come back, and make amends for all this guilt of yours, that shall else be your undoing; away with them, your defiant rebellions against me;

¹ ov. 10, 11. The text of the Hebrew is somewhat doubtful, and the grammar of the Latin obscure. But 'which his father ever shunned' is probably the sense originally intended. The rendering 'though not all of them' is possible, but hardly attractive.

a new heart, a new spirit! Why must you 32 choose death, men of Israel? Die who will, his death is none of my contriving, says the Lord God; come back to me, and live!

19 ... Thine to raise a dirge over the 2 princes of Israel: Prince, that mother of thine was a lioness indeed;
 where lions haunt, she made her lair, among their whelps nursed her brood.¹ 3 One cub she reared that grew to lion's estate, learned to bring down his prey, to 4 eat men; the neighbours² heard of it, caught him, not scatheless, in their pit, and 5 carried him off in chains to Egypt. Baulked of her hopes, she reared another, till it was 6 a grown lion. This one, in turn, took his case like a lion among the rest; learned to 7 bring down prey, eat men, of women make widows, of cities a desert; dispeopled a 8 whole land with his roaring. At that, folk came from far and near³ with nets to snare him, caught him in their cruel toils and 9 caged him. This one they led off in chains to the king of Babylon; in Babylon he remained a prisoner, and his voice was heard on the hill-sides of Israel no more.
 10 Mother of that royal stock! Vine planted by the water-side, and in that neighbourhood leafy and fruitful both, was 11 never so fertile. Here was a vine could yield sturdy boughs, sceptres for kings to govern with; high grew the leaves, fair the 12 branching tendrils. But vengeance fell upon it, torn up and thrown away on the ground, the sirocco to wither its leaves;
 faded and dry those strong boughs, till at 13 last fire consumed them! It is planted now far away, in the parched soil of a desert.
 14 Fire came out from those branching boughs, that consumed all the fruit of it;
 never a sturdy bough more, to be a king's sceptre. Make lament, then; here is good cause for lament.

20 And now it was the seventh year,
 the tenth day of the fifth month.
 Some of the Israelite leaders had come to visit me, asking what was the Lord's will, 2 and sat closeted with me. And this message I had from the Lord: Son of man, tell the leaders of Israel this from the Lord God: Would you come to ask my will? As I am a living God, the Lord says, you shall have no answer. Arraign them, son of 4 man, arraign them for their crimes; tell them what foul things their fathers did before them. This shall be thy message to 5 them from the Lord God: Long ago I made choice of Israel, plighted to Jacob my troth, when I made myself known to them in the land of Egypt. I swore to be their own God, swore that I would take 6 them away to the home I had destined for them, a land all milk and honey, the best of lands. Only, I told them, his darling idolatrics each man must set aside; not for you to be contaminated with the false gods of Egypt; I, the Lord, am your God. All 7 was defiance and disobedience; idolatry still cherished, the worship of Egypt's gods still unforsaken. I was minded to let my anger have its way, glut my vengeance on them, there in Egypt. But no, I would be 8 their champion, for my own honour's sake;

 the heathen all around, that had witnessed my coming to deliver them, must not learn 9 to hold my honour cheap. So from Egypt I rescued them, and led them out into the desert.

There I gave them a law, made known 11 to them the usages that bring life; bade 12 them share my sabbath rest, that should be a token between me and them, a token that they were divinely set apart. What did 13 Israel then? Defied my anger, disobeyed my law, life-giving commandments cast away, left my sabbath all unhonoured.
 Should I give vent to my anger, and make an end of them, there in the desert? And 14 let the heathen see my work of deliverance half accomplished? For my honour's sake, I must not. But I swore, out in the desert, 15 that the promised land, all milk and honey, best of lands, should never be theirs. My will defied, my law forsaken, my sabbath neglected, a heart set on idols, they should learn to rue; had not my pity spared them, 17 they should have died there and then, swallowed up in those wastes. To their 18

¹ The two lions referred to are presumably Joachaz (IV Kg. 23. 31) and Joachin (IV Kg. 24. 15). The mother referred to is probably the kingdom of Juda. The absence of any rubric at the beginning of the chapter is curious, and it does not follow naturally on chapter 18; some words may perhaps have fallen out, or the whole chapter may have been accidentally misplaced.

² Literally, 'the nations'.
³ Literally, 'nations came from the provinces'. It is a habit of Hebrew authors to read the application of a parable into the parable itself.

sons, the desert-born, warning I gave: Not for you your fathers' example, your fathers' traditions, the contamination of the false gods they worshipped. I, the Lord, am your God; mine the laws you must follow, the usages you must cherish and obey; my sabbath you must honour, in token that the Lord is the God you worship. But they too, the sons, defied me; my laws forsook, my life-giving usages forgot, my sabbaths profaned. There in the desert I would have given vent to my anger, let my vengeance take its toll of them, but still I held my hand; for my own honour, the heathen must see my work of deliverance accomplished. But once more in the desert I bound myself by an oath. . . .¹ I would scatter them among all the nations, spread them over the face of earth, men defiant of my will, contemptuous of my law, careless of my sabbath as ever, after the false gods of their fathers hankering still. Laws they should have, but for their harm, usages that brought, not life, but death; guilty, they should stain themselves with fresh guilt by the very offerings they made, when they consecrated their first-born to the fire; they must have proof of my power at last.²

They blasphemed me (tell Israel from the Lord God), those fathers of yours, and did me great despite. Scarce had I brought them into the promised land, when the sight of high mountain here, thick forest there, set them offering victims in honour of my rivals, burning incense, pouring libations! Well might I ask them, Whither resort you? And hill-resorts they are called to this day.³

Give the men of Israel, then, this message from the Lord God: Still the same ways your fathers went, still the same itch for things abominable? To this day, when you would make offering, you pass your sons through the fire; guilt of idolatry stains you yet, and shall I make answer to you, men of Israel? As I am a living God, the Lord says, you shall have no answer from me! Never think I will allow you to worship wood and stone like other races of men, your neighbours; as I am a living God, the Lord says, I mean to reign over you, though it should need all the exercise of my constraining power, all the outpouring of my vengeance. Rescued from many masters, summoned from many lands, you shall serve me perforce, my power constraining you, my vengeance threatening you. I will lead you out into a desert world, and there plead my cause against you, as I did with your fathers long ago, in the desert confines of Egypt. I will force you under my sceptre, chain you to my covenant. The rebels I will set apart, and though I summon them away from their banishment, they shall never return to the land of Israel; then you will know what manner of God you serve. Come, then, says the Lord God, let each man have recourse to his own idol, and pay it due worship! If that counsel you will not follow, nor drag my name in the dust with foul rites and false gods. . . .⁴

On that holy mountain of mine, the Lord God says, that high mountain that looks down over Israel, all the race of Israel shall be my worshippers, favoured suitors in a favoured land; first-fruit and tithe, all your hallowings shall be awaited there. Rescued from so many masters, summoned from so many lands, you shall be a fragrant offering; all my dealings with you the heathen shall acclaim, and you yourselves shall recognize my power, restored to the land of Israel, the land I promised to your fathers. False paths and foul misdoings you shall remember yet, and think with loathing of what you were; my power you shall know, men of Israel, says the Lord God; and that I was your benefactor, not for your deserts, that erred and sinned, but for my own honour's sake.

¹ It seems possible there has been an omission here, such as is very likely to occur in a passage full of repetitions. Verse 24 seems to deal with an existing situation (not with a future situation, like Deut. 4. 27, etc.); and if so, the threat of dispersal would more naturally be uttered against a people already settled in Chanaan. ² vs. 25, 26. This passage cannot mean that Almighty God commanded the sacrifice of children; cf. Jer. 32, 35. The prophet implies, by a kind of ironical exaggeration, that by refusing aid to his guilty people God drove them to become worshippers of Moloch, whose usages brought death instead of life. 'Laws they should have', 'they should stain themselves'; literally, 'I gave them laws'; 'I stained them'. ³ This verse contains a (probably fanciful) derivation of the usual Hebrew word for 'hill-shrines'. It is perhaps intended to emphasize the fact that the shrines were still used in the prophet's own day, in spite of all the punishments Israel had experienced. ⁴ It seems clear that there is an omission after this verse, unless indeed the text of it has been incorrectly transmitted.

45 Word came to me from the Lord: Look southward, son of man; pour out thy complaint towards the noon-day sun, and let the southern woodlands hear thee prophesy. To the listening forest give this message from the Lord God: I mean to set thee alight, burn up green tree and dry; unquenchable, that flame shall scorch the faces of all beholders, northward and south alike; plain enough it shall be for all the world to see that it was I, the Lord, set it ablaze, and there is no quenching it.

49 Alas for pity, Lord God, said I, they are complaining already that I speak to them only in parables!

21 So the Lord's word came to me, Why then, son of man, towards Jerusalem turn thee, pour out thy complaint sanctuarywards, and let the land of Israel hear thee prophesy. And this be thy message to the land of Israel: Have at thee! the Lord God says; here is my sword unsheathed to make an end of thy inhabitants, innocent souls and guilty. In token that all alike must perish, northward and south alike, all the world over, my unsheathed sword must go on its errand; drawn it is, plain for all the world to see, and there is no sheathing it. And therewithal I would have thee groan, as men groan that have an aching in the loins, very piteously in the public view; ask they the reason of it, thou wilt say, For ill tidings. Faint every heart shall be, when those tidings come, every hand shall hang listless; cowed every spirit shall be, every knee be weak as water. Those tidings are on the way, the Lord God says; there is no averting it.

8 Word came to me from the Lord: Tell them, son of man, the Lord God has this message for thee to utter: Whetted the sword is, polished the sword is, whetted for slaughter, polished to dazzle as lightning does. Never a tree but must fall at thy onset, woodman who art to overthrow the sceptre my son wield.¹ Polished, for the hand to grasp it well, the sharp sword, the bright sword, which the slayer must needs handle! Cry aloud, son of man, and bewail thee, that on my people it must fall, and all the princes of Israel that are left; prince and people, doomed to perish by the sword; smite on thy thigh most dolorously. A tried sword, the Lord God says, and when yonder sceptre it has overthrown, brought to nothing...² Prophesy, then, son of man; smite hands together and call for a second stroke and a third of the avenging sword; a sword of massacre, that strikes men dumb, turns their hearts faint, and lays all in ruin. Havoc wrought at every gate by the sharp sword, the sword polished till it shines again, wrapped about the hilts for more ease of smiting! Sharp be thy blade; cut right, cut left, wherever thy lust beckons thee! I too will smite hands together, telling the tale of my vengeance; I, the Lord, command thee.

Word came to me from the Lord: And now, son of man, draw a picture. A picture of two roads, both leading from a common point, by which the sword of the Chaldaean king may travel. Here he is, planning his course at the sign-post, where two roads meet, a city at the end of either. Draw the two roads, one beckoning that sword to Rabbath, where the Ammonites dwell, one to Juda, and Jerusalem the impregnable. There stands the king of Babylon at the parting of the ways, taking omens; there is shuffling of arrows, consulting of deities, searching of entrails. Choose he the right, it is for Jerusalem; the battering-rams, the breach made ere the slaughter can begin, the cries of battle, the assault on the gates, the mound, the siege-works. Thy picture will shew him as a man baffled by the omens given him, that remains idle, as if he were keeping the sabbath rest.³ Then he remembers the guilt; shall a guilty race go free?

Ay, says the Lord God, still fresh is the memory of that guilt; open rebels you are, and never a thought in your hearts but shews vile; capture awaits you, that revive those memories still. And thou, perjured wretch that rulest Israel, thy time has run out; off with head-band, off with crown, symbols that honour the base, the noble degrade! I will wrest it this way, wrest it that, as it was never wrested yet;¹ at last one shall come that claims it of right, and to him I will give it.

¹ Like much else in this chapter, the second half of the verse is obscure, and probably corrupt, in the Hebrew text. ² Once more the Hebrew text gives us no help, and grammar can only be restored to the Latin by assuming that there has been an omission in the original. ³ The Hebrew text refers here not to keeping sabbaths, but to swearing oaths; the sense of it is extremely doubtful.

- 28 Prophecy, son of man, and give a message from the Lord God to the men of Ammon, in answer to their taunts: Drawn be the sword, cried they,² whetted be the sword and bright for its work of slaying!
- 29 Nay, sword of Ammon, it was but a vain dream, a lying augury, that it should be thy office to fall on the necks of yonder doomed
- 30 sinners, whose time has run out. Back to thy sheath with thee, back to thy native soil; there, in the land where thou wast fashioned, I will call thee to account.
- 31 I mean to pour out my vengeance on thee, blast thee with the fire of my anger; barbarian foes shall have the mastery of thee,
- 32 that are skilful only to destroy. Fire shall feed on thee, earth run with thy blood, oblivion bury thy name; I, the Lord, have given sentence.

- 22 Word came to me from the Lord:
- 2 Wilt thou not arraign them, citizens of this murderous place, wilt thou not arraign them? Confront them with their foul misdeeds, and give them this message from the Lord God: Here is a city that hastens her own end with open bloodshed, soils herself with idols to her own undoing.
- 4 Blood-spilth and idol-filth have brought thy time nearer, shortened thy years; what marvel if I let the heathen reproach thee,
- 5 a whole world mock thee? What marvel if men exult over thee, far and near, great only in thy misfortune, as thou art renowned only for thy shame? No better title now to Israel's nobility, than to fill those streets with blood! Home of wrong, where father and mother are despised, the stranger oppressed, widow and orphan ill-used! My sanctuary, how it is despised,
- 9 my sabbath how profaned! Innocent lives sworn away, feasting at the hill-shrines,
- 10 and foul deeds done besides; see where a father's bed is dishonoured, a woman pleads her defilement in vain; neighbour comes lecherously between his neighbour's sheets, father beds incestuously with his son's wife, brother mates with sister sprung of the same blood! The murderer's hire, usury and extortion, gains won by violence; and of me, the Lord God says, never a thought! Well may I smite hands together, indignant at thy ill-gotten gains, thy murderous doings; will thy courage be so high, thy arm so powerful, when it is I that reckon with thee? What the Lord threatens, the Lord fulfils. Far will I banish thee, widely scatter thee, and bring the tale of thy shame to an end; so I will claim my rights over thee for all the world to see, and thou shalt learn at last my power.

And word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, where the race of Israel shews in the heart of the furnace, nothing I find but dross; all is copper, and tin, and iron, and lead; dross of silver where silver should be. This warning, then, the Lord God has for them: I mean to shut you up in Jerusalem, dross as you are; this shall be your furnace, silver and copper and tin and iron and lead, all together; and I will light a fire to smelt you. There my angry vengeance shall imprison you, and I will give you respite for a little, and then melt you down. Beleaguered there, with the fire of my anger to smelt you like silver in the furnace, you shall feel the force of the Lord's vengeance at last.

Then word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, tell the land of Juda that it is unclean, and, when my vengeance falls on it, rain it shall have none. What of the prophets?³ A sworn conspiracy; lions roaring for their prey, the lives of men; wealth and treasure they must have; there be widows everywhere. What of the priests? Priests, that despise my law, violate my sanctuary, cannot tell sacred from profane, count all one, clean or unclean; priests, that leave my own sabbath

¹ 'Symbols that honour the base, the noble degrade! I will wrest it this way, wrest it that, as it was never wrested yet.' Literally, the Latin version runs: 'Is not this the thing that has lifted up the low, abased the high? I will make it guilt, guilt, guilt (or perhaps, inequality, inequality, inequality). And this has not happened.' The Hebrew text appears to mean: 'This is not this! Lift up the low, abase the high! I will make it distortion, distortion, distortion. And this was not.'² The words 'cried they', and 'sword of Ammon' in the next verse, are not in the original; they have been inserted above as being necessary for the understanding of what the passage presumably means. It appears that the Ammonites had hoped to profit by the misfortunes of Israel, instead of which they will be involved in a common ruin.

³ For 'prophets' the Septuagint Greek has 'princes', which may well be the true reading; only a difference of one letter is involved in the Hebrew, and the prophets are to be mentioned in verse 28 below.

unregarded; am I not defiled by their 27 company? What of the nobles? Ravening wolves, all blood and murder, greedy for 28 gain; and here are the prophets with their untempered mortar, their vain dreams and false auguries, crying a message from the Lord when message from the Lord they 29 have none. Great wrong the citizens themselves do, robbing where they will,
 harrying the helpless poor, oppressing the 30 stranger and denying him redress. Who would close the breach, intercede with me to spare the land from ruin? Never a man 31 was found! What wonder if I have poured out my vengeance, burnt them up in my anger? It was but their deserts I gave them, says the Lord God.

23 Word came to me from the Lord:
 2 There were two women once, son 3 of man, daughters of the same mother, that went to Egypt and played the wanton there, so wanton and so young! There those breasts surrendered to the attack, 4 virginity was ravished. For their names, the elder was called Oölla, the younger Oöliba; both I espoused, and they bore me sons and daughters. (Samaria and Jerusalem are the true names.)

5 What did Oölla? She played me false, love-sick for the Assyrians that dwelt hard 6 by, her paramours. Gay gallants were these, princes and noblemen that went clad in purple, and proudly they came riding, 7 for they were horsemen all. Among the flower of Assyrian chivalry was none but enjoyed her favours; and she, that courted all alike, soiled herself with their idolatry.
 8 Alas, still unforbidden her dalliance in Egypt; the lovers that bedded her in her youth, mishandled her virgin breast, plied 9 her with their debauchery! Love-sick for new paramours, into their keeping she should be given up, the Assyrians should 10 have the mastery of her. How they stripped and dishonoured her, robbed her of sons and daughters both, and then put her to the sword! Never fell such signal punishment upon womankind.

11 That sight before her, what did the other sister, Oöliba? Why, she outwent the first 12 in her wantonness, more lascivious yet; she too cast shame aside, gave herself to the gallants of Assyria that came riding by, horsemen all, princes and noblemen in their brodered cloaks, so young, so fair!

 Light women both; I knew them now. 13
 This other would set no bounds to her 14 lust; her eye fell on some pictured wall, where the men of Chaldaea stood portrayed, all in crimson. What girdles they 15 had about their loins, these men of Babylon, what gaily-coloured turbans they wore! Sure, they must be princes, all of them, in their own Chaldaean land! And 16 with that, her eye fell a-doting on them, and she must send them a message all the way to Chaldaea. So the Chaldaeans, too, 17 were her bed-fellows, dishonoured her with their embraces, till even she grew weary of dishonour. Weary was I too, as 18 once of her sister; the open harlotry, the public shame! Must she still renew her 19 unfaithfulness, hanker still after those old debaucheries in Egypt, when she was love-20 sick for gallants lusty as the wild ass, hot as stallions?

Alas, Oöliba, are they remembered still, 21 the passions of thy youth, far away in Egypt, when those breasts surrendered to the attack, that virginity was ravished?
 This doom, then, the Lord God pro- 22
 nounces on thee: They shall be summoned to the attack, all those old lovers thou art wearied of, beleaguer thee round about;
 all those Chaldaeans from Babylon, noble- 23
 man and prince and chieftain, all those gay gallants from Assyria, captains and rulers, lords paramount and knights of renown!
 What rattling of chariot-wheels, what 24 hordes of warriors in breastplate and shield and helmet, mustered about thy walls! These shall be thy judges; theirs the sentence thou must abide. Ministers 25 of my jealous anger, they shall cut nose and ears off thee, and there shall be sword-strokes yet; carry off thy sons and thy daughters, and the fire shall have work to do yet. They shall strip thee of thy clothes, 26 rifle thy proud ornaments; gone the mem-27 ory of thy harlotries in Egypt, no hankering for them now, no thought of Egypt now!

Weary thou art and disdainful of them, 28 says the Lord God, but they shall have the mastery of thee; and they shall use thee 29 cruelly enough; carry all thy harvest away, and leave thee stripped and humbled; lay bare the secret of thy shame. Lust it is and lechery of thine that has brought thee to 30 this pass; so wantonly didst thou court the heathen, till at last their idolatry infected thee. Thy sister's counterparty, the cup of 31 thy sister's doom thou shalt inherit; deep thy cup shall be as hers, wide as hers; full of mockery and reproach, so much it holds, 32 full of dizziness and dismay, full of despair and melancholy, the cup of thy sister Samaria. Drink it thou shalt, ay, drain it to 33 the dregs, till thou art ready to devour cup itself piecemeal, or mutilate thy own breasts in thy madness.¹ Me thou didst forget; on me thy back was turned; wanton and faithless, thou shalt be held to account.

 36 Arraign them, son of man, the Lord God said to me; confront Oölla and Oöliba with the record of their foul deeds. Blood-stained those adulterous hands; false gods they have taken for their paramours, and to the greed of false gods sacrificed their 37 own children and mine. Thers to defile my sanctuary, profane my sabbath; no sooner had they done offering their sons to false gods, than my sanctuary must be violated; so would they treat me in my own house.
 40 And then they sent word to their paramours, summoning them from afar.

They came, those paramours; and thou, fresh from the bath, eyes painted, all thy ornaments hung about thee, didst await them, sitting on a fine bed with a table before it; incense of mine, oil of mine was there. What a stir was heard there, as of a great throng taking their ease! They had brought in a rabble of desert folk with them, and these must be given bracelets for their arms, fine garlands for their heads.
 43 And I wondered whether she would grant them her favours, even she, that had grown so old in unfaithfulness; but sure enough they went in, boldly as to a harlot's bed.²

Such lovers had Oölla and Oöliba, wantons both. Yet honest folk there be,³ that can judge their deeds as adultery should be judged and murder; adulterous they are and murderous both at once.

Muster me a company of such men, the Lord God says, and let them make a fearful example of these women, their prize. With stones from many hands, with swords from every side dispatch them; death for their children, the fire for their homes! Rid we the land of its guilt; of such harlotry let all women beware! Wantonness punished, idolatry's guilt uncondoned; you shall know the Lord's power at last.

24 And so the ninth year came, and the tenth month, and the tenth day of it. And the Lord gave me this message: Son of man, write down this day as The Day Itself.⁴ This day, this very day, the king of Babylon has closed his grip on Jerusalem. A riddle, a parable, for the rebellious brood! Tell them the Lord God this bidding gave thee: Set a pot on the fire, but filling it first with water; slice after slice goes in, all that is best; thigh and shoulder, the best joints of all, to fill the pot; and fat be the sheep that yields them. Pile high the fuel⁵ beneath; now boil pot, and see the stew, there in the heart of it! But ah, says the Lord God, what of the city that is stained with blood? It is no better than a pot covered with rust, that cannot be scraped off any longer; broken in pieces that must be cast away one by one; never shall the lot fall upon it.⁶ Blood plain for all to see, spilt on the polished rock, not on earth that might hide it away under the dust; rock, not earth, so I would have it; blood unconcealed, to warrant my angry frown, my avenging punishments!

Out upon the blood-stained city, says the Lord God, the great pyre I mean to kindle! Pile high the fuel for its burning! Why, how is this, meat wasted, the whole dish charred, the very bones calcined? Empty of water it must be set on the coals, till it is red-hot, and copper melts away, and the stain on it is burnt out, and it is rusty no more! Alas, it is but labour spent

¹ The text and meaning of this verse is doubtful.

Hebrew text as we have it is corrupt; no sense can be made out of it. The translation given above follows the Latin, which is somewhat less obscure.

² vs. 42-44. It can hardly be doubted that the ³ This may refer (by a metaphor) to the Chaldeans, but more probably, in these concluding verses, the coming fate of Jerusalem is left out of sight, and appeal is made to the moral sense of the prophet's audience.

⁴ Literally, 'write down the name of this day, this very day'.
⁵ The word translated 'fuel', here and in verse 10, is the Latin 'bones'. The Hebrew text has 'bones' here and 'wood' in verse 10; the two Hebrew words differ only by a single letter. There is some likelihood that the original had 'wood' in both places.

⁶ The Hebrew text is obscure, and perhaps corrupt; as it stands, it must mean that the rusty pot was thrown away in pieces, not that it was emptied of the slices of meat. It is difficult to see why a 'lot' should fall upon it; unless indeed we are to think of it as so riddled with holes that it could not even be used as an urn for casting lots in.

in vain; so deep is that rust, even the fire 13 will not drive it out.¹ A curse lies on this uncleanness of thine; purge thee I would, yet purged thou wilt never be, never till I have taken full toll of my vengeance on 14 thee. Such is my divine doom; come it must, executed it needs must be; indulgence is none, nor mercy, nor pity; I will pay thee what thy ill life, thy ill thoughts have earned.

15 The Lord's word came to me, Son of man, I mean to smite thee down, by taking away from thee what thou most lovest.
 Dole make thou none, nor lament, shed 17 never a tear. Unmarked be thy sighing, with no funeral grief made; thy head covered, thy feet shod, no veil on thy face, 18 no customary fare of mourners. And so it was; that morning I uttered my word to the people, and my wife died at set of sun.
 19 Next day, I did as the Lord bade me, and the people were all agog to know the meaning of what I did. Why, I told them, 20 the Lord has spoken to me, giving me a message for the race of Israel: he means to profane his own sanctuary, that proud boast of yours, which you love so, trembling ever for its safety. Sons and daugh-22 ters of yours, left behind at Jerusalem, will die at the sword's point. As I do now, you will do then; no veils on your faces, no 23 customary fare of mourners; heads covered, feet shod, you will make neither dole nor lament, but languish ever under the load of your guilt, sighing each of you 24 in his neighbour's ear.² In Ezechiel, says the Lord God, read your own doom; when that day comes, you will be at pains to do as he does now; you will have learned what power the Lord God has.

25 Yes, son of man, the day is coming when I will rob them of that citadel of theirs, that proud boast of theirs, so well loved,
 the comfort of their thoughts; rob them, 26 too, of sons and daughters. And what of thyself? Wait till a fugitive comes and tells 27 thee the news;³ then, when he utters his 28 message, utter thou thine, dumb no longer.

 So thou shalt be the presage of their doom,
 and they shall learn my power at last.

25 Word came to me from the Lord:
 Son of man, turn thy regard to-2 wards the Ammonites, and prophesy their doom. Give Ammon this message from 3 the Lord God: Joy, joy! was thy cry when my sanctuary was profaned, Israel ravaged, the men of Juda carried off into 4 exile; what shall be thy reward? The eastern folk shall enjoy thy lands; sheepcote of theirs, tent of theirs shall be found 5 in thee, crop of thine they shall eat, milk of thine drink; camels lodged in Rabbath, and all Ammon a pasture-land of sheep!
 Thus you shall know what power is mine.
 For clapping of hand and stamping of foot, 6 and heart that rejoiced at Israel's fall, that power shall be used in vengeance; all the 7 world shall have the pillaging of thee, till thou art a nation no longer, a kingdom no longer; thy ruin shall teach thee what manner of God I am.

This doom, too, the Lord God pro-8 nounces: Boasted they, the Moabites and the men of Seir, that Juda had gone the way of other lands? I will lay open the 9 valleys of Moab, that climb up from the cities, those frontier cities, fair Bethjesi-moth, and Beelmeon and Cariathaim; open them to the men of the east in their 10 pursuit of the Ammonites, and all shall be overrun. Ammon shall be blotted out from the memory of mankind,⁴ and there is 11 justice, too, awaiting the Moabites; they too shall learn my power.

And this: Ill did the Edomites to glut 12 their malice, by taking their revenge on Juda. This doom the Lord God pro-13 nounces: My hand is raised to smite Edom, sparing neither man nor beast,

¹ vs. 10-12. No certainty can be attained about the meaning of this passage. The Latin, but not the Hebrew text, has the word 'empty' in verse 11; it is rendered above 'empty of water', on the assumption that we are meant to look back to verse 3. A cooking-vessel with no water in it—possibly because it has rusted away into holes—will char the meat that is put into it and afterwards be burnt through, so that it is left more useless than ever. But it is not clear that this is the meaning. ² vs. 22, 23. Various reasons have been suggested for this absence of public lament among the exiled community; fear of political consequences is perhaps the simplest explanation.

³ It seems to be implied that Ezechiel received no more revelations for his own fellow-countrymen during the two years of the siege. Cf. 33, 21. ⁴ vs. 9, 10. Literally, 'Behold, I will open up the shoulder of Moab from the cities; from his cities, I say, and from his frontiers; (I will open up) those famous (cities) of the earth, Bethjesimoth, Beelmeon and Cariathaim, to the sons of the east with the sons of Ammon', etc. It seems probable that the whole prophecy against Moab has come down to us in a faulty text; the mention of Seir (Edom) in verse 8 comes too early, the mention of Ammon in verse 10 too late.

making a desert of it all the way from Teman in the south to Dedan, that shall be put to the sword. My own people of Israel shall execute this sentence against Edom, avenge for me the grudge I bear it; then it shall be seen how I punish my enemies, the Lord God says.

And this: Rancour of the Philistines, that murderous toll would take, old scores would settle! Against the Philistines, too, this hand is raised; executed they shall be, the executioners; the dwellers on the sea-coast, all that is left of them, I mean to exterminate. Great havoc I mean to make of them, unrelenting in my anger; such havoc as shall teach them to know what the Lord is.

26 In king Sedecias' eleventh year, on the first day of the . . . month, word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, what was the cry of Tyre over Jerusalem? Joy, joy, the toll-gate² of the world has been broken down! It is mine now; I shall grow fat on Jerusalem's ruin! This doom the Lord God pronounces: Have at thee, Tyre! I mean to bring hordes of nations marching on thee, like wave upon wave of the sea. Walls of Tyre they shall break down, and towers of her overthrow; all the soil I will scrape away from her, and leave her bare rock, doom her to be but an island where fisher-folk dry their nets; I, the Lord God, will give her over as a prey to all the nations. Daughter-towns that stand in her territory shall be put to the sword, and learn my power at last.

Here is Nabuchodonosor of Babylon, the Lord says, a king that has kings for his vassals, marching from the north with horse and chariot, with his knights and all his retinue, a great army of men, to put thy daughter-towns to the sword, compass thee with siege-works and raise a mound about thee. A barrier of shields he will raise under thy walls, ply engine and battering-ram against them, and bring down thy towers with grappling-irons. Of horses such a company, as shall cover thee all with dust; with cries of horsemen and rattle of chariot-wheels entering thy gates, thy walls shall ring again like the walls of a breached city. Never a street of thine but must echo with hoofs; butchered thy citizens shall be, thy fair pillars cast down, thy wealth plundered, thy merchandise taken for spoil. Down shall come walls, palaces totter in ruins; stone and timber and mortar of thine shall strew the seas. Hushed the murmur of thy songs; never more the sound of harp shall be heard in thee. Bare rock thou shalt be, for fisher-folk to dry their nets on; there shall be no building thee again, says the Lord God.

This too: The very isles shall echo with the crash of thy fall, ring with the cries of the wounded dying in thy streets. Down from their thrones they shall come, all the lords of the sea-harbours, throw robe aside, broided coats lay down; wrapped in dismay they sit on the bare ground, at the sudden fall of thee bewildered and amazed. And thus they shall sing thy dirge: What a doom was thine, sea-built city, far renowned! Mistress of the seas, mother of a race that all held in dread! Day of terror, that affrights the very ships, fills the islands with alarm, to see no ships leave thy harbour now!

This too: Desolate thou shalt be, thy place among the lost cities; higher and higher yet the fathomless ocean shall rise about thee, swallowing thee up under its waters. Among the dead thy place is, that go down into the grave, where time is not; entombed with those other ruined cities in the depths of earth, tenanted no longer. The living world shall see the glory of my presence, but thou shalt have no part in it, thou shalt no longer be; who searches for thee will search evermore in vain, says the Lord God.³

27 And word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, do thou thyself sing the dirge over Tyre. A message from the Lord God to the city that is built by the sea's gates, and trafficks with many

¹ 'The executioners'; that is, the Cerethites, a Philistine clan, 'cutters-down' both by the derivation of their name, and by the office they enjoyed under the early kings of Israel (II Kg. 8. 18; III Kg. 2. 25, 29).

² In the original simply 'the gate', but it is difficult to see how Tyre could have regarded Judaea as her rival, except in the sense that it lay on the trade route between the Gulf of Akabah (III Kg. 9. 26, 22. 49) and the Phoenician ports.

³ v. 19-21. Actually the siege of Tyre lasted for thirteen years (cf. 29. 18), and her commercial prosperity remained considerable for many centuries. Thus it seems clear that the sentence of overthrow, however well deserved in Ezechiel's time, was not literally executed, in the counsels of divine Providence, till much later.

peoples on many shores! Thine was the 4 boast of perfect beauty, the embosoming sea thy frontier. A well-fitted ship thou wert, such as they build on yonder coast; 5 of fir-wood from Sanir thy outer planks, 6 of Lebanon cedar thy mast, oars shaped from Basan oak, thy thwarts of box-wood¹ 7 from the western islands, with marquetry of Indian ivory. Of brodered linen from Egypt the sails they spread for thee, awning of blue and purple from the Grecian isles gave thee shade.

8 For thee, men of Sidon and of Arad manned the oar; thyself, Tyre, gavest men of skill, thy own citizens, to be helmsmen.
9 For thy dockyards,² all the grey-haired wisdom of Gebal was at thy command, and for trafficking, never was ship or sailor in 10 the world but visited thee. Warriors from Persia, from Lydia, from Africa, fought thy battles, with shield and helmet decked 11 thy walls; men of Arvad ringed the battlements, thy defenders, and the Gamma-dim,³ too, were mounted on thy towers, on thy walls hung their quivers; lacked nothing for thy adornment.

12 And for the merchants that dealt with thee, how Carthage poured her wealth into thy market-place, of silver and iron, of tin 13 and lead! What purveyors of thine were Ionia, Thubal, and Mosoch, with their slaves to sell thee, their urns of bronze; 14 and the men of Thogorma, with horse and horseman and mule! The sons of Dedan 15 were thy pedlars; riches came to thee from the islands far away; ivory and ebony thou 16 couldst win by barter. Syria, too, for the multitude of thy wares, must trade with thee, exposing in thy mart carbuncles, and 17 purple, and embroidery, and lawn, and silk, and rubies. Juda and Israel themselves had their yield to bring thee, fresh 18 wheat and balm and honey and oil and gum for thy stalls. Damascus, for thy 19 many goods, had much to exchange, rare wines and brightly dyed wool; Dan and Ionia and Mosel offered wrought iron for sale, with cassia and calamus supplied thee. Dedan brought thee saddles; Arabia 20 and Cedar's chieftains were at thy call, driving in lamb and ram and goat for thy purchasing. The merchants of Saba and 22 Reema were thy merchants too, with spices and precious stones and gold to shew in thy fairs; Haran, Chene and Eden, Saba, 23 Assur and Chelmad, none of them but exchanged traffick with thee; and how rich 24 the variety of it, the coverlets of blue, the embroideries, the treasure-caskets wound about with cords, the cedar-wood, all for thy profit!⁴

But the ships, they were thy pedlars in 25 chief; the ocean-going ships, that gave thee thy wealth, gave thee thy sea-enviored renown. Alas, that those oars-26 men of thine should have ferried thee out into deep waters, for the storm-wind to wreck thee, out in the heart of the sea! All 27 thy wealth and treasure and merchandise, thy mariners and helmsmen, dockyard masters and captains, all the warriors thou hast, and the common folk that dwell in thee, must sink down to the sea's depths in this day of thy fall. Bewildered, all thy 28 navy, with the helmsmen's shouts; down 29 come the rowers from their ships, mariner and pilot line the shore. Loud they bewail 30 thee, bitter their cry, as they throw dust on their heads and sprinkle themselves with ashes; heads are shaven, sackcloth is 31 every man's wear; woeful hearts are all around, and woeful lament. And a sad 32 dirge they shall sing as they mourn over thee: City was none like Tyre, that now lies forgotten in the depths of the sea!
Peoples a many thy trafficking supplied; 33 all the kings of the earth were richer for wealth of thine, enterprise of thine; and 34 now the sea has swallowed thee up; buried in the deep waters all the prosperity that was thine, all the citizens that thronged 35 thee. The island peoples, how they stood

¹ It seems almost certain that this word stood in the original, but, being rare, was wholly misconstrued. Thus our present Hebrew text speaks of 'the daughter of Assyria', the Septuagint Greek of 'forest-shrine habitations', and the Latin version of 'small country-houses'. For 'western' the Latin version has 'Italian', but this is only a guess; Balearic box-wood is probably meant. ² In the Hebrew text 'to caulk thy leaks'; in the Latin version 'for the administration of thy varied equipment'. ³ Who the Gammadim were, is unknown; some think they were the Cappadocians. The Latin version can hardly be right in identifying them with the pygmies. ⁴ vs. 12-24. There is considerable uncertainty, all through this section, about the identification of the nations mentioned and their wares. In verse 16 Aram (Syria) is probably a mistake for Edom, which resembles it in Hebrew script; the Edomite caravans would naturally bring eastern goods from the Red Sea. Syria, under the name of Damascus, has a separate mention below. The text at the beginning of verse 19 is almost certainly corrupt.

36 aghast at thy fall; the island kings, how their faces fell at the news of thy shipwreck! How they hissed in derision, the traders of other nations! Only ruin is left of thee, for ever vanished and gone.

2 28 And word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, give this message from the Lord God to the prince of Tyre: An ill day for thee, when thy proud heart told thee thou wast a god, enthroned god-fashion in the heart of the sea! Mortal man, thou hast played the god in thy own thoughts. What if more than a Daniel thou wert for wisdom, no secret hidden from thee? Skill and craft have brought thee power, lined thy coffers with gold and silver; and this skill of thine, this pedlar's empire of thine, have made thee proud of thy own strength. This doom, then, the Lord God has for thee, man that wouldst play the god: I mean to embroil thee with foreign foes, a warrior nation as none else, that shall draw sword on that fair creature, thy wisdom, soil thy beauty in the dust!

8 Dragged down to thy ruin, wounded to thy death, there in the heart of the sea, wilt thou still boast of thy godhead to the slayer, while his sword ungodd thee? Such my doom is for thee, death at an alien's hand, the uncircumcised for thy company.

11 This too: Son of man, sing a dirge over yonder king of Tyre.¹ This be thy message to him from the Lord God: The token, thou, of my considerateness.² How wise thou wast, how peerlessly fair, with all God's garden to take thy pleasure in! No precious stone but went to thy adorning; sardius, topaz, jasper, chrysolith, onyx, beryl, sapphire, carbuncle and emerald; all of gold was thy fair fashioning. And thy niche³ was prepared for thee when thou wast created; a cherub thou shouldst be, thy wings outstretched in protection; there on God's holy mountain I placed thee, to come and go between the wheels of fire.⁴ From the day of thy creation all was perfect in thee, till thou didst prove false; all these traffickings had made thee false within, and for thy guilt I must expel thee, guardian cherub as thou wert, from God's mountain; between the wheels of fire thou shouldst walk no longer. A heart made proud by its own beauty, wisdom ruined through its own dazzling brightness, down to earth I must cast thee, an example for kings to see. Great guilt of thine, all the sins of thy trafficking, have profaned thy sanctuaries; such a fire I will kindle in the heart of thee as shall be thy undoing, leave thee a heap of dust on the ground for all to gaze at. None on earth that recognizes thee but shall be dismayed at the sight of thee; only ruin left of thee, for ever vanished and gone.

This too: Son of man, turn thy regard towards Sidon, and prophesy its doom. This message give it from the Lord God: Have at thee, Sidon! Battle-field thy territory shall be of my renown! In her, too, my power shall be made known, my sentence executed, my holiness vindicated. Plague I mean to bring down on her and blood-letting both; the sword everywhere, and wounded men dying in her streets, to prove what power the Lord has.

No more shall the Israelites have scornful enemies round about, thorns and briars to prick and hurt them;⁵ they shall know at last what manner of God they serve. When I restore the scattered race of Israel from its exile, the Lord God says, my holiness shall be vindicated for all the world to see. The land I gave to my servant Jacob shall be thenceforward its home; securely it shall dwell there, build houses, plant vine-

¹ v. 11. The 'king' of Tyre, to whom the foregoing ten verses were addressed, was doubtless a historical figure. But it is not certain that we ought to read verses 12-19 in the same connexion; the exaggerated phrases would suggest a rhetorical apostrophe to the Tyrian god Melkarth ('King of the City'). Further, it seems evident that the prophet identifies him (local king or local god) with Satan, or some other fallen angel; cf. the reference to Lucifer in Is. 14. 12.

² Literally, 'the seal of similitude'. The Latin, like the other versions, gives a literal rendering of a confessedly obscure phrase in the Hebrew. The noun translated 'similitude' occurs only here. It is the verbal noun of a verb meaning to regulate, to adjust, to put in a right proportion. There are nineteen occurrences of the verb in Scripture, and nine of these are in chapter 18 above or in chapter 33 below. It seems best, then, to assume that we have here a cross-reference. The equitableness or considerateness of Almighty God in punishing the just man who has turned sinner is illustrated by his treatment of the fallen Angel, who is therefore described as a seal or token of (his) considerateness.

³ Literally 'holes' (or just possibly 'flutes'). If the text is right, a niche meant for a god's image is perhaps the nearest tolerable meaning.

⁴ Literally, 'stones of fire'. But no plausible suggestion has been made as to what 'stones of fire' could mean, and a very slight alteration in the Hebrew word would give the sense of 'wheels', readily understandable in view of numerous passages (e.g. 10. 6 above).

⁵ Cf. Num. 33. 55; Jos. 23. 13.

yards, fear no attack. It shall see every scornful neighbour punished, and know at last what it is to have the Lord for its God.

29 It was the tenth year of Sedecias, on the eleventh day of its tenth month, when word came to me from the 2 Lord: Son of man, turn thy regard towards Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and prophesy his 3 and all Egypt's doom. This message give him from the Lord God: Have at thee, Pharaoh, king of Egypt, great dragon that liest couched between thy streams, boasting that yonder river is thy own, thou art 4 a god, self-created!¹ Trust me, I will bridle those jaws of thine, and all the fish in thy river I will fasten to thy scales! Out of the river, fish clinging to scales, I will 5 drag thee, and leave thee aground in the desert, and thy fish too. None shall go out to search for thy corpse, or bring it home; carrion it shall be for beast on earth, for 6 bird in heaven, and all the citizens of Egypt shall learn my power. This, because thou didst prove a staff of cane to the men 7 of Israel;² grasped they that staff, it splintered, and there was an arm wounded; leaned they on it, it broke, and their strength gave way under them.

8 This doom, then, the Lord God pronounces: For thee, the sword; man nor 9 beast will I spare in thee; a lonely desert thou shalt be, till thou hast learned what my power is, thou that wouldst be river's 10 lord and river's maker. Out upon thee, out upon those streams of thine; a desert Egypt shall be, devastated by the sword, from Syene's tower to the marches of 11 Ethiopia; man nor beast shall set foot in it till it has lain forty years desolate. Land of 12 Egypt shall be as the desert lands are, cities of Egypt as the ruined cities are, for forty years uninhabited; and the men of Egypt shall be scattered wide as earth among the nations.

13 This too: At the end of forty years I will bring the Egyptians back from their 14 countries of exile, restore them from banishment, and in Phatures, the land of their birth, give them a home once more; there they shall be a kingdom of little account. Least of the kingdoms Egypt ¹⁵ shall be, no more hold up its head among the nations, too weak for empire now. No 16 more shall it raise hopes among the men of Israel, and bring upon them the guilt of finding a refuge there; they shall learn that I, the Lord, am their God.

It was on the first day of the twenty-17 seventh year³ that word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, here is great 18 drudgery king Nabuchodonosor of Babylon has given his men in the assault upon Tyre; every head worn bald, every shoulder 19 smooth, by the burdens they carried! A thankless service it was they did me there, he and his army; but now, says the 20 Lord God, I will make use of Egypt to pay Nabuchodonosor his wages; all its great 21 wealth he shall have, spoil for his spoiling, plunder for his plundering, and so his men shall have their reward. He has fought my 22 battles, and Egypt shall be his recompense, the Lord God says. When that day comes, 23 new life shall spring from the stock of Israel, and to the men of Israel thou shalt speak with unhampered utterance, to attest my divine power.

30 And again word came to me from 2 the Lord: Son of man, tell them their doom in the name of the Lord God, and bid them raise loud lament: Alas, alas the day! Nearer, nearer it comes, the 3 Lord's reckoning day, dawning in cloud; it is the heathen's turn now. Egypt shall 4 feel the sword, and Ethiopia tremble to see Egypt's warriors dying, Egypt's wealth 5 carried away, the foundations of Egypt overthrown. Ethiop and Libyan and Ly-6 dian, all that motley host, men of Chub and men that hold their lands under treaty, by that same sword shall perish. Such doom 7 the Lord God pronounces; gone, all the props that supported her, gone her proud empire; all that lies beyond Syene, the 8 Lord says, ravaged by the sword! Land of Egypt shall be as the desert lands are, 9 cities of Egypt as the ruined cities are; my power they will never learn till I have spread fire over their country, till all their allies have perished. When that day comes, there will be ships carrying news of my onset, to daunt the courage of Ethiopia; Egypt's doom approaching, they shall know it and be afraid.

¹ Literally, 'thou didst make thyself', but some think the sense is 'thou didst make it (the river) for thyself', cf. verse 9. ² Cf. Is. 36. 6. ³ The other dates given in these chapters plainly refer to the reign of Sedecias, though this is not expressed in the original. Less certainty can be felt about the 'twenty-seventh year'; cf. note on I. 1.

- 10 This too: I mean to make an end of Egypt's prosperity, through king Nabuchodonosor of Babylon; he and his army, in all the world is none fiercer, shall be let loose for the land's undoing, their swords drawn to fill Egypt with dead. I will dry up the course of its rivers, and leave the land at the mercy of its bitter enemies; nothing in it but shall be ravaged by alien hands; I, the Lord, have decreed it. Down shall come the idols of Memphis, the Lord God says, I will have no more false gods there, and prince in all the land shall be none. Such terrors Egypt shall know, Phatures all in ruin, Taphnis afire, in Alexandria¹ my doom executed, Pelusium, her fortress, shall feel my vengeance, Alexandria be laid waste; all Egypt shall be ablaze, such bitter throes Pelusium shall have, Alexandria such devastation, Memphis such hard straits day by day. Their warriors put to the sword, Heliopolis shall be enslaved and Bubastis; dark days there shall be at Taphnis, when I crush the power of Egypt there, and all the pride of her empire is gone; a city in darkness, with all her women-folk carried off into exile. Such doom I will execute upon the Egyptians, and they shall know my power at last. In the eleventh year of Sedecias, on the seventh day of the first month, word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, I have left Pharaoh, king of Egypt, with his arm broken; bound up and healed it may not be, clout or bandage is none to wind about it and give it support, give it strength to hold sword again. Out upon Pharaoh, king of Egypt, says the Lord God; that strong arm of his, that broken arm of his, I will disable, strike the sword from his hand; dispersed among the nations Egypt shall be, scattered to the winds. Strong arms I will give the king of Babylon, and a sword to wield, to Pharaoh broken arms, and the groans of dying men for all his comfort. The king of Babylon strong, and Pharaoh disabled; my power shall be known, when my sword, in Babylon's hand, hangs over Egypt; my power shall be known, when the men of Egypt are scattered wide as earth among the nations.

31 That same year, on the first day of the third month, word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, here is a message for Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and his retinue. Say to him, This greatness of thine, whose memory does it recall? Not less powerful once was the Assyrian² king, a very cedar of Lebanon. How fair its boughs, yonder tree, its leaves how overshadowing; what height, what thickness of growth about its top! Water nourished it, water came up from the depth beneath to sustain it, washed about its roots and parted into runnels to feed the trees around. In all the country-side none rose so tall, had covert so thick, branches so wide; none fed so deep. Among its boughs the birds nested, the beasts in their travail sought its shade; proud nations a many under Assyria's shelter grew. So fair it was, so tall and spreading, there by the brimming water's side, in God's own garden cedar could not overtop it, fir-tree match it for height, or plane-tree for shade. God's garden itself could not shew such beauty: never a tree there, tree of Eden,³ but must envy it the leafy loveliness that was my gift.

Alas, that he should aim too high, the Lord God says; alas for youth's luxurious promise, that swelled his heart with pride! I must needs hand him over to a conquering power, that should settle my reckoning with him; he, the godless, homeless should be. Cut down, yonder tree, by alien folk, heathen that pity have none, and left to lie on the hill-side, boughs choking the valleys, branches carried off by the mountain streams; vassal nations abandoned his shelter, and he was all alone. In the fallen trunk birds nested, under torn branches the wild beasts made their lair; never again should tree boast of its height, there by the river bank, overtopping the covert of the woods, never again should the waters nourish its pride. Death and the deep earth should await them all, mortal things to a mortal doom appointed.

¹ 'Alexandria' is an unfortunate guess of the Latin translators; the city referred to is Thebes. ² Some think that the name of Assyria has crept in through an error in the text, and that Egypt itself, not Assyria, is being compared to the cedar-tree. In verse 6, there is no mention of Assyria in the original; it has been introduced for the sake of clearness, on the assumption that the text of verse 3 has been correctly preserved. ³ Here, and in verses 16 and 18, the name 'Eden' has been translated 'pleasure' in the Latin version.

15 Sad dirge was his, the Lord God says, at his down-going; the great depth was the shroud of him, its flooding streams hushed and stayed; mourned Lebanon, and all the forest swooned away. How it echoed through the world, the crash of his fall! He too, like all mortal things, was for the earth at last; comfort for those others that were brought to earth like himself, trees of Eden like himself, so noble, so fair, so well watered! All alike must go down to the grave, the sword's way; his arm. . .¹

18 . . . his shadow their protection against surrounding nations. And thou, in thy greatness and glory among Eden's trees so like him! Yet thou, like other Eden trees, must come down low as earth can bring thee; and the sword shall level thee with the uncircumcised in death. (Pharao is meant, and Pharao's retinue, the Lord God says.)²

32 And in the twelfth year, on the first day of the twelfth month, word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, sing a dirge for Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, that counts for a lion among the nations: Monster thou art of the depths, holding up thy head in those rivers of thine, trampling them under foot, till their waters run foul! This doom the Lord God pronounces: A net-work I have of many peoples that I will cast over thee, a seine that will bring thee presently ashore. High on the beach I will leave thee aground, for all the birds to perch on thee, all the beasts to take their fill of thee; flesh of thine shall strew the mountains, with blood of thine the gullies shall overflow, reeking blood that drenches hill and chokes valley with its stream.

7 Thy light when I quench, muffled the skies shall be, the stars dim, the sun beclouded, and the moon shall refuse her light; no luminary in heaven but shall go mourning for thee, and in that land of thine, the Lord God says, all shall be darkness.

Here shall be a challenge to many nations, in lands thou still knowest not, when I tell them the story of thy downfall; peoples a many there shall be that gape in bewilderment, kings that tremble and quake at the story of thee. My sword they shall see flashing before their eyes, and each for his own life shall tremble in the day of thy fall. Sword of the king of Babylon shall reach thee, the Lord God says; tried warriors thy thronging multitudes shall cut down, pitiless hordes that shall harry the pride of Egypt, scatter her wealth. The very beasts that roam beside your full stream I will destroy; never foot of man, hoof of beast shall sully it thenceforward; clear those waters shall be as never they were, smooth as oil the river's flow, the Lord God says; all Egypt, now, shall be desolate, all its busy life shall be still, when I smite the men that dwell in it, and teach them to recognize my power. Make dole, then; here is good cause; Egypt shall have the world for her mourner, none but shall mourn for Egypt and her lost greatness, says the Lord God.

And in the twelfth year, on the fifteenth day of the month, this: Son of man, a dirge now for the common folk of Egypt; sing Egypt to her grave, and with her those other proud nations that must go down into the dark: Measure not thy beauty against another's; to thy grave get thee, and with the uncircumcised take thy rest. The sword carries off all alike; once loose it, she and all her multitudes must perish. From the tomb they greet the newcomer, those great warriors, men of the uncircumcised races, allies once, that now lie there, slain in battle.³ Here is the Assyrian king with all his muster-roll; how their graves ring him about, dead warriors all! Down there in the dark, his grave and theirs around him, dead now in battle, that once daunted the hearts of the living! Here are the Elamites, too, lying about their king, men uncircumcised that made themselves feared in life, and now lie in the pit beneath with all those others, stripped and shamed as they were left on the battle-field; (here he lies, with his men about him for monument, once so feared; stripped and shamed they lie, Elamites uncircumcised, there in the dark, there amongst the slain).¹ Uncircumcised, too, the king of Mosoch and Thubal, with all his retinue buried around him, dead now and feared no longer; shall they not sleep on there with the slain warriors, with the uncircumcised, still armed, swords beneath their heads; their corpses lawless yet, and feared no longer?² Thy place too, the place of thy slain warriors, is with the uncircumcised in their ruin. King and chief of the Edomites³ lie slain among the uncircumcised, there in the dark; so do all the kings of the north, and the Sidonians, dismayed now and trusting no more in their own valour, stripped and shamed. Well may Pharaoh and his men be comforted by that sight over the multitude of their slain, the Lord God says. He too, in this living world, wielded my terrors; he too lies there, the Lord God says, slain in battle, with the uncircumcised about him.

¹ There seems to have been either an error, or an omission, in the Hebrew text. The Latin rendering, 'the arm of each will sit under its shade' yields no good sense.

² According to the Septuagint Greek, the concluding words of the chapter should read 'So (it will be with) Pharao and all his retinue'.

³ In this curiously repetitive passage, from here to the end of the chapter, the Latin version follows the Hebrew text, which is here so different from the Septuagint Greek as to suggest the possibility of a very early corruption in the manuscripts.

33 Word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, tell thy fellow-countrymen this: Plague I a country with war, some frontier-dweller is chosen by the citizen to be their sentry. Let such a man spy the invader's approach, and sound the alarm with his trumpet; whoever hears it must give good heed, or else the enemy may catch him, and none but himself to blame. What, hear trumpet, and pay no heed? The fault is his. More cautious, he should have found safety. But what if sentry, when he sees the invader coming, sounds no alarm to warn his neighbours? Here is some citizen overtaken by the enemy; well, his guilt deserved it. But for his death I will hold the sentry accountable.

So it is with thee, son of man; for the whole race of Israel thou art my watchman; the warning thou hearest from my lips, to them pass on. Sinner if I threaten with death, and word thou give him none to leave off his sinning, die he shall, as he deserves to die, but thou for his death shalt answer to me. If warning thou givest, and he will not leave off his sinning, he dies by his own fault, and thou shalt stand acquitted.

This be thy word, son of man, to the race of Israel: Think you no hope of life is left, so burdened you are, so languish under the guilt of your sins? This message give them from the Lord: As I am a living God, the sinner's death is none of my contriving! I would have him leave his sinning, and live on. Come back, come back from your ill-doing; why must you choose death, men of Israel? And warn them, son of man, warn thy fellow-countrymen that, once the upright man falls a-sinners, his uprightness shall nothing avail him. Sinner that will leave his sinning, no harm shall he have; upright man that sins, no life shall his uprightness bring him. Promise I the upright he shall live on, he must not by his own uprightness be emboldened to sin; forgotten, all his good deserts, his guilt shall be his undoing. Threaten I the sinner with instant death, he has but to repent of his sins, do innocently and uprightly, restore the debtor's pledge, the ill-gotten gains, follow the life-giving law, forswear ill-doing, and it shall be life, not death for him. Forgotten, all his ill-deserving; innocent and upright, he shall live on. And yet they say, these fellow-countrymen of thine, that the Lord's dealings are inconsiderate, when in truth it is they that deal inconsiderately. Death for the upright that is upright no more, and turns ill-doer; life for the sinner that will leave his sinning, upright and innocent now! Will you still have it that the Lord's dealings are inconsiderate? Nay, men of Israel, each of you shall have his deserts.

It was in the twelfth year of the exile, on the fifth day of the tenth month, that a fugitive came to me with the news that Jerusalem had fallen. The night before this man reached me, the power of the Lord had visited me, to unseal my lips in readiness for his coming on the morrow; so now I could speak out, and was dumb no longer. And a message came to me from the Lord: Son of man, what are they saying, the folk that now inhabit yonder ruins of Israel? Enough of us, they say, to be the true heirs of this land! Abraham was granted possession of it when he was all alone.¹ Tell them this from the Lord God: You, that cook your meat with the blood in it, that look to false gods for aid, that thrive by murder, the land's heirs! You, that live by the sword, that practise foul rites, that dishonour your neighbours' wives, the land's heirs! This is the Lord's message to them: As I am a living God, ruin-dwellers, the sword shall be your ruin! Or choose you the open country, you shall be a prey to the wild beasts; choose you mountain-fastness and cave, the pestilence shall take you. A lonely desert this land shall be, all its proud boast at an end; the hill-country of Israel shall lie desolate, untrudged by wayfarers; desert and desolate their land must be, in punishment of all their foul doings, before they learn to recognize my power.

¹ This verse does not appear in the Septuagint Greek at all. ² It is difficult to attach any sense to this verse unless it is treated as a question, not a statement. 'Their corpses lawless yet'; literally, 'their lawlessnesses were upon their bones'; the absence of circumcision is perhaps referred to. ³ The mention of the Edomites (who practised circumcision) is unexpected. According to the Septuagint Greek, we return in this verse and the next to the Assyrians.

And thou, son of man, listen to what they are saying of thee, as they stand close to wall, huddled under doorway. Each says to other, Come and find out whether the Lord has any message for us. Ay, they come crowding about thee, this people of mine, and sit here closeted with thee, listening to all thou sayest, but do thy bidding they will not. No, they will have thee sing in their own tune,² and all their thought dwells upon gains ill-gotten. As well had it been some tuneful air, sung excellently well; better listeners thou couldst not have, nor less achievement. But when thy words come true, as come true they shall, none shall doubt that they have had a prophet in their midst.

34 Word came to me from the Lord: Now, son of man, prophesy doom to the rulers of Israel, the shepherds of my flock. This be thy message from the Lord God: Out upon Israel's shepherds, that had a flock to feed, and fed none but themselves; the milk drank, the wool wore, the fat lambs slaughtered, but pastured these sheep of mine never at all! The wasted frame went unnourished, the sick unhealed; nor bound they the broken limb, nor brought strayed sheep home, nor lost sheep found; force and constraint were all the governance they knew. So my sheep fell a-wandering, that shepherd had none; every wild beast fell a-preying on them, and they scattered far and wide. All over the high hills were scattered, this flock of mine, and no search was made for them, no search at all. This doom, then, the Lord pronounces on yonder shepherds: As I am a living God, I will have a reckoning for sheep of mine carried off, sheep of mine the wild beasts have preyed on, while they went all untended, with shepherds that would not go in search of them, shepherds that no flock would feed, but themselves only. A word, shepherds, for your hearing, a message from the Lord God: Out upon yonder shepherds! I will hold them answerable for the flock entrusted to them, and they shall have charge of it no more, feed themselves out of its revenues no more. From their greedy power I will rescue it; no longer shall it be their prey.

This is what the Lord God says: I mean to go looking for this flock of mine, search it out for myself. As a shepherd, when he finds his flock scattered all about him, goes looking for his sheep, so will I go looking for these sheep of mine, rescue them from all the nooks into which they have strayed when the dark mist fell upon them. Rescued from every kingdom, recovered from every land, I will bring them back to their own country; they shall have pasture on the hill-sides of Israel, by its water-courses, in the resting-places of their home. Yes, I will lead them out into fair pastures, the high mountains of Israel shall be their feeding-ground, the mountains of Israel, with soft grass for them to rest on, rich feed for them to graze. Food and rest, says the Lord God, both these I will give to my flock. The lost sheep I will find, the strayed sheep I will bring home again; bind up the broken limb, nourish the wasted frame, keep the well-fed and the sturdy free from harm;¹ they shall have a true shepherd at last.

¹ The contrast, 'Abraham was but one, and we are many' appears somewhat forced. It seems just possible that this paragraph is addressed, not to Jews, but to the heathen still living in Palestine, who were not descended from Abraham, and here express their intention of disputing his inheritance. It is perhaps worth noticing that the sin of eating meat with the blood in it (verse 25) is not elsewhere mentioned among the delinquencies of Israel. ² Literally, 'they turn them (thy words) into a song of their mouth'. The Hebrew text seems to mean 'they make loves in their mouths', but for 'loves' the Septuagint Greek has 'lies'.

17 And what of you, my flock? I mean to do justice, the Lord God says, among the beasts themselves, give redress against the rams and the buck-goats. What, was it not enough to have stripped the pasture-lands with your grazing, drunk all that was purest out of the stream, but you must trample and foul all that was left? None but trampled fields must my sheep graze, none but fouled waters drink? This is what the Lord God says: I mean to see justice done between fat beast and lean. Thrust back with side and shoulder, gored with the horn, all the weaker of them have been driven away; but now I mean to protect this flock of mine against your greed, give beast redress against its fellow.

23 . . . They shall have a single shepherd to tend all of them now;² who should tend them but my servant David? He shall be their shepherd, and I, the Lord, will be their God, now that he rules them on earth; such is my divine promise to them. Such a covenant I will make as shall grant them security; beasts of prey there shall be none, safe resting, now, in the desert, safe sleeping in the woods; on my hill-sides they shall dwell, a blessed people in a blessed home, rain in its season fall on them, and blessings all the while. Will trees their fruit, the earth its crops shall afford; undisturbed they shall dwell on their own lands, acknowledging my power at last, my power that severed strap of yoke, rescued them from the tyrant's hand. Forgotten, the enemies that despoiled, the wild beasts that preyed on them; they will live sheltered from all alarms. Once more their renown shall burgeon;³ never again the land starve with drought, never the alien's taunts be heard. None shall doubt that I, the Lord their God, am at their side, and they are my own people, the race of Israel, the Lord God says. Flock of mine, the Lord God says, flock of my pasturing, you are but men,⁴ yet I, the Lord, am your God.

35 Word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, turn thy regard towards the hill-country of Seir, and prophesy its doom. This be thy message from the Lord God: Have at thee, Seir! My hand is raised to smite thee; desert thou shalt be and desolate; when I have pulled down thy cities and left thee in ruins, thou shalt know my power at last. Relentless foe, didst thou not cut off Israel's retreat in its most need, when doom closed round it? As I am a living God, the Lord says, to bloodshed I doom thee, bloodshed shall hunt thee down, the very bloodshed that liked thee so little.⁵ Desolate and desert mount Seir shall be, none come and go there, every crest of it piled high with the slain. Slain they shall fall, thy warriors, by hill-slope and valley and ravine, till thou art left solitary for all time, thy cities uninhabited; so thou shalt witness my power. Two nations and two countries (thy boast was), and both are mine;⁶ to me is left the enjoyment of them! forgetting that I, the Lord, dwell there. As I am a living God, the Lord says, the rankling grudge that embittered thee thou shalt feel to thy cost; by the doom I execute upon thee, Israel shall learn to know me better; and thou too shalt learn that I, the Lord, was listening, when thy arrogance claimed its deserted hill-country for thy prey. I was listening to all those defiant blasphemies of thine, and now, says the Lord God, let all the world rejoice as it will, thou shalt lie desolate. Ruined utterly they shall be, mount Seir and all Edom, that triumphed in the ruin of Israel; the Lord's power shall be made known at last.

¹ 'Keep . . . free from harm'; so the Septuagint Greek. The Hebrew text has 'destroy', probably through the miscopying of a single letter. ² The rest of the chapter, from this verse onwards, has a different setting and a different emphasis from what goes before; there may have been some omission or misplacement.

³ Literally, in the Hebrew text, 'I will raise up a planting for them for renown'. This is usually interpreted as implying a successful development of afforestation; the rendering given above perhaps makes the sentence less frigid. ⁴ Or possibly, 'you are men' (as opposed to dumb beasts). But in either case the contrast seems uncalled for, and there is some reason to doubt whether the text has been correctly preserved; the Septuagint Greek has simply, 'you are the sheep of my flock and I am your God'.

⁵ Literally, 'I have created thee (or appointed thee; in the Latin, I will hand thee over) to blood, and blood shall pursue thee; I swear that thou hast hated blood, and blood shall pursue thee'. The word 'blood' is not used in the Hebrew in the sense of 'kinship'; and it is not easy to see why the Edomites are rebuked for 'hating blood', unless possibly in the sense that they closed their frontiers at the time of Juda's defeat, to keep the war out of their own territory. But there is reason to suspect that the text is corrupt. ⁶ The 'two nations and two countries' are usually identified as Israel and Juda. But it may be questioned whether the reference is not to Israel (generally) and Edom; cf. Gen. 25. 23.

36 And now, son of man, to the mountains of Israel address thy prophecy, and give them my divine message, comforting them, in the name of the Lord God, for the taunts of the enemy, that think to claim possession of their ancient strongholds. Thus shall thy word of prophecy begin: Desolate you lie, the Lord God says, and overrun by the invader; aliens have the lordship of you, and your name is on men's lips, a byword of common talk. Yet here is word for you, mountains of Israel, from the Lord God; word from him for crag and hill, ravine and valley and barren upland, ruined wall and deserted city, empty now and a mockery to their neighbours! On Edom, on all the Gentiles that fell to and feasted on lands of mine, marked them down for pillage, my jealous love pronounces doom. A promise, then, from the Lord God to every mountain and hill, every upland and valley in the land of Israel! Till now, the Lord God says, you have been put to the blush before your neighbours, but now my love and my indignation can contain itself no more. My oath upon it, the Lord God says, these neighbours of yours shall be put to the blush in their turn.

But you, mountains of Israel, must burgeon anew, and grow fruit for my own people to enjoy; their home-coming is not far off now. Watch for me, I am coming back to you; soil of you shall be ploughed and sown anew; and men, too, shall thrive on it, Israel's full muster-roll, peopling the cities, restoring the ruins. Full tale you shall have of men and beasts that thrive and multiply; I will make you populous as of old, more than of old my blessings lavish, and you shall not doubt my power. Masters you shall have, and those masters my people of Israel, your rightful lords; never shall they want lands or you lords again. Till now, the Lord God says, men have called thee a land that starves folk and empties cradle;¹ henceforth, his will is that thou shouldst starve thy folk, bereave thy folk, no longer; scoff and taunt of heathen neighbours thou wilt have none to bear, he says, nor lack men to till thee henceforward.

This too: Son of man, how the race of Israel profaned this country of theirs, when they still dwelt in it, by their lives and their likings! Cast clouts of woman were less defiling. What marvel if my vengeance was let loose on them for all the blood that stained it; all the idols that polluted it? What marvel if I drove them out among the nations, scattered them wide as earth, as lives and likings of theirs had deserved? But alas, wherever they went among the heathen, they brought my holy name into ill repute; These are the Lord's people, folk said, and here they are, exiled from the land he loves! Should I let my holy name go unhonoured, among the heathen that harboured them?

Give Israel, then, this message from the Lord God: It is not for your own sakes, men of Israel, that I come forward as your champion; it is for the sake of my holy name, brought into disrepute among the Gentiles who have crossed your path. That great renown of mine I mean to vindicate, that is now dragged in the dust among the Gentiles, dragged in the dust because of you. The very Gentiles will recognize my power, the Lord God says, when I proclaim my majesty in their sight by delivering you.² I mean to set you free from the power of the Gentiles, bring you home again from every part of the earth. And then I will pour cleansing streams over you, to purge you from every stain you bear, purge you from the taint of your idolatry. I will give you a new heart, and breathe a new spirit into you; I will take away from your breasts those hearts that are hard as stone, and give you human hearts instead. I will make my spirit penetrate you, so that you will follow in the path of my law, remember and carry out my decrees. So shall you make your home in the land I promised to your fathers; you shall be my people, and I will be your God.

¹ Literally, 'Thou art a devourer of men, that bereavest (in the Latin, stiftest) thy population'. This was perhaps a proverbial saying about Palestine (Num. 13. 33). The suggestion here is probably that it was not fertile enough to support a large number of inhabitants. But the reference may be to the misfortunes of Israel in general. ² vv. 20-23. The suggestion is, not that the Israelites in exile brought disgrace on the true religion by their sinfulness, but that the heathen looked with contempt on a God who seemed unable to protect his votaries.

29 I will set you free from the guilt which stains you;¹ I will send my word to the harvest, and bid it come up abundantly,

30 from dearth spare you; yield of tree and crop of earth I will multiply, and the heathen shall taunt you no longer with

31 your starving lot. Well may you think with loathing of what you were, as your minds go back to false paths and crooked aims 32 you once followed! Be assured of it, the Lord God says, it was for no deserts of yours I delivered you; blush still, men of Israel, for your crimes, hang your heads still!

33 This too: A time is coming when I will set you free from the guilt which stains you; when I will people your cities, rebuild

34 your ruins; when the deserted land shall be tilled anew. Desolate the passers-by 35 saw it once; now they will say, Why, it is a very garden of Eden, the country-side which once lay all uncultivated; the empty

36 towns, all gone to rack and ruin, are walled and populous! And the heathen shall know, such heathen as are your neighbours

37 still, that I, the Lord, rebuild ruin and plant wilderness; what the Lord promises, the Lord fulfils. This boon, says the Lord 38 God, Israel shall yet have of me, as a flock thrives their manhood shall thrive. See how the victim-herd throngs the streets of Jerusalem on her feast-days! Yonder empty cities shall be thronged, too, but with men; the proof of my divine power.

37 . . . The Lord's power laid hold of me, and by the spirit of the Lord I was carried away and set down in the midst of the plain, which was covered with

2 bones.² Round the whole extent of them he took me, where they lay thick on the 3 plain, all of them parched quite dry. Son of man, he said, can life return to these bones? Lord God, said I, thou knowest.

4 Then he bade me utter a prophecy over the bones: Listen, dry bones, to the word of 5 the Lord. A message to these bones from the Lord: I mean to send my spirit into you, and restore you to life. Sinews shall be given you, flesh shall grow on you, and skin cover you; and I will give you breath to bring you to life again; will you doubt, then, the Lord's power?

So I prophesied as he had bidden me, and as I prophesied a sound came, and I felt a stirring, and the bones came together, each at its proper joint; under my eyes the sinews and the flesh clothed them, and the skin covered them, but there was no breath in them even now. Son of man, he said, prophesy now to the breath of life; give the breath of life itself this message from the Lord God: Come, breath of life, from the four winds, and breathe on these slain men to make them live. So I prophesied as he had bidden me, and the breath of life came into them, so that they lived again; and all rose to their feet, host upon host of them. Then he told me, Son of man, in these bones here thou seest the whole race of Israel. They are complaining that their very bones have withered away, that all hope is lost, they are dead men. It is for thee to prophesy, giving them this message from the Lord God: I mean to open your graves and revive you, my people; I mean to bring you home to the land of Israel. Will you doubt, then, the Lord's power, when I open your graves and revive you? When I breathe my spirit into you, to give you life again, and bid you dwell at peace in your own land? What the Lord promises, the Lord performs; you will know that, he tells you, at last.

And word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, take two pieces of wood, and write on one, For Judah, and the tribes of Israel that take part with him; on the other, that is the stick of Ephraim, write, For Joseph, and all the tribes of Israel that take part with him. Then join them together into the form of a single stick, so that they are united in thy hand. And when thy fellow-countrymen would have thee tell them what thou meanest by all this, give them this message from the Lord: Here is this stick of Joseph and his confederate tribes, with Ephraim at their head; I mean to join it with Judah's and make one stick of it; one stick now, and in my hand.³

¹ Literally, 'I will save you from your stains'; but in verse 33, 'I will cleanse you from your guilt'.
² We should expect to find the date or place of the vision specified, and some think there is an omission in the manuscripts. ³ The Latin version gives 'in his hand', but probably meaning 'the Lord's hand', and assuming a break in the quotation. The Septuagint Greek has 'in Judah's hand', that is, 'with Judah at their head'.

And while thou art still holding the inscribed sticks, there in the presence of thy fellow-countrymen, say this: A message from the Lord God! I mean to recall the sons of Israel from their exile among the Gentiles, gather them from every side and restore them to their home. And there, in the hill-country of Israel, I will make one nation of them, with one king over them all; no longer shall they be two nations under two crowns. No more shall they be contaminated with idol-worship, and foul rites, and forbidden things a many; I will deliver them from the lands¹ that were once the haunts of their sinning, and make them clean again; they shall be my people, and I will be their God. They shall have one king over them, a shepherd to tend them all, my servant David; my will they shall follow, my commands remember and obey. And their home shall be the home of your fathers, the land I gave to my servant Jacob; they and their children shall enjoy it, and their children's children, in perpetuity, and ever my servant David shall be their prince. My covenant shall pledge them prosperity, a covenant that shall never be revoked; I will make them . . .² and give them increase, and set up my sanctuary in their midst for ever. My tabernacle over them; they my people, and I their God; proof to all the world that I, the Lord, have set Israel apart, I that dwell apart in their midst for ever.

38 Word came to me from the Lord: Son of man, turn thy regard now towards Gog, Magog's country, that has the lordship of Mosoch and Thubal, and prophesy its doom.³ This be thy message to it from the Lord God: Have at thee, Gog, that hast the lordship of Mosoch and Thubal! Trust me, I will turn thee about this way and that, bridle those jaws of thine! I will bring thee out to battle, with all thy army; with horses and mailed cavalry, with a great company that ply spear and shield and sword. Persians shall be there, and Ethiopians, and Libyans, all with shield and helmet, Gomer with his hordes, the men of Thogorma from the northern fastnesses, mustered in full strength; what an array thou hast about thee! Now hold thyself in readiness, marshal thy own strength and the hordes that follow thee; thine is the leadership.

Long hence thy turn shall come; long years must pass before thou dost march on Israel; a land, now, recovered from its blood-letting; its hills, desolate till now, are re-peopled with exiles from many shores, come back to dwell there in security. Storm never rose so suddenly, cloud-wrack never darkened it so fearfully, as thou with that host of thine, those confederate hordes. What thoughts will be in thy heart that day, the Lord God says, what foul design will be a-brewing? Why, thou wilt think to march on a land unfortified, a people dwelling free from all alarms, that walls about them have none, bolt nor bar to shut them in; spoil for thy spoiling, plunder for thy plundering. Easily enough they are like to fall into thy hand, the ruins so lately rebuilt; the men restored from exile, that hold but the heart of the country,⁴ and are already enriched! Small wonder if the traders of Saba, Dedan and Tharsis, ravenous lions all, would know whether it is plunder thy heart is set on? Such a muster of men, it can but mean spoil; silver and gold to rife, stock and stuff to carry away, ay, there is spoil behind this, and spoil worth the taking!

¹ The word means 'dwelling-places' or 'places of assembly', and is used in 8. 3 above for an idol's pedestal. But probably those critics are right who think that, by a slight error of copying, our text gives us 'dwelling-places' instead of 'apostasies', which is the reading of the Septuagint Greek. ² Or perhaps, 'I will give them'; in either case, it seems as if there had been an omission in the manuscripts. The Latin version renders, but inexactly, 'I will found them'. ³ If our text, in this verse and the verse which follows, has been correctly preserved, we are here meant to think of Gog as a people, not as a person; if any individual is mentioned, it is Magog. Mosoch and Thubal appear to be the Moschi and Tibareni, from the southern shores of the Black Sea; a general descent of barbarians is clearly envisaged, comparable to the Scythian invasions of B.C. 630. But the nations mentioned in verse 4 suggest that the picture is one of allegory, rather than of history, and the identifications of 'Gog' with the Persian emperor Cambyses or with Antiochus Epiphanes are probably misplaced ingenuity. What is meant by the 'prince-head' or 'prince of the head' is not clear; the expression is not elsewhere found, and it is perhaps worth observing that it might easily be a false reading in the Hebrew for 'one who lifts the head' (i.e. restores the fallen fortunes) of a man or a community (Gen. 40. 13, IV Kg. 25. 27, Zach. 1. 21). Thubal and Mosoch are undergoing a kind of resurrection, cf. 32. 26 above. ⁴ Literally, 'that are inhabitants of the navel of the land (or, earth)'. For the phrase, cf. Jg. 9. 37; the suggestion seems to be that the newly-returned people is too small in numbers to occupy more than the central portion of its territory. There is no reason to think that Jerusalem is here being described as the centre of the habitable globe, although 5. 5 above would help to justify such language.

- 14 Prophecy, then, son of man, and make known to Gog this divine message: None better ware of it than thou, when my people of Israel is living at peace, free from 15 alarms! Then it is thou wilt come down from those northern fastnesses, with thy hordes about thee, thy troops of cavalry, 16 a great muster, an army irresistible, sweeping down on my people of Israel like a cloud that overshadows the land. Offspring of that later age, thou shalt march on yonder land of mine, so that in Gog's doom my power may be vindicated, and 17 the heathen may learn what I am. Long years ago, the Lord God says, there were servants of mine that foresaw my will concerning thee, and even then warned Israel, in my name, of thy coming.

- 18 When Gog marches against Israel, the Lord God says, my indignation will contain itself no longer; jealous love and fierce 19 anger of mine, I swear it, shall throw all the land of Israel into commotion. Fish in sea, bird in air, beast on earth and all the creeping things of earth shall tremble at my presence, and the world of men, too, 20 shall tremble; mountains be overthrown, defences totter, walls come toppling to the ground. All through this hill-country of mine my word shall run, The sword! And 21 with that, the Lord says, friend shall turn his sword against friend; ordeal they shall have of pestilence and of blood-letting, of 22 lashing storm and great hail-stones; fire and brimstone I will rain down upon them, all that great army and the hordes that 23 follow with it. My greatness, my holiness, shall then be displayed for a world of nations to see, and they will recognize my power at last.

- 39 Prophecy, then, son of man, the doom of Gog; be this the divine message thou givest him: Have at thee, Gog, that hast the lordship of Mosoch and 2 Thubal! This way and that I will turn thee, whistle thee on and bid thee leave thy northern fastnesses, to march against the 3 hill-country of Israel; then I will strike yonder bow from thy left hand, spill the 4 arrows from thy right! Host and horde of thine shall fall with thee on the mountains of Israel, carrion for every bird in air, every beast on earth; cast away on the bare ground thou shalt lie, such is my doom for thee, the Lord God says. Such a fire I will light as shall reach Magog, and others besides, island-dwellers far away that have no thought of peril; they too shall know my power. Among my own people of Israel my renown shall spread, and never more shall my holy name be dragged in the dust; the heathen shall know what manner of God it is that dwells apart in Israel.

When all is over and done, and my day of doom past, the townsfolk of Israel will come out to gather kindling-wood and firewood out of the spoils that were left; shield and spear, bow and arrow, staff and pole; and they will be seven years a-burning. All that time, faggots will strew the country-side ungathered, and never axe will be laid to forest tree; weapons of war shall be all their fuel, spoil of the spoiler, plunder of the plunderer, the Lord God says. Then, too, Gog shall have a burying-place named after him, there in Israel, none other than the Valley of the Wayfarers, east of the Dead Sea; a thing of wonder to all that pass by. There they shall bury Gog with all the rabble that came after him, and Valley of Gog's Rabble the place shall be called. Seven months' work Israel shall have burying them, and cleansing the land from its defilement; all the citizens shall take part in it, and shall commemorate that day as the day on which I was vindicated, says the Lord God. Even when the seven months are over, some there will be whose office it is to search ever the country-side, finding those remains and burying them, to rid the land of defilement; still they will be scouring those plains, and setting up a mark where they see men's bones lie, for the grave-diggers to bury them, there in the Valley of Gog's Rabble; from this the city of Amona, Rabble, shall take its name. And so the land shall be cleansed.

This too: Son of man, here is a message for every bird in air, every beast that roams the earth: Come all, come with haste, gather from every side for the sacrificial feast I am making for you, a great feast on the uplands of Israel, flesh to eat, blood for your drinking! Flesh of fighting men, blood of the world's great ones; never was ram or lamb, never was goat or bull, food 19 so rich or so dainty! Glutted with fat, drunk you shall be with blood, at this feast 20 of mine; horse and brave rider, warriors of high rank and low, are the cheer they shall have at my table, says the Lord God.

21 In glory I will reveal myself to the Gentiles; the doom I have executed, the power 22 I have exerted, shall be for all to see; nor shall Israel doubt thenceforward that I, the 23 Lord, am their God. All the world shall know why it was that Israel went into banishment, why I turned my back on them and gave them up to massacre; that it was because they wronged me and de-24 serted me; that it was foul crime of theirs bade me disown them. I mean to restore 25 Jacob from exile, the Lord God says, and extend my mercy to the whole race of Israel; the honour of my name demands it.
 26 The disgrace, the punishment of all their guilt, they needs must bear. . . .¹

27 . . . when they are dwelling safely in their own land, free from all alarms; when I have brought them back from banishment among strangers, in hostile countries, and so, before the whole world's eyes, re-28 trieved my honour. They shall know at last that I, the Lord, am their God: if it was I that drove them into captivity, it was I, too, that restored them to their home, 29 not a man of them left in exile. And I will turn away from them no longer, I, that have poured out my spirit on the whole race of Israel.

40 It was the tenth day of the month;
 the twenty-fifth year of our banishment, and the fourteenth since the fall of the city, was just beginning. This was the precise day upon which the Lord's power came over me, and I fell into a 2 transport; in which transport, so the divine revelation would have it, I was carried off to the country of Israel. There, I found myself on the top of a very high mountain, that seemed to have a city built on it, sloping away towards the south. Into this 3 city I was taken, and there met a man whose look dazzled the eye like bronze; he stood there in the gateway, holding a flaxen cord and a measuring-rod. The open eye, 4 son of man, said he, the open ear, and mark well all I shew thee! Thou wast brought here to see, and tell the men of Israel what thou seest.²

There was an outer wall that ran round 5 the whole building, which he measured with his rod, that was six cubits and a palm³ in length; a rod's thickness there was in the wall, and a rod's height; when 6 he came to the gate at the eastern approach and had mounted the stairs of it, the entrance-way was spanned by a single rod;
 each entrance was of a rod's thickness.
 Within were guard-chambers, six cubits 7 square and five cubits apart; then came an inner gateway, a rod's length deep; then 8 an inner entrance-hall, measuring eight cubits across, with pillars two cubits thick.
 9 This eastern gateway had three guard-chambers on each side, alike in size, and alike in size the pillars between them. The 10 entrance of the gateway was ten cubits across, and the span of the gateway itself thirteen cubits; on either side the six-cubit 12 guard-chamber was set a cubit back. From 13 gable-window of guard-room to gable-window of guard-room opposite was 14 twenty-five cubits.⁴ (And he made the whole length of the colonnade sixty cubits, but this was measuring right up to the pillars which stood out round the gateway);⁵ the distance from the outer gate to 15 the inner was fifty cubits. . . . and slanting 16 windows in the guard-chambers and in the thickness of the walls that separated them, all round the gateway; the hall, too, within had its windows all round, and there was a pattern of palm-trees on the pillars between them.

¹ If the text has been correctly transmitted, it seems clear that some words (perhaps not many) have dropped out. But it has been suggested that the word 'they must bear' might be a scribe's error for 'they shall forget'.

² All through this chapter, the descriptions are very obscure, and their interpretation is largely a matter of conjecture. ³ The extra palm gives rise to some difficulty, unless it was a mere handle to hold the rod by. As a measure, the rod was equivalent to six cubits only (verses 7 and 12). The Hebrew text probably means that each cubit was the length of a forearm and a palm (cf. 43. 13 below).

⁴ Literally, 'And he measured the gate from roof of guard-chamber to roof of guard-chamber, a width of twenty-five cubits, door against door (or, opening against opening)'. ⁵ The rendering given above seems preferable to one which would suddenly introduce us to pillars sixty cubits high. But it does not look as if the text had been correctly preserved; we have been told nothing of these projecting columns, and there is no reason to think that the Hebrews used the expression 'he made' in our modern sense. It seems as if there must be a gap in the manuscripts at the end of verse 15.

17 So he led me into the outer courtyard, which was surrounded by parlours, that had the ground about them paved with stone; there were thirty parlours standing in this strip of pavement. It stretched up to the gateways, and was broad as they were long; like them, it was on the level of the ground. And now he measured the distance from the eastern gate to the inner courtyard, where they stood fronting one another; it was a hundred cubits.¹

20 As with the east, so with the north; length and breadth he must measure of the outer gate that looked northwards. This, too, was fifty cubits long and twenty-five broad; it had guard-chambers, three on each side, pillar and hall like the other. Hall and windows and palm-tree pattern differed nothing from those of the eastern gate; all was the same, from the seven steps of the approach to the hall within. As on the east, so on the north, the inner court had a gateway matching it, a hundred cubits distant. And next he took me to the south, where there was a fresh gate, which he measured, pillar of it and hall of it, as before; the same windows about the hall, the same length and breadth;² the seven steps, the hall at the further end, the pillars with a palm-tree patterned on either side. Here, too, a hundred cubits away, was a gateway on the south side of the inner courtyard.

28 It was through this southern gateway of it that he led me into the inner courtyard itself; a gateway with the same measurements as before, guard-chamber and pillar and hall. It had the same windows and window-pillars, the same length and breadth, and the porch round it was twenty-five cubits long, five cubits broad.³ The pillars had the same pattern, but this time the hall was on the outer side of the gateway, and there were eight steps instead of seven. Then he took me to the east side of the inner court, with the same measurements, guard-chamber and pillar and hall, window and window-pillar, length and breadth; the pillared hall again facing the outer court, the steps eight in number. And next to the northern gate, with the same measurements still, guard-chamber and pillar and hall and windows and length and breadth; the pillared hall facing outwards, the eight steps.

... and each ante-chamber had a door, between pillars. This was where they washed the victims for burnt-sacrifice; and in the hall of the entrance-way there were two tables on each side, for the slaying of the victims, whether it were a burnt-sacrifice, or some offering for a fault or for a wrong done. On the outer side of the gateway, towards the north gate, and again on the opposite side, there were two more tables, close to the hall. Thus altogether there were eight tables ranged along the side of the entrance-way, all for sacrifice. And for the burnt-sacrifice there were four other tables of hewn stone, a cubit and a half square, and a cubit in height; here they laid the instruments needed for sacrifice and offering; they had ledges, too, curving upwards all round, a palm in breadth, for these tables must also hold the flesh of the victims.

In the inner court itself, beyond the gateway, the singers had their lodging, on the north side, facing south. There was a parlour, too, at the side of the eastern gate, facing... north;⁴ the one facing south, he told me, was for the priests who kept watch over the temple, the one facing north for the priests who are busied with the service of the altar, Sadocite Levites, that were the Lord's privileged ministers. The court, with the altar standing in it, was a hundred cubits square.

Then he led me to the porch of the temple; the jamb on either side was five cubits deep, and the width of the gate... three cubits on either side;⁵ the porch

¹ 'The eastern gate'; this description is given for the sake of clearness; in the original it is 'the lower gate', because (as the foregoing verse has explained) the whole outer court was lower (by eight steps) than the inner court. At the end of this verse, the original has 'eastwards and northwards'; the only possible rendering of the words appears to be that given at the beginning of the new paragraph.

² This verse is very difficult. The word 'porch' is the same as that elsewhere rendered 'hall'; but the hall or lobby of each gate was not of the measurements here stated; a portico jutting out from the building seems the only explanation of the text as it stands.

³ Here, and in verses 29, 33 and 36, the Hebrew forms have been recast for the sake of brevity.

⁴ 'Facing... north'; the context seems to imply an omission. The prophet must surely have written, 'facing south, and a corresponding parlour facing north'.

⁵ According to the Septuagint Greek, we should read 'the width of the gate fourteen cubits, leaving a blank piece of wall on either side, three cubits in width'.

itself was twenty cubits long and eleven broad. As we climbed up the eight steps to it, there were columns facing us, one on either side.

41 So he brought me into the temple, between pillars that were six cubits square by tabernacle measure.¹ The door was ten cubits across, the recess behind the doorway five cubits on either side; the whole length of the outer temple was forty cubits, and the width twenty. Then he went into the inner sanctuary, measuring the doorway, two cubits thick, the door, six cubits across, and the width of the recess behind the doorway, seven cubits.
 Each side had the length of the side next to the outer temple, twenty cubits. This, said he, is the innermost sanctuary.
 Then he measured the temple wall, which was six cubits thick; it was flanked all round by rooms four cubits square.
 There were sixty of these rooms, in three storeys one on the top of another; and their upper storeys jutted out all round the temple wall, but keeping apart from it; the temple wall must not be touched. And there was a round stair-case which went up in a spiral to this upper loft of the temple building, which projected outwards for that very reason; there was thus an easy passage from the lower to the middle, and from the middle to the upper storey.² The building, I saw, was all raised above the ground; the rod shewed that the ground level of the rooms was six cubits up. The rooms were at a distance of five cubits beyond the temple wall, and they enclosed it all round;³ and there was a close of twenty cubits' width between these and a line of parlours which flanked the temple.
 The doors of the inner rooms let out, to north and south, on a praying-walk,⁴ five cubits in width, which ran round the temple.

Round this again was the close of twenty cubits, and beyond that, on the west, a pavilion seventy cubits by ninety, with a wall five cubits thick. He shewed me that the temple was a hundred cubits long; the close with the pavilion beyond it, including its walls, a hundred cubits long; the eastern face of the temple, with the close on each side of it, a hundred cubits long;
 and the breadth from side to side of the pavilion beyond the close (with its galleries) a hundred cubits long. . . .⁵

. . . and the inner sanctuary, and the halls that gave on to the courtyard, the doorways, the slanting windows, the galleries that went round on three sides, over the several doorways; all were completely panelled in wood. The panelling ran right up to the windows, which it framed, right up to the top level of the doorway; ran all the way round to meet the inner sanctuary, keeping the same height within and without it. The design was of alternate cherubs and palm-trees, and each cherub had two faces, shewing like a man towards one palm-tree and like a young lion towards the other; the same pattern ran all through the building, carved cherubs and palm-trees on each wall from ground level to the height of the door's lintel.

The entrance of the temple stood square, facing the inner sanctuary; facing the altar, which was of wood, three feet high, and two feet across; corners and slab and sides were all of wood. This, he told me, is the table that stands in the Lord's presence.⁶ Outer temple, inner sanctuary, had two doors each; and either door had leaves that folded together, two leaves on each door, with the same pattern of cherubs and palm-trees that the walls had.

¹ This whole chapter is even more obscure than the last, and it is difficult to believe there have not been omissions, if not faults of copying, in the text. ² vv. 6, 7. Cf. III Kg. 6. 5, 6; here, as there, it seems clear that the rooms at the side must have no architectural connexion with the sacred walls of the temple itself; beyond that, nothing is clear. The rendering above assumes the accuracy of the Latin version; it differs widely both from the Hebrew text and from the Septuagint Greek, which are unintelligible. It is not easy to see why projecting upper storeys should have matched especially well with a spiral stair-case. According to the Hebrew text, there were three storeys of thirty rooms each; the Latin version may imply three storeys of twenty rooms, or two storeys of thirty-three rooms each.

³ The Hebrew text seems to imply that there was a five-foot wall outside the rooms all round, as well as a six-foot wall inside. But it is not likely that so many rooms should have been made receiving no light whatever. ⁴ In the Hebrew text simply 'an open strip of ground'. This seems to have been a narrow strip at the edge of the raised platform; the twenty-foot close was on ground level. ⁵ It looks as if there must have been an omission here, to account for the sudden change of subject. 'With its galleries' is difficult to explain; we should have expected 'including its walls'. ⁶ This was presumably the altar of incense; some, however, identify it with the table on which the sacred loaves were exposed (Ex. 25. 23, 30. 1).

To match this, the outer porch was faced 26 with thick beams¹ reaching up to the level of the slanting windows; thick beams figured with palm-trees in either recess. . .
 matching the width of the rooms and of the temple walls.

42 Then he took me into the outer court again, the northern part of it, and would have me enter the parlours that lay there, close to the pavilion and to 2 the northern side of the temple.² The long side of them, facing the north door, was a 3 hundred cubits, the breadth fifty; between the twenty-cubit close of the inner court, and the paving of the outer, they rose,
 gallery upon gallery, three storeys in all.
 4 In front of them was a walk ten cubits wide, encroaching on the inner court by one cubit;³ all their doors faced the north.
 5 Here, the top rooms were narrower, since they must make room for porticos at the side, built out over the two lower storeys; 6 these three-storeyed parlours had no columns in front of them, like the parlours in the outer court,⁴ but made up for it by porticos that rose from the roof of the first two floors, filling in the width of the fifty 7 cubits. Inner parlours faced outer only 8 with fifty cubits of their wall's length; in the outer court, the parlours were but fifty cubits long, whereas those beside the 9 temple were a hundred. These inner parlours were entered from below at their 10 eastern end, from the outer court. . . in the thickness of the court's eastern wall. . .
 opposite the pavilion, and here too there were parlours close to the pavilion.⁵ 11 Southern parlours, like northern, had a walk in front of them; had the same length and breadth, were entered by doors of the 12 same kind; the doors of these parlours opened on a walk along their southern side, and the main entrance was approached at the eastern end, from the walk that faced the hall and the close.

13 These parlours, he told me, built to north and south beside the pavilion, are hallowed precincts, where the priests who sacrifice to the Lord may eat what is set apart for holy uses. All that is set apart, all the offerings made for fault and for wrong done, shall there be laid out, as on holy ground. Nor, entering it, shall the priests leave it for the inner court all at once; here they must lay aside their vestments, for these, too, are hallowed, and put on other clothes before ever they mingle with the people.

With that, he made an end of measuring the precincts within, and led me through the eastern doorway, to measure them from without. Along the eastern side his reed measured five hundred cubits; five hundred cubits along the northern side, and five hundred cubits along the southern;
 westwards, too, the measure of it was five hundred cubits. All round the four quarters of the wind he would measure it, five hundred cubits in length as in breadth, this boundary between things sacred and things profane.

43 Then he took me to the eastern gate; and all at once, from the sun's rising, the bright presence of the God of Israel made entry there. Like the sound of waters in deep flood his voice was, and earth was lit up with the splen-dour all around. Such was the appearance I had seen of him, when he came bent on the city's destruction, when I saw my vision by the banks of Chobar; down fell I, face to earth. In it came through the eastern gateway, the splendour of the Lord himself; and with that, a transport seized me, carrying me off into the inner court, where already the brightness of the Lord's presence filled the temple. Thence it was I heard his voice speaking to me; and the man who stood at my side passed on the message.

Son of man, he told me, here is my throne; here eternally, in the heart of

¹ The Hebrew word translated 'thick beams' is of very doubtful significance. The last words of the chapter are difficult to understand, whether in the Hebrew, in the Greek, or in the Latin; if the text of them is right, it looks as if there had been a fresh omission.

² vs. 1-12. Once more the original is very obscure, and the interpretation of it far from certain.

³ Literally, 'looking towards the inwards of a way of one cubit', an expression from which it is hard to derive any definite meaning. The Septuagint

Greek has, 'of a hundred cubits in length', but this is probably a guess.

⁴ The outer parlours are those mentioned in 40. 17; where, however, perhaps through some omission in the manuscripts, there is no mention of a colonnade.

⁵ It can hardly be doubted that there is some serious disturbance in the text. At the end of the verse, it is clear that the prophet and his guide have gone to measure the southern parlours, corresponding to the northern parlours already described.

Israel, is my resting-place. No more shall Israel's folk, Israel's kings, drag my name in the dust with their infidelities, with the dead gods they served, with their hill-sanctuaries.¹ Door next to door of mine, pillar to pillar, only a wall between us; and for the foul doings that dragged my name in the dust, my vengeance took full toll of them.² Bid they those infidelities, those dead gods farewell, I will make my eternal home here in the midst of them. Thine, son of man, to shame the men of Israel by the sight of yonder temple; who measures the fabric of it, shall learn to blush for his misdeeds. Form and fashion of the temple, gates that lead in and out, all the plot of it do thou make known to them; and what observances they are that govern the ordering of it. All this they must see in writing, and so learn to keep its pattern ever unaltered, its laws ever to fulfil.

2 Wouldst thou know what the temple's charter is? No part of the mountain top that lies within its bounds but is my inmost sanctuary; that, nothing less, is the charter of the temple.

3 These measurements the altar had,³ measured by the true cubit, that is the width of a fore-arm and a palm; first came a gutter, of a cubit's depth and a cubit's width, ending in a lip a span broad all round; thus the altar was drained. Above this gutter, which was at ground level, came the lower base, two cubits high and a cubit across; the upper base rose four cubits above it, and was again a cubit wide. The altar proper was four cubits high, with four horns projecting above it, and the sides of it were square, twelve cubits by twelve. The base was also square, fourteen cubits by fourteen, and had a projecting rim half a cubit across; the groove under this was a cubit in height. The steps of the altar faced eastwards. . .

8 Son of man, he told me, when the altar is set up, ready for burnt-sacrifice and for blood-sprinkling, these ceremonies the Lord God would have thee observe. A young bullock the priests must have, those priests of Sadoc's line that are my true ministers, for a transgression-victim. Horns of the altar, and the four corners of its base, and the rim round about it, thou shalt smear with the victim's blood, to cleanse them and purge them of fault, then take the victim itself to a place apart, beyond the temple precincts, and there burn it. Next day, the transgression-victim shall be a male kid, without blemish; with this, as with the calf, the altar must be purged; and when the purging is over, bullock and ram must be offered, these too without blemish; when they have been brought into the Lord's presence, and the priests have sprinkled them with salt, they must be given to the Lord in burnt-sacrifice. Each day, for seven days, goat and bullock and ram must be offered, all unblemished; purged and cleansed and hallowed the altar must be for seven days, and when these are over, on the eighth day and ever afterwards, the priests may use it for burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offering of yours, and I will look favourably on you, the Lord God says.

44 Then he brought me back to the eastern gate of the outer precincts, that was fast shut. Shut this gate must ever be, the Lord told me, nor open its doors to give man entrance again, since the Lord, the God of Israel, entered by it. Access to it is none, even for the prince himself; sit there he may, to eat his share of the welcome-offering, but it is through the hall at the other end of the gateway he comes and goes.

And so he took me towards the northern gate, in full view of the temple; and all the temple was filled with the brightness of the

¹ Literally, 'with their fornications, with the ruins of their kings, and with their hill-sanctuaries'. St Jerome understands this as meaning that worship at the hill-sanctuaries brought the kings of Juda to their ruin. But the word used in the Hebrew text means carcasses, not ruins; 'with the carcasses of their kings, their hill-sanctuaries', or possibly, 'with the carcasses of their kings when they died'. It has been supposed that Ezechiel is protesting against the burial of kings close to the temple, as a profanation. But no such protest is found elsewhere, and we have no evidence that the practice existed. The rendering given above assumes that 'kings' is used for 'gods', as (apparently) in Am. 5. 26. 'Dead gods', either in the sense of 'dumb idols', as in Lev. 26. 30, or possibly in reference to the worship of Adonis (see 8. 14 above). But it seems likely that the manuscripts may have been at fault, some copyist writing the word 'their kings' twice over by accident. ² The prophet is complaining, not that the royal palace adjoined the temple, but that profane rites were celebrated just beyond its walls; see 8. 8 above. ³ ibid. 13-17. It seems possible that this passage has been accidentally misplaced. The terms used in it are of very doubtful interpretation.

Lord's presence, a sight that brought me 5 to my knees, face to earth. Give good heed, son of man, the Lord said to me; the open eye, the open ear! Rule and observance of the Lord's house I mean to tell thee:
 of the temple, and who may approach it,
 of my sanctuary, and the manner of leaving it.

6 This message deliver, from the Lord God, to the rebel brood of Israel: Will you never have done with insult, men of Israel, 7 letting alien folk, that in mind and body circumcision have none, profane my house by entering the sanctuary? What avails it, 8 to offer me bread, and fat, and blood, when all the while these foul doings of yours violate my covenant? The sacred charge committed to you went for nothing; guard-9 ians of my own worship, in my own sanctuary, should be men of your choosing!
 Place the alien may have, though body and 10 mind be both uncircumcised, in the commonwealth of Israel, the Lord says; place in my sanctuary he has none. There be Levites that have forsaken the following of me, when all the race of Israel went a-straying; that have betaken themselves 11 to false gods, and must needs do penance for their fault. What forbids they should be sacrists and door-keepers of mine, temple attendants to prepare burnt-12 sacrifice, slay victim, and stand ministering in the people's presence? Ministers of false worship, that betrayed Israel into guilt, they have made me their sworn enemy, and must be held to account for it; 13 never may they come before me as priests, never touch consecrated gift that is set apart for holy uses; disgraced they must 14 needs be, penance must needs bear; yet I would have them keep the doors of my house, and be charged with all the menial offices that belong to it.

15 The priests, the true Levites, shall be those sons of Sadoc that held fast by my temple worship when Israel left the following of me. Theirs to come forward as my ministers; theirs to wait upon my pre-16 sence, offering me fat and blood of victims, the Lord God says; theirs my sanctuary to enter, my table to approach, servants of mine that shall keep the charge I gave 17 them. Come they within the inner gate, they shall be all vested in linen; nothing of wool shall clothe them, when they serve me in the intimacy of the inner court; mitres of linen on their brows, breeches of 18 linen about their loins, with no such habit-ing as may bring them out in a sweat.

 These vestments of office they must lay 19 aside, and put away in the temple sacristy, when they go out to mingle with the people in the outer court; that holy contact is not for common folk; it is time they put on their workaday clothes instead.

They shall be at pains to cut their hair, 20 not grow it long; yet cropped their heads must not be. As for wine, a priest may not 21 drink it when he is soon to enter the sanctuary. Wed he, it must be a maid he weds, 22 of Israelite birth; not rejected wife or widow, save it be the widow of another priest. Their office it is, to teach the people 23 what is clean and unclean, what is holy and what profane; when dispute arises, to take 24 their place at my judgement-seat and give award; my feasts with due rite and ordinance to observe, my sabbaths to keep holy. Never shall they defile themselves 25 with dead body's contact, save only it be father or mother, son or daughter, brother or unwedded sister of theirs. Cleansed 26 though he be after such contact, a priest must wait for seven days yet, nor enter the 27 inner court to do service in my sanctuary, the Lord God says, till he has made an offering in amends for his fault. And for 28 the priestly tribe, it must have no patri-mony assigned to it; I am their patri-mony, nor needs he portion, whose portion is his God. Bloodless offering they shall 29 eat, and the victim that is offered for a fault or a wrong done; theirs every gift an Is-30 raelite vows to me, theirs the first of all first-fruits, and the residue of all you offer;
 and the first batch of your baking you must give to the priest, to win his blessing for you and yours. Bird or beast that drops 31 dead, or has been a wild thing's prey, the priest may not eat.

45 When you set about the allotment of your territory, one strip you must leave out, twenty-five thousand cubits by ten thousand,¹ a hallowed strip of

¹ 'Cubits'; the word is not expressed in the original, and some think that all through this paragraph, except in the last clause of verse 2, the unit of measurement is not the cubit but the angel's rod, six cubits long. But since we know that the temple precincts were five hundred cubits each way (42. 20) and they land that is to be the Lord's peculiar, all the length and breadth of it hallowed. (Hallowed entirely one plot in it shall be, a square plot of five hundred cubits each way, with fifty cubits' space for approach all about it.¹) Within the Lord's domain, a space of twenty-five thousand cubits by ten thousand, surrounding temple and sanctuary, must be measured out as dedicated to the priests, that serve the sanctuary and worship in the Lord's presence; this shall be their home, this their sacred enclosure. And for the Levites that serve the temple another like space is to be measured out; twenty cells they shall have there. Marching with the sacred enclosure, there shall be a strip of twenty-five thousand cubits by five thousand, where the common folk of Israel shall have their city and their city's lands. And at either end of the enclosure, and of the city lands, the prince shall have his domains, adjoining either end, and stretching away to west and east as far as each of the tribal allotments stretches westwards and eastwards. He shall enjoy his own possessions on Israelite soil; there shall be no more encroaching on the public rights; each tribe shall be given its own territory, to have and to hold.

Will you never have enough, princes of Israel? the Lord God says. Must it always be wrong and robbery, never right and redress? Right of king and right of people he bids you determine once for all. Let us have true scales, a true ephi, a true bate; let ephi and bate match, a tenth part of a cor either of them; by the standard of the cor they shall be measured. Let twenty obols go to the sicle, twice twenty sicles and fifteen besides go to the mina. And so let these be the tithings you pay; a sixth of an ephi for every cor of wheat or barley, and a tenth of a bate for every cor of oil, tenth of bate or hundredth of cor, since the cor is to measure ten bates;² and one ram you must contribute out of every two hundred that feed in Israel's pasture-lands. That each may pay his scot, for bloodless offering or burnt-sacrifice or welcome-offering, the Lord says, this tax the whole land of Israel owes to its prince. And he, on Israel's behalf, shall defray the cost of burnt-sacrifice, and bloodless offering, and libation, on feast-day and new moon and sabbath, whenever the folk of Israel keep holiday; transgression-victim, and burnt-sacrifice, and welcome-offering, he must provide them all.

On the first day of the year, the Lord God says, the sanctuary must have a calf, without blemish, sacrificed for its purging. Door-posts of the temple, corners of the altar's base, door-posts of the inner court, the priest shall smear with blood of the transgression-victim. And the like must be done again on the seventh day of that month, for faults committed unwittingly, through inadvertence; and so the temple shall be purged clean. On the fourteenth day of the first month you will keep the paschal feast, and for a week eat bread without leaven. On the feast itself, the prince must provide a calf, in amends for fault of his own, fault of his people; and every day during the week seven calves and seven rams without blemish; every day, too, a goat for a transgression-victim; with each ram or goat a bushel of flour, and with each bushel of flour a gallon and a half of oil. The same provision he must make, of transgression-victim, burnt-sacrifice, bloodless offering, and oil, for the fifteenth day of the seventh month, and its week of holiday.

46 Eastern gate of the inner court, the Lord God says, must be shut on the six working days, open on the sabbath; on the day of the new moon, too, it shall be opened. When it is opened, the prince shall come in by way of the outer hall, and wait in the entrance till the priests have done presenting burnt-sacrifice of his, welcome-offering of his; there on the threshold he shall do reverence, and go his ways, but the gate shall not be shut after him, not till the evening. On sabbath days, and when the moon is new, before this gate the people also shall do reverence. Six lambs are described as 'five hundred each way' in verse 2 here, it seems best to assume the cubit-standard throughout. 'By ten thousand'; the Septuagint Greek gives twenty thousand, which would include the enclosure of the Levites (verse 5).

¹ Some think this verse has been misplaced, and should come after verse 4. ² The Hebrew text has probably suffered from corruption in this verse; the Septuagint Greek gives ten per cent, not one per cent, as the rate of the oil-tithe. The Latin does not yield any acceptable sense.

and a ram, without blemish, are the prince's burnt-sacrifice to the Lord every sabbath, with a bushel of flour for the ram, and for the lambs what bloodless offering he will; and of oil a gallon and a half to the bushel. And when the moon is new, the same victims, and a bullock besides, unblemished as they; with the bullock, too, a bushel goes as bloodless offering, and the rest shall be as before. Through the outer hall of the gateway the prince comes and goes; but on feast-days, when a great throng comes into the Lord's presence, they must enter by one gate and leave by the opposite, from north to south or south to north, and the prince, that worships in their midst, shall enter and leave as they.

And for the bloodless offering, come feast-day, come holiday, it shall be made as aforesaid. Will the prince make burnt-sacrifice or welcome-offering of his own free will, the eastern gate shall be opened for him, as on the sabbath, till burnt-sacrifice or welcome-offering is done; but when he goes out, the gate shall be shut behind him. And there shall be daily burnt-sacrifice; morning by morning he shall offer one of that year's lambs, unblemished; of flour, morning by morning, the sixth part of a bushel, and half a gallon of oil mingled with it; ever this bloodless offering is the Lord's due, continual and unalterable. Lamb and flour and oil, morning by morning, an eternal sacrifice.

If the prince will make a gift of land to sons of his, the Lord God says, their patrimony it is, held by right of inheritance; crown lands he cannot alienate to any of his servants beyond the year of jubilee, when they must needs return to him; the crown lands are entailed upon his sons.

And at no time shall he rob the people by violence of their rightful patrimony; if he will endow his sons, out of his own patrimony let him do it; my people must not be disinherited.

And now he took me through an entry close by the side of the gate, which led to the northern row of priests' rooms round the sanctuary. Where this reached its western end, there was a kitchen, which the priests used, he told me, to boil the flesh of victims for a fault or a wrong done, to bake the bloodless offering. They must not be carried out into the courtyard; such holy contact was not for the people. Afterwards he took me into the outer court, round all the corners of it in turn, and shewed me that there was a little garth in each of them; no corner but had its garth; in each, there was a space of forty cubits by thirty, perfectly matched. The wall enclosed them, and here, under an open roof, kitchens were built. These kitchens, he told me, were used by the temple attendants for cooking the welcome-offerings made by the people.

47 And last, he took me to the door of the temple itself, and shewed me where a stream of water flowed eastwards from beneath the threshold of it. Eastward the temple looked, and eastward these waters flowed, somewhat to the temple's right, so as to pass by the southern side of the altar. Through the northern gate he led me, and round the walk that passed the outer gate, taking the eastern sun; and here, to the right of the gate, the water gushed out. Eastward then he faced, the man of the measuring-rod; measured a thousand cubits, and led me across a stream that reached my ankles. Another thousand, and when I crossed the stream it reached my knees; another thousand, and it was up to my waist, another thousand, and now it had become a torrent I might not cross any longer, so high the waters had swelled, out of my depth. Mark it well, son of man, said he; and with that he brought me out on to the bank again; when I reached it, I found that there were trees growing thick on either hand.

This stream, he told me, must flow eastward to the sand-dunes, and so fall into the desert; pass into the Dead Sea and beyond it, cleansing those waters by its passage. Wherever it flows, there shall be teeming life once again; in the Dead Sea itself there will be shoals of fish, once this stream has reached it, this stream that heals all things and makes all things live. Fisher-folk will line the shores of it, and there will be drying of nets all the way from Engaddi to Engallim, and fish there will be in great shoals, varied in kind as the ocean fish are. Only the swamps and marshes about it there is no cleansing; these shall turn into 12 salt-pits. And on either bank of the stream fruit-trees shall grow of every kind; never leaf lost, never fruit cast; month after month they shall yield a fresh crop, watered by that sanctuary stream; fruit for man's eating, and medicinal leaves.

13 This message, too, the Lord God has for you, about the frontiers of the territory you are to divide among the twelve tribes; twelve, because Joseph must have a double 4 portion. I promised it to your fathers long ago; This land, I told them, shall be allotted to you.¹ And you must allot it among 5 yourselves in equal shares. These are to be its boundaries on the north; from Hethalon, on the Great Sea, across the pass which 6 leads to Sedada and Emath, by Berotha and Sabarim (where Emath marches with Syria) and Hazar Tichon (near the Hauran country) to the Syrian frontier-town of 7 Hazar Enan, its extreme limit inland. Ever northward it stretches, this northern frontier of yours, till it reaches Emath. The 8 eastern frontier is to be drawn between Hauran and what is now Syria, between Galaad and Israel proper, down the line of 9 the Jordan to the Dead Sea. Towards the south and the noon-day sun, the line stretches from Thamar to the Waters of Challenge at Cades, then follows the Brook 10 of Egypt to the sea; and on the west, it runs straight from the Egyptian border to the 11 Emath pass.² All this territory must be apportioned between the tribes of Israel; 12 then you will divide it up among yourselves. Aliens will have their share in it, such aliens as have thrown in their lot with yours and bred amongst you; native Israelites you shall count them, and allot them their portions in this tribe or that.
13 Amidst the tribe which has given him shelter, each shall find a home, the Lord God says.

48 And here is a list of the tribal domains. First Dan, with its northern frontier on a line from Hethalon, across the Emath pass, to the Syrian frontier-town of Hazar Enan, and marching with Emath all the way; its eastern limit... the sea.³ Next, stretching from Israel's eastern frontier to the sea, Aser; next, in like manner, Nephthali; next, in like manner, Manasses; next, in like manner, Ephraim; next, in like manner, Ruben; next, in like manner, Juda.

Next, in like manner, comes the strip of dedicated land you are to set apart; in breadth, twenty-five thousand cubits, in length, stretching from Israel's frontier to the sea like the rest; and in the heart of it, the sanctuary. The Lord's own domain will be twenty-five thousand cubits by ten thousand; and in this holy plot, measuring 20 twenty-five thousand cubits north and south, ten thousand cubits east and west, the priests are to dwell, with the sanctuary in their midst. Priests, I say, of Sadoc's 21 line, that held fast by my observances and never went a-straying with strayed Israel, as the other Levites did; first-fruit of the 22 first-fruits their domain shall be, the domain of the Levites marching with it. This neighbouring strip will be of the same size, twenty-five thousand cubits by ten thousand; sell their land they may not, nor 23 exchange it; the consecrated ground is unalienable. The remaining strip of five thousand cubits' breadth shall be for city's buildings and city's lands; the city itself standing in the middle; north, south, east 24 and west it shall measure four thousand five hundred cubits; north, south, east and west it shall have purlieu two hundred and fifty cubits deep. In length, it will fall 25 short of the Lord's domain by ten thousand cubits on the east, and as much on the west; but this remaining space will be city lands, like the sanctuary lands, growing food for the needs of labouring men in the city; these shall have the right to cultivate 26 it, come they from what tribe they will. All the length and breadth of this square 27 of territory, twenty-five thousand cubits either way, shall be sanctuary enclosure and city lands; beyond this square of sanctuary and city, all that is left of the dedicated domain, eastwards to the Jordan and

¹ The quotation is from Num. 34. 2; the subject-matter of that chapter is the distribution of Chanaan between the tribes in the first instance. ² vs. 15-20. The text here is awkward, and perhaps partly corrupt; several of the place-names remain unidentified. What seems clear is that the length of the new kingdom (from north to south) is that of David's kingdom, including Syria ('Damascus' in the original) but not Emath on the north or Hauran on the east; the breadth of it is curiously shrunken, the whole of Transjordan being abandoned. ³ It seems probable that the original text ran, 'Its eastern limit the eastern limit of Israel, its western limit the sea'.

westwards to the sea, shall belong to the prince; the hallowed plot that surrounds the temple shall divide his lands in two.
 22 Royal lands and Levite lands shall march with Juda, royal lands and city lands with Benjamin.¹ 23 For the rest of the tribes, Benjamin comes first, stretching from Israel's frontier on the east to the sea on the west; next, 24 in like manner, Simeon; next, in like manner, Issachar; next, in like manner, Zabulon; 25 in like manner, Simeon; next, in like manner, Zabulon; next, in like manner, Gad. Gad shall 26 be the southernmost, facing the noon-day sun, with a frontier running from Thamar 27 to the Waters of Challenge at Cades, and along the Brook² to the Great Sea. Such 28 shall be the territory allotted to Israel's tribes, the Lord God says, and thus allotted they shall be.

And these are the city's limits; on the north side, measure four thousand five hundred cubits; and here (for all must be named after Israel's tribes) are three gates named after Ruben, Juda and Levi. As many on the east, and here are gates named after Joseph, Benjamin, and Dan. As many on the south, and here are gates named after Simeon, Issachar and Zabulon. As many on the west, and here are gates named after Gad, Aser and Nephthali. The whole circumference is one of eighteen thousand cubits. THE LORD IS THERE; such is the name by which the city will be known ever after.

¹ The order of the words in this verse implies, what is not clearly stated elsewhere, that the Levite domain was on the north of the sacred enclosure, the city lands on the south of it. ² As in 47. 19; the Latin version has misread the word 'brook' as 'portion'.

THE PROPHECY OF DANIEL

WHEN Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon, marched against Jerusalem and laid siege to it, in Joakim's third year as king of Juda,¹ the Lord gave him the mastery. Not only Joakim fell into his hands, but... some of the temple treasures,² which he carried off to Sennaar as offerings to his own god, and there, in the treasure-house of his own god's temple, bestowed them. Meanwhile, he had a command for Asphenez, his head chamberlain. He was to take under his charge certain young Israelites, of royal or princely stock, in body well formed, handsome of mien, so well versed and grounded, so keen of wit, as they might be taught lore and language of the Chaldaeans, and have places at his court. For three years they should have daily allowance of the king's meat and wine; then he would send for them. Among these were four tribesmen of Juda, called Daniel, Ananias, Misael and Azarias; the chamberlain had given them fresh names, to Daniel Baltassar, to Ananias Sidrach, to Misael Misach, and to Azarias Abdenago. Daniel had resolved, neither meat nor wine from the royal table should sully his lips; and for this abstinence he hoped to get leave from the head chamberlain; with such kindness and pity God had touched his heart. But this would not serve; Nay, said he, what of the charge my lord king gave me, that you should have food and drink? It were as much as my life is worth, if he saw you haggard-cheeked beside others of your own age. Hereupon Daniel went to Malasar, one of the other chamberlains, to whose care Asphenez had entrusted all four of them.³ Sir, said he, be pleased to put us on our trial. For ten days, give us nothing but pulse to eat, water to drink, then compare our looks with the looks of those others who have fed on the king's bounty; judge by what thou seest, and do with us what thou wilt. The challenge was accepted, and the ten days' trial began; when it was over, never a one of the king's pensioners shewed healthy and well nourished as they. After that, Malasar had their allowance of meat and wine, and they pulse.

Meanwhile, in all lore and learning, God made apt pupils of these four; and of visions and dreams especially Daniel was master. And now, the time of their probation over, Asphenez presented his pupils before Nabuchodonosor, who had speech with all of them; and no match was found for Daniel, Ananias, Misael and Azarias; all must have places at court. Never a question the king could propound, to make trial of their learning and their quick wits, but they could answer it ten times better than any diviner or sage in his kingdom. And still, up to the beginning of Cyrus' reign, Daniel was...⁴

2 In the second year of his reign,⁵ Nabuchodonosor had a dream; and

¹ The capture of Jerusalem in Joakim's reign is vouched for by II Par. 36. 6; the corresponding passage in IV Kg. 24. 1 is perhaps defective. The dating here gives rise to difficulties; Nabuchodonosor had not yet acceded to the throne in the third year of Joakim (Jer. 25. 1). Some think he is called 'king', although still crown prince; others, that the 'reign' of Joakim is only dated from his revolt against Babylon, his position up to that time having been merely that of a viceroy.

² It seems probable, from what follows, that there has been an omission, and that the original text contained some account of persons (including Daniel and his companions) being removed to Babylon.

³ The Septuagint Greek seems to preserve a different account of this incident, in which Malasar disappears from the story and it is Asphenez, after all, who grants Daniel's request.

⁴ It seems probable that a few words have dropped out at the end of the chapter, telling us that Daniel was 'in high favour', or something of the kind. The phrase 'Daniel was until the first year of Cyrus' is quite without parallel in the Old Testament. Some, by a slight change in the text, would read 'Daniel lived'; but it appears Daniel was still alive in the third year of Cyrus (to 1. below).

⁵ It is difficult to see how Nabuchodonosor should still have been in the second year of his reign, when Daniel and the others had already undergone three years of training. The difficulty disappears if we suppose that he was only crown prince when he marched on Jerusalem (see note on 1. 1). But some think that the years are computed in two different ways, chapter 1 reckoning from the day of the king's accession and chapter 2 from the beginning of his first complete year.

his mind, between sleep and waking, was 2 all distraught.¹ Diviner and sage, sooth-3 sayer and astrologer must be summoned without more ado, to pronounce on the 4 royal dream; and when they were admitted to his presence, he said to them, I have had a dream, but my mind is so 4 distraught, I cannot tell what it was. And the astrologers gave him answer.

IN ARAMAIC²

Long life to the king's grace! Be pleased to tell us what the dream was, and it shall 5 be interpreted. Why, said the king, I know no more than this; dream and interpretation both you must needs tell me, or else 6 your lives must be forfeit, and your houses put to public use. Gifts and great honour shall be your reward, if you will but tell me both. Come now, what dreamt I, and what meant my dream?

7 Once again they demurred; would the king be pleased to recount his dream to them, interpreted it should be forthwith.
 8 Nay, said the king, I see how it is, you are trying shifts with me. You know well there 9 is but one way to it; dream of mine or doom of yours it must be. Some lying story you have ready, that will suit your turn; how shall I know your interpretation is right, if you cannot tell me what dream 10 I saw? Nay, said they, never a man on earth could do what the king's grace asks.
 Princes and great rulers there have been a many, but none of them yet, from diviner, 11 sage or astrologer, expected so much! Here is riddle indeed thou wouldst have us read for thee, lord king; where is counsellor can tell thee the secret? Unless it were the gods only, and they walk not with men.

12 At this, the king was in such a taking of fury that he would have all the wise men 13 of Babylon put to death; and, once the warrant was out for the extinction of them, there was hue and cry against Daniel and 14 his fellows. Arioch it was, the captain of the king's guard, that was commissioned to rid Babylon of all its wise men, and from him Daniel would have the why and wherefore of it; here was cruel work committed to him; what moved the king's grace to be so absolute? And, when Arioch had made all clear to him, into the king's presence he went, asking for more time to answer the royal question. So, returning to his fellows, Ananias, Misael and Azarias, he made all known to them, and would have them cry out upon the God of heaven for better knowledge of his secret, without which both he and they should perish in the general massacre of the wise men.

Then, in a vision by night, the secret was revealed to Daniel, and he fell to praising the God of heaven, with such words as these: Blessed be the Lord's name from the beginning to the end of time; his are the wisdom and the power; change and chance of our mortal life he rules, crowns one man and discrowns another. Wisdom of the wise, skill of the skilful, what are they but his gift? The hidden depths he can lay bare, read the secrets of the dark; does not light dwell with him? God of our fathers, I give thee thanks and praise for thus enabling, thus enlightening me; for prayer answered, doubt resolved, and the king's thought revealed.

With that, he betook himself to Arioch, that was to slay the wise men, and made suit to him, slay the wise men he should not. Thou hast but to take me into the king's presence, said he, and the riddle shall be read. Without more ado, Arioch granted his request; here was an exile from Juda, he said, that would answer the royal question. Is this true? the king asked of Daniel. Canst thou, Baltassar, tell me the dream and its meaning both? And Daniel spoke out in the royal presence, Never wizard or sage, never diviner or prophet, that can give the king's grace an answer!

¹ 'Between sleep and waking, was all distraught'; literally, in the Hebrew text, 'his spirit was bewildered, and his sleep took place upon him' (which is explained as meaning, 'was all over for him'). The Septuagint Greek has, 'his sleep was away from him', the Latin version, 'his dream fled from him'. The Latin perhaps implies that Nabuchodonosor had really forgotten his dream; but this is unnecessary to the story.

² It is, of course, possible to render, 'And the astrologers gave him his answer in Aramaic', but no plausible reason has been suggested for this sudden philological digression. Meanwhile, it is certain that, from this point up to the end of chapter 7, the text given in the Hebrew Bible is not written in Hebrew properly so called, but in the dialect called Aramaic (also used in I Esdras); hence it seems likely that the two words given above in capitals are merely a note intended to warn the reader. The most probable account of this circumstance is that two versions of the original text were current, one Hebrew and one Aramaic, and that certain chapters which were lost in one had to be supplied from the other.

But there is a God in heaven, king Nabuchodonosor, that makes hidden things plain; he it is that has sent thee warning of what must befall long hence. Let me tell thee what thy dream was, what visions disturbed thy sleep. As thou wast lying there abed, my lord king, thy thoughts still turned on future times; and he that makes hidden things plain revealed to thee what the pattern of those times should be. If the secret was disclosed to me also, it is not that I have wisdom beyond the wont of living men; I was but the instrument by which the meaning of it was to be made known, and a king's thoughts unravelled.

A vision thou hadst of a great image; what splendour, how terrible an aspect it was that confronted thee! Of fine gold the head, breast and arms of silver, belly and thighs of bronze; of iron the legs, and of the feet, too, part was iron, part was but earthenware. And as thou wert watching it, from the mountain-side fell a stone no hands had quarried, dashed against the feet of yonder image, part iron, part clay, and shattered them. With that, down came iron and clay, down came bronze and silver and gold; chaff of the threshing-floor was never so scattered on the summer breeze. They were gone, none knew whither; and stone that had shattered image grew into a high mountain, filling the whole earth.

So much for the dream, and now we that know the secret of it¹ will tell the king's grace what it means. Thou hast kings for thy vassals; royalty, power, dominion and great renown the God of heaven has bestowed on thee; every haunt of man and wild beast and flying bird he has given over to thee, all alike he has made subject to thee; the head of gold, who else but thou? Another and a lesser empire must follow thine, one of silver, then another of bronze, still wide as the world; then a fourth, of iron, breaking down and crushing all before it, as iron has power all-conquering, all-subduing.² But feet and toes of the image were part iron, part clay; this fourth empire will be divided within itself. Foundation of iron there shall yet be, from which it springs; sure enough, in the feet thou sawest, earthenware was mixed with true steel. Yet was true steel mixed with base earthenware, token that this empire shall be in part firmly established, in part brittle. Iron and clay mingled; race of the conquerors shall be adulterated with common human stock; as well mix clay with iron!³

And while those empires yet flourish, another empire the God of heaven will bring into being, never to be destroyed, never to be superseded; conqueror of all these others, itself unconquerable. This is that stone thou sawest none ever quarried, that fell from the mountain-side, bringing clay and iron and bronze and silver and gold to nothing; this was a revelation the king's grace had from the most high God himself of what must come about; true was thy dream, and this, past doubt, the meaning of it.

With that, king Nabuchodonosor bowed down face to earth, and made Daniel reverence; ay, he would have sacrifice offered to him, and incense, and with these words greeted him: Doubt is none but this God of yours of all gods is God, of all kings the master; he it is brings hidden things to light, or how couldst thou have read the secret? Thereupon, he raised Daniel to high rank, and showered riches on him; ruler he should be of all Babylon's provinces, and over all its wise men have the pre-eminence. But Daniel made suit to him, and it was Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago that had Babylon under their charge; Daniel himself was the king's courtier still.

¹ 'We that know the secret of it'; in the original simply 'we'. It is to be supposed that Daniel was associating himself with his three fellow-pupils, who had perhaps accompanied him to the court.

² Many authors identify the second empire with a 'Median' empire (cf. note on 5. 31 below), the third with Persia, and the fourth with Macedon. Others identify the second with Persia, the third with Macedon, and the fourth with Rome; the break-up of the (now divided) Macedonian empire began with the victory of Paullus at Pydna, B.C. 168.

³ Literally, 'As thou sawest iron mixed with earthenware, so they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men, but they shall not cohere, this with that, just as iron will not mix with clay'. This is usually understood as meaning 'the rival dynasties will enter into alliance with each other by means of royal marriages (the seed of men), but they will not contrive to keep the peace'. All this is very much out of tune with the allegory, which plainly implies that the fourth empire in its later stages will be composed of a weaker and a stronger element within itself, the two elements not really mixing. We must understand, then, that the conquering power (whatever it may be) will fail to absorb and unify the conquered elements it is dealing with.

3 It was this king Nabuchodonosor made a golden image, sixty cubits high and six cubits broad, which he set up on the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon; and word went round in king Nabuchodonosor's name, summoning all the governors, magistrates, judges, chieftains, rulers, prefects and leading men from every part of his dominions, to be present at the dedication of the image king Nabuchodonosor had set up. So they gathered there, governors, magistrates, judges, chieftains, rulers, noblemen in high office, and leading men from every part, for the dedication of king Nabuchodonosor's image. And, as they stood before the image he had set up, a herald cried lustily to men of all peoples, nations and languages: As soon as you hear the sound of horn, flute, harp, zither, dulcimer, pipe and other instruments of music, you are to fall down and worship the image of gold which king Nabuchodonosor has set up. Whoever does not fall down in worship will be thrown, there and then, into the heart of a raging furnace. No sooner, then, did the sound of horn, flute, harp, zither, dulcimer, pipe and the rest reach the assembly than all of them, whatever their tribe, people or language, fell down in worship of king Nabuchodonosor's image.

8 It was then that certain Chaldeans came forward with malicious accusations against the Jews. They wished long life to king Nabuchodonosor, and said, Lord King, thy command was that all men, at the sound of horn, flute, harp, zither, dulcimer, pipe and the rest, should fall down and worship the golden image, on pain of being thrown into a raging furnace. And here are certain Jews, entrusted by thee with the affairs of Babylon province, to wit, Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago, who have set the royal command at defiance, and will not reverence thy gods, or worship the golden image thou hast set up. Upon this, in a transport of rage, Nabuchodonosor sent for Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago; and when they were brought, without delay, into his presence, this was the threat king Nabuchodonosor uttered: So Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago will not reverence my gods, or worship this golden image of mine? Here is your choice, then; either you will fall down and worship this image of mine when the sound of horn, flute, harp, zither, dulcimer, pipe and the other music reaches you, or then and there you shall be thrown into a raging furnace. You are in my power; what God can deliver you?

Then Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago said to king Nabuchodonosor, There is no need for any answer of ours to that question; thou wilt see for thyself whether the God we worship is able to rescue us from the raging fire, and from thy royal power: But, whether he rescues us or no, be assured, sir king, here are men who do not reverence thy gods, or worship any image of thine. At this, Nabuchodonosor fell into a rage; his features, as he glared at Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago, were distorted with fury. He would have the furnace heated seven times hotter than its wont; and into this raging furnace he bade the most stalwart of his fighting men throw Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago with their feet tied together. So they were bounc just as they were, in breeches and turban shoes and coat, and thrown into the heart of the raging furnace; the king's order admitted no delay. So fiercely was the furnace heated that those who threw them it were burned to death. Meanwhile these three, Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago, fell fast bound into the heart of the fires that raged in it.

And there, in the hottest of the flames, they walked to and fro, singing to God their praises, blessing the Lord. There, a he stood in the heart of the fire, Azaria found utterance, and thus made his prayer: Blessed art thou, Lord God of our fathers, renowned and glorious is thine name for ever! In all thy dealings with us thou hast right on thy side; so true to thy promises, so unswerving in thy course, so just in thy awards! No punishment thou hast inflicted upon us, or upon Jerusalem holy city of our fathers, but was deserved for sins of ours, faithfulness and justice that stroke laid on. Sinners we were, thou had wronged and forsaken thee, all we amiss with us; unheard thy commandments, or else unheeded, thy will neglected, and with it, our own well-being. Nothing we had not deserved, pillage and thy contriving, plague of thy sending, and at last the foul domination of godless foe!

of a tyrant that has no equal on earth!
33 Tongue-tied we stand, that have brought disgrace on the livery of thy true worship.
34 For thy own honour, we entreat thee not to abandon us eternally. Do not annul thy covenant, and deprive us of thy mercy.
35 Think of Abraham that was thy friend, of thy servant Isaac, of Jacob whom thou 36 didst set apart for thyself; the men to whom thou didst promise that thou wouldst increase their posterity, till it was countless as the stars in heaven, or the sand 37 by the sea-shore. Whereas now, Lord, we are of all nations the most insignificant; all the world over, men see us humbled for 38 our sins. In these days we are without prince or leader or prophet, we have no burnt-sacrifice, no victim, no offering; for us no incense burns, no first-fruits can be brought into thy presence and win thy 39 favour. But oh, accept us still, hearts that are crushed, spirits bowed down by ad-40 versity; look kindly on the sacrifice we offer thee this day, as it had been burnt-sacrifice of rams and bullocks, thousands of fattened lambs; who ever trusted in thee 41 and was disappointed? With all our hearts, now, we choose thy will, we reverence 42 thee, we long after thy presence; for that clemency, that abundant mercy of thine 43 must we hope in vain? By some wondrous deliverance vindicate thy own renown; 44 theirs be the vain hope, that would do thy servants an injury. Fools, that would match themselves with omnipotence!
45 Crush down their might; teach them that in all the world Lord there is none, God
there is none, glorified as thou.
46 Meanwhile, their tormentors were not idle; naphtha and tow, pitch and tinder 47 must be heaped on the furnace, till the flame rose forty-nine cubits above the 48 furnace itself, breaking out and burning such Chaldeans as stood near it. But an angel of the Lord had gone down into the furnace with Azarias and his companions;
and he drove the flames away from it, 49 making a wind blow in the heart of the furnace, like the wind that brings the dew.
So that these three were untouched, and the fire brought them neither pain nor 50 discomfort. Whereupon all of them, as with one mouth, began to give praise and glory and blessing to God, there in the furnace, in these words that follow: Blessed art thou, Lord God of our fathers, 52 praised above all, renowned above all for ever; blessed is thy holy and glorious name, praised above all, renowned above all for ever. Blessed art thou, whose glory 53 fills thy holy temple, praised above all, renowned above all for ever; blessed art 54

thou, who reignest on thy kingly throne,
praised above all, renowned above all for ever. Blessed art thou, who art throned 55 above the cherubim, and gazest down into the depths, praised above all, renowned above all for ever. Blessed art thou, high 56 in the vault of heaven, praised above all, renowned above all for ever.

Then they cried out upon all things the 57 Lord had made, to bless him, and praise him, and extol his name for ever.¹ Bless 58
the Lord they should, the Lord's angels;
bless him they should, the heavens, and 59
the waters above the heavens; bless him they should, all the Lord's powers. Bless 62 him they should, sun and moon, stars of heaven, each drop of rain and moisture, 64 and all the winds of God. Bless him they should, fire and heat, winter cold and 65 summer drought, dew and rime at morn- 68 ing, frost and the cold air. Bless him they should, ice and snow, day-time and night- 71 time, light and darkness, lightnings and storm-clouds. And earth in its turn should 74 bless the Lord, praise him, and extol his name for ever. Bless the Lord they should, 75 mountains and hills, every growing thing that earth yields, flowing fountains, seas 76 and rivers. Bless him they should, sea- 79 monsters and all life that is bred in the waters, all the birds that fly in heaven, wild 80 beasts and tame, and the sons of men. 82 Bless him Israel should, priests of the Lord bless him, servants of the Lord bless him; 85 bless him they should, spirits and souls of 86 all faithful men; bless him they should, 87 dedicated and humble hearts. And for Ananias, Azarias and Misael, well might 88 they bless the Lord, praise him and extol his name for ever; here was the grave spoiled, death robbed of its prey, and ever they were kept safe from the furnace, let its flames rage as they would. Give 89 thanks to the Lord, they cried, the Lord is ¹ In the original, the words 'praise him, and extol his name for ever' are repeated some thirty times in verses 58-88. Here, as in the liturgy, the passage has been abridged.

90 gracious; his mercy is eternal! Bless the Lord, you that are his worshippers; he is God above all gods; praise him and give him thanks, whose mercy is eternal.¹

91 Sore amazed was king Nabuchodonosor, and started to his feet; Tell me, he said to his courtiers, did we not cast three men into yonder furnace, all closely bound? And when they answered, Sire, past doubt, 92 he told them what he had seen; here were four men, that bonds wore none, walking to and fro in the heart of the fire, and never the worse. And such an aspect he wore, the fourth of them, as it had been a son of 93 God. With that, close went Nabuchodonosor to the furnace door, and cried, Come forth, Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago! Servants of the most high God, come out to me! So out came Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago, from the fire's heart all of 94 them; and with one accord governor and judge and courtier clustered round them to look. Plain it was, the heat had no power over them; never a hair singed, nor a coat shrivelled, nor any smell of burning 95 marked its passage. And at that, Nabuchodonosor could contain himself no longer; Blessed be this God whom Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago worship! Here were servants of his that trusted in him, and defied a king's edict, ready to put their lives in peril, so they might be free men, worshipping no God but their own; and he has sent an angel to deliver them. 96 Hereby, then, I enact that if anyone blasphemes against the God of Sidrach, Misach and Abdenago, come he of what people, what tribe, what race he may, he shall pay for it with his life, and his house be put to public use. God there is no other that can grant such deliverance as this! 97 And be sure he promoted them to high rank in Babylon province.

98 King Nabuchodonosor to men of every race, tribe and tongue, dwell they where they will, all health! Here be wondrous portents the most high God has been 99 manifesting, and in my person. And my will is to make them known, portents most weighty, wonders most compelling; such a reign as his lasts for ever, such power as his the ages cannot diminish.²

4 All went well in my household; never was Nabuchodonosor's court more flourishing. And then I had a dream that put me in fear; nor waking thoughts gave my troubled wits repose. Thereupon I gave orders that all the wise men of Babylon should appear before me, to interpret my dream; diviner and sage, astrologer and soothsayer, all must assemble, and there in their presence I rehearsed what dream it was, but never one of them could tell me the meaning of it. At last came Daniel, one of their number, styled after my own god's name Baltassar, and endowed by all the holy gods³ with their spirit. To him I unfolded my dream thus: Diviner is none, Baltassar, such as thou art; the spirit of all the holy gods is in thee, and there is no mystery beyond thy ken. Tell me, thou, what vision came to me in sleep, what events it boded.

Wouldst thou know, what fantasies disturbed my rest, this was what I saw. Grew a tree from the heart of earth, beyond measure tall; a great tree and a thriving; top of it reached the heavens, and the ends of the earth had view of it. What fair leaves it had, what foison of fruit, enough to cater for a whole world! Beast was none but might take shelter under it, bird was none but might nest in its branches, and to all living creatures it gave food. But as I lay watching in my dream, came down from heaven one of the holy ones that mount guard there, and loud rang his message: Down with yonder tree, lop branch, strip leaves, spill fruit! Let beast its shade, bird its covert forsake! Yet leave the stock of it fast in earth.

Band of iron, chain of bronze! There on the soft meadow-grass heaven's dew wet him, pasture with the beasts find he; heart of man be changed in him, beast's heart given him, till seven seasons there have found him, and passed him by. Doom it is of the unsleeping ones, will and word of the holy ones; live men and learn that he, the most High, of human kingship is overlord, gives it to whom he will, and holds none too base for the having of it.

Thus dreamt I, the great king Nabuchodonosor. Make haste, Baltassar, and ¹ Verses 24-90 are found in the Septuagint Greek, but were unknown to the Aramaic text, it seems, even in the time of St Jerome. ² Verses 98-100 should (and in some Greek manuscripts do) form part of the next chapter. ³ Or perhaps 'by the holy God'; so also in verses 6 and 15.

read me the riddle; wise man was none in my kingdom that could tell me the meaning of it, but thou hast the spirit of the holy gods in thee; thou canst unravel it.

16 But Daniel, Baltassar if you will, made no answer. For a whole hour, in silence, he gave himself up to his thoughts, and right comfortless they were. Nay, Baltassar, the king said at last, never lose heart over a dream, and the interpretation of a dream! Lord king, said he, such dreams be for thy enemies! To ill-wishers of thine bode they what they bode! A tree tall and sturdy, top reaching the heavens, in all the world's view, fair branches, fruit abounding, food for all, beasts sheltering, birds nesting there, what is it, lord king, but thou? So great thy power has grown, it reaches heaven; earth's bounds are the bounds of thy dominion. He watches ever, that holy one thou sawest coming down from heaven; and his word was, Down with the tree, away with it, yet leave the stock of it rooted fast! Of iron band he spoke, and chain of bronze; of soft meadow-grass under the dews of heaven; of one that should have his pasture among the beasts, till seven seasons had found him there, and passed him by. Sentence from the most High this dream forbodes, and the king's grace the subject of it. Far from the haunts of men thou shalt be driven out, and among brute beasts thou shalt have thy dwelling; eat grass, ox-fashion, and with heaven's dew be drenched, till seven seasons have passed thee by; so learn thou must, that of all human kingship the most High is overlord, and grants it where he will. If stock of tree is to be left rooted, be sure thy throne shall be thine once again; but first thou must learn thy lesson, that all power is from above. Deign, my lord king, to be advised by me; with almsgiving, with mercy to the poor, for fault and wrong-doing of thine make amends; it may be he will condone thy guilt.

25 All this king Nabuchodonosor underwent. A twelvemonth later, as he walked to and fro on the roof of his palace at Babylon, he said aloud: Babylon lies before me, the great city, the royal city I have built; sure proof of my power, fair monument of my renown! And before the words had died on his lips, came a voice from heaven; King Nabuchodonosor, here is thy doom! Pass away from thee it must, that royal power of thine; driven from the haunts of men, with beasts dwell thou, grass like the cattle eat thou, till seven seasons have passed thee by, and learned thou hast that the most High is overlord of all human kingship, to grant it where he will. There and then fell the doom on Nabuchodonosor; thrust him out they did, to feed on grass, and ever the dew of heaven drenched him; thick as eagle's feathers his hair grew, and like birds' talons his nails.

When the appointed time was over, I lifted up my eyes to heaven, I, Nabuchodonosor, and right reason came back to me. Blessed I then the most high God, to the eternal gave glory and praise; such a reign as his lasts for ever, such power as his the ages cannot diminish. Matched with him, the whole world of men counts for nothing; in the heavenly powers, as in our mortal lives, he accomplishes his will, and none may resist him, none may ask his meaning. And when reason came back to me, back came royal pomp and state, back came the beauty I once had; prince and senator waited on me, restored to my throne now in more magnificence than ever. What wonder if I, Nabuchodonosor, praise this King of heaven, extol and glorify him, so faithful to his promise, so just in his dealings? Proud minds none can abase as he.¹

5 Now turn we to king Baltassar, that made great cheer for courtiers of his a thousand, each man drinking wine as his rank entitled him.² And he, in his cups, would have the spoils of the old temple at Jerusalem brought in, cups of gold, cups of silver that his father Nabuchodonosor had carried away; king and court, wife and concubine should drink from them. Brought in they were, all the spoils of

¹ It would seem that the story of Nabuchodonosor's dream must have been current, from quite early times, in more than one version. The alternation, in this chapter as it stands, between history and autobiography would by itself suggest a compilation from sources. But it is also observable that the Septuagint Greek, while agreeing as to the facts, tells the story throughout in quite different words. ² In the Aramaic text, 'and (the king) drank wine in the presence of all the thousand'.

Jerusalem; king and courtier, wife and concubine, drank from those vessels; 4 drank, and to their own gods gave the praise, gods of gold and silver, bronze and iron, wood and stone.

5 Then, in that hour, an apparition came to them. They saw the fingers of a man's hand writing on the plaster of the palace wall, full in the lamp's light; joints of a hand that wrote there the king could not choose but see. All at once he changed colour, a prey to anxious thoughts; melted his heart within him, and his knees 7 knocked together. With a loud cry, he bade them summon the wise men of Babylon, sage and astrologer and diviner; and to these he made proclamation: Who reads me yonder writing, and tells me the meaning of it, shall go clad in purple, a gold chain about his neck, and hold the third 8 place in my kingdom. But when they came into the banqueting-hall, never a wise head among them could read the characters, nor 9 tell the king what they meant; whereupon king Baltassar was in a great taking of fear, his cheeks paler yet, and his princes were no easier in mind than himself.

10 But now all this ado brought the queen-mother down into the banqueting-hall; Long life to the king's grace! cried she; here is no need for daunted hearts and pale 11 looks! One man thou hast in thy realm the holy gods inspire; in thy father's time, good proof he gave of the wisdom and learning that were his. Did not thy father, king Nabuchodonosor, put him at the head of his wise men one and all, sage nor wizard nor astrologer nor soothsayer to match him? In such renown thy royal father held 12 him, my lord king; no common spirit is his, no common prudence and discernment, dreams to interpret, hidden things to reveal, spells to unbind. For his name, it is Daniel; thy father called him Baltassar. Let Daniel be summoned, and thy riddle shall not long go unread.

13 So Daniel was brought into the king's presence, and the king asked him if Daniel he were, one of the Jewish exiles his father 14 had brought to Babylon? Great things were told of him; that he had the spirit of the gods, gave proof of skill, discernment 15 and wisdom above the common. And here was certain writing, that had baffled sage and diviner called in to read them; meaning of it they could not tell. If Daniel 11 had skill indeed to reveal mysteries and unbind spells, let him read those characters and interpret them; robe of purple he should have, and a gold chain about his neck, and hold the third place in the kingdom.

But Daniel spoke out, there in the king's 12 presence: Purple and gold keep for thyself; and for thy honours, let him have them who will. But for the writing, I will read it willingly, and tell thee the meaning of it. Sir king, thy father was Nabuchodonosor; to him the most High gave royal state, and splendid renown; for that renown of his, every people and race and tribe must tremble in awe of him; slew he, smote he, exalted he, abased he, all he would. With that, his heart beat high; proud grew his will and obstinate; and the issue of it? From that throne he must come down, be shorn of that glory; cast 13 out henceforth from the haunts of men. Heart of beast the heart of him; dwelling-place of wild ass should be his, food of the ox; and the dews of heaven should drench him, till he had learned that the most High is overlord of all human kingship, grants it to whom he will. All this, Baltassar, thou 14 knewest, yet son no more than father would abate his pride; heaven's Ruler defying, thou wouldst bring out yonder cups, the spoil of his temple, to serve wine for thee and thy court, for wife and concubine. Gods of silver and gold, bronze and iron, stone and wood, that cannot see or hear or feel, thou wouldst magnify; for the God that holds thy life, thy fortunes, in his keeping, never a word of praise. That is 15 why the hand appeared to thee, fingers that wrote what there stands written. This is the charactery of it: Mané, Thecel, Phares. Mané betokens numbering; so many years allotted to thy empire, and now God has brought them to an end. And thecel, weighing; the equal of his benefits God demands, and has not found in thee. And phares, rending; Persian and Mede shall be thy successors in the kingdom that is torn from thy grasp.

With that, at the royal bidding, they 16 clothed Daniel in purple, and hung a chain of gold about his neck; proclamation, too, was made that he held the third place in the kingdom. But that same night Baltassar, 17

the Chaldaean king, was slain, and his crown passed to Darius, a Mede, then in the sixty-third year of his age.¹

6 This Darius saw fit to appoint a hundred and twenty lords lieutenant, who should govern the provinces of his empire; and over these, three viceroys, of whom Daniel was one; governor should be answerable to viceroy, and the king's grace should not be troubled with such matters. Yet governor was none or viceroy that could compare with Daniel, so richly God inspired him; and soon the king's thought was, to put the whole empire under his care. Right gladly would his rivals have found opportunity to discredit him in the king's eyes; but no, handle or pretext they could find none, so faithful was he, so far removed from all breath of suspicion. And at last they were fain to admit, if charge was to be found against Daniel at all, keeping of his God's law must be the ground of it.

So they took the king by surprise; Long life, they said, to the king's grace! Here is a design upon which we are all agreed, viceroy and magistrate and governor and senator and judge; that an edict should go out under the royal seal forbidding thy subjects to make any request of god or man these next thirty days, save only of thyself. And if any man disobeys, it shall be at his peril; he is for the lion-pit. May it please the king's grace to give this design of ours effect, and make the decree unalterable, under law of the Medes and Persians, the law there is no amending.

Draw up the edict he did, and signed it. As for Daniel, when he heard it was law, he took himself home; and now as ever, three times a day, he would open his chamber window towards Jerusalem eastwards, doing reverence on bended knee and praising his God. Be sure they surprised him at it, these enemies of his; found him a-praying to his God, and went off to remind the king of his edict. Had not a law been enacted, prayer there should be none to god or man those thirty days following, save to the king; and that on pain of the lions? Law it is, said he, and law of the Medes and Persians there is no amending. Why then, they asked the king, what of Daniel, Daniel the Jewish exile, that for law and edict cares nothing? Three times a day he offers his God prayer.

Pitiful hearing was this for the king's ear; to save Daniel was all his thought, and to that end he laboured till set of sun; but the trap they had devised was too crafty for him, and ever they put him in mind there was no help for it. By the law Medes and Persians use, let the king once make a decree, there is no amending it. At last the king gave orders Daniel should be sent for and shut up in the lion-pit; So faithful a servant, he told him, thy God must needs deliver. And with that, a stone was brought and set down at the pit's entrance, which the king sealed and his nobles both; there should be no interfering with Daniel. Home went the king, and supperless to bed; he would have no food brought him, and sleep he could not.

With the first light of day, the king was up and stirring; to the lion-pit he hastened, and as he came up to it, he cried out most lamentably: Daniel, worshipper of the God that lives, thou wert ever his true servant; has power of his availed to rescue thee from the lions? Long life to the king's grace, Daniel answered; angel of his did his errand, and stopped the lions' mouths. What harm should they do me, one that my God sees guiltless? And for thyself, lord king, nought did I to earn thy displeasure. Right glad the king was to learn of Daniel's safety; be sure he gave orders they should bring Daniel up out of the pit, and out of the pit they brought him, unscathed from head to foot; such reward they have that trust in God. Thereupon at the king's bidding, they fetched his accusers, and thrust them into the lion-pit, their wives and children with them. But these never reached the floor of it, so quickly the lions fell upon them, and broke all the bones of them to nothing.²

¹ If the event here referred to is the well-known capture of Babylon by Cyrus, Darius the Mede should perhaps be identified with Gobryas, a general of his who took command of the city after its capture. It is not impossible that a short-lived 'Median' empire may have intervened between that of Babylon and that of Persia, but the monuments reveal no trace of it; and the sacred writers appear to regard the Medes and Persians as already, for political purposes, a single nation.

² Cf. note on Mt. 1. 25. The Septuagint Greek has, 'they fetched those two accusers of his', i.e. the two other viceroys alluded to in verse 2 above.

25 Then Darius sent out a proclamation to all the world, without distinction of na-26 tion, race or language, wishing them well, and enjoining this decree upon them, that all the subjects of his empire should hold the God of Daniel in awe and reverence.
Here is a God that lives, he told them, a God that abides for ever; such a reign as his there is no overthrowing, such power 27 as his the ages cannot diminish. His to deliver, his to save, his to shew wondrous portents in high heaven and on earth beneath, the God who saved Daniel from the lions.

28 Let Darius reign, or Cyrus the Persian, this same Daniel thrive yet.

7 In the first year of the Babylonian king Baltassar, Daniel had a dream;
sleep he might, but still his thoughts were busy. The substance of this dream he put on record, giving no more than the sum of it, in these words following.

2 Night came, and brought with it a vision for my seeing. All the winds of heaven, 3 I thought, did battle over the wide sea, and out of it came four great beasts, each of 4 them different from the last. A lioness the first seemed, that yet had eagle's wings;
but as I watched, these wings were plucked, and with that it rose up from the ground, standing on its feet like a man, and 5 a man's heart was given to it. Then rose up another by its side, this one like a bear;
three rows of teeth it had in its mouth, and a summons came to it, great part of man-6 kind it should devour. What saw I next?
A leopard it seemed, yet had a bird's wings,
four of them, on its back, and four heads;
this beast it was that now attained do-7 minion. But still I dreamed on, and a fourth beast saw at last, fiercer, and stranger, and more powerful yet. It had great teeth of iron, ready to crush and to devour, and ever what these spared it would trample down with its feet; match it those others might not; and out of its 8 head grew ten horns. Even as I watched them, a new horn grew up in the midst of the others, and three of them must be plucked away to make room for it; eyes it had, this new horn, like a man's eyes, and a mouth that talked very boastfully.

9 While I still watched, there were judgement-thrones a-setting; and one took his seat there crowned with age. White as snow his garments were, his hair could match unsullied wool for whiteness; his throne all of flame, the wheels under it glancing fire; and ever from his presence a stream of fire came rushing onward.

A thousand thousand they were that waited on his bidding, and for every one of these, a thousand others were standing there before him. Assize should be held now, and the records lay open. And still I watched, to see what would become of the boasts yonder horn had made; and all at once I was aware the beast itself had been slain, and even the carcase of it had vanished, handed over to the flames; nor might those other beasts enjoy power any longer, though life they should enjoy for a while, until their turn came. Then I saw in my dream, how one came riding on the clouds of heaven, that was yet a son of man; came to where the Judge sat, crowned with age, and was ushered into his presence. With that, power was given him, and glory, and sovereignty; obey him all must, men of every race and tribe and tongue; such a reign as his lasts for ever, such power as his the ages cannot diminish.

By this, Daniel wrote, my heart was ill at ease; a dread sight it was, and as I dreamed, my thoughts bewildered me. So I drew closer to one that stood by, and asked to know the truth of all that had gone forward; he it was that read the riddle for me, and thus he unravelled it: It is but earthly kingdoms they betoken, these four great beasts thou hast seen; the servants of the most high God shall have dominion yet; theirs it shall be for ever and for evermore. But I was minded to know the truth more fully; what was the fourth beast, so different from all the rest, so dreadful; why must it have teeth and claws of iron, to crush and to devour, to trample on what was left? What of the ten horns on its head, and that other, before which three of them fell, the horn that had eyes, and a mouth to boast with, and grew greater than the rest? This horn it was I saw doing battle against the servants of the most High, and getting the better of them, until the Judge appeared, crowned with age, to give them redress, and their turn came to have dominion.

23 And his answer was, this fourth beast was the fourth of those earthly kingdoms, and the greatest of them all, to crush and devour and trample down a whole world.

24 Ten kings be the ten horns of that kingdom, and after these another shall rise, more powerful yet, and three of them shall

25 bite the dust. Boastfully he shall challenge the most High, and do his servants despite; calendar and ordinance he shall think to set aside; for a space of time, and for twice as long, and for half as long,¹ he

26 must needs have his way. Then assize shall be held on him, and all his power be taken away, crushed down and forgotten for 27 ever. Then what royalty, what empire, what earth-embracing dominion shall be theirs, the people set apart for the most High! Sovereignty everlasting; no monarch but must bow to its yoke.²

28 So ended the revelation made to Daniel. Bewildered my thoughts were, and my cheek pale, but I kept the memory of it faithfully in my heart.

8 To me, to Daniel, another revelation came, besides that I had first seen. It was now the third year of king Baltassar, and I was at the town of Susa, in Aelam province, but it seemed, in my vision, it was by the gate³ of Ulai I stood. I looked at what lay before me, and what saw I, at the edge of the marsh, but a ram standing there, with one high-branching horn, and another that grew up after it, but grew 4 higher yet. With those horns it tossed every enemy that came to meet it; west and north and south was never a beast could match it, or escape its attack; no wonder this ram carried all before it, and rose to greatness.

5 But now, as I looked, came a buck-goat from the west country, earth overshadowing, and spurning the ground beneath him; one horn this goat had between the eyes of him, a horn of noble aspect. Close he came to the ram, the great horned ram I had espied in yonder gateway, and bore down upon it with very furious onslaught. So madly he charged that he overcame the ram and broke either horn of it with one blow; what shift could it make now? Brought down it was and trampled under foot; there was no rescuing it. So now it was the goat's turn to enjoy dominion; yet no sooner had he reached his full strength, than the great horn was broken, and four other horns must grow up in place of it, fronting the four winds of heaven.

It was from one of these a single horn now sprang; a little horn that grew till it outrivalled south and east, aye, and the armies. . . For the armies of heaven itself it proved a match, bringing heavenly powers down to earth, stars down to earth, and trampling them under foot; a match even for the captain of those armies, that must lose the daily sacrifice offered to him, and look on at the destruction of his sanctuary. Alas for our guilt! That such an enemy, by armed force, should avail against the sacrifice, truth itself should dethrone, and should thrive yet, should prosper yet! This complaint I heard one of God's servants making to another, I know not who; and when that other asked how long a cessation of sacrifice the vision portended, how long the estranging guilt, and the defeat, and the profanation, Night first, said he, morning after; two thousand three hundred days it will be, ere the sanctuary is cleansed.⁴

But for me, for Daniel, that saw the vision, understanding of it was none, till one appeared to me that had the semblance of a man, and a voice hailed him from between Ulai gates; For thee it is, Gabriel, to make the vision clear. Came he close,

¹ Literally, 'for a time, and times, and half a time'. This is traditionally interpreted as meaning three-and-a-half, that is, half of the mystical number seven.

² It must be confessed that the historical interpretation of verses 15-27 remains wholly doubtful. It is not even clear whether the four beasts represent four successive empires (like the statue in chapter 2), or four kingdoms existing simultaneously, e.g. the four main divisions of the Macedonian empire after Alexander's death. The little horn is usually identified with Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 175-164), the persecutor of the Machabees; but he was the eighth, not the tenth of his line, and the explanations given of the 'three horns' displaced by him seem curiously forced.

³ According to the Hebrew text, 'the river', and so in verse 16.

⁴ Verses 9-14 (particularly verse 13) are very obscure, and may have suffered from manuscript corruption. At the end of verse 9, the Septuagint Greek has 'the north'; the Hebrew text 'the splendour' (or possibly, 'the gazelle'); the Latin version 'the armies'. Perhaps a word has dropped out, and we should read either 'the armies of heaven', as in verse 10, or 'the land of splendour' as in 11. 16. The reference to night and morning in verse 14 is generally interpreted, according to the Hebrew text, of the evening and morning sacrifices. Some think that we should understand an interval of 1,150 days, involving 2,300 sacrifices.

then, to where I was standing; but I, at his coming, fell down in terror, face to earth. Heed thou well, son of man, said he; what here thou seest, in the last days shall be accomplished. But he spoke to one that lay swooning on the ground; so he must put out his hand, and raise me to my feet.

18 Then he went on: I mean to tell thee how all shall fall out when the days of punishment are over; be sure the end of them is fixed. Horned ram of thy vision rules over the Medes and Persians; buck-goat over the realm of Greece, and the great horn between his eyes is first of the Greek kings.

22 Those four others that grew after its breaking are four kings that shall arise, fellow-countrymen of his, but not his peers.

23 These reigning, the world shall go from bad to worse, till a new king comes to the throne, brazen-faced, a master of riddles.

24 Great power shall he wield, though of that first king not the peer, making havoc beyond belief, thriving and prospering. Strength of arms nor holiness of life shall rescue peoples from his will; all shall go well with crafty scheming of his, till his heart grows proud, and he deals death all about him, when peril is none. And at last with the Prince of princes he shall try conclusions; no human hand it shall be that crushes him down at last. Night comes first, then morning; but the revelation made to thee is a true one; seal it up, till those last days when it must have effect.

27 So much he told me; and for many days after I lay sick; when I was on my feet again, I had the king's business to do, but still I was all dazed by the vision, and there was no interpreting it.

9 Then Darius the Mede, son of As-suerus, was raised to the throne of Chaldaeae; and in the year when his reign began who but I, Daniel, should discover, by the reading of old records, how to compute the seventy years of Jerusalem's widowhood? Such doom the Lord had foretold to the prophet Jeremias. And with that, I turned to the Lord my God; pray to him I would, and sue for mercy, fasting ever, sackcloth and ashes my only wear.

Prayed I then to the Lord my God, and made confession of my sins, in these words following: Mercy, mercy, Lord God, the great, the terrible; to those who love thee, so gracious, with those who keep thy commandments, troth keeping still! Sinned we have, and wronged thee, rebelled we have, and forsaken thee, turned our backs on decree and award of thine, nor heeded thy servants, the prophets, that spoke to us in thy name, to king and prince and the common folk that gendered us. Fault with thee is none; ours, Lord, to blush for the wrong-doing that has offended thee, men of Juda, citizens of Jerusalem, Israel near at hand, Israel banished far away, in what plight thou seest! Blush we, king and prince of ours, fathers of ours that did the wrong; be it thine, O Lord our God, to have mercy and to forgive. So far we have strayed from thee, so deaf to the divine voice, when the prophets that served thee bade us follow thy law! A whole people that would transgress thy command, turn a deaf ear to thy calls! What wonder if it fell on us, drop by drop, the avenging curse God's servant Moses wrote of? Our sins had deserved it, and if yonder unexampled punishment befell Jerusalem, it was but a threat fulfilled; warning we had of it, we and the princes that governed us. No misfortune overtook us, but the law of Moses had foretold it; and yet, O Lord our God, appease thy anger we would not, nor leave our sinning, nor bethink ourselves, how well thy word thou keepest; what wonder if bane, not blessing, the divine regard brought us? Be our punishment what it will, not ours to find fault with the God we have disobeyed.

Thou art the Lord our God, whose constraining power rescued thy people from the land of Egypt, who hast won thyself glory, too, in this our day; we, Lord, have been sinners, we have shewn ourselves unworthy of all thy faithful dealings with us. But wilt thou let thy indignant anger fall on Jerusalem, on that holy mountain of thine? Too long, for our sins and the sins of our fathers before us, all our neighbours have held Jerusalem, and us thy people, in contempt. God of our race, give audience at last to the prayer, the plea thy servant brings before thee; for thy own honour, restore the sanctuary, that now lies forlorn, to the smile of thy favour. My God, give ear and listen to us; open thy eyes, and see how desolate is this city of ours, that claims to be thy own. No merits of ours, nothing but thy great love emboldens us to lay our prayers at thy feet. Thy hearing, Lord, and thy pardon; thy heed, Lord, and thy aid! For thy own honour, my God, deny thyself no longer to the city, the people that is called thy own!¹

¹ In verses 19–26, the great horn is evidently Alexander of Macedon, who died in B.C. 323, and the little horn presumably Antiochus Epiphanes. The Latin version gives two different translations of the same phrase in verses 22 and 24; but it seems likely that we ought to prefer a uniform interpretation; either 'not a match for Alexander's strength', which suits the context best, or 'not by means of their (his) own strength', which is a more natural rendering of the Hebrew. The description of Antiochus Epiphanes is not particularly recognizable.

o Thus prayed I, thus did I confess my own sins, and the sins of my fellow Israelites, pouring out supplication, there in the presence of my God, for that holy mountain which is his dwelling-place. And I was still at my prayer, when the human figure of Gabriel, as I had seen it at the beginning of my vision, flew swiftly to my side; it was the hour of the evening sacrifice when he reached me. And with these words he enlightened me: Daniel, my errand is to instruct thee and give thee discernment. Even as thy prayer began, a secret was disclosed, and I am here to make it known to thee, so well heaven loves thee. Mark well, then, the message, and read the revelation aright. It is ordained that this people of thine, that holy city of thine, should wait seventy weeks before guilt is done away, sin ended, wrong righted; before God's everlasting favour is restored, and the visions and the prophecies come true, and he who is all holiness receives his anointing. Be assured of this, and mark it well; a period of seven weeks must go by, and another period of sixty-two weeks, between the order to rebuild Jerusalem and the coming of the Christ to be your leader. Street and wall will be built again, though in a time of distress; and then sixty-two weeks must pass before the Christ is done to death; the people will disown him and have none of him. Then the army of an invading leader will destroy both city and sanctuary, so that his taking away will mean utter destruction; only a ruin is to be left when that war is ended. High covenant he shall make, before another week is done, and with folks a many; but when that week has run half its course, offering and burnt-sacrifice shall be none; in the temple all shall be defilement and desolation, and until all is over, all is fulfilled, that desolation shall continue.²

10 Then, in the third year of Cyrus' reign, that was king of Persia, a fresh revelation was made to Daniel, who is also called Baltassar. Here is truth indubitable, and a great host. . . And right well he understood its meaning; little avails vision where understanding is none.³

For three weeks together I, Daniel, that saw it, had been making sad cheer; for three weeks together dry bread was my diet, nor ever did meat or wine cross my lips, nor oil anoint me. Came now the twenty-fourth day of the new year, and I stood by the banks of the great river, where it is called Tigris. I looked up, and saw a man standing there clad all in linen, and his girdle of fine gold. Clear as topaz his body was, like the play of lightning shone his face, and like burning cressets his eyes; arms and legs of him had the sheen of bronze, and when he spoke, it was like the murmur of a throng. The vision was for me, for Daniel, alone; my companions never saw it; such fear overcame them, they were fain to hide themselves, and I was left alone with this high vision for my ¹ The prayer of Daniel has several points in common with that of the Jewish people in Bar. i. 15, 2. 13.

² The traditional account given of verses 24-27 is, that Daniel interprets the seventy years of Israel's captivity as seventy weeks of years, and that the periods called 'weeks' are periods of forty-nine years, four hundred and thirty-four years, and seven years respectively, four hundred and ninety in all. The order to rebuild Jerusalem is, quite naturally, identified with that given in II Esd. 2, and dated B.C. 445. This would explain the preoccupation with prophecies about 'the End' which characterizes the outlook of our Lord's contemporaries; Daniel's prophecy was to fall due within the course of that century. It must be admitted, however, that widely different views have been held about the application of the prophecy in detail. Modern commentators, who understand the whole passage as a reference to Antiochus Epiphanes, and the profanation of the Temple in B.C. 167, are driven to very unconvincing explanations of the time-periods involved. Verse 27 is very obscure, and the text seems to have suffered in transmission. 'All shall be defilement and desolation'; literally, 'there shall be abomination of desolation', cf. Mt. 24. 15. ³ The attempts made to explain this verse as it stands are not such as to produce conviction, and it seems likely that there is some corruption or omission in the text.

company. No wonder if my spirits were cowed; pale grew my cheek, and all the strength in me ebbed away. He spoke, and as I listened to that voice, I swooned where I stood, and lay there, face to earth, till a hand touched me, giving fresh impulse to knee and wrist.

Daniel, he said to me, Daniel, so well beloved, up with thee, and heed thou well; I have an errand to thee. Yet for all he spoke thus to me, I stood there trembling, and still he must allay my fears. Take heart, Daniel, said he; thy prayers did not go unheard. Prayer of thine it was beckoned me to thy side, from the very moment when thou didst set about thy search for knowledge, by fasting in the presence of thy God; but these twenty-one days he who guards the realm of Persia has delayed my coming. At last Michael, one of the high lords, brought me aid, and there, at Persia's court, I was left master of the field.¹ Now I am here to tell thee what shall befall thy people in the last days; long days must pass ere the revelation is accomplished.

Ever, as he spoke, I stood there dumb, and with eyes downcast, till all at once a touch fell on my lips, like the touch of human hand.² Now found I speech, to give yonder visitant his answer. Bethink thee, my lord, I said, that sight of thee unknots my frame; strength in me is none. How should slave bandy words with master? Not strength alone fails me; the very breath will not come. Once again a hand seemed to touch me, and words came to hearten me; Nay, fears are not for thee, so well beloved; never harm befall thee! Take courage, and play a man's part! With that, I found my strength again; Speak on, my Lord, said I; thou hast put new heart into me. And he answered, Hast thou read, by this, the secret of my coming to thee? I am even now on my way back to fight against the lord of Persia; when I left him, what saw I but the lord of the Greeks already on the march? Only I must shew thee first what is written in the book of doom.³

Much is to do, and save for Michael, that is guardian of your race, I have none to aid me.

11 Him to strengthen and uphold has been my task,⁴ ever since Darius the Mede began reigning. And now, doom to foreshew thee, a king shall rise in Persia; the fourth from this, rich in great revenue beyond all the others; in the power such wealth gives him, he will set the whole world in motion against the realm of Greece...

And a warrior king shall arise, winning such empire that there is no resisting his will.⁶ Divided that empire shall be, as soon as it is established, between the four quarters of heaven; not sons of his they shall be that rule it, nor peers of his; besides these, foreign lords shall part his dominions between them. The southern kingdom a strong ruler shall have, but of his vassals one shall be mightier than he, and in dominion excel him; wide, wide his domain; until at last these two make terms between them, and, to seal their amity, daughter of Egyptian king to Syrian king must pass.⁷ Yet thrive she may not, nor dynasty of hers endure; herself in due time, with retinue of hers, faction of hers, must be a victim. Not unavenged; scion of her own father's stock shall march on

¹ 'He who guards the realm of Persia'; the reference here, and all through the rest of the chapter, is to the guardian angels of the countries concerned, according to the common opinion. The last clause in this verse is of very doubtful interpretation. ² Literally, 'As it were the semblance of a son of man touched my lips'. This would suggest, at first sight, the presence of a second angelic being, not yet mentioned. But verse 19 probably implies that only one angel is referred to, from verse 5 onwards.

³ Verses 20, 21 do not read naturally, and some think the order of the original text has become dislocated through an accident. ⁴ 'The book of doom'; literally, 'the writing of faithfulness' (i.e. certainty). ⁵ 'Him' probably refers to Michael; but it might be understood of 'the lord of Greece', or even of Darius.

⁶ This king is ordinarily identified with Xerxes (B.C. 485-465). But it is doubtful whether the Hebrew text should not be rendered 'shall set all in motion, the (whole) realm of Greece'; and this might describe the provocation offered to Philip of Macedonia by Artaxerxes III; he might be called the fourth successor of Artaxerxes I, in whose reign Jerusalem was rebuilt. If the interval (of more than a century) between Xerxes and Alexander had been passed over in silence, it may be a prophetic foreshortening of history, or conceivably there has been an omission in the text. ⁷ In verses 3-19, the period from Alexander the Great to Antiochus the Great is sketched in with considerable detail; verse 6 gives the history of Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy II, and verse 17 that of Antiochus' daughter Cleopatra.

⁸ 'Egyptian' and 'Syrian' are 'southern' and 'northern' in the original, all through this chapter (though Egypt is mentioned by name in verses 8, 42 and 43).

8 Syria, and do battle, and prevail; shall carry off to Egypt the images of Syria's gods, its treasures of silver and gold. Then, 9 his rival mastered, with that inroad he shall be content, and to his own kingdom return.

10 To Syria's heirs the quarrel is left; and now there are great hosts a-mustering, under a new king that must ever be hurrying on, like river in flood, returning with spirit to the charge, throwing all his forces into the assault. See with what fury the Egyptian king takes the field against him, rallies a great host of his own, and over Syria's host gains the mastery! Captives a many, dead warriors a many, to gladden his heart, but all to no purpose; back Syria comes, in greater force than ever, ranks filled, and treasures swollen, with the years. All the world will be for picking a quarrel with Egypt then; hot-heads there will be among thy own people who think to fulfil the old prophecies thus, but to their cost. On marches he, yonder Syrian king, raises mound, and makes fortified cities his own; Egypt's vigour is all spent, never a halt, though its best warriors engage him; irresistible he comes, to impose terms on his enemy, sets foot in a noble land¹ and crushes it under his heel. How to gain secure possession of the whole kingdom? A bargain must be struck; gift of a royal bride shall be the land's undoing! But no, that will not serve, never shall it be his. To the sea-coast he turns his thoughts instead, and conquers lands a many; puts to silence the author of his own disgrace, and covers him with disgrace in his turn.² But at last, to his own province turning back, he totters to his fall, and the fame of him is heard no more.

11 To a vile creature his throne must pass, of a throne unworthy; soon shall his end come, and yet no blow struck in anger, or in battle.³ And after him a man little thought of; royal investiture he has none, yet see how stealthy his approach, what shifts he uses to win a throne!⁴ Down go 22 strong armies, crushed before him, down goes covenanted chief;⁵ treaty first, and then treachery; of armed following he needs but little. So he makes his way into rich cities that suspect no harm, outdoes father and grandsire both in havoc, so much wealth to plunder and to squander; into strong cities, too, by crafty devices, while fortune serves. Power of his and 25 policy of his he shall match at last against Egypt, with a great army at his back; alas, Egypt, what avails that great muster of warriors? Craft wins the day; men that 26 feed on thy royal bounty are thy own undoing, and with great slaughter that army of thine is overborne. See where the two 27 kings plot mischief at one table, liars both! But nothing they shall achieve; yet the appointed hour has come. Back goes the 28 king of Syria, enriched with spoil, wreaking his spite on God's covenant as he journeys home; then, when the time is 29 ripe, marches once again southwards. Yet speed he shall not as once he sped; here are Roman galleys⁶ overtaking him, and he must return discomfited.

And now, as he returns, he shall vent his spleen against the holy covenant in good earnest. The forsakers of that covenant have not escaped his eye, and there are 31 willing hands a many to help him profane the inviolable sanctuary, daily sacrifice annulling, spreading defilement and desolation there. Fawning knaves, and traitors 32 to the covenant! But those others, that their God acknowledge, shall go all the more boldly to work, counsellors a few 33 that give right counsel to many. Crippled they shall be for a while, by sword and flame, by prison and plunder; then, even 34 as they are falling, it will need but a little support, and the fickle multitude will rally to their side. What if some of 35 them should fall, those wise counsellors?

¹ The 'noble land', here and in verse 41, is usually understood as meaning Palestine, though Egypt is a possible alternative in either case.

² This verse is very obscure, and in the Hebrew text untranslatable. We should have expected some reference to the defeat of Antiochus by the Romans at Magnesia (B.C. 190).

³ The Hebrew text describes this king as 'causing an exactor to pass through', presumably in allusion to II Mac. 3. 7. But the Septuagint Greek, like the Latin version, contains no such allusion.

⁴ Throughout verses 21-45, the allusions are much less readily traceable than in verses 3-19. Some parts of it at least are generally understood as referring to Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 176-164), but for the most part it would be equally applicable to any persecuting tyrant.

⁵ 'Covenanted chief' perhaps means the high priest Onias III, deposed by Antiochus in B.C. 175.

⁶ So the Septuagint Greek, but the Hebrew text has simply 'ships of Chittim', i.e. from the West. It looks as if the versions had interpreted their original; it is well known that Antiochus was warned off Egyptian soil by the Roman ambassador Popilius Laenas.

Assayed let them be for a little, sifted, purged for a little; there shall be happier times yet.

36 As for the king, he shall have all his own way; in his pride, he will think himself a match for any god, even of that God boast himself the rival, who is above all gods, And still he shall thrive; vengeance is not yet ready to overtake him; doom shall come when doom must. What are his fathers' gods to him? Women's dalliance is all his concern; of gods he reck's little, that will set himself up over all. When his turn comes, it is the god of Maozim¹ he will worship; for such a god, that never his fathers knew, the gold, and the silver, and the precious jewels; with this new-found god to aid him, he will make Maozim his stronghold, shower honours and dignities upon its folk, make a present of lands to them.

40 Then comes the hour of destiny. Egypt shall declare war, and he, the Syrian king, shall sweep down upon it with horse and chariot and a great fleet. Which lands will he invade and conquer, which pass by, ere he reach the noblest of them all? Ruined a many shall be, but Edom shall escape his onslaught, and Moab, and the principedom of Ammon. A country here he will attempt, a country there, and be sure Egypt shall not go unscathed; gold and silver of Egypt, and all its precious treasures shall come into his power. Then, as through Libya and Ethiopia he makes his way, tidings shall come from east and north, to bring him back with all his host, ready for havoc, ready for carnage. See where he sets up his royal pavilion² betwixt sea and sea on yonder noble hill, yonder sacred hill; reaches its very summit, and none brings aid!³

12 Time, then, that Michael should be up and doing; Michael, that high lord who is guardian of thy race. Distress shall then be, such as never was since the world began; and in that hour of distress thy fellow-countrymen shall win deliverance, all whose names are found written when the record lies open. Many shall wake, that now lie sleeping in the dust of earth, some to enjoy life everlasting, some to be confronted for ever with their disgrace. Bright shall be the glory of wise counsellors, as the radiance of the sky above; starry-bright for ever their glory, who have taught many the right way.

For thyself, Daniel, keep this revelation locked away; sealed up the record of it must be until the hour appointed. Leave others to hasten to and fro, in search of knowledge.⁴

Thus he spoke; and now, looking up, I saw two others that stood there, one on either bank of the stream. But he, the man clad in linen, stood there yet over the river itself; and when I asked how long these wondrous doings should last, it was from him I had my answer. Both hands raised to heaven, he swore by the God who lives for ever that there should be an end to it; it should last for a space of time, and for twice as long, and for half as long, no more. Strength of God's holy people must be broken utterly; when that is over, all is over and done.⁵ So I had my answer, but still could not tell the meaning of it; Ay, my Lord, I said, but what shall be the end of it all? Nay, Daniel, said he, no more of this; needs must that this revelation be shut away and sealed up, till the appointed hour comes; and still there shall be chosen souls a many, that are purged by the fire's assaying, and still there are sinners that will not leave their sinning. The riddle, for these others, a riddle must remain, but wise counsellors there be that will find the clue to it. Of this be sure; after the time when the daily sacrifice is abrogated, and all becomes defilement and desolation, twelve hundred and ninety days must pass. Blessed shall his lot be that waits patiently till twelve hundred and thirty five days are over.⁶ And for thyself, Daniel, go thy way

¹ 'Maozim'; or perhaps, 'fortresses'. But it is difficult to understand who are meant by 'them' in verse 39 if Maozim is not a proper name. We do not meet the name elsewhere; on the other hand, attempts to identify the 'god of fortresses' are not altogether convincing. ² The Latin version here trans literates, 'his pavilion Apadno'.

³ The Hebrew text is generally understood as meaning 'he reaches his end, and there is none to bring him aid'. ⁴ The last part of this verse cannot be rendered with any certainty. ⁵ Here too the end of the verse is variously interpreted.

⁶ The figures given in verses 11 and 12, like those given in 8. 14, are mysteriously uncoordinated with the 'time, times and half a time' which is elsewhere given as the time-unit. Cf. Apoc. 12. 6, 14 and 13. 5, where the time-unit is consistent.

... till the end; till the end of the days rest thou shalt, and rise to fulfil thy appointed destiny.¹

13 There was a man called Joakim living in Babylon, married to one Susanna, daughter of Helcias.² This was a woman of great beauty, and one that feared God, so well had her parents, religious folk, schooled their daughter in the law of Moses. A rich man was Joakim, and had a fruit-garden close to his house; and he was much visited by the Jews, among whom there was none more honoured than he. There came a year in which those two elders of the people were appointed judges, of whom the Lord said, Wickedness has sprung up in Babylon, and the roots of it are those elders and judges who claim to rule the people.³ These two were often at Joakim's house, and all those who had disputes to settle appeared before them there. At noon, when the common folk had returned home, Susanna would walk about in her husband's garden, and these two elders, who saw her go in and walk there day after day, fell to lusting after her. Reason they dethroned, and turned away their eyes from the sight of heaven; its just awards they would fain have forgotten. The love that tortured both, neither to other would disclose; confess it for very shame they might not, this hankering after a woman's favours; yet day after day they seized the opportunity to have sight of her. A day came at last when one said to the other, Home go we, it is dinner-time; and go they did, taking their several ways; yet both returned hot-foot to their watching-place, and there met one another. So there was questioning on both sides, and out came the story of their lust; and now they made common cause; at a suitable time they would waylay her together, when she was alone.

They watched, then, for their opportunity; and she, as her custom was, went out one day with two of her maids, and had a mind to bathe, there in the garden, for it was summer weather, and none was by except the two elders; and they were in hiding, watching her. So she bade her servants go and bring her oil and soap, and shut the garden door while she was a-bathing. Her whim was obeyed; shut the door of the garden they did, and went out by a back entrance to bring her what she had asked for; they knew nothing of the elders that were hiding there within. And these two, as soon as the servants were gone, rose from their hiding-place and ran to her side. See, they told her, the garden door is shut, and there is no witness by. We are both smitten with a desire for thy favours; come, then, let us enjoy thee. Refuse, and we will bear witness that thou hadst a gallant here, and this was the reason thou wouldst rid thyself of thy hand-maidens' company.

Whereupon Susanna groaned deeply; There is no escape for me, she said, either way. It is death if I consent, and if I refuse, I shall be at your mercy. Let me rather fall into your power through no act of mine, than commit sin in the Lord's sight. With that, Susanna cried aloud, and the elders, too, began crying shame on her; meanwhile, one of them ran to the garden door and opened it. And now the servants of the house, hearing such outcry in the garden, came running in through the back entrance to know what was afoot; and they were greatly abashed when the elders told their story; never before had Susanna been defamed thus.

When the morrow came, there was a throng of people in Joakim's house, and the two elders were there, intent upon their malicious design against Susanna's life. They asked publicly that Susanna, daughter of Helcias and wife to Joakim, should be sent for; sent for she was, and came out with her parents and her children and all her kindred. So dainty she was, and so fair, these two knaves would have her let down her veil, the better to enjoy the sight of her charms. All her friends, all her acquaintances, were in tears. Then the two elders rose amidst the throng, and laid their hands upon Susanna's head, while she, weeping, looked up to heaven, in token that her heart had not lost confidence in the

¹ This verse is very obscure, and perhaps corrupt. The latter part of it is usually interpreted as meaning that Daniel will die and rise again to happiness in a future life; but if so all the words in it are used in an unaccustomed sense.

² This chapter, with chapter 14, is preserved in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text.

³ Some think this is an allusion to Jer. 29. 21-23.

36 Lord. We were walking in the garden apart, said the elders, when this woman came out with two hand-maidens. She had the garden door shut close, and sent 37 the maidens away; whereupon a young man, who had been in hiding till then, 38 came out and had his will with her. We,
 from a nook in the garden, saw what foul deed was being done, and ran up close, so 39 that we had full view of their dalliance; but lay hold of the man we could not; he was too strong for us, opening the garden door 40 and springing out. The woman we caught, and asked her who her gallant was, but she would not tell us. To all this, we bear witness.

41 They were elders, they were judges of the people, and they persuaded the assembly, without more ado, to pass the death sentence. Whereupon Susanna cried 42 aloud, Eternal God, no secret is hidden from thee, nothing comes to pass without 43 thy foreknowledge. Thou knowest that these men have borne false witness against me; wilt thou let me die, a woman innocent of all the charges their malice has in-44 vented? And the Lord listened to her plea; 45 even as she was being led off to her death, all at once he roused to utterance the holy spirit that dwelt in a young boy there, 46 called Daniel. This Daniel raised his voice and cried out, I will be no party to the 47 death of this woman; and when all the people turned upon him, asking what he 48 meant, he stood there in their midst, and said, Are you such fools, men of Israel, as to condemn an Israelite woman without trial, without investigation of the truth?
 49 Go back to the place of judgement; the witness they have borne against her is false witness.

50 Eagerly enough the people went back, and the elders would have Daniel sit with them, such credit God had given him be-51 yond his years. He bade them part the two men, at a distance from each other, while 52 he questioned them. So parted they were, and when the first was summoned, thus Daniel greeted him: Grown so old in years, and years ill spent! Now, that past sinning 53 of thine has found thee out, a man that perverts justice, persecutes innocence, and lets the guilty go free. Has not the Lord said, Never shalt thou put the innocent man, the upright man, to death? Thou 54 foundest her; good; they met under a tree; tell us what kind of tree. And he answered, Under a mastic-tree I surprised them. The right word! cried Daniel, 55 prized asunder thyself shall be, when God bids his angel requite thee for this calumny.

 Then he had this one removed, and bade 56
 the other come near. Brood of Chanaan, said he, and no true son of Juda, so beauty ensnared thee? So lust drove thy heart astray? Such approaches you have made, 57 long since, to women of the other tribes, and they, from very fear, admitted your suit; but you could not bring a woman of Juda to fall in with your wicked design.
 And now tell me, under what tree it was 58
 thou didst find them talking together?
 Under a holm-oak, said he, I saw them.
 The right word again! cried Daniel. Saw 59 thee asunder the angel of the Lord will,
 with the sharp blade he carries yonder;
 you are both dead men.

And with that, the whole multitude 60 cried aloud, blessing God that is the deliverer of those who trust in him. And they 61 turned on the two elders, by Daniel's questioning self-convicted of false witness; served they must be as they would have 62 obeyed; so they put them to death. That day, an innocent life was saved. Good 63 cause had Helcias and his wife to praise God for their daughter Susanna, good cause had Joakim and all his friends; no 64 breath of suspicion assailed her now. And as for Daniel, he was in high favour with all the people from that day forward.

When king Astyages became part of his 65 line, it was Cyrus, the Persian, succeeded him.¹

14 Of this king, Daniel was the courtier, and valued above all his other friends. A great idol there was, that the 2 men of Babylon worshipped; Bel was the name of it, and day by day it must be fed with thirty-two bushels of fine flour, and forty sheep, and of wine thirty-six gallons.
 The king himself honoured it with the 3 rest, and no day passed but he went to pay it reverence. A time came when he asked

¹ This verse evidently belongs to the next chapter. But it only gives us a loose historical reference; it was only after he had been king of Media for twelve years that Cyrus conquered Babylon.

Daniel, that worshipped no God but his own, why Bel he would not worship; and this answer Daniel made him, that for idols made by men's hands worship he had none, only for that living God that made heaven and earth, and of all mankind held the sovereignty. What, cried the king, wilt thou have it Bel is not a living god? Hast thou no eyes for the great trencherman he is, day in, day out, of food and drink both?

Nay, my lord king, Daniel answered with a smile, give no heed to false tales. Clay he is within, and bronze without; I warrant thee, eat he cannot. Whereupon the king, in high displeasure, summoned Bel's priests. You shall give account, said he, of yonder revenues, and that on pain of your lives. Who is it has the eating of them? Prove to me it is Bel himself, and Daniel shall die instead, that blasphemed him. As it pleases the king's grace, said Daniel.

Seventy of these priests there were, that had wives and children to fend for besides. And when the king reached their temple, with Daniel in attendance, this challenge they offered: Withdraw we, as thou seest; for thee it is, lord king, to set food, pour out wine, lock and seal door with thy own hand. To-morrow, come thou and find aught left over from Bel's banqueting, we die for it; or else Daniel dies, that so traduced us. Lightly enough the challenge was made; had they not provided a hidden entrance-way, close under the god's table, by which they came in and ate what eat they would? So out they went, and the king set on Bel's viands with his own hand; and what did Daniel? He would have his servants bring ashes, and scatter them all over the temple floor, there in the king's presence. Which done, all withdrew, leaving the door locked, and the royal seal upon it. And that night in they came as came they ever, priest and priest's wife and priest's children, and left neither bite nor sup between them.

Next day, the king was early abroad, and Daniel with him. What of the seals, Daniel? the king asked. Are they unbroken? Ay, my lord king, unbroken yet. What a cry was that the king gave, when he opened the door and caught sight of the table within! A great god thou art, Bel, said he, and no deceiver! But Daniel smiled, and would not have the king go in yet; Look about thee, he said, and ask thyself who it was left their prints on yonder floor. Why, cried the king, these be foot-prints of living men, and women and children besides! With that, he fell into a rage; priest and priest's wife and priest's children must be taken into custody. And when these had shewed him the door by which they came in and swept the table bare of its offerings, he put the whole company of them to death. And as for Bel, he left him to Daniel's mercy, who threw down image and temple both.

There was a great serpent, too, in those parts that was worshipped by the folk of Babylon; and of this the king said to Daniel, here at least was a god that lived; gainsay that he could not, and therefore he needs must worship. Nay, said Daniel, my own God I worship still; living God is none but he. Here is no living God; let me but have the royal warrant, and I will make an end of it, and neither sword nor club to help me. So the king gave his warrant, and what did Daniel? Pitch and fat and hairs he boiled all together, and with lumps of this fed the serpent, which thereupon burst all to pieces; and, Here, said Daniel, is your god.

Angry men were the folk of Babylon when they heard of these doings, and they made their way into the royal presence, crying out, Here is the king himself turned Jew! Here is Bel overthrown, and the dragon slain, and our priests massacred! And when they found audience, Give up Daniel to us, they said, or we will make an end of thee, and thy household with thee. The king, finding their onslaught so determined, gave up Daniel to them against his will; and they threw him into a pit in which lions were kept, where he spent six whole days. Seven lions there were in the pit, and each day two human bodies were given them as food, and two sheep; but now they were kept unfed, so that Daniel might be their prey.

Far away, in Judaea, the prophet Habacuc had been making broth, and crumbling bread in a great bowl, and was even now carrying it to the reapers on the farm; when suddenly the angel of the Lord said to him, Take the dinner thou hast with thee to Babylon, and give it to Daniel; he 34 is in the lion-pit. Lord, said Habacuc, I was never yet in Babylon, and know 35 nothing of any lion-pit there. Upon which the angel of the Lord caught at his head and lifted him by the hair of it; then by the force of his impulse, set him down in 36 Babylon, close to the pit. So Habacuc cried out, Daniel! Servant of God! The Lord has sent thee thy dinner; come and 37 take it. And Daniel said, Thou wouldst not forget me, O God, wouldst not forsake 38 such as love thee. So he rose and ate, while the angel of the Lord brought Habacuc, all at once, back to his home.

39 When the seventh day came, the king went out to mourn for Daniel; and now, reaching the pit and looking in, he saw Daniel seated there among the lions. And 40 at that, the king cried aloud, How great thou art, O Lord, thou who art Daniel's God! And he took him out of the lion-pit, and shut up there instead the men who had 41

conspired to ruin him; and in a moment,
as he watched, the lions devoured them.
Whereupon the king said, Well may the 42
whole world stand in awe of Daniel's God.
What deliverance he effects, what signal proofs of his power, here on earth, the God who has rescued Daniel out of a den of lions!

THE PROPHECY OF OSEE

THIS is the message which came from the Lord to Osee, son of Beeri, during the reigns of Ozias, Joathan, Achaz and Ezechias in Juda, and during the reign of Jeroboam, son of Joas, in Israel.

2 When first the divine voice made itself heard through Osee, this was the command given him: Wanton wed thou, wantons breed thou; in a wanton land thou dwellest, that keeps troth with its Lord never. So it was he came to marry Gomer, a daughter of Debelaim.¹ When he got her with child, and she bore him a son, This one, the Lord told him, thou art to call Jezrahel; at Jezrahel the blood was spilt² for which, ere long, Jehu's line must be punished, and Israel have kings no more; in Jezrahel valley, my doom is, bow of Israel shall be broken. And next, she was brought to bed of a daughter; of whom the Lord said, Unbefriended call her, in token that I will befriend Israel no longer, heed them no longer. To Juda I will be a friend yet, not with bow or sword of theirs delivering them, not in battle, with horse or horseman to give aid, but by the power of the Lord their God only.

8 Unbefriended, then, was the name of her; and after she was weaned, once more Gomer conceived, and had a son. This time the command was, Call him Strange-folk; no longer shall you be my people, or I be your...³

10 ... Measureless the race of Israel shall be and countless as the sand by the seashore. In the very place where once the doom was uttered, You are but strangers to me, they shall be welcomed as sons of the living God. As one people, Juda and Israel shall be rallied, under a leader of their common choice; and they shall come flocking from every corner of the land; such great doings there shall be at Jezrahel.

2 God's-folk and Befriended, these are the names they should have by rights, brother and sister of yours. Blame her, blame your mother, that she is no true wife of mine, nor I any longer her Lord. Must she still flaunt the harlot's face of her, the wantonness of her breasts? Must I strip her, leave her naked as babe new-born, leave her desolate as the barren waste, the trackless desert, to die of thirst? Those children of hers, must I needs leave them unpitied, the children of her shame?

Harlot mother of theirs brought reproach on the womb that bore them; Haste I away, she said, to those gallants of mine, the gods of whose gift bread comes to me, and water, wool and flax, oil and wine! See if I do not hedge her way about with thorns, fence in her prospect, till way she can find none! Then, it may be, when her gallants she courts in vain, searches for them in vain, she will have other thoughts: Back go I to the husband that was mine once; things were better with me in days gone by.

Yet it was, did she but know it, that bread and wine and oil gave her, gave her all the silver and gold she squandered on Baal. And now I mean to revoke the gift; no harvest for her, no vintage; I will give wool and flax a holiday, that once laboured to cover her shame; no gallant of hers but shall see and mock at it; such is my will, and none shall thwart me. Gone the days of rejoicing, the days of solemnity; gone is new moon, and sabbath, and festival; vine and fig-tree blighted, whose fruit, she told herself, was but the hire those lovers paid;

¹ It is not clear whether the transactions here described took place in real life, or in a vision.

² This perhaps refers to the massacres described in IV Kg. 10. 1-11. ³ It seems almost certain that there is an omission at the end of verse 9, the word 'God' being needed to complete the sense. It may be questioned whether the gap is not more considerable. We should expect more information about the history of Osee's family, to prepare us for the allusions of chapters 2 and 3; meanwhile, the abrupt change of situation in verses 10 and 11 appears to demand some kind of introduction. Some think verses 10 and 11 have been accidentally misplaced, and belong to the end of chapter 2.

all shall be woodland, for the wild beasts 13 to ravage as they will. Penance she must do for that hey-day of idolatry, when the incense smoked, and out she went, all rings and necklaces, to meet her lovers, the gods of the country-side, and for me, the Lord says, never a thought!

14 It is but love's stratagem, thus to lead her out into the wilderness; once there, it shall be all words of comfort. Clad in vineyards that wilderness shall be, that vale of sad memory¹ a passage-way of hope; and a song shall be on her lips, the very music of her youth, when I rescued her from 16 Egypt long ago. Husband she calls me now, the Lord says, Master no longer; that name I stifle on her lips; master-gods of the country-side must all be forgotten.² 18 Beast and bird and creeping thing to peace pledge I; bow and sword and war's alarms break I; all shall sleep safe abed, the folk that dwell in her.

19 Everlastingly I will betroth thee to myself, favour and redress and mercy of mine thy dowry; by the keeping of his troth thou shalt learn to know the Lord. When that day comes, heaven shall win answer, the Lord says, answer from me; and from 22 heaven, earth; and from earth, the corn and wine and oil it nourishes; and from 23 these, the people of my sowing.³ Deep, deep I will sow them in the land I love; a friend, now, to her that was Unbefriended; to a people that was none of mine I will say, Thou art my people, and they to me, Thou art my God.

3 The Lord's word came to me: To wife that will have gallants a-courting her, shew thyself a lover yet. The Lord is yet Israel's lover, that has no eyes but for alien gods, leaves grape for husk.⁴

2 So buy her back to me I must, fifteen pieces of silver paying for her ransom, and 3 a core and a half of barley. A long time thou must wait for me, I told her, thy wantonness leaving, yet still unwed; and I will wait for thee as faithfully.

A long time the sons of Israel must wait, neither king nor prince to rule them, neither sacrifice nor shrine to worship at, neither sacred mantle nor their own images to consult. Then they will come back, and to the Lord, their own God, betake them, and to David that is their true king; the Lord, and the Lord's goodness, holds them spell-bound at last.

4 Listen, sons of Israel, to a message from the Lord, notice of a suit he prefers against all that dwell in this land of yours; a land where loyalty, and tenderness of heart, and knowledge of God is none. Curse they and lie, murder they and steal and live adulterously, till there is no checking it; never feud ends but another feud begins. What wonder the land lies widowed, and its folk dwindle; gone, beast and bird, and the sea-beach piled high with fish? Nay, let us have no recriminations between man and man; so should this people of thine fall to railing at their priests! Ruin for thee, sir priest, this day, and, come night, the prophet shall share thy ruin;⁵ name of the mother that bore thee shall perish, as, through thy fault, this people of mine perishes for want of knowledge. Knowledge wouldst thou spurn, and shall not I spurn thy priesthood; my law wouldst thou forget, and shall race of thine be spared oblivion? Priests a many, and sins to match their number; shall that title bring glory any longer, and not reproach? Fault if Israel committed, guilt if Israel incurred, it was but the meat and drink such priests craved for.⁶ Priest, now, shall fare no better than people; he shall pay for his ill living, reap what his false aims deserve; greed, that remained still unsated, wantonness, that could never have enough. Ah, faithless guardians, that you should play your Lord false!⁷ That dalliance, and wine, and revelry, should so steal away your wits!

¹ Literally, 'the vale of Achor', see Jos. 7. 26. It may be, however, that no historical allusion is intended; the valley in question is mentioned by Isaiah (65. 10) in a quite general context. ² A Hebrew wife would address her husband as her ba'al, i.e. 'proprietor'; the same word was used for those proprietary gods who were supposed to control the harvest, the vintage, etc. ³ 'The people of my sowing'; literally, 'Jezrahel' (i.e. God has sown). It seems clear that the word, an echo of the foregoing chapter, is used here as a kind of cipher-word for 'Israel'.

⁴ 'Leaves grape for husk'; or perhaps 'offers raisin-cakes' idolatrously. ⁵ The text of verses 4 and 5 is barely translatable, and is widely suspected of being corrupt. The word 'priest' only occurs once in the original, but there is no telling whether it is meant to be the last word of verse 4 or the first of verse 5; possibly it occurred in both places and, through inadvertence, was written once instead of twice. ⁶ Unless the prophet is using a somewhat violent metaphor, there is probably an allusion to the sacrifices offered in expiation, when the law had been transgressed, and to the priests' share in them.

⁷ The interpretation of this verse is very uncertain.

12 And what of my people? See where they have recourse to tree-stump or senseless wand, for an answer to their perplexities! Lust for strange worship swept them away, made them false to their troth with 13 God; on mountain and hill-side, grateful for leafy shade of oak, poplar or terebinth, they slay the victim, and burn incense. What wonder daughters should turn harlot, wives play the wanton? Harlot daughter and adulterous wife shall go unpunished; what did father and husband, but keep harlots' company, share revel with consecrated minions? Want wit, be sure a people is ruined.

15 Wanton though Israel be, at least let Juda shun the wrong; not for them the way that leads to Galgal, Bethaven's pilgrimage, or the oath taken by the living God...¹

16 Stubborn as frisking heifer, Israel turns away the head; would you have the Lord feed him, like a cade lamb, unconfined?

17 Wedded to idols, this Ephraim; go his own way he must; here be revellers that will keep their own company, here be idolaters in grain, and princes that dote still on their 19 own disgrace. Ay, but a storm is coming that shall carry them away on its wings, to rue the unavailing sacrifice.²

5 Priest and people, hear and heed!

And you, too, mark it well, men of the court; whose but yours the blame, if there are snares on every commanding height,³

2 if Thabor itself is ringed with toils, and your quarry is driven down to the depths?

3 But to all alike comes the warning. Think you that I have no eyes for Ephraim's wantonness? that Israel escapes my scrutiny, Israel, so defiled? Return to the Lord? Not for such hearts the message; lust for strange worship is there, and of the Lord they reck nothing. Self-condemned, < the pride of Israel; what wonder Israel... and Ephraim should be entangled in guilt?⁴ Juda itself shall not escape their downfall. All their flocks and herds shall not win them access to the Lord; he stands aloof from them, sinners that have defied 7 him; a bastard brood, that ere yonder moon rises new shall be disinherited and brought to nothing.⁵

The trumpet, there, in Gabaa; at Rama 8 sound for battle; let Bethaven echo with the rallying-cry! Benjamin, to arms! Alas 9 for Ephraim, in the hour of punishment left forlorn! Mine to teach Israel's tribes a lesson of faithfulness. And what of 10 Juda's chieftains? A neighbour's landmark scrupled they never to remove; on these, too, the full flood of my vengeance shall come down. Poor Ephraim, ever 11 since he set his face towards the mire, all is oppression with him, all is judgement gone amiss. And all the while I, none other, 12 wear away strength of Ephraim and Juda alike; moth nor canker so surely! What 13 did Ephraim, in his great sickness, what did Juda, bound hand and foot? To Assyria Ephraim would despatch envoys, to yonder ruthless king; but heal you he 14 could not, nor unbind. Mine the encounter Ephraim has to fear, and Juda both; lion's dam nor whelp mauls prey and carries it off so inexorably. All in a 15 moment come and gone whence I came! Who knows if weariness will drive you back to my presence?⁶

6 Ay, in their distress they will be waiting full early at my door; Back to the Lord! will be their cry; salve he only 2 can bring, that wounded us; hand that smote us shall heal. Dead men to-day and 3 to-morrow, on the third day he will raise us up again, to live in his presence anew.

¹ It seems clear that the verse, as it stands, is incomplete, and some think a reference to Bersabee has fallen out (cf. Am. 5. 5). The reference to an oath, even so, is puzzling; but cf. Am. 8. 14. ² In verses 18 and 19, once more the accuracy of the Hebrew text may be doubted; in verse 18, no sense can be made of it at all.

³ The 'commanding height' may also be read as a proper name, Maspha. It is not clear whether the hills are mentioned merely as a setting for the metaphor, or as places where idolatrous worship was in fact conducted.

⁴ 'Israel' and 'Ephraim' are strict synonyms; it looks as if a verb might have fallen out in the manuscripts. ⁵ Literally, 'They have begotten alien children; now a month shall devour them with their territory', an obscure phrase which is perhaps corrupt.

⁶ The situation in verses 8-15 is not easy to envisage. It would appear that a common danger threatened the two kingdoms; Juda is invited to bring aid to Israel (verse 8), but fails to do so (verse 9), and perhaps even takes advantage of Israel's embarrassments to make territorial acquisitions (verse 10). It is hard to see whence the threat can have come, if not from Assyria; verse 13 therefore probably indicates, not an appeal to Assyria for help, but an attempt to buy off the invader, such as that made by king Menahem (IV Kg. 15. 19).

Acknowledge we, cease we never to acknowledge the Lord, he will reveal himself, sure as the dawn, come back to us, sure as the rains of winter and spring come 4 back to the earth. What way will serve with you, men of Ephraim? Juda, what way will serve? Ruth of yours is but momentary, fades like the early mist, like 5 morning dew. What wonder I should send prophets first, to shape men to my will if they could, and then utter my sentence of ruin? Believe me, this doom of thine shall 6 be clear as daylight. A tender heart wins favour with me, not sacrifice; God's acknowledging, not victim's destroying; and these be very children of Adam, keep troth they cannot, here is a land where my will is 8 set at defiance.¹ What is Galaad but a stronghold of idolatry, bedabbled with 9 footprints of blood? Nor much imports it, company of priests thou meet on Sichem road, or troop of robbers thirsting for men's lives; be sure there is mischief 10 afoot;² foul deeds I see done in Israel.³ 11 Ephraim so wanton, Israel so defiled; and, Juda, what of thyself? For thee, no harvest?⁴

When I restore my people from exile . . .

7 When I would grant⁵ healing to Israel . . .

Foul shews the guilt of Ephraim, Samaria's malice is plain to view. What a workshop of wrong-doing is here, all thieving within doors, all robbery without!
 2 Let them never complain I am too nice over the chronicling of their misdeeds; why, they blazon these ill designs of theirs, 3 under my very eyes! King himself there is no pleasing but by villainy, nor his nobles but by flattering speeches; false is every one of them to his troth. What else is this whole realm but baker that lights his fire, and then takes a rest from his kneading, leaves yeast to spread as it will? Huzza for our king?⁶ Ay, but see how the princes fall to their carousing, and he himself reaches out for the wine, reckless as they! Their scheming adds fuel to the fire; are there not plots afoot? Sleeps baker the long night through, and morning finds him flaming hot like the rest. A very furnace the city is; ruler may not abide nor king stand before the heat of it, and never a man among them invokes my name! What wonder Ephraim should throw in his lot with the Gentiles? No better than a girdle-cake is Ephraim, baked only on one side.⁷

Foreign neighbours, all unawares, have drained the strength of him; the dark locks, all unawares, dappled with grey; and even now self-condemned stands the pride of Israel;⁸ return to the Lord, recourse to the Lord is none, even now. Never silly dove so lost her wits as this Ephraim, now calling on Egypt, now turning to Assyria for aid! Fatal the journey; my net I mean to spread over them, catch them as in the fowler's snare; public the chastisement shall be, as public the warning. Dearly they shall pay for their wandering from me, ruin follow on the heels of rebellion; I their ransom, and they so false! Never do their hearts cry out to me; growl they like beast in den, or beast-like eat and drink and chew the cud; me they have forsaken.⁹ Now I chasten them, now I

¹ There is considerable reason to think that the text of verses 7-11 has suffered from corruption in the manuscript. Verse 7 reads literally, 'These, like Adam, have sinned; they have behaved treacherously towards me there'—the last word suggests that a place name should appear in the first half of the verse, possibly Adom (Jos. 3, 16). ² This verse is untranslatable in the Hebrew text as it stands, and the Latin version of it offers no grammatical construction. ³ Literally, 'in the house of Israel', perhaps a false reading for 'in Bethel'. ⁴ Verse 11 remains wholly obscure; some think the latter part of it really belongs to chapter 7. ⁵ So the Latin version, but the Hebrew text and the Septuagint Greek are more naturally translated, 'When I grant'. It seems doubtful, therefore, whether the first seven words of the verse really fit on to what follows. ⁶ 'Huzza for our king'; literally, 'The day of our king'; cf. IV Kg. 9, 13. ⁷ The allegory from cooking seems to be a double one; the baker (apparently the people of Israel) goes to sleep and lets the fire blaze up, instead of keeping a moderate heat, and at the same time he does not finish kneading the dough, so that the result is a half-baked state of things. The application is not easily made; but perhaps the passage reflects the disappointment of God-fearing people at the relapse of Jehu's dynasty into idolatry, after the overthrow of Ahab's Baal-worship. The ruling class, it seems to be intimated, are too strong for the new sovereigns, and the old ways come back again. ⁸ 'Self-condemned stands the pride of Israel'; the same words are used as in 5, 5 above, but the Latin version here has 'The pride of Israel shall be humbled before his very eyes'. It seems unlikely that we are meant to vary the interpretation in this way. ⁹ Literally, 'And they did not cry out to me with their heart, but howled in their beds, chewed the cud over wheat and wine, departed from me'. If 'chewed the cud' is the right interpretation of the rare verb used, we must suppose that the Israelites are being compared to dumb beasts. But it seems likely that the text is corrupt.

strengthen their hands, and still they have 16 no thought for me but of hatred; ever they step back from the yoke,¹ like a twisted bow recoil.

Put to the sword their nobles must be, railing tongues the ruin of them. This the taunt that shall be uttered against them in the land of Egypt...

8 The trumpet to thy mouth! Eagle's wings threatening the Lord's domain! Conscious of faith forsworn, of my 2 law defied, to me Israel cries out, My God! cries out, We acknowledge thee!² 3 Estranged, poor Israel, from the good that was his, and the enemy pressing hard upon
 him.

4 Kings a many, and with no warrant from me; princes a many, that were none of my choosing; idols a many, of their own gold and silver minted; here is cause 5 enough for their undoing. Cast calf, Samaria, is yonder calf of thine; for this burning affront, it shall be long ere thou 6 canst find acquittal. Israel gave birth to it, this calf of Samaria, that came of man's fashioning, and god is none; it shall be beaten fine as filigree.

7 Sow the wind, reap the whirlwind;
 empty stook is empty bin, and here if grain is any, alien folk shall have the eating of it!

8 Poor Israel, already engulfed, the heathen all around making a despised tool of him!

9 Lone as wild ass in the desert, to Assyria he betakes himself; if mate he would, he must 10 pay for his dalliance. Well, hire they mercenaries where they will, they shall be cooped up in their own land none the less,
 and have respite from the exactions of king and nobles both.³

11 So many the altars Ephraim has, and they shall increase his guilt, none of them 12 but shall increase his guilt; so many the laws I gave him, and all alike went unrecognized. Appointed sacrifice⁴ they still 13 offer, flesh of the sacrifice still eat, but the Lord will have none of it; no more their guilt shall go unrecorded, their sins unpunished; Egypt once again for them! The 14 God that made them forgotten, Israel builds shrine and Juda stronghold still;

 but the fire I am kindling shall fall upon Juda's cities, shall devour them, citadel and all.

9 No rejoicing, Israel, no cries of gladness now! Wouldst thou be like the heathen, and rejoice that thou hast played thy God false, ever selling thy favours to the first comer, in return for a full threshing-floor?⁵ Not for such reapers harvest 2 and vintage; the wanton must go without her wine; dispeopled, now, the Lord's 3 territory, Ephraim back in Egypt again, or tasting, among the Assyrians, unhallowed food. Libation shall be none to win the 4 Lord's favour, nor any sacrifice; bread of theirs shall be as the bread mourners eat, defiling to the lips; fill their bellies it may,
 but into the Lord's house it cannot enter.
 5 Alas, what shift will you make when the great days come round, the Lord's festi-6 vivals? Ruin fell on the citizens, and they are gone; Egypt the home of them now, Memphis the tomb of them; bows that shone with silver the nettles have claimed, burdocks grow in the doorways.

Close at hand the audit-day, the doom 7 close at hand! And wouldst thou know, Israel, why prophet is turned fool, and he can but rave now that once was inspired?
 God's heavy plague is this for thy much sinning; prophet of thine, watchman of 8 thine, Ephraim, is a snare at every turn, luring thee to thy ruin, and at God's decree; he stands there in God's house, a plague to thee. So deep the canker of their 9 sin; Gabaa itself never knew worse wrong.

¹ The Hebrew text is usually interpreted as meaning, 'they return, (but) not upwards', a phrase which leaves a good deal to the imagination. The latter part of the verse, if the text is genuine, can hardly be understood except on the supposition that some words have fallen out at the end of it. ² As before, it is difficult to feel certain that the text has been preserved in its original state. Literally, the passage reads:

'To thy palate the horn, like an eagle upon the house of the Lord, because they have overstepped my covenant and transgressed about my law, to me they shall cry out, My God, we recognize thee, Israel.'

³ Literally, 'Even if they hire among the nations, now I will collect them, and they shall cease for a little from the burden of king and nobles'. Verses 7-10 are best explained if we suppose that Jeroboam II only won his victories against Syria at the price of calling in Assyrian aid; this meant burdening the people with taxation and, ultimately, forfeiting the national independence. ⁴ 'Appointed sacrifice'; this seems the most probable translation of a rare word in the Hebrew text, for which the Latin version only gives us a rough equivalent. ⁵ Literally, 'loving hire upon all the threshing-floors of wheat'.

There can be little doubt that the reference is to the worship of the countryside gods, or Baalim, who were supposed to have a special influence over the harvest.

For the remembered guilt of it they shall be called to account.¹

10 When I kept tryst with Israel long ago, rare the encounter, as of grapes out in the desert, of spring figs a-ripening high up on the tree. And all at once to Beelphegor they betook themselves, sold honour for shame, caught foul contagion from the things they loved! Light as bird on bough, Ephraim's glory has come and gone; womb is none that breeds, or, breeding, bears;

12 ay, though they should bring sons to manhood, childless their race shall be, nameless among men.

13 Woe betide them indeed, when I withdraw my presence from them! Ephraim's land, so fair a garden, as I look out over it towards Tyre! And must Ephraim rear her sons for the slaughter-house?² Thy gift to them, Lord, what is the best gift they can have of thee? A womb, assuredly, that miscarries, and dried-up breasts! See where, at Galgal, their offence comes to a head; there it is they have made an enemy of me. They shall dwell in my domain no longer, claim love from me no longer; chieftains of theirs are no vassals of mine.

16 On Ephraim blight has fallen; withered the root now, wizened the fruit; beget they, doom of death is on their offspring, so dearly loved. Cast away, my God, from thy presence, because heed thee they would not, cast away to wander homeless through the world!

10 A spreading vine is yonder vine of Israel, and fruit of him matches leaf. Rich, fertile soil; alas, how rich in altars, in sacred trees how fertile! A race half loyal, half false, but the penalty must be paid in full; those altars God himself will devote to extinction, strip those trees bare.³

King we have none, you say; God we fear not; what of the great king? What will he do to us? All is vain promise and making of treaties; never a furrow in your land but shall yield the bitter fruit of punishment.⁴

Calif⁵ of Bethaven, the folk of Samaria once honoured, what ado is here! Mourns people and writhes priest at the passing of its glory; carried off, now, into Assyria, for the pleasure of a ruthless king; fooled is Ephraim, Israel's hopes have played him false. Like foam on the river Samaria sees her king pass by; and with that, vanish the hill-shrines of false worship, Israel's darling sin; grows thorn and thistle on their altars; no prayer have the men of Israel now but that mountains should fall on them, hills should bury them alive.

Old is the tale of Israel's guilt, old as what befell at Gabaa; there stood they unmoved; was it not at Gabaa the tide of battle reached them, battle against the champions of wrong?⁶

A jealous chastiser I will be to them; twofold their guilt, and many the nations I will muster for their chastisement. Heifer that has learned the welcome task of the threshing-floor, such is Ephraim; that sleek neck of hers I have spared till now; now she is to be harnessed; when Juda goes a-ploughing, Jacob it shall be that breaks the clods for him.⁷

If mercy is to be the measure you reap by, seed of yours must be sown in right doing; there are fallow acres to be tilled. Not too late to have recourse to the Lord, waiting for him to come and bring⁸ you redress! But alas, shameful furrows⁹ they

¹ The sense of verses 7-9 can only be guessed at, and most modern editors suspect the text of corruption. In verse 8, 'God's decree' is 'my God's decree'; and 'God's house' is 'his God's house' in the original. The mention of Gabaa in verse 9 is explained by some as a reference to Jg. 19 and 20, but there can be no certainty on the point.

² The use of language here is strained, and once more suggests the possibility of corruption in the text. 'The slaughter-house' may refer to the worship of Moloch (Jer. 32. 35), or simply to the massacres that will accompany the capture of Samaria. ³ This verse is more easily understood if we suppose (as is most likely) that the Israelites were not clear in their own minds whether the hill-shrines, etc. were devoted to the worship of the true God or not. ⁴ Literally, 'For now they will be saying, We have no king, because we do not fear God; what will the king do to (or, for, us? For now they speak perjured words in making a treaty; therefore judgement springs up in their furrows like hemlock'. It is hard to feel certain about the meaning or bearing of the passage. ⁵ 'Calif'; so the Septuagint Greek. The Hebrew text, like the Latin version, gives 'heifers', followed by a masculine singular pronoun in the rest of the sentence.

⁶ Cf. 9. 9 above. Here, as there, some think the reference is to Jg. 20; but it may easily be to some incident not elsewhere recorded. ⁷ The last part of this verse is usually translated, 'Juda shall plough, and Jacob shall break the clods for himself'. But the expression 'for himself' seems curiously inappropriate. ⁸ The verb used in the Hebrew text may mean either 'rain down' or 'teach'. ⁹ 'Shameful furrows'; it can hardly be a coincidence that the Hebrew verb used can mean either 'ploughing' or 'carving images'.

were you traced, and what came of it? A harvest of wrong, fruit that cheated you in the tasting!

14 So thou wouldst trust in thy own devices, in thy own warrior strength? Believe me, there shall be turmoil among thy folk, and all thy strongholds shall fall, as fell Salmana before Jerobaal¹ when the day was won; fell child, fell mother, dashed to 15 pieces. So much shall yonder Bethel countervail the heinousness of your guilt!

11 Soon fades the dawn; soon passes king of Israel.

Israel in his boyhood, what love I bore him! Away from Egypt I beckoned him, henceforth my son.²

2 . . . They called them, the more they refused obedience; gods of the country-side must have their victims, dumb idols their 3 incense!³ Yet it was I, none other, guided those first steps of theirs, and took them in my arms, and healed, all unobserved, their 4 injuries. Sons of Adam, they should be drawn with leading-strings of love; never waggoner was at more pains to ease bridle on jaw, fed beast so carefully.

5 Never again to Egypt; Assyria shall rule 6 him now, the unrepentant; already the sword is let loose in those towns of his, the brave shall engulf, the wise shall devour.

7 Can my people be reconciled with me? All hangs in doubt, until at last I put a yoke on all alike, never to be taken away from 8 them.⁴ What, Ephraim, must I abandon thee? Must I keep Israel under watch and ward? Can I let thee go the way of Adama, share the doom of Seboim? All at once my 9 heart misgives me, and from its embers pity revives. How should I wreak my vengeance, of Ephraim take full toll?

God am I, not a man in the midst of you, the Holy One, that may not enter those city walls;⁵ the Lord must lead, and man 10 follow.⁶

Loud he will call, like lion roaring, and at the sound of it, sons of his will come trembling from the distant sea; fluttering 11 like sparrow or dove from Egypt, from the Assyrian country, and in their own home, the Lord says, I will give them rest.

Ephraim so false, Israel so treacherous, 12 all about me! But Judah governs his folk with God to aid him; Judah takes part with the holy ones, loyal yet.⁷

12 Ephraim, that would still play shepherd to the wind, still hunt in the track of the storm, and nothing hoard up but treachery, nothing but his own ruin! See him making treaties with the Assyrian, sending tribute of oil to Egypt! On Judah's part the Lord takes up the 2 quarrel, will call Jacob to account,⁸ for ill deeds and ill designs rewarding him.

Here was one that took precedence of⁹ 3 his brother even in the womb; strength was his, of celestial strength the rival. Did he not hold his own in contest with an 4 angel, and prefer, with tears, his suit? Ay, and what of that encounter at Bethel, when the promises came to us from him, the 5 Lord of hosts, from the God whose name we remember yet?

Wouldst thou to thy God return? A 6 tender heart keep thou must, and a right mind, and wait for thy God's help continually.

Is it the Chanaanite that carries false 7 weights, and loves ill gotten gain? Here is Ephraim boasting that he has grown rich, 8 has found a false god to worship; will not

¹ According to the Hebrew text 'as Salman (quite differently spelt) destroyed Beth-arbel', an event not elsewhere alluded to.

² The Hebrew text, at the end of the verse, is naturally understood as meaning, 'I called him to be my son'. If this is authentic, we must suppose that a different colour was given to it in early times; cf. Mt. 2. 15. The Septuagint Greek has, 'I called his children'.

³ Although the subject of verse 1 is continued, it looks as if one or two words had been accidentally omitted.

⁴ Literally, 'The sword has begun in his towns, and shall consume his chosen ones, and devour their heads; and my people shall hang to my return; a yoke shall be put on them at the same time, which shall not be taken away'. The Hebrew text differs considerably, but is equally obscure.

⁵ The first sentence of this verse may be read as a statement, 'I will not wreak my vengeance', or as a question, 'Shall I not wreak my vengeance?' The remaining part reads literally, 'for I am God and not man in the midst of thee the holy and I will not go into the city'; an obscure phrase, and perhaps corrupt.

⁶ Literally, 'They shall go behind the Lord'. The rest of this verse, with verse 11, cannot easily be fitted into the context, and was perhaps misplaced.

⁷ The language of this verse is curiously forced; if it has been correctly preserved, 'the holy ones' is perhaps best understood of the (non-rebellious) angels.

⁸ Literally, 'And there is a quarrel to the Lord with Judah, and to the calling to account of Jacob'. In view of 11. 12, it does not seem likely that the Lord's quarrel here is against Judah.

⁹ 'Took precedence of'; literally, 'dogged the heels of'. The incident related in Gen. 25. 25 is cited here as an example, not of Israel's treachery, but of God's favour for his own people.

these earnings of mine, thinks he, buy me out from the punishment I have deserved?¹

9 I, the Lord, thy God in Egypt, and thy God still! Once again thou shalt dwell in tents, as in the days when I kept trust with thee;² once again I will bestow³ utterance upon the prophets. Mine it is, by the prophets' means, to grant clear vision, to speak in parables.

11 If Galaad is all idolatry, vain the sacrifice of oxen that is made at Galgal; stone heaps their altars shall be, out in the ploughlands.⁴

12 Time was when Jacob fled to the Aram country; Israel worked for a wife, and for that wife's sake loyally kept his troth.

13 Time was, when the Lord rescued Israel from Egypt by a prophet's means, and, for that prophet's sake loyally preserved them.⁵

14 For bitter jealousy of mine Ephraim must pay the penalty; spurned Master spurns him now.

13 Spoke Ephraim,⁶ all Israel trembled at his word; how else came they, for Baal's worship, to barter away life itself? And they are busy yet over their sinning; melt down silver of theirs to fashion models of yonder images, craftsman copying craftsman's design! And of such models they say, The man who would do sacrifice has but to kiss these calves.⁷

3 Fades the memory of them, light as early mist or morning dew, light as chaff on the threshing-floor, smoke from the chimney, when high blows the wind!

4 And all the while I am the Lord thy God⁸... from the land of Egypt; God thou shalt own no other, other deliverance is none; out in the desert, out in the parched wastes, owned I thee. Fatal pasturing! With food came satiety, and with satiety pride, and with pride forgetfulness of me! Now their way lies to Assyria, and on that road I will meet them again, their enemy now, watchful as lion or leopard; bear robbed of its young should not tear open breast more cruelly, lion devour more greedily; they shall be a prey, now, to the wild beasts.

Alas, Israel, undone! Who but I can aid thee? Thy king, where is he? Now, if ever, from end to end of thee thou hast sore need of king and princes both; king and court thou didst demand of me, and gift of mine was never so grudgingly made, so angrily withdrawn.

Trust me, it is stored away, it is jealously preserved, the record of Ephraim's sinning. Pangs like the pangs of travail shall come upon him; or say he is babe ill-guided, that shall thrive never when it comes to the birth.⁹

From the grave's power to rescue them, from death to ransom them; I, death's mortal enemy, I, corruption's undoing!¹⁰

Pity? My eyes are closed to it; these, that now have a share among their brethren, shall feel the Lord's vengeance, a burning desert wind that shall dry up their brooks, foul their springs, lay waste the store-houses where they hoard their treasure.

14 Death to Samaria, that has provoked her God's anger! Death at the sword's point; children dashed headlong, ripped open the womb!

¹ The meaning of verses 7 and 8 is obscure, and much disputed.

The Tabernacle of Appointment went with Israel through the desert. Or, possibly, the sense may be 'as in the days of solemn observance', i.e. the Feast of Tent-dwelling (Lev. 23. 34).

² That is, when the here has 'And I used to bestow'; but a reference to the past seems out of place here. ³ The Latin version language of this verse is strained, and the sense doubtful; some think there is an error in the manuscripts. The Hebrew for 'stone-heaps' is gallim, and there is possibly a play upon words. ⁴ Little can be said for certain about these verses, except that those editors are wrong who would print verse 12 after verse 5, and verse 13 after verse 10. Evidently they must be taken together, but it is hard to see the force of their minute parallelism; possibly there is an allusion to Assyria and Egypt as places of exile; cf. 11. 11.

⁵ Ephraim 'is here the tribe of that name (to which Jeroboam I belonged), not, as elsewhere, a synonym for the twelve tribes in general. ⁶ The Latin version gives no satisfactory sense in the last clause; it translates, 'Sacrifice, O men that worship calves', or possibly, 'Sacrifice men, you that worship calves'.

⁷ After 'the Lord thy God' the Septuagint Greek has 'that holds heaven in place and is earth's Creator, whose hands made all the host of heaven. Warrant thou hast none from me to follow such worship; I it was that rescued thee'.... ⁸ The metaphor here is confused, and the details of it cannot be determined with certainty. ⁹ Literally, 'I will free them from the hand of the grave, I will ransom them from death; O death, I will be thy plague, O grave, I will be thy devouring'. But many editors read the first part of this as a question, implying a threat; and translate the second part, 'Come, death, where are those plagues of thine? Where is that destroying power of thine, corruption?' as if Almighty God were calling on his creatures to assail unrepentant Israel. The Septuagint Greek has 'where', instead of 'I will be', and a reminiscence of its language is to be found in 1 Cor. 15. 55.

2 Come back, Israel, to the Lord thy God; it is sin that has caused thy overthrow.
3 Come back, men of Israel, with a plea ready on your lips: Pardon all our guilt, and take the best we have in return;¹ the praises we utter shall be our victims now.
4 No longer we will find refuge in Assyrian help, mount our men on horses from Egypt;² no longer will we give the name of gods to the things our own hands have made; thou art the friend of the friendless who trust in thee.
5 I will bring healing to their crushed spirits;³ in free mercy I will give them back my love; my vengeance has passed them by. I will be morning dew, to make Israel grow as the lilies grow, strike roots deep as the forest of Lebanon. Those branches shall spread, it shall become fair as the olive, fragrant as Lebanon cedar. None that dwells under the protection of that name but shall come back to me; corn shall be theirs in plenty, and they will grow like one of their own vineyards, famed as the vintage of Lebanon itself. The false gods of Ephraim are forgotten; mine to answer his prayer and tend him, ever-green as a fir-tree; from me all thy increase comes. All this the wise discern, the thoughtful understand; straight paths the Lord has shewn us for his friends to walk in; who leaves them shall stumble to his ruin.

¹ 'Take the best we have in return'; literally, 'take good', that is, perhaps, the praises mentioned in the following clause; the phrase is unusual. ² 'From Egypt' is not expressed in the original, but is almost certainly intended; cf. Is. 31. 1. ³ The Hebrew text has here, as in Jer. 3. 22, 'their apostasies'.

THE PROPHECY OF JOEL

THIS message came from the Lord to Joel, the son of Phathuel.

2 Citizens, hear and heed, ruler and commoner alike! Tell me, what happenings are these, in your days 3 and in your fathers' days unmatched, a tale you must needs hand on to your children, and they to theirs, and theirs to a fresh 4 generation yet? That locusts, breed upon breed of them, so ravage yonder countryside, Swarmer devouring what Spoiler, 5 Ruin-all what Gnaw-all has left?¹ Weep they and wail, the tipplers that must be ever at their cups, for the sweet wine they drank, and shall drink no more!

6 Alas, my country, how valiant an enemy is this, in number past all counting, that comes to invade thee; lion nor lion's whelp 7 has teeth can grind so pitilessly. Spoiled thy vineyards lie, stripped of the very bark thy fig-trees; bare and blanched and 8 ruinous every bough. Weep bitterly, then, as maid that goes clad in sackcloth, un-9 timely widowed; in the Lord's house, bread nor wine is offered now; for the priests, the Lord's own ministers, no office 10 now but tears. Desolate the land lies, every field forlorn; crops ravaged, the vine thirsty, strengthless the oil. Alas, for hus-11 bandman's labour lost, for vintage-song turned to lament! Alas for harvest 12 perished, for vineyard withered, and drooping fig-tree! Pomegranate, and palm, and apple, no tree in the wood but fades there; what wonder? Has not joy faded in human hearts?

13 Mourn, priests, and lament; in mourners' garb go about your work at the altar; ministers of God, to his presence betake you, and there, in sackcloth, keep vigil; your God's house, that offering of 14 bread and wine has none! Then proclaim a fast, assemble the folk together, ruler and commoner alike summon to the temple, and there for the Lord's help cry lustily.

Woe betide us this day! The day of the Lord is coming; his the dominion, his the doom. Here in our sight, here in the temple of our God, the festal cheer abolished, all the contentment, all the rejoicing! Beast on dung-heap rots; barn-wall gapes, and store-house lies in ruin, the hope of harvest gone; echoes byre with lowing of bewildered cattle, that pasture have none; even the flocks dwindle. What help, Lord, but thine? Parched are the upland meadows, every tree scorched in the forest; to thee even the wild beasts make their dumb appeal, from dry riverbeds, from upland pastures laid bare.

2 The trumpet, there, in Sion! On yonder mountain-height, my sanctuary, sound the alarm! Tremble, fellow-countrymen, one and all; the day of the Lord is coming, coming so soon. Day of gloom and darkness, day of cloud and storm; spread out, like dawn over the hills, this great, this valiant army; never was the like since time began, never shall be, while the ages run their course. Fire running greedily before them, and a track of flame behind; in front, a land that could match Eden for loveliness, and where they have passed, nothing but a desert waste; escape from them is none. Horse nor horseman so terrible of aspect, so speedy in advance;
hark to the noise of them, as they spurn the hill-slopes! Din of chariots is not so loud, nor crackling of flames that feed on stubble; a valiant army, all arrayed for battle! What wonder if whole nations groan at their coming, everywhere pale cheeks?² Bravely they hasten to the attack, warrior-like scale the wall; unswerving they press on, never one jostling with an-

¹ The Latin here mentions four destructive agencies—the caterpillar, two kinds of locust, and the blight. The Hebrew text is ordinarily understood as giving four different kinds of locust, or four different names for the locust. It is impossible to say with certainty whether the prophet, from 1. 4 to 2. 11, is describing a hostile invasion under the metaphor of a locust-swarm, or a locust-swarm under the metaphor of a hostile invasion.

² See note on Nahum 2. 10.

other, so well keeps each one his course; storm the loop-hole¹ unhurt; and now, the city breached, mount wall, climb house-top, enter by windows, the thief's way.

Before that army, quakes earth, and heaven rocks; dark grow sun and moon, and the stars withhold their radiance; with his own voice the Lord heralds its coming. Wide it stretches, that host of the Lord, valiant it is, and ever ready to do his will. O great, O terrible day of the Lord; who shall find strength to bear it?

Time now, the Lord says, to turn the whole bent of your hearts back to me, with fasting and with mourners' tears. It is your hearts, not the garments you wear, that must be torn asunder. Come back to the Lord your God; he is ever gracious and merciful, ever patient and rich in pardon; threatens he calamity, even now he is ready to forgive. Who knows but he will relent, and be appeased; cast one glance behind him, and, enough for his own due of bread and wine-offering, spare us largesse yet?

The trumpet, there, in Sion! Here is fasting proclaimed,² the citizens assembled; the folk summoned, the cleansing rites performed, the elders met; weanling must be there and babe unwedded, groom leave his chamber and bride her bower. Hark how the priests, that wait upon the Lord, make lament between porch and altar, crying aloud: Spare thy people, Lord, spare them; thy chosen people, do not put them to the shame of obeying heathen masters! Wilt thou let the Gentiles ask, What has become of their God?

People of a land well loved, he spares us yet. His answer comes, Here is corn and wine and oil to your hearts' content; no more will I let the nations mock you. Far he shall be driven from your lands, the northern invader; out in the trackless desert he shall lie, vanguard to eastern, rearguard to western sea, and nothing more shall assail you but stench and stink of him, this enemy that did so wondrously. Fear no more, land of Israel; in the Lord's wondrous doings triumph and rejoice! Fear no more, beasts that roam the country-side; grass grows on the upland meadows! There is fruit on the trees again; vine nor fig-tree ever bore so lustily. Rejoice, men of Sion, and triumph in the Lord your God; proof he gives you of your restoration to favour,³ making the winter and the spring rains fall, as in time past. Now the threshing-floor shall be piled with wheat, and the presses overflow with wine and oil. Profitless years, when the locust ravaged you, Gnow-all and Ruin-all and Spoiler, that great army of mine I let loose among you, they shall be made good. Eat you shall to your hearts' content, praising the name of the Lord your God for his wondrous protection; never again shall Israel go away disappointed. I will make myself known among you, I, the Lord your God, who alone am God; Israel cheated of their hopes never again!

And afterwards? Afterwards I will pour out my spirit upon all mankind, and your sons and daughters will be prophets. Your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men see visions; everywhere servants of mine, handmaids of mine, inspired to prophesy! I will shew wonders in heaven, and on earth blood, and fire, and whirling smoke. The sun will be turned into darkness and the moon into blood before the day of the Lord comes, the great, the terrible day. And never a soul shall call on the Lord's name but shall find deliverance; here on mount Sion, here in Jerusalem there shall be refuge, for a remnant, a remnant of the Lord's own summoning, there shall be deliverance at last.

3 Perilous those times shall be, when the hour has come for reversing my sentence against Juda and Jerusalem. Into the valley of Josaphat I will herd the heathen folk, one and all, and there hold assize over them for the wrong they did to my people, to Israel, my own domain. People of mine they scattered through the world, land of mine they parcelled out between

¹ 'Storm the loop-hole'; literally, 'fall through windows', but the Hebrew text reads 'fall (or plunge) among weapons'. ² Grammatically (if the text is sound) verses 15-17 imply a command; dramatically (as verses 18 and 19 shew) they imply that the command has been carried out. ³ 'Proof of your restoration to favour', literally, 'a teacher of justice'. Some would understand the Hebrew text as meaning 'winter rain to (produce) the restoration of your fortunes'. But it almost seems as if the prophet had made a deliberate play upon words: 'He gives you a show-er of (the way to) restoration, makes the winter shower and the spring rain fall'.

3 them. Must they be awarded by lot, such captives, and then sold cheap, boy-slave 4 for a harlot's hire, girl-slave for the draining of a wine-stoup? What, would you chaffer with me, men of Tyre and Sion, men from the pale of Philistia? Must there be barter and exchange between us? Nay, if you will have exchanges with me, look to it that the reward does not fall on your own 5 heads, swift and sudden!¹ Would you carry off silver of mine and gold, lay up the choicest of my treasures in yonder tem-6 ples? Citizens of Jerusalem, men of Juda's breed, would you sell them to Grecian 7 masters, far away from their home? See if I do not summon them back from exile that was of your contriving, and, for that service 8 done, pay you in your own coin; make over son and daughter of yours to these same men of Juda, slaves they can barter at will to the remote Sabaeans; I, the Lord, have decreed it.

9 Cry it to the nations, they should do sacrifice and muster their tried warriors for battle; rally they, march they, all that bear 10 arms. Ploughshare beat into sword, spade into spear; weakling is none but must sum-11 mon up his manhood now! To arms, to the rendezvous, nations all about; doom of 12 the Lord awaits you, warriors all! Up, up, to Josaphat's valley betake you; here, upon all neighbouring peoples, I will hold assize.
 13 The sickle, there! Harvest is ripe already.

Down to the vineyard with you! Are not the vats full, the presses overflowing? Has it not come to a head, the measure of their wickedness?

Thronging, thronging they come, in yonder valley to try their destiny, appointed trysting-place of a divine audit;
 dark grow sun and moon, light of the stars 11 is none. Loud as roaring of lion speaks the Lord in thunder from his citadel at Jeru-12 salem, till heaven and earth quake at the sound. To his own people, the sons of Is-13 rael, refuge he is and stronghold; doubt you shall have none thenceforward that I,
 the Lord your God, have my dwelling-place at Jerusalem; a holy city Jerusalem shall be, never again shall alien foe breach the walls of her.

Drip now with sweet wine the mountain-14 slopes, bathed in milk the upland pastures;
 never a stream in all Juda but flows full and strong. What fountain is this that comes out from the Lord's temple, and waters the dry valley of Setim? A lonely ruin Egypt 15 shall be, and Edom a desert waste; here was great wrong done to Jewry's people, here unoffending lives were taken. For 16 Juda, for Jerusalem, there shall be peace undisturbed, long as time shall last; for 17 these, guilt of blood that went still unpardoned shall be pardoned now; here, in Sion, the Lord will have his dwelling-place.

¹ The interpretation of this verse in detail is not altogether clear; the general sense is evidently that Almighty God demands to be indemnified for the loss he is represented as having suffered when his people were sold as slaves.

THE PROPHECY OF AMOS

HERE tells Amos, one of the shepherd folk at Thecue, what visions he had concerning Israel. In Juda, Ozias was then reigning, in Israel, Jeroboam son of Joas, and it was two years before the earthquake. Loud as roaring of lion, said he, the Lord will speak in thunder from his citadel at Jerusalem; forlorn they lie, yonder pastures the shepherds loved once, the heights of Carmel all shrivelled away.

A message from the Lord: Thrice forfeit Damascus, and forfeit once again,¹ that rode rough-shod over the men of Galaad;² fall fire on Azael's court, to burn down all the strongholds of Benadad! Broken Damascus gate shall be, nor any be left to dwell in Aven's plain, or rule over Eden valley; far off, at Cir,³ the Syrian folk shall go into banishment, the Lord says.

This, too: Thrice forfeit Gaza, and forfeit once again, that secured for the men of Edom their full toll of captives;⁴ fall fire on Gaza's walls, to burn down all its strongholds! None shall dwell in Azotus, none rule over Ascalon; upon Accaron, too, my stroke shall fall; every trace of Philistia vanished and gone, the Lord God says.

This too: Thrice forfeit Tyre, and forfeit once again, that gave Edom its full toll of captives, as though bond there were none between brethren; fall fire on its walls, to burn down its strongholds!

This too: Thrice forfeit Edom, and forfeit once again, that would hunt down his own brother at the sword's point; unnatural cruelty, so to hug his enmity, nor ever let rancour die down; fire fall on Theman, to burn down the strongholds of Bosra!

This, too: Thrice forfeit Ammon, and forfeit once again, that so coveted Galaad's lands, every mother's womb he would rip open; fire fall on Rabba's walls, to burn down its strongholds! Hark to the bray of battle, blustering of the storm-wind! Into exile Melchom⁵ shall go, with all his retinue.

2 This, too: Thrice forfeit Moab, and forfeit once again, that burned the king of Edom's bones to dust;⁶ fall fire on Moab, to burn down all the strongholds of Carioth! With tumult and the bray of trumpets, Moab shall go to his death; ruler of theirs I will strike down in their midst, and all his vassals shall perish with him, the Lord says.

This, too: Thrice forfeit Juda, and forfeit once again, that spurned the Lord's law and left his bidding undone, so mazed were they by the false gods their fathers had gone a-courting; fire fall on Juda, to burn down all the strongholds of Jerusalem!

And this, too: What of Israel? Thrice forfeit Israel like the rest, and forfeit once again, that for a debt, though it were but the price of a pair of shoes, will make slaves of poor, honest folk. Ground in the dust, the poor man's rights, shouldered aside, ¹ Literally, 'For three offences of Damascus, and for four, I will not bring it back'. The verb is variously explained: 'I will not restore Damascus to prosperity,' 'I will not recall the sentence I have pronounced', etc. ² 'Rode rough-shod over the men of Galaad'; literally, 'threshed Galaad with iron threshers'.

³ The situation of Cir is unknown; but the Latin version can hardly be right in identifying it as Cyrene.

⁴ Here and in verse 9, it is usually explained that first the Philistines, then the Phoenicians, invaded Israel, and sold the prisoners they took to the Edomites. But such a notion is both historically and geographically improbable. It seems much simpler to understand that the Edomites invaded Israel (see verse 11) from the south-east, and neither the Philistines on the south-west nor the Phoenicians on the north-west would allow Israelite refugees to cross their frontiers. This would be described in Hebrew idiom as 'shutting up Israel into the hands of the Edomites'. Cf. Abd. 14.

⁵ For 'Melchom' the Hebrew text, probably by an error, reads 'their king'. ⁶ It seems unlikely that the words 'burned the king of Edom's bones to dust' represent what the prophet wrote. Nowhere else in the Old Testament is one heathen nation reprimanded for its conduct to another; nowhere else is cremation treated as an atrocity. And the denunciation of the Edomites in 1. 11 does not prepare us for a sympathetic reference to them.

the claim of the unbefriended! See where father and son, to my name's dishonour, bed with one maid! See where they lie feasting beside the altar, at the very shrine of their God, no cloak there but is some borrower's pledge, no stoup of wine but is some debtor's forfeit!

9 Was it for such men as these I exterminated the Amorrites, a race tall as the cedar, hardy as the oak, root and fruit of them doomed to destruction? These are the men I rescued from Egypt, guided them, all those forty years, through the wilderness, to make the domain of the Amorrites theirs! Tell me, men of Israel, the Lord says, what avails it that I should call sons of yours, from their boyhood's days, to serve me as prophets and Nazirites? Ever you tempt the Nazirites with wine, ever you forbid the prophet to raise his voice in prophecy. Henceforth, you shall seek my help in vain; waggon-axle overladen with sheaves groans not so reluctant as I! Speed shall be no profit to the speedy, strength to the strong; warrior shall not escape, nor bowman stand firm; the fleet of foot, nay, the very horseman shall have no deliverance; a day is coming, the Lord says, when tried valour shall be fain to throw arms away, and take flight.

3 This, then, is the Lord's message to you, men of Israel, to the whole race I rescued from Egypt: Nation is none I have claimed for my own, save you; and guilt of yours is none that shall go unpunished.

3 Tryst there must be, if friends will meet and journey together; prey there must be, ere lion will roar in the forest, lion's whelp growl in its lair; bird is not pinned to the ground, without fowler to snare it, nor trap released without a catch made. 6 Sounds trumpet in the streets, men do well to be afraid; if peril is afoot in the city, doubt not it is of the Lord's sending. 7 Never does he act, but his servants, the prophets, are in the secret. Roars lion, who but will tremble? Comes the divine warning, who but will prophesy?¹

Raise a cry from the house-tops, there in Azotus, there in Egypt's land: To the hills about Samaria betake you, and look deep into the heart of her, what turbulent doings are there, what wrongs men suffer! In yonder palaces, the Lord says, that are store-houses of oppression and rapine, honest doing is all forgot. This doom, then, the Lord God utters: Distress and siege for such a land as this! All thy fastnesses shall be dismantled, all thy palaces spoiled. Wilt thou have lion disgorge his prey? Pleased enough the shepherd, if a pair of legs he recover, a mangled ear! They shall fare no better, the Israelites that lie on a corner of the mattress at Samaria, and have their bed at Damascus.² A message for you, says the Lord, the God of hosts, a warning for the sons of Jacob! I will have a reckoning with the rebellions of Israel, a reckoning with those altars of theirs at Bethel, that shall have the horns of them cut off and hurled to the ground; on summer dwelling of yours and winter dwelling my hand shall fall, houses of ivory and houses of the common folk; all shall lie in ruin, the Lord says.

4 Here is word for you, pampered cattle that dwell at Samaria, the poor wronging, the friendless folk spurning, and ever crying out upon your husbands, Wine, there! We would drink! Never let me be called holy, the Lord God says, if doom does not overtake you for this; see if you be not trussed on spears, and your children given up to feed the cooking pan!³ Leave the city walls you must, the Lord says, one by this breach, one by that, and be cast away in Armon.

On with you to Bethel, and defy me. thence to Galgal, and repeat defiance there; morning victims, tithes on the third

¹ The meaning of this difficult passage seems to be that there is no smoke without fire; the lesser judgements already experienced by Samaria (4. 6-11) are sure proof that it has incurred God's anger, and worse calamity is to follow.

² The insinuation is not clear, perhaps a general warning against luxury is intended (cf. verse 15). But this seems to be the natural rendering of a sentence that has produced a wide variety of interpretations. It runs, literally: 'So shall the sons of Israel be dragged out, that dwell in Samaria on the corner of a bed, and in Damascus. . . a couch'. There is no evidence that the stuff called 'damask' was known, or was so called, in Amos' time.

³ Literally, 'they shall lift you up on poles (or, spears) and that which you leave behind (or, that which is left of you) in boiling pots'. We might compare Jer. 19. 9, or possibly Ez. 11. 7. But the meaning of the Hebrew text is probably different: 'he will lead you away with hooks, with barbed prongs such as fisher-folk use, all that is left of you.'

5 day, bread, leavened bread, for thank-offering, gifts of devotion publicly proclaimed!¹ Have your will, men of Israel, says the Lord God, have your will.

6 What would you? Never a city left but men's teeth were idle, never a village but bread lacked there, and you would not 7 come back to me, the Lord says. It was three months to harvest, and rain I denied you; or rain fell on one city, and not on the next, one village had a drenching and the 8 next was dry, till one city must supply water for three neighbours, and none had its fill, and you would not come back to 9 me. You would not come back to me, the Lord says, when sirocco I sent, and mildew, and the locust preyed on garden and vineyard, fig-tree and olive-tree of yours;
10 you would not come back to me, when with Egypt's pestilence² I slew you, when your warriors fell at the sword's point, and your horses were carried off, and never a camp of yours but the stench of it plagued your 11 nostrils; you would not come back to me, when ruin threatened, swift as the divine stroke that ruined Sodom and Gomorrhah, and you yourselves were like a brand saved from the burning.

12 Now I have worse, Israel, in store for thee;³ when that worse comes, prepare 13 thou must, Israel, to meet thy God. He is here, that fashioned the hills and made the winds; he is here, that gives man warning of his designs, that turns dawn into darkness, and sets his feet on the highest heights of earth; the Lord God of hosts is the name of him.

5 Please you then listen to the dirge I raise for you, men of Israel: Fallen she 2 is, never to rise again, Israel, the unsubdued; stretched at full length she lies there 3 forsaken! Ay, the Lord God says, but a hundred citizens, but ten villagers left to you, city that marched out a thousand, village a hundred strong!

4 Yet warning the Lord gave to the race of Israel: On peril of your lives, to my aid 5 betake you! Not to Bethel, not to Galgal's ring-shrine, or Bersabee pilgrimage; a long road yonder circle shall lead you, a road that never returns; house of God shall not avail you, that is home of idols now! On 6 your lives, to the Lord betake you, as you would not see all Joseph ablaze, quenchless fire raging over Bethel! And still you 7 poison the springs of justice, still in the dust fling honour away.

8 . . .⁴ Creator he of Arcturus and Orion; dawn brings he out of darkness, and turns 9 night to day, beckons to the waters of the sea, and over the surface of earth spreads them, such the power of his name! At his 10 glance falls ruin on the strong, devastation on the fortified.

11 Ill looks he will earn at yonder city gate, that finds fault; the wise word, there, is a thing abominable. Yet, trust me, it shall 12 nothing avail you, this harrying of the poor, and taking toll of the best they have. Houses of stone you build you shall never dwell in, sunny vineyards you plant you shall drink of never. Your often misdoing, 13 your heinous guilt, never think I am blind to it; innocence hated, the bribe taken, the poor refused their rights at the judgement-seat! And should wisdom keep silence 14 times like these, ill times like these?⁵ Set your minds on right, that now are set on wrong-doing; so you shall find life, so your 15 boast shall come true that the Lord, the God of hosts, is with you. Shun wrong, cherish the right, justice enthroned at your judgement-seat; then there is hope that the Lord, the God of hosts, will have mercy on some remnant of Joseph's line.

16 This doom he utters, he, the Lord of hosts, he, our Master: Market-place or street is none but shall echo with wailing and cries of woe; country-folk, and such as are skilled in mourning, they shall call 17 in to make dirge and dole;⁶ dirge, too, the vineyards shall sing; all this, when I make my way through your midst, the Lord says. Fools, that wait eagerly for the day of 18 the Lord's coming! Think you it shall serve your turn? Nay, it is the Lord's day of triumph, not yours; dawn it must, but in

¹ See Ex. 23. 18.

² See Deut. 7. 15, 28. 27.

³ Literally, 'I will do this to thee', the nature of the punishment being left vague, as is the common formula, 'May the Lord do to me (that is, punish me) thus and more than thus'.

⁴ Both grammar and logic seem to demand that some thought should be supplied here, which our existing manuscripts do not express. ⁵ This sentence may be read either as a statement or as a question; if it is a statement, no satisfactory account of it has yet been devised.

⁶ At the end of this verse, the Latin seems to be a correction of a text unintelligible in the Hebrew. But it may be questioned whether the corruption does not go deeper.

19 darkness, not in light. Speeds he well, that shuns lion and meets bear? Has he joy of his home-coming, that leans hand on wall, and all at once is bitten by a viper? And for you, that day brings darkness, not the light you craved for; no radiance haunts about it, only gloom.

21 Oh, but I am sick and tired of them, your solemn feasts; incense that goes up from your assemblies I can breathe no longer! 22 Burnt-sacrifice still? Bloodless offerings still? Nay, I will have none of them; fat be the victims you slay in welcome, I care not. 23 O to be rid of the singing, the harp's music, that dins my ear!

24 . . . And like waters rolling in full tide, like a perennial stream, right and justice shall abound . . .

25 What, men of Israel, did you spend forty years in the desert, ever for me your burnt-sacrifice, ever for me your offerings; 26 and now would you have Moloch for your king, a star for your god, carry shrine of theirs, idolatrous image you made of them, 27 hither and thither? What wonder if I banish you beyond Damascus far away? Dooms you with his own sign-manual the Lord, the God of hosts.

6 Poor fools, that in Sion or high Samaria take your ease, and fear nothing! That lord it over the Gentiles, and pass proudly through Israel's domain, bidding us make our way to Chalane, and thence to noble Emath, or go down to Gath, where the Philistines are, and see if land of theirs be fairer, borders of theirs be wider, than these of ours. Poor fools, with the evil day ever at arm's length, wrong enthroned ever close at hand! Sleep they on beds of ivory, sprawl they at table, eating the best lambs flock can provide, calves fattened at the stall; and ever must harp and voice nicely accord, ay, very Davids they think themselves for musical invention! All their drinking is from the bowl, all their ointment of the best, and what care they for Joseph's ruin?

Lead their folk they shall, but into exile; the revel must break up at last. By my divine power I swear it, says the Lord God of hosts, pride of yours shall weary me, great houses of yours shall offend my sight, no longer; city and citizens, I will leave you at the enemy's mercy. Be there ten men left alive in a house, death shall take toll of them . . .³

. . . Kinsman that comes to take him away must burn him first, and so carry his bones without. Ho, there! cries he to one that lurks in the inner rooms, hast thou any left? And when he hears the task is over, bids him say no more, unless it be to call the Lord's name to memory⁴ . . .

A word from the Lord, and all shall be a gaping ruin, palace and cottage both. Strange, if yonder mountain-crag men should climb on horseback, or plough with oxen!⁵ Stranger still, that people of mine should poison the springs of right and justice, all wormwood now! And still you boast over some conquest of little worth;⁶

¹ Literally, 'And took up (or, will take up) Siccuth (or, the booths) your king (or, of Moloch), and Ciun (or, the image or, the pedestal), of your images, the star of your god (or, gods), which you made for them'. The meaning of the sentence has been much disputed, and the general reference to Israel's idolatrous habits in Ac. 7. 42 does not help to clear up the difficulty. Many suspect a reference to the Assyrian worship of the planet Saturn; but it should be observed that Amos does not, as a rule, tax the Israelites with worshipping false gods; rather with an idolatrous and unspiritual approach to their own religion. It is not improbable that the text has suffered from an early corruption, like the beginning of chapter 6.

² The language of the Hebrew text is curiously forced all through verses 1-3, and it is difficult to feel certain that manuscript errors have not interfered with it. The invitation in verse 2 must be taken as the utterance, not of the prophet, but of the boastful Samaritan leaders; otherwise the logic of the passage is wholly obscure. For the mention of Sion (if the text is rightly preserved) cf. 2. 4, the only other threat against Juda in the whole book; cf. 7. 12 below.

³ There seems to be a gap, both in grammar and in logic, at the end of this sentence, which suggests a manuscript omission; e.g. the mention of the number ten would be more readily intelligible if the text ran, 'Be there ten men left alive in a house, nine of these shall die'. We should expect also to hear what kind of danger (perhaps battle) they had escaped, to fall into some other danger, perhaps that of pestilence. If a reference to plague has dropped out, it would explain the allusion to burning in verse 10; the Israelites did not ordinarily burn their dead.

⁴ The exact bearing of this vivid passage escapes us, perhaps because the true context of it has not been preserved. 'Say no more, unless it be to call the Lord's name to memory'; the Latin means, and the Hebrew text may mean, 'Hush! No mention must be made of the Lord's name'. But no plausible reason has been produced for such a taboo; nor does it appear that there was any immediate danger of the divine name being introduced into the conversation.

⁵ By a very slight change in the Hebrew text it is possible to get the reading, 'or plough the sea with oxen'.
⁶ 'Of little worth'; or possibly, 'Of Lodabar', a place-name (II Kg. 9. 4). The prophet may intend a play upon words, as we might upon the name 'Littleworth'.

To what greatness, you say, valour of ours has brought us!¹ Trust me, men of Israel, the Lord God of hosts says, I mean to embroil you with such an enemy as shall crush the life out of you, from Emath pass to the brook that bounds the desert.

7 This was a vision the Lord God shewed me; here were locusts a-making, just at the time when the after-growth was coming up, after the king's crop had been carried. Short work had these made of all the land yielded; Ah, Lord God, said I, be merciful! How should Jacob survive, the puny creature he is? And with that, the Lord relented; Happen it shall not, said he. And a second vision the Lord God shewed me, how he would summon them to ordeal by fire; fire should devour the waters below the earth, and devoured some part of them were. Ah, Lord God, said I, for pity! How should Jacob survive, the puny creature he is? And with that, the Lord relented again; Happen it shall not, said he.

But now the Lord shewed me a third vision; a plastered wall, and the Lord himself standing by it with a trowel² in his hand, asking me if I could see what he had there. Why, Lord, I said, a plasterer's trowel! Ay, he answered, and here, in full view of Israel's folk, that trowel I lay aside; cementing they shall have from me no more. Hill-shrines of Aven³ shall tumble down, sanctuaries of Israel be laid waste; at the sword's point I will try conclusions with the race of Jeroboam.

Hereupon, a message came to Jeroboam, king of Israel, from Amasias that was priest at Bethel. Here is Amos, said he, raising revolt against thee in the realm of Israel; there is no room in all the land for such talk as his; Jeroboam to die at the sword's point, Israel to be banished from its native country! And this was his counsel to Amos, Sir prophet, get thee gone; in Juda take refuge if thou wilt, and there earn thy living by prophecy. Prophecy here in Bethel thou mayst not, where the king's chapel is, and the king's court.

What, said Amos, I a prophet? Nay, not that, nor a prophet's son neither; I am one that minds cattle, one that nips the sycamore-trees; I was but tending sheep when the Lord took me into his service. It was the Lord bade me go and prophesy to his people of Israel. He has a message for thee: Thou wilt have no prophesying against Israel, no word dropped against Bethaven? Here, then, is the divine doom pronounced on thee: Wife of thine, here in the city streets, shall be dishonoured; sons and daughters of thine shall die at the sword's point; lands of thine shall feel the measuring-rope. And for thyself, on unhallowed soil death awaits thee, when Israel is banished, as banished it needs must be, from the land of its birth.

8 Then the Lord God shewed me another vision, of a hook⁴ such as they use for fruit-gathering. And when he asked, could I see what he had there, Why, Lord, I said, a grappling-hook for fruit-trees! Ay, said he, and right autumn it is for my people of Israel; no further chance shall they have of repentance.

Day of doom! How shriek the hinges of yonder temple gates; then, what massacre! Everywhere deep silence falls.⁵

Here is word for you, oppressors of the poor, that bring ruin on your fellow-citizens in their need; you that long for new moon and sabbath to be at an end, for trading to begin and granary to be opened, so you may be at your shifts again, the scant measure, the high price, the false weights! You that for a debt, though it

¹ Literally, 'Have we not by our own strength taken to ourselves horns?' The Hebrew word for horns, Carnaim, was also a place-name (1 Mac. 5. 26).

² The Hebrew word rendered in the Latin by 'trowel' more probably means a plumb-line, which Almighty God threatens to apply against Israel; that is, he will proceed strictly against them, he will not pass over (their sins) any more (cf. 8. 2, where the same words are used).

³ The Latin version gives 'hill-shrines of Aven (or, the Idol)', exactly as in Os. 10. 8 (cf. Am. 1. 5). In verse 16 below it gives 'Bethaven (or, House of the Idol)', exactly as in Os. 4. 15; 5. 8, 10. 5. Our present Hebrew text gives 'hill-shrines of Isaac' and 'house of Isaac'; it is supported by the Septuagint Greek (which, however, translates the word as 'laughter'); this, too, was St Jerome's reading. It almost looks as if there had been some early uncertainty in the manuscripts, due perhaps to scrupulous reluctance on a scribe's part, to write down some name connected with heathen worship (like 'Baal'). It may be pointed out that 'house of Isaac' is a phrase nowhere else used—it would necessarily include Edom—and that Isaac is never mentioned by the prophets, except in Jer. 33. 26.

⁴ 'A hook'; according to the Hebrew text, 'a basket'.
⁵ The sense of this verse is uncertain, and a manuscript error seems probable.

were but the price of a pair of shoes, will make slaves of poor, honest folk; you that 7 sell refuse for wheat! By Jacob's ancient renown the Lord swears it, crimes of yours 8 shall remain for ever unforgotten. Well may the earth quake over such doings, to the hurt of all that dwell in it; everywhere mount up, and shift, and sink, like Egypt's 9 river in flood. Day of doom, says the Lord God, when there shall be sunset at noon, and earth shall be overshadowed under the 10 full light! All your feasting turned to lament, all your songs to dirge and dole;
 not a loin but goes clad in sackcloth, not a head but is shaved bald; never was such mourning made, though it were for an only son; bitter the day, bitter its ending.

11 A time is coming, says the Lord God, when there shall be great lack in the land, yet neither dearth nor drought. Hunger?
 Ay, they shall hunger for some message 12 from the Lord, yet go they from eastern to western sea, go they from north to south, making search for it everywhere, message from the Lord they shall have none.
 13 Thirst, ay, they shall thirst, fair maid and brave warrior both. Fools, that by the 14 shame of Samaria take their oaths, pin their faith to Dan's worship or Bersabee pilgrimage! Here is fall there is no amending.

9 And now I saw the Lord standing above the altar; smite column there, he cried, lintel there dislodge, nest of ill-gotten gains!¹ To the last man, the sword must take its toll; refuge shall be none.
 Flee they, never a fugitive shall escape;
 2 from the pit beneath I will dig them up,
 from heaven above I will drag them down; 3 hide they on Carmel's heights, I will search and seize them, lurk they in the sea's depths, my writ runs there; maw of mon-4 ster shall devour them. Let enemy drive them into exile, even there the sword shall be my pursuivant; watch and ward I keep over them, never doubt it, but to their undoing.

... The Lord God of hosts, whose touch melts earth, to the hurt of all that dwell in it, makes it everywhere mount up and sink, like Egypt's river in flood; his the arched stairway of heaven, his the knitted frame of earth; beckons he to the waters of the sea, and over the earth spreads them, such the power of his name!

Ethiop or Israelite, what care I? the Lord says. God that brought you here from Egypt was God that brought the Philistines from Caphtor, brought the Syrians from Cir!² Divine regard that watches ever this kingdom, marks ever its guilt; I will blot it out, believe me, from the face of the earth.

And blot out the name of Jacob together? Nay, not that, the Lord says. At my command, the whole world shall be a sieve, to sift the race of Israel as corn is sifted in the riddle, and never a grain³ cast out loose on the bare ground; at the sword's point they shall die, all the guilty that are found among my people; the guilty, who now flatter themselves that evil shall never come next or nigh them.
 Then, I mean to rebuild the fallen dwelling-place of David, all its breaches made good, all its ruins restored; it shall stand once more as it stood long ago; empire it shall have over the Edomites, and all the Gentile folk I claim for my own. A time is coming, the Lord says, when ploughman shall tread on the heels of reaper, sower's task begin ere vintager's is ended; never a mountain-side but shall run with sweet wine, never a hill but its rugged nature shall be tamed.⁴ I will bring back my people of Israel from its exile, to rebuild ruined cities and dwell there, plant vineyards and drink of them, till gardens and eat the fruits of them. Firm root they shall take in their native soil, never again to be torn away from the home I have given them, says the Lord, thy own God.

¹ 'Nest of ill-gotten gains'; the meaning of this phrase is very doubtful. ² The Latin version here gives Cappadocia for Caphtor, and Cyrene for Cir, as elsewhere. The identification is by no means probable. ³ 'Never a grain'; the word used is of doubtful significance. But the meaning seems to be that all the Israelites will go into captivity, and this will be a sieve to separate the good from the worthless among them; none will escape, as a grain of corn might escape by being thrown carelessly over the sieve's edge. ⁴ 'Its rugged nature shall be tamed'; literally, in the Latin version, 'it shall be cultivated'; in the Hebrew text, 'it shall melt'.

THE PROPHECY OF ABDIAS

HERE follows the vision of Abdias. What doom does the Lord God pronounce on Edom? What bruit is this has reached our ears, what embassy has been sent abroad among the nations? Up, march we out to engage him in battle!¹ Sorry the lot I have given thee among the peoples of the world, no better than a thing of contempt; yet, dwelling where thou dost in the clefts of the rocks, thou art puffed up with pride; high thou hast built thy throne, and thinkest there is none can drag thee down to earth. Build thy eyrie high as the eagle, nest, if thou wilt, among the stars, I will yet drag thee down thence, the Lord says. Strange, the silence that has fallen upon Edom! Thieves were they, midnight robbers, that had assailed thee, at least they had been content to carry off what they had need of; some gleanings at least those vintagers would have left thee! But now, see how Esau is ransacked, how all his treasury is rifled! See how the very folk that are in league with thee drive thee back to thy own frontier, thy own confederates playing thee false, pressing thee hard! Stabbed from beneath by boon companions of thy own? Thou art a fool for thy pains.

Day of doom, the Lord says, when wise man shall be none in Edom, nor any prudent counsellor on all Esau's hill-side; dismayed the warriors of Teman² shall be, till slaughter leaves all the mountains of Esau desolate. What wonder if hopes of thine come to nothing, name of thine perish eternally, that didst assail thy own brother, with murderous wrong? Hast thou forgotten the day when thou stoodest aloof, while the enemy disarmed his ranks, while aliens thronged through yonder gates, and parcelled out Jerusalem by lot, thyself making common cause with them?

What, look on idly, when fortune turns¹² against that brother of thine; nay, triumph over Juda's fall, boast of his calamity? He¹³ overthrown, and thou wouldst find thy way in at the gates of my own city; he overthrown, and thou wouldst rejoice at his discomfiture; he overthrown, and thou wouldst offer him battle? Thou wouldst¹⁴ take up thy post in the breach, and cut off the fugitive, bar the way to the straggler, when all is lost?

Be sure of this, a time is soon coming¹⁵ when the Lord will summon all the nations to their account; then, as thou didst, it shall be done to thee, in thy own coin thou shalt be paid. The cup of vengeance you, my¹⁶ people, have drunk, there on that mountain which is my sanctuary, all the heathen shall drink henceforward; drink, ay, drink deep, and fall into forgetfulness, as if they had never been. But here, on mount Sion,¹⁷ all shall be deliverance, all shall be holiness, and their spoilers the men of Jacob shall despoil. A fire Jacob shall be,¹⁸ a living flame the sons of Joseph, and Esau's race stubble before their onset; the spark once kindled, all shall be consumed, and of Esau's race no memory be left; the Lord decrees it.

Hill-country of Esau shall fall to the¹⁹ southern folk, and Philistia to the men of the plain; all that is Ephraim and Samaria now shall be theirs, and Galaad shall be made over to Benjamin. Warriors of Israel,²⁰ banished far away, shall hold all the Chanaanite lands, Sarepta their northern frontier; men of Jerusalem, come back from the shores of Bosphorus to claim the cities of the south. No lack of champions Sion shall²¹ have, to do justice on the mountains of Edom; and of that empire the Lord himself shall be sovereign ruler.

¹ It seems possible that some of these early verses are a quotation from an earlier prophecy, which is also cited by Jeremias (49. 9 and 14-16). ² The Latin version, here and in Hab. 3. 3, translates Teman as if it were a common noun, meaning 'the South'. It was a district in northern Edom.

THE PROPHECY OF JONAS

THE Lord's voice came to Jonas, the son of Amathi: Up, and to the great city of Nineve make thy way; I would have thee preach to them; great guilt of theirs claims my cognizance. Rise up he did, but his thought was, he would escape to Tharsis, and there avoid the Lord's scrutiny. So he made his way to Joppa, and there, sure enough, was a ship bound for Tharsis; passage-money was paid, and aboard went Jonas with the rest of them, sailing for Tharsis to be out of the Lord's way.

But now the Lord sent out a boisterous wind over the sea, that raised a great tempest there, and the ship was like to have been broken all to pieces. Sore afraid the mariners were, and loud they called upon their god; ay, and fell to throwing the tackle overboard, to lighten ship. And what of Jonas? He had gone down into the ship's hold, and fallen fast asleep. But that would not serve; up came the captain and asked what he meant, to lie there sleeping? Up, said he, and cry out upon thy God! Who knows but God will take pity on us, and grant us our lives yet?

By this, the ship's company were of another counsel; Nay, said one to other, cast we the lot, and so find out how it is that such peril has befallen us! Cast lots they did, and Jonas was singled out. Tell us, they cried, for whose sake¹ it is that we are come into such peril! Tell us what thy errand is, whence thou art journeying and whither, what nation it was gave thee birth. I am a Hebrew, he told them, and worship the Lord, the God of heaven, that made the sea and the dry land both. And when they heard (for he told them all) that this was a man who would escape from the Lord's sight, they were in a great taking of fear. What ailed thee? they asked. And how must we use thee, if we would have yonder seas calmed for us? (Even as they spoke, the waves grew more angry yet.) Why, said he, take me up and throw me over the ship's side, and the sea will grant you respite; doubt there is none, I am the cause of all this peril that has befallen you.

What would you? They fell to the oars, hoping to make land thus, but could nothing avail; ever angrier grew the sea about them. And at last they cried out upon the Lord; Take we this man's life, they said, let it not be to our own undoing! Do not charge us with the death of an innocent man, thou who hast so manifested thy divine will! And with that, they took Jonas up, and threw him over the ship's side. All at once, the raging of the sea was stilled; what awe fell on those mariners! What sacrifices they made, what vows they offered to the Lord!

2 And what of Jonas? At the Lord's bidding, a great sea-beast had swallowed him up; and there, in the belly of it, three days spent he and three nights. This was the prayer which Jonas made to the Lord his God, there in the belly of the sea-beast: Call I on the Lord in my peril, redress he grants me;² from the very womb of the grave call I, thou art listening to me! Here in the depths of the sea's heart thou wouldst cast me away, with the flood all about me, eddy of thine, wave of thine, sweeping over me, till it seemed as if I were shut out from thy regard: yet life thou grantest me; I shall gaze on thy holy temple³ once again. Around me the deadly

¹ 'For whose sake'; that is, probably, 'in vengeance for whom', the assumption being that Jonas was a murderer (Ac. 28. 4). But this clause is omitted by the best manuscripts of the Septuagint Greek, and it may possibly be a footnote on the similar clause in verse 7, accidentally included in the text. ² vv. 3-10: Cf. Ps. 119. 1; 17. 7; 41. 8; 30. 23; 68. 2; 141. 4; 142. 4; 17. 6; 30. 7; 116. 17, 18; 3. 9. The occurrence of such a cento proves how complete a body of psalms was in existence at the time when this book was written. ³ The temple here alluded to is presumably the temple at Jerusalem, although Jonas is usually regarded as belonging, not to Juda, but to the northern kingdom (IV Kg. 14. 25). In verse 6, the Latin has 'sea' instead of 'weeds'.

waters close, the depths engulf me, the 7 weeds are wrapped about my head; mountain caverns I must plumb, the very bars of earth my unrelenting prison; and still, 8 O Lord my God, thou wilt raise me, living, from the tomb. Daunted this heart, yet still of the Lord I would bethink me; 9 prayer of mine should reach him, far away in his holy temple! Let fools that court false worship all hope of pardon forgo; 10 mine to do sacrifice in thy honour, vows made and paid to the Lord, my deliverer!
 1 And now, at the Lord's bidding, the sea-beast cast Jonas up again, high and dry on the beach.

3 A second time the Lord's voice came 2 to Jonas: Up, and to the great city of Nineve make thy way; there preach, what 3 preach I bid thee. That voice he obeyed; rose up and took the road for Nineve, a great city indeed, three days' journey from 4 end. And when he had advanced into it as far as one day's journey would carry him, he began crying out, In forty 5 days, Nineve will be overthrown. With that, the Ninevites shewed faith in God, rich and poor alike, proclaiming a fast and 6 putting on sackcloth; nay, the king of Nineve himself, when word of it reached him, came down from his throne, cast his robe aside, put on sackcloth, and sat down 7 humbly in the dust. And a cry was raised in Nineve, at the bidding of the king and his nobles, A fast for man and beast, for herd and flock; no food is to be eaten, no 8 water drunk; let man and beast go covered with sackcloth; cry out lustily to the Lord, and forsake, each of you, his sinful life, his 9 wrongful deeds! God may yet relent and pardon, forgo his avenging anger and spare 10 our lives. Thus, when God saw them amending their lives in good earnest, he spared them, in his mercy, their threatened punishment.

4 As for Jonas, he took it sore amiss, and was an angry man that day. And thus he made his prayer to the Lord: See if this 2 be not the very thought I had, far away in my own country! Good cause had I to seek refuge at Tharsis from such an errand as this. I knew from the first what manner of God thou art, how kind and merciful, how slow to punish, how rich in pardon, ven-3 geance ever ready to forgo. A boon of thee, Lord! Take away this life of mine; I had rather die than live. Why, the Lord said, 4 what anger is this?¹

Jonas had left the city, and sat now under 5 a little arbour he had made for himself on the east of it, waiting there in the shade to see what doom would fall on Nineve. And 6 now, at the Lord God's bidding, an ivy-plant grew up over Jonas' head, to give him shade and shelter after his toiling; and great joy he had of his ivy-plant. But when 7 the morrow dawned, came at God's bidding a worm, that struck at the plant's root and killed it. Up rose the sun, and at the 8 Lord's bidding the sirocco came; here was Jonas with the sun's rays beating on his head, and all of a sweat. Now indeed his heart's prayer was, he might die; Better death than life, said he. Why, said the 9 Lord, what anger is this over an ivy-plant?
 Deadly angry am I, Jonas answered, and no marvel either. Great pity thou hast, the 10 Lord said, for yonder ivy-plant, that was not of thy growing, and no toil cost thee;
 a plant that springs in a night, and in a night must wither! And what of Nineve?
 11 Here is a great city, with a hundred and twenty thousand folk in it, and none of them can tell right from left, all these cattle, too; and may I not spare Nineve?

¹ The exact force of the Hebrew idiom used here is uncertain. Some think it means, 'Hast thou good reason to be angry?'; others would translate, 'Art thou very angry?'

THE PROPHECY OF MICHAELAS

THIS message came from the Lord to Michaelas the Morasthite, during the reigns of Joathan, Achaz and Ezechias in Juda; this revelation was made to him concerning Samaria and Jerusalem both together.

2 A word for you, nations far and near; let the whole world give audience, and all the world contains! Listen to this indictment the Lord God brings, from his high throne 3 all beholding. See, where the Lord comes out from his dwelling-place; and, as he makes his way down, the topmost peaks of 4 earth for his stairway, melt hills at his touch, melt valleys like wax before the fire, like water over the steep rocks flowing away!

5 Alas, what betokens it? What but Jacob's going astray, what but guilt of Israel's line? Head and front of Jacob's sinning Samaria needs must be, sure as Jerusalem is Juda's place of pilgrimage.¹ In ruin Samaria shall lie, a heap of stones in the open country-side, a terrace for vineyards; all down yonder valley I will drag the stones of her, till her very foundations 7 are laid bare. Shattered all those idols must be, burnt to ashes the gauds she wears;² never an image but shall be left forlorn; all shall go the way of a harlot's wages, that were a harlot's wages from the first.

8 For this, should I not raise the dirge aloud? Barefoot go I and stripped; jackal nor ostrich cries out more lamentably.

Hurt is here past all cure, that to Juda itself must spread; Jerusalem itself, mart of my own country-side, shall feel the blow. Gate of Gath³ must never hear the news, hushed be the sound of weeping; afar at Bethaphra cast the dust on your heads. Away 11 with you, Shaphir's folk, shivering and shamed; of coming and going in Saanan sign is none; mourning of Beth-ezel. . . has taken the ground from under your feet. Marred, now, are the anxious hopes of 12 Maroth; so ruthless the Lord's decree against yonder gates of Jerusalem. Recklessly, at Lachis⁴, harness they steed to chariot; Lachis, that first betrayed poor Sion into guilt, that was Israel's mistress in wrong-doing! Marriage-dower this 14 daughter of thine, Moreseth-gath, shall cost thee; here is Achsib, too, for the royal policy how rude a set-back! Thy marches, Maresa, shall be ridden once again; to Odollam. . .

15 . . . Israel's glory shall come.⁵ Such pride in thy children! Shaven bare thy brow; vulture itself is not so bald; alas, for sons of thine exiled far away!

2 Out upon you, that lie awake over dreams of mischief, schemes of ill, and are up at dawn of day to execute them, soon as your godless hands find opportunity! Covet they house or lands, house or lands
2 by robbery become theirs; ever their oppression comes between a man and his home, a man and his inheritance. And I, 3

¹ In the original, the latter part of this verse reads simply, 'What is the crime of Israel; is it not Samaria? And what are the hill-shrines of Juda, are they not Jerusalem?' The sense of the phrase cannot be determined with certainty.

² 'The gauds she wears'; literally, 'the wages of a harlot', as in the concluding part of the sentence. The prophet seems to regard the meretricious accessories of Samaritan worship not as a gift from man to God, but as a gift from God to man (possibly in allusion to the idea that false gods were responsible for Israel's prosperity, cf. Os. 2. 5). The end of the verse is perhaps merely a proverb, 'lightly come, lightly go', used of wealth won on easy terms.

³ Gath seems to have been wrested from the Philistines by Ozias (II Par. 26. 6); Michaelas points out that this and the neighbouring towns will once more be lost to Juda as the result of the Assyrian invasion. He plays upon the names of these towns by a series of rough assonances, of which the rendering given above may afford some idea. Unfortunately, the text of verses 10-15 seems to have been much disturbed; the meaning of the Hebrew is doubtful in several cases, and the Latin version, like the Septuagint Greek, yields no satisfactory sense, even where it can be construed as grammar. The Latin version also represents most of the place-names by common nouns. It is, therefore, the sense of the Hebrew text that is given here.

⁴ The allusion to Lachis as specially responsible for Juda's misdoings has not been convincingly explained. ⁵ It seems impossible to find any meaning in the phrase, 'the glory of Israel shall come to Odollam', and the text of the verse may well have suffered in transmission.

too, the Lord says, am devising mischief, mischief against the whole clan of you; never think to shake it off from your necks and walk proudly as of old; ill days are 4 coming. A by-word then they shall make of you, dirge and dole of music raise over you: Stripped, stripped bare! My country's bounds removed! Come he but once again, that so parcels out our lands, all is 5 lost to me! Trust me, when lands are allotted among the Lord's people, never shall one of yonder clan have rope to throw.¹

6 Prophets, leave your prophesying; word of prophecy is never for such as these, never may shame overtake them.² What, cry they of Jacob, is the Lord so easily offended? Are his designs indeed so unfavourable? Nay, certain it is, if a man will follow the straight path, award of mine 8 shall prosper him; but what of you? Has not this people of mine long counted you enemies, rising up to arraign you? Robbers, that will have cloak and coat both; what marvel if simple folk are up in arms 9 against you? My people! And you would dispossess its women of the homes they loved, take away from its children . . . my 10 glory for ever.³ Do you, in your turn, rise up and go your ways; no resting-place shall you have here; corruption most foul the guilt of this land shall breed in it.

1 Alas, that I should be one beckoned by the spirit, and not rather some forger of lies! Wine and revel to inspire him, he might prophesy, and a people such as this 2 take him for an oracle: Trust me, Jacob, I mean to assemble thee in full strength, rally all that is left of Israel in one place, thronging like sheep in fold, like herd in 3 byre, hum of voices echoing all around; where the breach has been made ready for them, break they out and pass on their way, sally forth with a king to lead them, with the Lord at their head!⁴

3 But no, this is my word to you, chieftains of Jacob's line, rulers of Israel: Who should acclaim justice, if not you? Alas, that you should be the foes of right, 2 the friends of wrong! Beasts of prey, that will have skin and flesh both, leave nothing save the bare bone. My people! And you will gnaw flesh of them, tear skin of them, 3 break bones of them; cut them to pieces, meat for your pot, roast for your oven! What marvel, if the Lord will not listen to 4 such cry as yours, turns his back on you in your distress, for your ill deserving?

And this message the Lord has for prophets that guide my people amiss, prophets that must have their mouths filled ere they will cry, All's well; sop thou must give them, else thou shalt be their sworn enemy. Visions would you see, all shall be 6 night around you, search you the skies, you shall search in the dark; never a prophet but his sun is set, his day turned into twilight! Seers that see nothing, baffled diviners, acknowledge they, finger on lip, word from God is none. But here stands 8 one that is full of the Lord's spirit; vigour it lends me, and discernment, and boldness, fault of Jacob to denounce, guilt of Israel to proclaim.

A word with you, chieftains of Jacob's line, rulers of Israel, that hold right abominable, and all justice pervert; that 10 build up strength of Sion, fortunes of Jerusalem, with deeds of bloodshed and of wrong! Never a judge but has his price; 11 never a priest tradition teaches, but for hire; never a prophet but must have his hand lined with silver! And all the while, how lean they on the Lord! Is not he in their midst (they ask)? How should harm 12 befall them? Trust me, for such guilt as yours I will turn mount Sion into ploughlands; standing heaps of stones that were once Jerusalem, and brushwood of the high forest growing over the Temple hill.

¹ Literally, 'thou shalt not have a man to throw a rope'. It is difficult to see what is the singular subject addressed as 'thou', unless it be the clan mentioned in verse 3, though indeed we might have expected a feminine preposition to follow it.

² Verses 6-11 are very obscure, and some critics think the text has suffered from considerable faults of copying. Verse 6 begins, in the Hebrew text, 'Do not prophesy, they will prophesy, they will not prophesy to these', and in the Latin version, 'Do not speak speaking, it will not drip upon these'.

³ It seems difficult to believe that the text has not suffered here, either by corruption or by omission.

⁴ Verses 11-13 are usually printed as if a fresh paragraph began with verse 12. But verses 12 and 13, in that case, wholly interrupt the run of the passage, and the note of encouragement is particularly out of place here. The rendering given above assumes that verses 12 and 13 are the utterance of the imaginary false prophet, verse 1 of the next chapter being the message which Michæas, as a true prophet, is forced to deliver. It is doubtful whether there is any reference here to a return from exile; the situation envisaged seems rather to be a sortie from a besieged stronghold (cf. IV Kg. 25. 4).

- 4 The Temple hill!¹ One day it shall stand there, highest of all the mountain-heights, overtopping the peaks of them, and the nations will flock there together. A multitude of peoples will make their way to it, crying, Come, let us climb up to the Lord's mountain-peak, to the house where the God of Jacob dwells; he shall teach us the right way, we will walk in the paths he has chosen. The Lord's command shall go out from Sion, his word from Jerusalem; over thronging peoples he shall sit in judgement, give award to great nations from far away. Sword they will fashion into ploughshare and spear into pruning-hook; no room there shall be for nation to levy war against nation, and train itself in arms. At ease you shall sit, each of you with his own vine, his own fig-tree to give him shade, and none to raise the alarm; such blessing the Lord of hosts pronounces on you. Let other nations go their own way, each with the name of its own god to rally it; ours to march under his divine name, who is our God for ever and for evermore!
- 6 When that time comes, the Lord says, I will gather them in again and take them to myself, flock of mine that go limping and straggling, ever since I brought calamity on them; lame shall yet be a stock to breed from, and wayworn shall grow into a sturdy race; here in Sion they shall dwell, and the Lord be king over them, for ever henceforward. And thou, the watch-tower of that flock, cloud-capped fastness where the lady Sion reigns, power shall come back to thee as of old, once more Jerusalem shall be a queen.
- 9 When that time comes! At this present time, what anguish is this constrains thee?

Have king and counsellor played thee false, that the pangs of travail take hold on thee? Sorrow thou well mayst, lady of Sion, and labour as any woman brought to bed; city thou must needs leave, and lodge in the open country-side, nay, to distant Babylon thou must journey;² there it is thou wilt find deliverance, there it is the Lord will ransom thee from the power of thy enemies. At this present time, how many the nations that gather about thee, crying, Death to the adulteress! Feast we our eyes on Sion's downfall! Little they know God's thoughts; little they guess his purpose is to store them up, like wheat on the threshing-floor! Up, lady of Sion, and set about the threshing of them! Horn of iron, hoof of bronze he will give thee, to grind all that conspiracy of nations to dust. Forfeit to the Lord their ill-gotten gains shall be; nothing of theirs but must be his, who is master of the whole earth.

5 At this present time, what is left thee but to muster thy roving bands, daughter of an outlaw king? Hard siege presses us now; smitten on the cheek, now, is the ruler of Israel.³

Bethlehem-Ephrata! Least do they reckon thee among all the clans of Juda? Nay, it is from thee I look to find a prince that shall rule over Israel. Whence comes he? From the first beginning, from ages untold!⁴

Marvel not, then, if the Lord abandons his people⁵ for a time, until she who is in travail has brought forth her child; others there are, brethren of his,⁶ that must be restored to the citizenship of Israel. Enabled by the Lord his God, confident in that mighty protection, stands he, our ¹ vv. 1-3. The same words occur at the beginning of Is. 2. Since Michæas was Isaiah's contemporary, it seems probable that both prophets are quoting from some older fragment of literature.

² The mention of Babylon suggests, to the modern reader, the Captivity, which took place a century later. Michæas' own contemporaries will have imagined that they were going to take refuge in Babylon as in a friendly country (IV Kg. 20. 12).

³ The beginning of this verse reads literally, 'Now thou shalt be laid waste, daughter of freebooters'; in the Hebrew text, 'thou shalt be laid waste' is 'form thyself into bands' (or possibly 'cut thyself', i.e. in sign of mourning). Thus both the meaning of the verse and its historical background are obscure; but conceivably the prophet is preaching guerrilla warfare, and reminding his fellow-countrymen that this was, in early days, king David's experience.

⁴ Our present Hebrew text reads, 'Thou (art) too small to be among the clans of Juda'; but there may have been an alternative reading, 'thou art not small among the clans of Juda'. This would account for the rendering given in Mt. 2. 6, without making it necessary to suppose that the translator of St. Matthew's Aramaic was guilty of an error. 'From ages untold'; literally, 'from the days of eternity', but this is a phrase used somewhat loosely by Hebrew authors (cf. 7. 20 below); and no certain theological inferences can be based on it.

⁵ Literally, 'he abandons them', but the sense is presumably that given. ⁶ Apparently the brethren of the Messianic prince; the Septuagint Greek gives 'their brethren', but this is probably guesswork.

shepherd, and safely folds his flock; fame of him now reaches to the world's end; who else should be its hope of recovery? What though the Assyrian invade our country, trample down our strongholds? Seven leaders of men we shall find to marshal us, and an eighth yet in reserve; sword in hand, they shall herd the men of Assyria, naked steel for the land of Nemrod! Invade they, trample they as they will, he shall be our deliverance.

Poor remnant of Jacob, lost among that multitude of peoples! Yet thrive it shall; does not the grass thrive, with dew and shower from the Lord to water it, nor looks for man's tending, unbeholden to our human toil? Poor remnant of Jacob, among those heathen multitudes lost! Yet lion amid the forest herds, lion's whelp amid flock of sheep, finds not easier passage, brings not down more inexorably his prey. High triumph thou shalt have over thy enemies; perish all that bear thee ill-will!

All other help, the Lord says, shall then be denied thee; gone, horse and chariot of thine, the cities lost, ruined the strongholds. Sorcery thou shalt have none to trust in, nor divinings; gone idol and sacred pillar of thine, nor any of thy own imaginings left thee; uprooted the woods of thy false worship, fallen the cities. Only then shall my fierce anger find its scope, only then fall my vengeance upon the nations that defied me.

6 Listen to this message I have from the Lord: Up, and to the mountains make thy complaint, let the hill-sides echo with thy voice! Listen they must, yonder sturdy bastions of earth, while the Lord impleads his people; Israel stands upon its trial now. Tell me, my people, what have I done, that thou shouldst be a-weary of me? Answer me. Was it ill done, to rescue thee from Egypt, set thee free from a slave's prison, send Moses and Aaron and Mary to guide thee on thy way? Bethink thee, what designs had Balach, king of Moab, and how Balaam the son of Beor answered him... from Setim to Galgala; and canst thou doubt, then, the faithfulness of the Lord's friendship?¹

How best may I humble myself before the Lord, that is God most high? What offering shall I bring? Calf, think you, of a year old, for my burnt-sacrifice? Fall rams by the thousand, fattened buck-goats by the ten thousand, will the Lord be better pleased? Shall gift of first-born for wrong-doing atone, body's fruit for soul's assailing? Nay, son of Adam, what need to ask?² Best of all it is, and this above all the Lord demands of thee, right thou shouldst do, and ruth love, and carry thyself humbly in the presence of thy God.

So comes the divine voice to yonder city; best he shall thrive, that stands in awe of thy name.³ Listen, tribesmen, to that voice; which of you dares acclaim it? What of homes unhallowed, that hide yet the ill-gotten gain⁴, the false measure to call down my vengeance? Here the uneven scales, there the bag of short weights, and shall I hold you acquitted? City where the rich are ever busy with oppression, where all is treachery, and a man has a tongue in his mouth only to deceive! Thy turn, now, to feel my lash; thy guilt is thy undoing. Thine to eat, and eating, never have thy fill; for all alike, now, the same affliction.⁵ Thine to enslave, but thy slaves never to keep; those thou hast, I mean to make over to the sword. Sow shalt thou, and never reap, press olive, and never anoint thee, tread grape, and no wine drink. Commands of Amri thou wouldst obey, not mine, Ahab's purposes, not mine, fulfil; their bidding if thou wouldst follow, what marvel that I should mark thee down for ruin, Jerusalem for the hiss of scorn?

¹ It seems probable that some words have been lost here; Setim and Galgala are not connected in any way with Balaam's prophecy, but are, respectively, the last camping-ground of Israel before, and the first camping-ground after, the passage of Jordan.

² 'What need to ask?'; literally, 'I will tell thee', but in the Hebrew text 'he has told thee' (or possibly, 'it has been told thee').

³ This verse is very obscure in the Hebrew text, and its interpretation remains uncertain.

⁴ The ill-gotten gain; literally, 'the embers of ill-gotten gain', but it would appear that the Latin version and the Septuagint Greek have here misunderstood a word in the original.

⁵ The Hebrew word here rendered 'affliction' occurs nowhere else, and the rendering given in the Latin is perhaps only a conjecture. In the second part of the verse, the Hebrew text is generally understood as referring, not to enslavement, but to the removal of wives, children, etc. into a place of safety.

Shame of its own origins the people that is mine must bear.¹

7 Your tears for Sion! Not more pitiful work is gleaning when the vintage is done; never a cluster to eat; for the ripe 2 figs belly craves in vain. Fled is piety, vanished honesty, from human kind; murderous plots afoot; the hunt is up everywhere, man spreading his nets for man.
 3 Ever the wrong done, and fair names devised for it; ruler must have his benevolence, and judge his gratuity, and tyrant makes known what is his earnest wish;
 4 they know well how to wrap it up.² Cruel as thorns they be, that are kindest of them, close as thorn-hedge, that are honest above the rest. Surely this is the day thy watchmen foretold, surely thou wilt call them to account; not long delayed their last extremity!

5 Trust no man, give thy heart to no man, though he be friend and counsellor of thine; against the wife that lies on thy 6 bosom, guard the entry of thy lips; here, where son fools father, and daughter her mother, and son's wife her mother-in-law, where a man's own household are his 7 enemies! On the Lord my eyes are set; it is to God I look for my protection; my own God, and will he deny me audience?

8 City that Sion hatest, never triumph over her fall; fall I, it is but to rise again, sit I in darkness, the Lord will be my light.
 9 The Lord's displeasure I must bear, I that have sinned against him, till at last he admits my plea, and grants redress. Out into the light he will bring me, to find him faithful still. Sore abashed that enemy of mine shall behold it; only yesterday she was crying, What is become of thy God now? Welcome the sight, when she is trampled down like mire in the streets!³

Day of pell-mell disorder it shall be, the day of thy walls' rebuilding; a day when folk shall resort to thee from all the lands that lie between Assyria and the towns of Egypt, between Egypt and . . . Euphrates, between sea and sea, mountain-range and mountain-range.⁴ By then, the whole country-side will be lying desolate, such reward the inhabitants of it have earned by their ill-doing. With that staff of thine gather thy people in, the flock that is thy very own, scattered now in the forest glades, with rich plenty all around them; Basan and Galaad for their pasture-grounds, as in the days of old. Now for such wondrous evidences of power as marked thy rescuing of them from Egypt! Here is a sight to make the Gentiles hold their valour cheap, stand there dumb; ay, and why not deaf too? Let them lick the dust, serpent-fashion, crawl out from their homes, like scared reptiles, in terror of the Lord our God; much cause they shall have to fear him.

Was there ever such a God, so ready to forgive sins, to overlook faults, among the scattered remnant of his chosen race? He will exact vengeance no more; he loves to pardon. He will relent, and have mercy on us, quashing our guilt, burying our sins away sea-deep. Thou wilt keep thy promise to Jacob, shew mercy to Abraham, thy promised mercies of long ago.

¹ The concluding words of the chapter read literally, 'You shall bear the reproach of my people'. Some think this means, 'You (the rich) shall bear the reproach of my people in general'; others suppose that there is a slight error in the manuscripts, and that we should render, 'You shall bear the taunts of the (heathen) nations'.

² The interpretation of this verse is difficult; the meaning given above seems to fit the Latin best.

³ We have no means of determining whether the last thirteen words are part of what the rival city used to say about Sion, or part of what Sion will say about the rival city.

⁴ The passage is obscure, and there is some reason to doubt whether the text has been preserved accurately. It runs literally, 'Day for the building of thy walls, that (is a) day the limit is removed far off; that (is a) day and he (or, people) shall come all the way to thee, all the way from Assur and the cities of Mazor, all the way from Mazor and to the River, and the sea from the sea and the mountain the mountain'. 'Limit' can hardly mean 'frontier', a notion which is always expressed elsewhere by a different word (over two hundred times in the Old Testament). The phrase 'limit is removed' is a jingle of words, probably meant to suggest confusion, like our 'higgledy-piggledy'. Mazor is translated as a proper noun ('fortress') in the Latin version. It is hard to see why the space between Assyria and Egypt should be regarded as different from the space between Egypt and the Euphrates; possibly something has dropped out.

THE PROPHECY OF NAHUM

1 WHAT burden for Nineve? Here is matter revealed to Nahum 2 the Elcesite. A jealous lover the Lord is, and takes full vengeance; full vengeance the Lord takes, no stranger, he, to indignation; nor spares 3 rebel, nor forgets the wrong. Bide his time he may, but power lacks not; guilty is guilty still. Storm and whirlwind are the path he treads, cloud-wrack the dust he 4 spurns; the sea at his rebuke dries up, streams turn into a desert, Basan withers away, and Carmel; all the leaf of Lebanon 5 fades. Shrink and shrivel they, mountaintop and hill-side, before him; quakes earth at his coming, and all the world of men 6 with it. Alas, when the blow of his resentment falls, who may confront that fierce anger unmoved? Here is vengeance poured out like fire, to melt the hard rock!

7 None so gracious as the Lord, no strength like his in the hour of distress; do but trust him, and he will keep thee in his care. . .
8 . . . Flood-tide shall overwhelm the site of it;¹ ever his enemies find darkness at 9 their heels. Think not, by shifts of yours, to thwart the Lord's will; believe me, he will take full toll, there shall be no second 10 visitation. Close be it as thicket of thorns, yonder conspiracy over the cups, all at once, like scorched stubble, they shall be consumed.²

Here is one of thy number devising rebellion against the Lord, folly's counsellor.
But thus the Lord says: Are they in full muster? At least there are over-many of them; they must be shorn of their strength.
It will pass; once chastened is chastened enough,³ and now I mean to shatter that 13 yoke of his that lies on thy back, tear thy chains asunder. . .

For thee, this doom the Lord has; race 14 shall never spring from thee to bear thy name, nor in the temple of thy god any images be left, cast or carven; and I will write it on thy tomb-stone, thou wast nothing worth.⁴

See where they bring good news on 15 the mountain heights, proclaiming that all is well! Now, Juda, keep holiday; paid be thy vows; mocking enemy shall pass through thee no more; never a one left.⁵

2 Here is an enemy at thy gates that scatters all before him; here is close siege, no entry but must be guarded; gird thee well, summon up all thy strength!
Honour of Juda the Lord retrieves now, 2 and honour of Israel both, that have seen the spoiler ransack them, strip vineyard bare.⁶ Bright flash that enemy's shields, 3 warriors of his go clad in scarlet; dart like flame his chariots as he goes to the attack, dizzily sways charioteer. How jostle they 4 in the streets, those chariots, hurtle they in

¹ Since there is no noun in verse 7 to which the words 'of it' can conceivably refer, the suspicion naturally arises that there may have been an accidental omission in the text. ² Some modern scholars, by means of altering and transposing the text, make verses 1-10 into part of an abecedarian poem; i.e. one in which the first verse in the Hebrew begins with Aleph, the second with Beth, and so on (cf. e.g. Ps. 24). There is some reason to think that Ps. 9 was originally abecedarian, and the traces of it were confused by subsequent editing (as happened with the Hymn of Friday Lauds). But a careful examination of the present chapter suggests that the apparent traces of arrangement may be due to mere coincidence.

³ The meaning of the Hebrew text here is uncertain, and many scholars think it corrupt. It runs, literally, 'Thus the Lord says: Are they complete? (or, If they are complete) even so they are many; and even so they will be shaven. And it (or, he) will pass, and I have afflicted thee but I will not afflict thee any more.' ⁴ This verse is evidently addressed not to Juda but to Assyria, and some think it has been accidentally misplaced. ⁵ v.v. 11-15. Some part, or all, of verses 11-15 may refer to the invasion of Sennacherib (IV Kg. 18 sqq.). ⁶ 'Mocking enemy' is literally 'Belial', a word meaning 'worthlessness' or perhaps 'destruction'.

⁶ Meaning and bearing of this verse are obscure; it tells us that the Lord will restore, or perhaps remove, or perhaps requite, the excellency, or perhaps the pride, of Jacob, and also that of Israel. 'Jacob' is a strict equivalent of 'Israel' as a rule; here, if the text is sound, it can only be conjectured that Jacob stands for Juda, and Israel for the ten tribes. Some think the whole verse has been accidentally misplaced.

the open market-place; dazzle they like flame of torches, like the lightning that comes and goes!

5 Alas, for the muster-roll of the king's vassals,¹ fallen as they went about their task! Swiftly they manned the walls, but the engines were in place already. Open, now, stands the water-gate, crumbles yonder temple into dust. Alas, for warriors of Nineve gone into exile, for maids of hers led away,² that sigh and moan like ring-doves in the bitterness of their heart!
8 Nineve, welcome sight as pools of water to the fugitive;³ stay, stay! But never a one looks back. Out with silver, out with gold of hers; store is here of costly stuff beyond 10 price or reckoning! Roof to cellar rifled and ransacked! Sore hearts are here, and knees that knock together, loins that go 11 labouring, and pale cheeks.⁴ Lair of lion, and nursery of his whelps, what trace is left of thee, once so secure a retreat, his haunt and theirs? Cub nor lioness should want, so preyed he, so mauled he, so filled with plunder of his forays the den 13 where he lay. Have at thee! says the Lord of hosts; yonder chariots shall be burnt to ashes; whelps of thine shall die at the sword's point, plunder of thine be swept off the face of earth; and for thy heralds, their voices shall be heard no more.

3 Out upon thee, city of blood, full fed with treason and rapine, yet still at prey! What sounds are these? Crack of whip, whirring of wheels, beat of horse-hoof, rattle of chariot. Mounts horseman, flash like lightning sword and spear; what carnage! How cumbered the earth with slain! Dead bodies past counting; the living stumble over the dead. Harlot so unwearied in thy harlot's ways, so fair, so full of witchery, too long hast thou betrayed a nation here, a tribe there, with sorcery of thine, harlotry of thine; and now I will be even with thee, says the Lord God of hosts. I mean to set thy skirts flying about thy ears, and lay bare the naked shame of thee, for all the kingdoms of the world to see; pelted thou shalt be with things abominable, and foully bemocked; such a public show I will make of thee, passer-by will be fain to shun thee; Nineve fallen, says he, and never a tear! Search where I will, never a friend to comfort thee!⁵ Here was another city, No-Ammon,⁶ fair as thyself; she too was built on the river-side, water all about her; the sea her mart, the sea her defences. Hers the Ethiop land, hers was Egypt; wanted there strength yet, African and Libyan were at her side; yet thy fate was hers, exile, and captivity, and children at every street's turning dashed to death; honour and rank condemned to the lot's mercy, and the chain's grip!

Bemused and helpless with fear, looking about for succour against the invader, so she was, so thou shalt be. At a touch thy bastions shall fall, like ripe figs that drop into the eater's mouth, soon as tree is shaken; woman-hearted the defenders, the gates wide open to the enemy's onrush, touchwood the bars of them. Water, there, water for a siege! Raise the battlements higher yet! Down to the clay-pit with thee, tread the mortar, put thy hand to the brick-mould! Fire shall consume thee none the less, the sword cut thee off, hungry as locust to devour.

Thrive thou as locust thrives or grass-hopper, ay, let thy enterprises⁷ outnumber the stars in heaven, what avails it? Early hatches locust, early flies away. Forgotten, the high lords, forgotten, the

¹ Literally, 'he will remember (or perhaps mention) his princes'. There is no evidence that the verb can mean 'to summon', and the phrase is so awkward that we may be tempted to suspect the prophet wrote something else; e.g. 'his menfolk, his princes'.

² The word rendered 'warriors' in the Latin more probably refers, perhaps by a proper name, to some queen or goddess; the word used for 'maids' has, everywhere else, the sense of female attendants.

³ 'Nineve, welcome sight as pools of water to the fugitive'; the Hebrew text here differs from that of the Septuagint Greek, and of the Latin, but the literal sense is probably, 'Nineve is a pool of water; water is she, and they fugitives'. The meaning of the verse can only be conjectured.

⁴ 'Pale cheeks'; literally, 'faces like the blackness of a pot'. We may compare Joel 2. 6, where the Latin renders the same phrase, 'all faces shall be turned into a pot'. The literal meaning of the Hebrew text is that they will gather some kind of complexion perhaps best described as 'lividness'; the noun does not occur anywhere else.

⁵ It is not clear where the comments of the supposed passer-by come to an end.

⁶ No or No-Ammon is commonly identified with (Egyptian) Thebes, the 'sea' being understood as referring to the Nile. The Latin version gives 'Alexandria', which involves a manifest anachronism.

⁷ In the Hebrew text, 'thy merchants'.

A change of one letter would give 'thy foot-soldiers'.

princelings,¹ as they had been locusts,
and brood of locusts, that cling to yonder hedge-row in the chill of morning, and are gone, once the sun is up, who knows 18 whither? Gone to their rest thy marshals, king of Assyria; thy vassals lie silent in the dust; out on the hills the common folk take refuge, with none to muster them. Wound of thine there is no hiding, 19 hurt of thine is grievous; nor any shall hear the tidings of it but shall clap their hands over thee, so long thy tyrannous yoke has rested on so many.

¹ The words rendered 'high lords' and 'princelings' are rare words of uncertain significance. The Latin has 'guardians' and 'little ones', but it seems likely that state officials of some kind are meant.

THE PROPHECY OF HABACUC

THIS burden following was revealed to the prophet Habacuc.

- ² Lord, must I ever cry out to thee, and gain hearing never? Plead against tyranny, and no deliverance ³ be granted me? Must I nothing see but wrong and affliction; turn where I will, nothing but robbery and oppression; pleading at law everywhere, everywhere ⁴ contention raising its head? What marvel if the old teachings are torn up,¹ and redress is never to be found? Innocence by knavery circumvented still, and false award given!
- ⁵ Have you no eyes for the world about you? Look upon it with wonder and awe; in your own days here be strange deeds a-doing, so strange, a man would scarce credit them if they were told in story.²
- ⁶ What a nation is this I am spurring on to battle, the Chaldaean folk, so implacable, so swift! Ready to march the wide world over, so there be lands, not theirs, to covet!
- ⁷ A grim nation and a terrible; no right they acknowledge, no title, but what themselves ⁸ bestow. Not leopard so lithe as horse of theirs, not wolf at evening so fast; wide the sweep of their horsemen, that close in, close in from afar, flying like vultures ⁹ hungry for their prey. Plunderers all; eager as the sirocco their onset, whirling ¹⁰ away, like sand-storm, their captives.³ Here be men that hold kings in contempt, make princes their sport; no fortress but is a child's game to such as these; let them but ¹¹ make a heap of dust, it is theirs. Veers wind, and he is gone; see him fall down and ascribe the victory to his god!⁴

But thou, Lord, my God and all my worship, thou art from eternity! And wilt thou see us perish? Warrant of thine they hold, take their strength from thee, only to make known thy justice, thy chastening power!⁵ So pure those eyes, shall they feast on wrong-doing? Wilt thou brook the sight of oppression, look on while treason is done? Innocence the prey of malice, and no word from thee? As well had men been fishes in the sea, or creeping things, that ruler have none! And indeed it nothing spares, hook of yonder Chaldaean; seine and drag he spreads for all, and great joy has he of his sport. Nay, seine must have its victims, incense be offered to drag; whom else thanks he for the rich fare on his plate, viands most dainty? Trust me, wider still yonder net shall be flung; sword of his will never have done with massacre.

2 What message, then, is entrusted to me? What answer shall I make when I am called to account? Here on the watch-tower my post shall be; stand I on the battlements, and await his signal.

Write down thy vision, the Lord said, on a tablet, so plain that it may be read with a glance; a vision of things far distant, yet one day befall they must, no room for doubting it. Wait thou long, yet wait patiently; what must be must, and at the time appointed for it. Foul air the doubter breathes; by his faith he lives, who lives right.

Tyrant, like drunkard, is mocked by

¹ 'Are torn up'; according to the Hebrew text, 'have lost their vigour'. The reference to teaching (that is, of the Law) shews that these verses refer to misdoings among God's own people. But the prophet only cites these as an instance of man's inhumanity to man in general.

² These verses, 5-11, put into the mouth of Almighty God, are a preface to Habacuc's own protest against the barbarity of the Chaldaeans. Probably, although they are cast into the prophetic form, they represent facts which had already taken place at the time when this prophecy was made; Habacuc seems to have lived under the captivity (Dan. 14. 32)

³ The Hebrew text here is obscure; some think it means the Chaldaeans had their faces set towards the east, or perhaps simply 'forward'.

⁴ Literally, 'Then a wind (or spirit) will be changed, and he (or it) will pass by, and he will fall down; this is the strength of his god'.

The Hebrew text, which is slightly different, gives a doubtful sense and is perhaps corrupt.

⁵ It is not clear whether this means God has raised up the Chaldaeans in order to punish the Jews, or in order to exhibit his justice by punishing, later, the Chaldaeans themselves.

false dreams of glory.¹ See him whet his appetite, not death itself nor the grave more insatiable; gather up a tribe here, a nation there, heap his plate with them!

6 One day, what a by-word they will make of him! What riddling taunts shall be hurled at him! As here follows:

So thou wouldst hoard up the possessions that are none of thine, load thyself with base dross,² and it should go on for ever? All unawares the foe shall spring, worry thee, harry thee, make a helpless prey of thee. So many lands thou hast plundered, plundered thyself shalt be; enough nations are left for that; for men's blood shed, and for fields ravaged, plundered the city shall be, and all that dwell there.³

9 Ill-gotten gains thou wouldst amass to deck that house of thine; make it an eyrie, too high for envious hands to reach? Nay, with this undoing of many peoples thou hast done thy own house despite, thy own life is forfeit; stone from ruined wall cries out against thee, and beam from gaping roof echoes the cry.

12 City thou wouldst found, city's walls build up, with deeds of bloodshed and of wrong? What, has not the Lord of hosts uttered his doom, toil of nations shall feed the fire, and all their labour be spent for nothing? It is the Lord's glory men must learn to know, that shall cover the earth, flooding over it like the waters of the sea.⁴

15 Thou wouldst pour out a draught for thy neighbour, a draught thy own hand has poisoned; bemuse him as with wine, to leave him stripped and bare? This was to cover thyself with shame, not with glory; drink thou in thy turn, and grow dizzy! A round for thee, now, from yonder cup the Lord holds in his hand; how shamefully is that glory of thine bespewed!

17 Wrong done to Lebanon, scathe of the roaming beasts, shall recoil on thee; fear shall overtake them,⁵ city of thine and all that dwell there, for men's blood shed, and for fields ravaged.

What avails image, that carver should be at pains to carve it? In metal his own hands have melted shall a man put his trust? Cheating likenesses, dumb idols all! And thy prayer was, stock and stone should wake up and come to thy aid, senseless things that cannot signify their will;⁶ nay, breath in their bodies have none, for all they are tricked out with gold and silver!

And all the while, the Lord is in his holy temple. Keep silence, earth, before him.

3 A prayer of the prophet Habacuc for Shigionoth.⁷

I have heard, Lord, the tale of thy renown, awe-stricken at the divine power thou hast. Reveal that power in these latter days, in these latter days make it known once more! And though we have earned thy anger, bethink thee of mercy still. God coming near from Teman, the holy One from yonder hills of Pharan! See how his glory overspreads heaven, his fame echoes through the earth; the brightness that is his, like light itself, the rays that stream from his hand, masking its strength; pestilence his outrider, the wasting sickness⁸ in his train! There stood he, and scanned the earth; at his look, the nations were adread; melted were the everlasting mountains, bowed were the ancient hills, his own immemorial pathway, as he journeyed. I saw the Ethiopian quail in his tent,⁹ the dwellings of Madian astir with terror.

Is it the rivers, Lord, that have awaked thy anger; should it be the rivers? Or has the sea earned thy vengeance, that thou comest thus mounted on thy horses, on thy victorious chariot; that bow of thine

¹ Literally, 'Behold, the breath (or life) of him who is incredulous will not be straight within him, but the just man will have life in his faith. And as wine deceives the drinker, so shall a proud man be, and he will not be adorned'. The Latin here is evidently trying to restore sense to a passage unintelligible in the Hebrew text. The word 'faith' in the Old Testament usually means faithfulness (to one's word); here the context suggests that it means confidence.

² 'Base dross'; literally, 'thick mud', a mistaken attempt to identify a Hebrew word which means 'borrowers' pledges'. In the next verse, the verb 'worry' or 'bite' is, in Hebrew, closely allied to a word meaning 'usury'.

³ Here and in verse 17 below the Latin version has probably misunderstood the Hebrew construction, referring 'the city and all that dwell there' not to Babylon but to her victims.

⁴ Verses 12-14 seem to be a cento of quotations; cf. Mic. 3. 10, Jer. 51. 58, Is. 11. 9.

⁵ Literally, 'it shall frighten them'; the last word is masculine in the Latin, feminine in the Hebrew. The Hebrew text of this verse is very obscure, and may well be corrupt.

⁶ 'Signify their will'; literally 'teach'. If the text is sound, the contrast must be with the true God as Lawgiver.

⁷ 'For Shigionoth' appears to be a musical direction, of uncertain meaning. The Vulgate Latin renders 'for faults of inadvertence'.

⁸ 'The wasting sickness'; this is the rendering of the new Latin Psalter; the Vulgate Latin translates, 'the devil'.

⁹ Literally, 'the tents of Ethiopia under affliction'. The Vulgate gives a less probable rendering, 'the tents of Ethiopia (required) for their guilt'.

brought into full play, which grants to Israel the assurance of thy succour?¹ Earth is torn into ravines; the mountains tremble at the sight. Fierce falls the rain-storm, the depths beneath us roar aloud, the heights beckon from above; sun and moon linger in their dwelling-place;² so bright thy arrows volley, with such sheen of lightning glances thy spear.

12 Nay, if thou ride through the world so angrily, with thy disdain striking the nations dumb, it is to rescue thy own people, rescue thy own anointed servant, that thou goest out to battle. Down fall the turrets in yonder castle of godlessness, down sink the foundations to their very base; lights thy ban on its princes, on the heads of its warriors, whose blustering rage would overthrow me, confident now as some petty tyrant who oppresses the poor in secret.

15 Over the sea, over the ooze beneath its waves, thou hast made a path for thy horses to tread.

Such was the tale that set my whole frame trembling; at the rumour of it my lips quivered with fear; there was a faintness overcame my whole being, my steps faltered as I went. Now with tranquil heart let me await this day of doom; upon the enemies of our people it is destined to fall.³ What though the fig-tree never bud, the vine yield no fruit, the olive fail, the fields bear no harvest; what though our folds stand empty of sheep, our byres of cattle? Still will I make my boast in the Lord, triumph in the deliverance God sends me. The Lord, the ruler of all, is my stronghold; he will bring me safely on my way, safe as the hind whose feet echo already on the hills.

(For the chief singer, to the harp's music.⁴)

¹ 'Which grants to Israel the assurance of thy succour'; literally, 'the promises which thou hast made to the tribes', see Gen. 49. 24. The new Latin Psalter has 'thy quiver so full of arrows', a reading based on certain manuscripts of the Septuagint Greek.

² 'The heights beckon from above; sun and moon linger in their dwelling-place'; the new Latin Psalter reads (with certain manuscripts of the Septuagint Greek) 'the sun forgets to dawn in splendour, the moon lingers in her bower'.

³ This is the rendering given by the new Latin Psalter; no satisfactory sense is offered by the Vulgate here: 'Let rottenness enter into my bones, and fester beneath me, that I may have rest in the day of affliction, that I may go up to this people of ours which is girded for battle'.

⁴ The musical direction here printed in brackets is omitted in the new Latin Psalter; the Vulgate has confused it with the text of the canticle.

THE PROPHECY OF SOPHONIAS

To Sophonias, that was descended from Ezechias through Amarias, Godolias and Chusi, this message came from the Lord, at the time when Josias son of Amon reigned in Juda.

Fall to I must, and weed yonder plot of ground, the Lord says; rid it, says he, of man and beast, of bird in air and fish under water; and down shall the godless come too, never a man left alive upon it. All Juda, all the citizens of Jerusalem, shall feel the stroke. Not a trace shall they leave behind, yonder gods of the country-side, acolyte and priest of theirs not a memory; forgotten, all that worship the host of heaven from the roof-tops, all that worship. . . ,¹ take they their oaths to the Lord, or swear they by Melchom; forgotten, all that turn their backs on the Lord, and will neither seek nor search for him.

Silence, there, to greet the Lord! Here is day of his appointing, here is great sacrifice of his preparing; all his guests bidden, all their cleansing done. The Lord's sacrifice! A day of reckoning it shall be, king and prince I will call to account, all that go clad in foreign bravery, all that spurn yonder threshold,² and fill the house of the Lord their God with deeds of treachery and wrong. What an outcry that day, the Lord says, from the Fishmongers' Gate, what lamenting from the New Town! How the hill-sides will echo to the noise of your ruin! Ay, lament indeed, you that dwell in Mortar Valley; of the merchant folk no more is heard; here is an end of all that trafficked in silver.

Time, then, to call for lamps, and search Jerusalem through! Trust me, I will find them out, spoiled natures, like wine that has settled on its lees, the men who think to themselves, From the Lord nothing is to hope, nothing to fear. Ransacked their wealth shall be, and their homes ruined; houses they build they shall never dwell in, vineyards they plant they shall drink of never. Nearer, nearer comes the great day of the Lord's reckoning, ay, and soon; bitter the bruit of its coming; here is peril to cow the bravest heart. Day of vengeance, day of strain and stress, day of ransack and ruin; dim and dark, overcast with cloud and storm! City is none so well fortified, pinnacle is none so high in air, but shall hear braying of trumpets and the battle-cry. Guilty wretches, they shall grope in the dark, flesh and blood of them cheap as dust and dung; silver and gold of them powerless to buy off the Lord's present vengeance. Burns through the land the fire of his slighted love; takes full toll, and speedily, of all that dwell there.

Band together, men of a nation so little loved, bind yourselves in one; ere resolve can bear fruit, like flying chaff passes the day.³ Before the divine vengeance falls on you, before the day of divine retribution comes, to the Lord betake you! To honest doing and patient suffering betake you, men of humble heart wherever you be, men obedient to his will; it may be, when the hour of the Lord's vengeance comes, you shall find refuge.

Gaza and Ascalon to rack and ruin left, Azotus stormed ere the day is out, root and branch destroyed is Accaron! Out upon the forfeited race⁴ that holds yonder strip of coast-land; the Lord's doom is on it, the little Chanaan of the Philistines; wasted it shall be, and never a man to dwell in it. There on the coast-land shepherds shall lie at ease, there shall be folds for flocks; and who shall dwell there? The remnant that is left of Juda's race; there they shall find pasturage, take their rest, when evening comes, in the ruins of Ascalon, when the Lord their God brings them relief, restores their fortunes again.

¹ It is difficult to explain the run of this verse except on the supposition that a word has been lost; e.g. 'on the hill-tops', or 'at the forest shrines'.

² It is uncertain what is meant by 'leaping over the threshold'; probably it was some superstitious practice (cf. I Kg. 5. 5).

³ This passage appears to be addressed to the Jewish people scattered about the world. There is considerable obscurity about the sense, perhaps due to corruption of the text. 'Ere resolve can bear fruit, like flying chaff passes the day'; the Latin version has, 'Before the command brings forth the passing day like chaff', which yields no appropriate sense. For 'resolve', cf. Jg. 5. 15; the phrase is no doubt a proverb.

8 And what of Moab, what of Ammon? Doubt not I have heard the blasphemous taunts they uttered against my own people, as they encroached upon its borders. As I am a living God, says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, no better shall Moab and Ammon be than Sodom and Gomorrha, all waste and brushwood and salt-pits, for ever desolate; of my own people enough remnant shall be left, a nation still, to plunder and to conquer them. Pride that would mock and overreach his own people he, the Lord of hosts, knows how to punish; see what terror he strikes into them! Peak and pine they, gods of the other nations; rise they from their places, one by one, to adore him, island-dwellers of the world.

12 You too, men of Ethiopia, shall feel my sword.

13 That hand shall stretch out northward, and make an end of Assyria; Nineve shall be left forlorn, a trackless desert.¹ Flocks shall lie down there. . . all the wild things of earth; bitter and hedgehog make their dwelling in its doorways, bird-song there shall be in the windows, and raven perched on lintel; so ebbs the strength of it. And this was the proud city that dwelt so free from alarms, thinking to herself, Here I stand, with no rival; a desert now, lair of the wild beasts! Hisses the passer-by in mockery, and shakes his fist.

3 Out on the rebellious city, the defiled city, so full of wrong!² Never the call heard, the warning heeded; trust in the Lord is none; nay, they would keep God at a distance. Here be rulers no better than ravening lions, judges like wolf that prowls at night, and not a bone left on the morrow; prophets that are heedless men and treacherous, priests that profane the sanctuary and do violence to the law. And all the while the Lord is there in the midst of it! Not his the blame; never morning passes but he makes known his award for their enlightening, without fail; and still injustice goes on unashamed! Short work I have made of other nations; crumbling battlements, unfrequented streets, with never a foot-fall, their cities lie ruined and forlorn, with none to dwell in them; Ah, thought I, now at least thou wilt learn to fear me, wilt profit by the warning! Here at least is a city that may be left habitable, send them what plagues I may! But no, early and late they would be at their perverse doings still!

Hope, then, is none,³ till the day, long hence, when I will stand revealed;⁴ what gathering, then, of the nations, all kingdoms joined in one! And upon these, my doom is, vengeance shall fall, fierce anger of mine shall fall; the whole earth shall be consumed with the fire of my slighted love. And after that, all the peoples of the world shall have pure lips, invoking one and all the Lord's name, straining at a single yoke in the Lord's service. From far away, beyond Ethiop rivers, my suppliants shall come to me, sons⁵ of my exiled people the bloodless offering shall bring. No need, then, to blush for wayward thoughts that defied me; gone from thy midst the high-sounding boast; no room, in that mountain sanctuary of mine, for pride henceforward; a poor folk and a friendless I will leave in thy confines, but one that puts its trust in the Lord's name.

The remnant of Israel, strangers now to treachery and wrong, the true word ever on their lips! Yonder flock may graze and lie down to rest, none to dismay it. Break into song, fair Sion, all Israel cry aloud; here is joy and triumph, Jerusalem, for thy royal heart. Thy doom the Lord has revoked, thy enemy repulsed; the Lord, there in the midst of thee, Israel's king! Peril for thee henceforth is none. Such is the message yonder day shall bring to Jeru-

¹ The Latin version, through a mis-reading of the text, gives 'the fair one' instead of 'Nineve'. It looks as if there was some slight omission in verse 14; the word for 'flock' in the Hebrew is only used of domesticated animals. ² The Latin version gives 'the redeemed city, the dove', but this seems due to a faulty understanding of the Hebrew text. Cf. Jer. 25, 38. ³ Literally, 'Therefore thou must wait for me', but the verb commonly expresses an attitude of pious longing, and it looks as if the faithful remnant, not the generality of the Jewish people, were being addressed. ⁴ Literally, 'the day when I will rise up thenceforward'; the Hebrew text has 'the day when I will rise up and catch my prey', the Septuagint Greek, 'the day when I will rise up to bear witness'. ⁵ In the Hebrew text, 'daughters'; there is some ground for suspecting a faulty reading in the manuscripts.

- 17 salem: Courage, Sion! What means it, the unnerved hand? Thou hast one in the midst of thee, the Lord thy God, whose strength shall deliver thee. Joy and pride of his thou shalt be henceforward; silent till now in his love for thee, he will greet thee with cries of gladness.
- 18 Truants that were lost to the covenant
I will reclaim; of thy company they are,
thou shalt be taunted with them no longer;¹ only for thy persecutors that hour shall be the hour of doom. Lamé sheep medicined, and strayed sheep brought home! Lands that despised them shall hear name and fame of them now. Name and fame you shall have, all the world over, the Lord says, when I call you back and gather you in; when you see the fortunes of Israel retrieved at last.

¹ Here again, in verses 17 and 18, most modern editors question the soundness of the Hebrew text; in the Latin version, the difficulties are partly disguised.

THE PROPHECY OF AGGAEUS

IT was in the second year of Darius' reign, on the first day of the sixth month of it, that a message came from the Lord through the prophet Aggaeus; came to Zorobabel, son of Salathiel, that was governor of Juda, and to the high priest, Josue son of Josedec. And thus it ran: Word from the Lord of hosts to his people, that will not restore his temple, but cry, Too early yet! Listen, the Lord said to them through the prophet Aggaeus, is it not too early yet for you to have roofs over your heads, and my temple in ruins? Think well on it, says the Lord of hosts; here is much sown, and little reaped, nor eating brings you a full belly, nor wine a merry heart; such clothes you wear as leave you shivering, such wages win as leak out at purse's bottom! Think well on it, says the Lord of hosts; up to the hill-side with you, fetch timber and restore my temple, if content me you will, the Lord says, if honour me you will! So much attempted, so little attained; store you brought into your houses withered at my breath; would you know the reason for it? says the Lord of hosts. Because to your own houses you run helter-skelter, and my temple in ruins! That is why the skies are forbidden to rain on you, earth to afford its bounty; ban of barrenness lies on plain and hill, wheat and wine and oil and all the earth yields, man and beast and all they toil to win.

12 What made they of it, Salathiel's son Zorobabel, and the high priest, Josue son of Josedec, and all the people with them?

That voice they could not choose but heed, that message from the Lord their God sent to them by the prophet Aggaeus, and they were sore adread of the divine warning. Yet here was divine encouragement; Aggaeus, the Lord's own messenger,¹ gave them the Lord's own assurance he was at their side. So the Lord put heart into them, governor and priest and people alike; and they set to work building up the temple of the Lord God of hosts.

2 This was on the twenty-fourth day of the sixth month, in the second year of Darius.

Afterwards, on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, the Lord sent another message through the prophet Aggaeus. To Zorobabel, and Josue, and all the people with them his word was: Tell me, those of you who saw this house in its former brightness, what make you of it now? It is no better in your eyes than a very nothing. Take heart, Zorobabel; Josue, son of Josedec, take heart! And you, too, people of the land, the Lord of hosts bids you put heart into the work; is not he, the Lord of hosts, at your side?

... the promise I gave when you escaped from Egypt; my own spirit shall be among you, do not be afraid.²

A little while now,³ the Lord of hosts says, and I mean to set heaven and earth, sea and dry land rocking; stirred all the nations shall be, hither shall come the prize the whole world treasures,⁴ and I will fill

¹ Literally, according to the Latin version, 'Aggaeus, an angel from among the angels of the Lord', but this is probably due to a misunderstanding of the Hebrew text. ² It looks as if some words had fallen out between these verses 5 and 6, including a verb to govern 'the promise'. Some editors print the end of verse 5 as a parenthesis, and make the sentence run: 'The Lord of hosts bids you take heart and perform (is not he, the Lord of hosts, at your side?) the word which I covenanted with you when you escaped from Egypt'.

³ Literally, 'a single little while', but the addition gives no satisfactory sense. The Hebrew text is difficult, and perhaps corrupt; the Septuagint Greek gives '(only) once more', a phrase interpreted in Heb. 12. 26 as looking back to the experience of Israel when the law was given on mount Sinai (Ex. 19).

⁴ Literally, 'the object of the whole world's desire shall come'. The Septuagint Greek has, 'the choice (treasures) of the whole world shall come'. Either of these might represent the peculiar language of the Hebrew text, 'they shall come, the object of the whole world's desire' (which could just be rendered, 'they shall come to the object of the whole world's desire', i.e. the temple). 'The brightness of my presence'; literally, 'glory', but the word, when used in connexion with the temple, regularly implies a theophany; (cf. III Kg. 8. 11, Ez. 10. 4).

this temple with the brightness of my presence, says the Lord of hosts.

9 Silver or gold, what matters it? the Lord 10 of hosts says. Both are mine! Bright this new temple shall be, he tells you, as never the first was; here, he tells you, his blessing shall rest.

11 Then, on the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month, in this second year of king Darius, another message came from the 12 Lord to the prophet Aggaeus, bidding him, in the name of the Lord of hosts, make enquiry of the priests upon a matter touch-13 ing the law. And the question was this: Here is one carries consecrated meat in the fold of his garment, and with this same fold chances to touch bread or broth, wine or oil, or what food you will; does this food become consecrated thereby? And the 14 priests said No. Why then, Aggaeus went on, let some other man touch this food, one that is contaminated by the contact of a dead thing, will the food be defiled? And they answered, Defiled it is.

15 Then Aggaeus opened his mind to them: Here is a whole people, a whole race, the Lord says, that shews defiled under my scrutiny. Never an enterprise of theirs, never an offering they bring, but is defiled.
6 But now, mark well how you thrive henceforward. Whilst none would be at pains to set pillar on base, here in the Lord's temple, how fared it with yonder twenty-17 bushel heap of corn? Look closer, and it was but ten bushels. Did you think to press fifty quarts into the vat? There were but twenty. Sirocco I sent and mildew, 18 smote all your crops with hail, and you would not come back to me, the Lord says.

Mark well how you thrive henceforward, 19 from this twenty-fourth day of the ninth month, when you laid the foundations of the Lord's temple; mark it well. Not yet 20 has the corn ripened, not yet have vine and fig, pomegranate and olive, had time to blossom; but on all these my blessing lies henceforward.

And this further message Aggaeus had 21
from the Lord, on that twenty-fourth day of the month, for Zorobabel, the governor 22 of Juda: Earth and heaven both I mean to set rocking; royal thrones shall be over- 23 turned, and the power of Gentile kingdoms brought to nothing; overthrown they lie, chariot and charioteer, down come horse and rider, friend turning his sword against friend; but thou, son of Salathiel, 24 says the Lord of hosts, thou, Zorobabel, art my servant still; on that day I will take thee to my side, keep thee there, close as signet-ring; it is a divine choice that has fallen on thee, says the Lord of hosts.

¹ This had been done in some sort much earlier, under king Cyrus (Esd. 3. 10), but the work was interrupted, and doubtless had to start again from the beginning.

THE PROPHECY OF ZACHARIAS

IT was in the second year of Darius' reign, and the eighth month of it, that a message from the Lord came to the prophet Zacharias, son of Barachias, son of Addo. And thus it ran: Beyond question, your fathers incurred the Lord's displeasure; and now this word thou must proclaim from the Lord of hosts, Come back to me, he bids you, and I, he promises, will come back to your side. Prophets there were long since, that warned those fathers of yours in his name, they should turn away from ill living and rebellious thoughts; yet neither heed nor hearing, he says, would they give me; not for you to follow their example. Gone, the men of an earlier day; prophets that spoke to them might not live on for ever, but warning of mine, promise of mine, entrusted to the prophets that were my true servants, live on yet. See how the fulfilment of them overtook your fathers, till at last they must needs repent, must acknowledge the Lord of hosts had not threatened them, sinners and rebels, in vain!

7 Then, on the twenty-fourth day of Sabbath, which is the eleventh month, word came from the Lord afresh, and once more it came to Zacharias, son of Barachias, son of Addo. A vision appeared to me in the night, of one that was mounted on a sorrel horse, at a stand among the myrtle-trees, down in the Valley; and never a horse in all his company but was sorrel, roan or white. Scarce had I asked, My Lord, what be these? when the angel that inspired me¹ promised he would shew me the meaning of it; and with that, my answer came from him who stood among the myrtle-trees, These have gone out on the Lord's errand, patrolling the earth. And to him, now, the angel of the myrtle-wood, those others made their report: All earth we have pattrolled, said they, and everywhere is safety, everywhere is rest. Ah, Lord of hosts, my angel monitor said, wilt thou never relent, never take pity upon Jerusalem and the towns of Juda? Here be seventy years come and gone. And with that, the Lord answered him; gracious his words were, gracious and full of comfort. Cry it abroad, now, my monitor said to me, this message from the Lord of hosts: Jealous, right jealous my love for Sion's hill, deep, full deep my anger against the heathen that are so well content! I would have punished Jerusalem but lightly, it was these drove home the blow. And now, the Lord says, I am for Jerusalem again, bringing pardon with me; temple shall be built there for the Lord of hosts, Jerusalem shall see mason's plummet busy once again. And this, too: A promise from the Lord of hosts! Yonder towns shall yet overflow with riches; Sion shall yet receive comfort, Jerusalem be the city of my choice.

Then I looked up, and what saw I? Here were four horns;² and when I asked my guide what they should be, he told me, Upon these horns, Juda and Israel and Jerusalem were tossed about. After that, the Lord sent me another vision of four blacksmiths; What errand, said I, have these? Why, said he, yonder horns made such havoc of Juda till now, never a man might lift his head; what should be the blacksmiths' errand but to turn them back?³ Polled they must be henceforward, the heathen folk that once tossed Juda to the winds.

2 When next I looked up, I saw a man there that carried a measuring-line; so I asked him, whither he was bound? For Jerusalem, said he, to measure length and breadth of it. And at that, my angel

¹ Literally, 'the angel who spoke in (or, by means of) me'. The Hebrew text can also be rendered, 'the angel who spoke to me' (cf. Num. 12. 6 and 8). But see note on 2. 3. ² The horns evidently represent four (or perhaps two) enemies of the Jewish people, but they cannot be identified with certainty. ³ 'Turn them back'; literally, 'scare them away'. It seems probable that there is an error in the manuscripts, and that some word more appropriate to the activities of blacksmiths originally appeared there.

monitor would have gone out on his errand, but here was a second angel come out to meet him.¹ Speed thee, said he, on thy way, and tell that pupil of thine:² So full Jerusalem shall be, of men and cattle both, wall it shall have none to hedge it in; I myself, the Lord says, will be a wall of fire around it, and in the midst of it the brightness of my presence.

Away, away, from the north country get you gone, the Lord says; what if I have scattered you, far as the four winds? Away with thee, Sion; wouldst thou still make thy home with widowed Babylon? This promise the Lord of hosts makes: After . . . glory,³ I hold his warrant against the nations that plunder you; apple of my eye⁴ he touches, that touches you. Lift I my hand, they shall be at your mercy that are your masters now; doubt shall be none it was the Lord who sent me.

Sion, poor maid, break out into songs of rejoicing; I am on my way, coming to dwell in the midst of thee, the Lord says. There be nations a many that shall rally that day to the Lord's side; they, too, shall be people of mine, but with thee shall be my dwelling.

Doubt there shall be none it was the Lord of hosts sent me to thy aid.⁵ Juda the Lord shall claim for his own, his portion in a holy land; still Jerusalem shall be the city of his choice.

Be silent, living things, in the Lord's presence; yonder in his holy dwelling all is astr.

3 Another vision the Lord shewed me; here was an angel of his, and before this angel stood the high priest Josue, with the Accuser at his right hand bringing accusation against him. But to the Accuser the divine answer came, The Lord rebuke thee, Satan; the Lord, that makes choice of Jerusalem, rebuke thee! What, is not this a brand saved from the embers?⁶ Then, for he saw Josue standing there in his presence very vilely clad, the angel gave it out to his attendants they should take away these vile rags from him; Guilt of thine, said he, I have set by; thou shalt have new garments to wear instead. A clean mitre they should give him besides. And so, when the new mitre was on his head and the new garments were about him, the angel of the Lord rose up and gave Josue his commission from the Lord of hosts: My beckoning follow thou, my commands keep thou, people of mine thou shalt govern, house of mine shalt have in thy charge, and in their company, that here stand about thee, shalt come and go. This for the hearing of the high priest Josue, and others his co-assessors, names of good omen all.⁷

Time is I should bring hither my servant, that is the Dayspring. Stone is here I will set before yonder Josue; a stone that bears seven eyes, device of my own carving, says the Lord of hosts. All the guilt of this land I will banish in a single day. That shall be a day of good cheer, the Lord of hosts says, friend making glad with friend under vine and under fig-tree.

4 Once the angel monitor roused me to my senses, as though I had lain asleep; Now, said he, what seest thou? Why, I said, here is a lamp-stand meets my eyes, all of gold. A bowl this lamp-stand has at the top of it, and from the bowl run seven pipes, to feed the seven lamps that crown

¹ Although the prophet is given direct vision, it seems that he only understands the meaning of it through the medium of the angel who 'speaks in him' (cf. 1. 9). This angel monitor comes and goes between heaven and earth (5. 5), he 'goes out' from the divine presence, exactly like the deluding spirit in III Kg. 22. 22, with some revelation about the measuring of Jerusalem, but is intercepted on his way by the assurance that the city needs no measuring. ² Literally, 'that young man' or 'that child'.

Conceivably the reference is to the man mentioned in verse 1, but more probably Zacharias is the 'child', not in years but in experience (III Kg. 3. 7). ³ No plausible explanation has been suggested to account for the words 'after glory', and it seems likely there has been an omission in the manuscripts; the more so, because Almighty God is the speaker in verse 8, and not in verse 9. ⁴ For 'my eye' the Hebrew text gives 'his eye'. ⁵ The sudden change of speaker perhaps indicates that, all through this chapter, we are reading a series of prophetic fragments, not a continuous prophecy. ⁶ Cf. Am.

4. 11. The idea is not, in all probability, that of something rescued from a conflagration but that of a log which is saved from overnight to light this morning's fire—Josue is a link between the pre-exilic and the post-exilic period. ⁷ The meaning of verses 8–10 will have depended on some kind of symbolism with which we are no longer conversant. 'Names of good omen'; literally, 'names of sign'. 'The Dayspring' seems a translation from the Septuagint Greek, which is ambiguous; probably, in accordance with the Hebrew text, it meant 'The Branch'. See further 6. 12 below, and note. It is not clear whether the

'stone' is a fresh metaphor for describing God's servant, or needs some other explanation.

3 it. And there are two olive-trees hanging over it, one to the right and one to the left 4 of the bowl. Then in my turn I asked a question of the angel, Tell me, what does 5 all this mean? What, said my monitor, canst thou not recognize it? Not I, my Lord, I answered.

6 And thereupon the angel told me . . .

. . . Word from the Lord to Zorobabel: ¹

By arms, by force nothing canst thou; my 7 spirit is all, says the Lord of hosts. Vain is towering height of thine, great mountain;
down to plain's level thou must stoop at Zorobabel's coming; stone from thee he must quarry and smooth to be his coping-8 stone, how fair, how fair! ² This message, 9 too, I had from the Lord: Yonder temple hand of Zorobabel has founded, hand of Zorobabel shall finish. No more you shall doubt that I come to you on the Lord's 10 errand. Humble fortunes of yesterday who dared belittle? Rejoice they now, to see plummet at work in Zorobabel's hand . . .

. . . What should they be, those seven, but eyes the Lord has, glancing this way and that to scan the earth?

11 Then I asked him about the two olive-trees, to right and left of the lamp-stand; 12 and there was more I would know, What of the two olive-shoots, close beside the two golden taps that feed yonder pipes of 13 gold? ³ What said he, canst thou not tell?
14 Not I, my Lord, I answered. What should these be, he said, but the two newly-anointed ones that stand in his presence, who is Master of the whole earth?

5 Once again I looked up, and there before me was a scroll, that had wings 2 to fly with. So when he asked, what saw I, A scroll, I said, that flies past, twenty 3 cubits long and ten broad. Here is ban, said he, that runs all the world over; thief is none, perjurer is none but shall be judged ⁴ by the tenour of it. It shall go out under my warrant, says the Lord of hosts, making its way into house of thief, house of perjurer that wrongs my name, and clinging close till it makes an end of all, wood-work and stone-work both.

Again the angel visited me, and bade me look well at the revelation that was sent me. What is it? I asked. Bushel-measure is this, he told me; And it is nothing other, said he, than guilt of theirs, ⁵ spread abroad over the whole earth. Then he lifted up the cover, that was a talent's weight of lead, and what should I see but a woman sitting there within? Godlessness, he told me, is the name of her; and with that he thrust her back into the barrel, and fastened down the cover of lead. And now, looking up, I saw two other women appearing, that had wings spread out to the wind, strong as a hawk's wings; and these carried the barrel off, midway between heaven and earth.
When I would know whither they carried it, the angel told me, To Sennaar, where it must have a shrine built for it; there it must be set up, and rest on a pedestal of its own.

6 Once more yet I looked up, and had a vision of four chariots, coming out of a pass between two mountains that were all of bronze. Of the horses, the first pair were sorrel, the second black, the third white, the fourth a sturdy pair of roans.
And when I asked of my angel monitor what these might be, Here be four winds, he told me, going out on their errand; their place is in his presence, who is Master of the whole earth. So out they went, chariot drawn by black horses turning northwards; the white followed these, and the roans turned southwards, the sturdiest pair of all . . .

. . . Went out on their errand, ⁶ fain to

¹ Verses 6-10 seem to interrupt the thread of the narrative, and some think they have been accidentally misplaced. ² Literally, in the Latin, 'And he shall bring out a primary stone, and shall equalize grace to the grace of it'; in the Hebrew text, 'And he shall bring out the stone, the top, a roaring, Grace, grace to it'. It seems likely that the text has been badly preserved. ³ The Hebrew text seems to imply that there were two shoots communicating between the olive-trees and the pipes, as if to feed the lamps with oil. But the text is difficult, and perhaps corrupt, nor does this image fit in well with verse 14. Taking the Latin as it stands, we may perhaps conjecture that the two trees represent the priesthood and the kingship, the two shoots (not mentioned earlier) representing Josue and Zorobabel respectively.

⁴ Instead of 'judged' the Hebrew text has 'declared innocent'; it can hardly be doubted that there has been some error of copying. ⁵ 'Guilt of theirs', presumably that of the Jews during their captivity. The Latin version here, following the Hebrew text, gives 'eyes' instead of 'guilt'; but 'guilt' is the rendering of the Septuagint Greek, and a very slight error in Hebrew script would account for the mistake.

⁶ It seems likely that there is some defect in the text, which makes no mention of the sorrel horses, and implies (as it stands) that the roans first went southwards, and then went out in an unspecified direction.

8 traverse the whole world through. And a great cry came to me,¹ See, where they reach the north country! All is well in the north country, my heart is content.²

9 And a message from the Lord came to 10 Zacharias: From yonder emissaries of the exiled Jews, Hoidai, Tobias and Idaias, toll thou must take; this very day bestir thee, and make thy way to the house of Josias, son of Sophonias, whither they have repaired, newly come from Babylon.

11 Gold and silver thou must take from them, and make crowns, to crown the high priest, 12 Josue son of Josedec...³ This message thou shalt give him from the Lord God of hosts: Here is one takes his name from the Dayspring;⁴ where his feet have trodden, spring there shall be. He it is shall rebuild the Lord's temple; builder of the Lord's temple, to what honours he shall come! On princely throne he sits, throne of a priest beside him,⁵ and between these two, what harmony of counsel! For Helem, Tobias, Idaias, and Hem the son of Sophonias, the crowns they gave⁶ shall win remembrance in the temple of the Lord.

13 Men shall come from far away, to work at the temple's rebuilding; you shall not doubt, then, it was the Lord of hosts gave me my warrant. Will you but heed the voice of the Lord your God, this shall be your reward...⁷

7 In the fourth year of Darius' reign, another message from the Lord came to Zacharias; it was on the fourth day of Casleu, the ninth month. This was the occasion of it; here was Sarasar, with Roggomleach and others of his company, sending envoys to implore the Lord's favour.⁸ A question they put to the priests,⁹ there in the temple of the Lord of hosts, and to the prophets besides: Must I yet mourn, yet rid myself of defilement, when the fifth month comes round, as my wont has been these many years past?⁹ Then came this message to me from the Lord of hosts: Ask this, of priests and people both; was it indeed fast of mine you kept, all these seventy years, the fifth month and the seventh observing ever with fasting and lament, you, that when food and drink were set before you, shared them with none?¹⁰

Bethink you, what warnings gave he by the prophets of an earlier day, when Jerusalem was yet safe and prosperous, she and the cities about her, populous the western valleys, populous the hill-country of the south. (Such was the word the Lord sent to Zacharias.¹¹) A message from the Lord of hosts: Come now, the true award, the tender heart that pities a neighbour's need! Widow and orphan, the alien and the friendless, wrong no more; brother against brother plot no more! And would they listen? Shrank every shoulder from the burden, deaf ears they turned him, hardened their hearts to adamant. Heed his law they would not; heed they would not, when the Lord of hosts inspired those older prophets to speak in his name. What wonder if his divine anger was aroused beyond measure? What wonder, says the

¹ Literally, 'he cried and said to me', the subject of the verb remaining unexpressed. ² Literally, 'they have given my spirit rest in the north country'. The sense is perhaps that they had executed vengeance (cf. Ez. 5. 13); but the interpretation of the allegory must have depended on a situation with which we are no longer familiar.

³ It is possible that two crowns at once were set on the head of Josue, to convey some mystical lesson. But it is more natural, especially in view of what follows, to infer that some words have dropped out of the text, indicating that the second crown was for Zorobabel. ⁴ 'The Dayspring', as in 3. 8 above, is 'the Branch' (or 'the Shoot') in the Hebrew text. It seems clear that the first half of Zorobabel's name is referred to. 'Where his feet have trodden'; literally, 'from under him'.

⁵ The Latin and the Hebrew are ambiguous here; the meaning may be 'he shall be priest on his throne', or 'a priest shall be on his throne'. The latter sense is given by the Septuagint Greek, and those authors who adopt the rival interpretation are at a loss to explain what is meant by 'these two'.

⁶ Literally, 'the crowns', but it seems fairly clear that the same persons are referred to as in verse 10, though with some curious differences of nomenclature. ⁷ The form of the sentence in the Hebrew text suggests that the obedience of the Jewish people will produce some effect which still remains to be expressed; if so, we have to suppose another gap in the manuscripts. ⁸ The interpretation of this verse is very doubtful; the persons referred to are not mentioned elsewhere. ⁹ The fifth month was that in which Jerusalem had fallen; it had evidently been a time of fasting during the Captivity; now that the temple is in building, they ask, should the commemoration cease?

¹⁰ Literally, in the Latin, 'And when you ate and drank, did you not eat and drink for yourselves?'; in the Hebrew text, 'And when you ate and when you drank, were not you the eaters and you the drinkers?' A general accusation of selfishness is perhaps intended; cf. Deut. 16. 14 and elsewhere. ¹¹ Some think the words were included here by accident; if not, they are a somewhat confusing repetition of the rubric in verse 1. It is clear that they interrupt the run of the paragraph; verses 9 and 10 are a message delivered (in the first instance) not by Zacharias but by the older prophets mentioned in verse 7.

14 Lord of hosts, they should call in vain on me, that in vain had warned them? So it was I scattered them in unknown countries, left their land a desert, where none came or went; a land so fair, by its own inhabitants laid waste.

8 This word, too, came from him:
 2 A message from the Lord of hosts! Great ruth have I for Sion, and sore it grieves me. To Sion I will return, so runs his promise, and make in Jerusalem my home; The loyal city, men shall call her, and that mountain where dwells the Lord 4 of hosts, The holy mountain. This, too: Trust me, there shall yet be aged folk in the streets of Jerusalem, men and women both, that go staff in hand, they are so 5 bowed with years; thronged they shall be, those streets, with boys and girls at play in the open. And this: Hard to believe? So now they find it, poor remnant of a people; but should I, the Lord of hosts, find it hard 7 to perform? And this, too: See if I do not rescue my people from the east country and the west, bring them back to dwell here, in the midst of Jerusalem; they my people, and I their God, in troth and loyalty either to other bound.

9 A message from the Lord of hosts! Take courage, then, you that still hold fast by the commands the prophets gave you, when the foundations of yonder house were a-laying, and the Lord of hosts had 10 no temple yet. Before that time, labour went unrewarded, for man and beast; so hard pressed were you, none might come or go in safety; every man, in those days, 11 I left at his neighbour's mercy. But now, says the Lord of hosts, this remnant of my 12 people shall enjoy better fortune; a happier seed-time is theirs. Its fruit the vineyard shall yield, the land its harvest, heaven its rain, and all for this remnant to enjoy.
 13 Breed of Juda, breed of Israel, by-words of misfortune once, when heathen folk fell to cursing their enemies; happy deliverance, they shall be names of blessing now!
 14 Your fears vanquish, go bravely on; he, the Lord of hosts, gives you his warrant for it. Time was, says he, when your fathers had roused my anger, and I was ever planning mischief against you; no respite then! Today, for the good estate of Juda and Jerusalem plan I no less eagerly; vanquish your fears. And for your part, this do: deal honestly with your neighbours, give ever in your market-place the true, the salutary award; harbour no ill thoughts one against another, nor set your hearts on the oath falsely sworn; every deed of wrong is hateful to me, the Lord says.

And word came to me from the Lord of hosts, bidding me say this in his name: Fasts you kept ever, when three months of the year, or four, six months or nine were gone, shall be all rejoicing and gladness for the men of Juda now, all high festival, will you but love true dealing and peaceful ways. This promise I give you from the Lord of hosts: What alien throngs, from what far cities, shall make pilgrimage yet! And ever, as fresh towns they reach, says pilgrim, Come with us, and welcome; court we the divine favour, to the Lord of hosts repair we; says townsman, Go with you I will. No nation so populous, no kingdom so strong, but shall betake itself to Jerusalem, to find the Lord of hosts and court his divine favour. This, too: A time is coming, when there is never a man of Jewish blood but shall have ten Gentiles at his heels, and no two of the same speech, clinging all at once to the skirts of him, and crying, Your way is ours! The tale has reached us, how God is there to protect you.

9 Burden of the Lord's doom, where falls it now? On Hadrach's land; ay, and Damascus shall be its resting-place; all men's eyes are fixed on the Lord, all the tribes of Israel are watching him now. Perilously near is Emath, and yonder cities of Tyre and Sidon, so famed for wisdom. This Tyre, how strong a fortress she has built, what silver and gold she has amassed, till they were common as clay, as mire in the streets! Ay, but the Lord means to dispossess her; cast into the sea, all that wealth of hers, and herself burnt to the ground! At the sight of it, how Ascalon trembles, how Gaza mourns, and Accaron, for hopes belied; no chieftain in Gaza, no townsfolk left in Ascalon now; in Azotus dwells a bastard breed. So low will I bring the pride of yonder Philistines; snatch the blood-stained morsel from their mouths, the unhallowed food theirs no longer; ¹ servant of our God he shall be that is left surviving, a clansman ² in Juda; so shall Accaron be all one with the Jebusite. I have sentinels that shall march to and fro, guarding this home of mine, and none shall take toll of it henceforward; my eyes are watching now.

¹ Literally, 'listen to'; but the people of Juda could not be listening, there and then, to prophecies uttered two years earlier. ² The latter part of this verse seems out of place, and some think the Hebrew text has been incorrectly transmitted. A very slight alteration would give the sense, 'The cities of Syria belong to the Lord, just as much as the tribes of Israel'.

Glad news for thee, widowed Zion; cry out for happiness, Jerusalem forlorn! See where thy king comes to greet thee, a trusty deliverer; see how lowly he rides, mounted on an ass, patient colt of patient dam! ³ Chariots of thine, Ephraim, horses of thine, Jerusalem, shall be done away, bow of the warrior be unstrung; peace this king shall impose on the world, reigning from sea to sea, from Euphrates to the world's end.

How should they be ransomed, but by the blood of thy covenant with me, those thy fellow-countrymen, in waterless dungeons bound? To these sheltering walls, O patient prisoners, return; you have my warrant, double recompense shall be granted you. Bow of mine is Juda, Ephraim thy shafts employ; Greece, look to thy sons when I match the sons of Zion against them, sword in a warrior's hand! See him there, in visible form, high above them, the Lord God, that volleys down shaft of his lightning, sounds with the trumpet, rides on the storm-wind of the south! He, the Lord of hosts, will be their protection; with sling-stones for teeth, flesh of men eat they, drink blood like revellers at their wine; not sacrificial bowl, nor altar's horns, so drenched with blood. His own people, his own sheep, will not the Lord God in that hour defend them? His own sacred trophy themselves shall be, to this land of his beckoning all men's eyes; ⁴ a people how blessed and how fair! ⁵ So well with corn and wine furnished, both man and maid shall thrive. ⁶

10 For rain in spring whom but the Lord entreat we? He it is, none else, fashions the snow; ⁷ waters the crops on this farm or that. Vain the false god's ² foretelling, vainly diviner cheats us, and dreams delude; comfort they have none to give; such ways Israel has followed, like a flock of sheep untended, and to its cost. What marvel if my anger blazed out against ³ the shepherds? A reckoning I must have with yonder buck-goats; ay, the Lord of hosts would keep strict count of his flock, the sons of Juda.

Who but Israel is the proud charger I will ride into battle? Corner-stone, he, of ⁴ the building, peg of the tent's rope, bow that shall win the day; spoilers of the world he, none other, shall send forth. Warriors they shall be that go out to battle ⁵ trampling all before them in the mire; does not the Lord go out to battle at their side? Well mounted, their enemies could yet nothing win. Such aid the men of Juda ⁶ shall have, the sons of Joseph such deliverance; in pity I will restore them, and all shall be as it was before I cast them off from me; I am the Lord their God, shall I not heed them? Ephraim, of great war- ⁷ riors the peer! Glad all hearts shall be, as when the wine-cup goes round; children of his shall acclaim the sight, and triumph lustily in the Lord.

Flock of my ransoming, see how they ⁸ gather at my call! Thriving now as they thrive long since, yet scattered through ⁹ the world, in those distant lands they shall remember me; with spirits revived, they and their children shall return. Back from ¹⁰ Egypt, back from Assyria I will summon them, rally them, to Galaad and Lebanon

¹ Some think this verse implies that the Philistines will be converted to Jewish customs, abstaining from meat with blood in it and other forbidden food. But it may be Philistia is compared to a beast of prey; cf. Am. 3. 12. ² Literally, 'a chieftain', but this makes the sense difficult; some scholars, by a different pointing of the Hebrew text, would read 'a clan'. ³ Literally, 'and a colt, the foal of an ass'; the implication seems to be that the king will come in less than royal state. See Mt. 21. 5.

⁴ Literally, 'And the Lord their God will deliver them in that day, like the flock of his people, because they shall be like) stones of sanctification that are lifted up as a standard over his land'. ⁵ 'A people how blessed and how fair'; literally, 'What is the goodness of it and what is the beauty of it!' Or possibly 'of him', but the word 'beauty' would be out of place in this context. ⁶ The reference of verses 11-17 is obscure; the conflict between Jewish and Greek culture did not make itself felt until nearly three hundred years after Zachary's time. ⁷ The word here used in the Hebrew text probably means lightning.

bring them home; and that home shall be 11 too small for them. Crossed, yonder straits, the sea's wave checked, depths of the river disappointed of their prey! As-syria's pride brought low, empire of Egypt 12 cut down! In the Lord they shall find strength, under his protection come and go; so runs the divine promise.

11 Fling thy gates wide, Lebanon, for the fire to come in, and devour thy 2 cedars! Lament, neighbour pine-tree, for cedar overthrown; here be lordly ones plundered; lament, oaks of Basan, for 3 secret forest that is cut down! Hark, how the shepherd-folk lament, their fine mantle¹ gone, how roars lion for the thickets of Jordan stripped!

4 This message the Lord my God sent me:² To this flock that is a-fattening for slaughter thou must play the shepherd.
 5 What, would they slay without remorse, yonder lords of the flock, sell carcass, and thank the Lord that so enriches them; are 6 there shepherds so unmerciful? Nay, I will be unmerciful too, the Lord says, to all that dwell on earth; I will leave every son of Adam at the mercy of his neighbour, or the king that rules over him; broken and bowed the land shall be, and no redress shall they have from me henceforward!

7 Poor sheep fattening for slaughter, take charge of your flock I must; and two staves I made me, for the better tending of it, one I called Beauty, and the other Cords.
 8 Before a month was up, of three shepherds I had rid them, yet had I no patience with them, and they of me grew no less weary.
 9 No more will I tend you, said I; perish all of you that will perish, be lost all that will be lost; and for the residue, let them de-10 vour one another; I care not. With that, I took up the staff I called Beauty, and cut it in two; in token that my covenant with all the world should be null. Null it was thenceforward; and doubt they might not,

 the starvelings of the flock that looked up to me, the Lord's word had come to them.

. . . And now, said I, pay me my wages, if pay you will; if not, say no more. So they paid me for my wages thirty pieces of silver. Why, the Lord said, here is a princely sum they rate me at! Throw it to the craftsman yonder. So there, in the Lord's temple, I threw the craftsman my thirty pieces of silver. . .³

Then I took my other staff, Cords, and cut it in two; in token that all brotherhood was at an end between Juda and Israel.⁴ And the Lord said, Gear of a foolish shepherd thou must take to thee now. See if I do not find me such a shepherd for this land of theirs, as will leave lost sheep uncounted, strayed sheep unsought, hurt sheep unhealed; and such as are left whole, feed he will not, but eat ever the fattest of them, tearing only the hoofs away. Out upon the false shepherd⁵ that abandons his flock! Sword shall pierce the arm of him, and the right eye of him, till arm is withered and eye darkened quite.

12 Burden of the Lord's doom, where falls it now? On Israel. Word from the Lord, who spread heaven out, founded earth, fashions the life that beats in man!
 This is my decree, that Jerusalem's walls (ay, and the whole of Juda shall man those ramparts) be offered to all the nations round about for a fatal cup;⁶ to all the world Jerusalem shall be a stone immoveable; lift it who will, shall be torn unmercifully. See where they muster to the attack, all the kingdoms of the world!
 Time now, the Lord says, to dazzle steel and craze rider's wits; for Juda, the sunshine of my regard, the heathen must ride in darkness. Vainly do yonder chieftains of ¹ The word used in the Hebrew text may mean either 'mantle' or 'magnificence'. In the present context, it may perhaps refer to the shade of the trees, now lost to the shepherds through felling; the beasts have similarly been robbed of their covert in the thickets (literally, 'the pride') of the Jordan valley.

² No plausible account has been given either of the meaning of this prophecy (verses 4-17), or of the occasion upon which it was delivered.

³ It is not easy to see who could be the employers mentioned in such a context, and it may even be doubted whether these two verses have not been misplaced. In Mt. 27. 9, 10, where they are quoted in a considerably different form, Jeremy, not Zachary, is mentioned as their author. But see note there.

⁴ If the text is correctly preserved, this part of the parable looks as if it referred to a situation several centuries earlier than Zachary's time.

⁵ Literally, 'shepherd that is an idol', or perhaps (according to the Hebrew text) 'shepherd of nothingness'.
⁶ Literally, 'Behold, I will make Jerusalem a lintel of drunkenness to all peoples round about; ay, and Juda, too, shall be in the siege against Jerusalem'. In the Hebrew text, a cup is probably meant rather than a lintel; and the second half of the verse runs, 'Ay, and against Juda, too, it shall be, in the siege (or, stronghold) against Jerusalem'.

Juda look to the garrison of Jerusalem to be their succour, in the strength of the Lord their God; chieftains of Juda themselves shall be my instruments then, fire-brand in the forest, spark among the dry sheaves, to devour all the nations right and left of them. Jerusalem shall stand, when all is over, where Jerusalem stood; but to the country folk of Juda the Lord grants deliverance first; clan of David, citizens of Jerusalem shall not boast themselves better than the rest.¹

When that day comes, the men of Jerusalem shall have the Lord for their stay; the lowest fallen among them shall seem royal as David's self, and David's clansmen a race divine, as though an angel of the Lord marched at their head.

Never a nation that marched on Jerusalem but I will hunt it down, when that day comes, and make an end of it.

On David's clan, on all the citizens of Jerusalem, I will pour out a gracious spirit of prayer; towards me they shall look, me whom they have pierced through.² Lament for him they must, and grieve bitterly; never was such lament for an only son, grief so bitter over first-born dead.

When that day comes, great shall be the mourning in Jerusalem, great as Adadremmon's mourning at Mageddo;³ the whole land in mourning, all its families apart. Here the men of David's clan, yonder their women, here the men of Nathan's, yonder their women, here the men of Levi's, yonder their women, here the men of Semei's, yonder their women; apart they shall mourn, whatever families there be, and all their women-folk apart.

13 When that day comes, clansmen of David and citizens of Jerusalem shall have a fountain flowing openly, of guilt to rid them, and of defilement.

¹ Instead of 'first', the Septuagint Greek and the Latin version give 'as at first', apparently by an error. Verses 8-14, with the whole of chapter 13, seem to form a collection of prophetic fragments rather than a continuous prophecy.

² A variant reading in some manuscripts gives 'him' instead of 'me'. On critical grounds, it is less plausible, but it seems to have been current in very early times (see Jn. 19: 37; also Apoc. 1: 7).

³ The reference may be to II Par. 35: 25; but many battles were fought in the neighbourhood of Mageddo.

⁴ The meaning of the second half of this verse is quite uncertain. Literally, 'between thy hands', a difficult phrase most inadequately interpreted by some moderns as meaning 'on thy back'. If the sacred author had meant 'between thy arms', he would surely have said so, as in IV Kg. 9: 24.

⁵ Literally, 'my lovers'; elsewhere in the Old Testament this word always refers to false gods, as the 'lovers' with whom Israel committed adultery. If the false prophet is referred to, it is not easy to see what injuries he had sustained, why any question was asked about them, what answer was expected, or what was meant by the answer given.

⁶ 'Neighbour'; the word is not likely to be what the prophet wrote. Elsewhere it is only a legal term meaning 'a second party'. The second half of the verse may be a continuation of the first; but if so the direction 'Smite!' cannot be addressed to the sword, which would require a feminine, not a masculine formation of the verb.

A time shall come, says the Lord of hosts, when I will efface the memory of the false gods; the very names of them shall be forgotten; banish, too, the false prophets, and the unclean spirit they echo. Dares one of them prophesy again, all men will turn against him, even the parents that begot him; Still at thy lying, and in the Lord's name? Thou shalt die for it! And with a javelin's thrust father and mother will take the life they gave.

When that day comes, never a prophet but shall rue the false vision he trusted in. Deceitful garb of sackcloth each one shall throw aside; No prophet am I, but a simple peasant, that grew up to follow Adam's trade!⁴

Ask they, What wounds be these in thy clasped hands?⁵ Thus wounded was I, he shall answer, in the house of my friends.⁶

Up, sword, and attack this shepherd of mine, neighbour of mine, says the Lord of hosts.⁷

Smite shepherd, and his flock shall scatter; so upon the common folk my vengeance shall fall. All over this land, the Lord says, two thirds of them are forfeit to destruction, only a third shall be left to dwell there; and this third part, through fire I will lead them; purged they shall be as silver is purged, tried as gold is tried. Theirs on my name to call, their plea mine to grant; My own people, so I greet them, and they answer, The Lord is my own God.

14 The Lord's appointed time is coming, when spoil of thee shall be divided in thy midst. All the nations of the world I will muster to the siege of Jerusalem; taken the city shall be, and its houses pillaged, and its women-folk ravished; of the defenders, half will go into exile, and leave but a remnant in the city.

3 And then the Lord will go out to battle against those nations, as he did ever in the decisive hour. There on the mount of Olives, that faces Jerusalem on the east, his feet shall be set; to east and west the mount of Olives shall be cloven in two halves, with a great chasm between, and the two halves shall move apart, one northward, 5 one southward. Down the clefts of that sacred hill-side you shall flee, each of them now leading to the next; flee as you fled before the earthquake, in Ozias' time, that reigned over Juda; on, on he comes, the Lord my God, with all his sacred retinue.

6 Light there shall be none that day, all 7 shall be frost and cold; ¹ one day there shall be, none but the Lord knows the length of it, that shall be neither daylight nor dark, but when evening comes, there shall be 8 light. Then a living stream will flow from Jerusalem, half to the eastern, half to the 9 western sea, winter and summer both; and over all the earth the Lord shall be king, one Lord, called everywhere by one name.

10 What shall be the land's frontiers? The desert, and Geba, and Remmon ² that is south of Jerusalem. What of the city? It shall be built up high, and its true limits keep, from gate of Benjamin to main gate and corner gate, from tower of Hananeel to 11 the king's wine-press. A populous city, no ban resting on it thenceforward; a secure dwelling-place.

12 And what of the visitation that shall smite down the assailants of Jerusalem? Wasted away the flesh of them, till they can keep their feet no longer; wasted away eye 13 in socket and tongue in mouth; with great tumult of mind the Lord will bemuse them that day, each of them laying hands on his fellow, brother engaging brother in fight. Juda meanwhile, shall set about the regaining of Jerusalem, ³ and find the spoils of every neighbouring people amassed there, gold, and silver, and of raiment great abundance; but as for horse and mule, camel and ass, and all the cattle in yonder camp, these will have perished by the same plague as their masters.

Yet of all the nations that sent their armies against Jerusalem there shall be some remnant left; and these, year by year, shall make pilgrimage, to worship their King, the Lord of hosts, and keep his feast of Tent-dwelling. Come and worship their King they must, the Lord of hosts; else no rain shall fall on them, all the world over. What then of Egypt's folk, that rain have none? What if they refuse to go on pilgrimage? Why, for their neglecting of this feast, the same plague shall fall on them which the Lord sent on the heathen armies aforesaid. ⁴ Be it Egypt, or be it any other nation, that will not keep the feast of Tent-dwelling, punished it shall be in this fashion or in that.

Spoils from the enemy's bridle-rein shall be consecrated on that day to the Lord's service, till there is never pot or pan in his temple but rivals the altar's bowls for costliness! ⁵ Nay, never pot or pan in all Jerusalem but shall be consecrated to the Lord of hosts, for any who will to come and take it and seethe victim in it; trafficking there shall be no more in the Lord's temple, when that day comes. ⁶

¹ The sense of this verse is doubtful, and it seems possible the text needs emendation; perhaps the prophet wrote 'there shall be neither light nor darkness, heat nor cold'. ² For 'the desert, and Geba, and Remmon' the Latin version has 'the desert from the hill of Remmon'. ³ 'Set about the regaining of Jerusalem'; in the original simply 'fight against Jerusalem'. But it is clear from the context that we have gone back to the situation described in verse 2, where Jerusalem is enemy-occupied. The Vulgate here gives the form 'Judas', instead of the more usual form 'Juda', perhaps with the idea that Judas Machabaeus is referred to. ⁴ The Hebrew text is obscure, and perhaps corrupt, but it seems most likely that the sense given above was the general sense of it. The Latin version gives no satisfactory meaning here. ⁵ Literally, 'On that day that which is on the horse's bridle shall be holy to the Lord, and the caldrons in the Lord's house will be like bowls before the altar'. The Hebrew text is usually interpreted as meaning that the bells on the trappings of the horses (it is difficult to see what horses) will be inscribed, 'Holiness to the Lord'. ⁶ This verse seems to imply that only consecrated vessels might be used in seething the victim before a sacrifice; and further, that some charge was made by the Temple authorities for the use of the vessels in question.

THE PROPHECY OF MALACHIAS

HERE follows burden of the Lord's doom for Israel, that was entrusted to Malachias.

2 Oh, but I have dealt lovingly with you! the Lord says. Would you know, wherein I shewed my love? This tell me; was not Esau brother to Jacob? Yet to Jacob I proved myself a friend, the Lord 3 says, no friend to Esau; I have made a waste of yonder mountain-side, of all his 4 lands a dragon-haunted desert. Ay, but, says Edom, what if we have fallen on evil days? Give us time to repair the ruins! Trust me, says the Lord of hosts, as fast as they build, I will pull down; land of rebellion men shall call it, brood the Lord 5 hates, and for ever. Glad sight, to make you cry God praise from end to end of Israel!

6 Son to father, servant to master gives his due. Your father I, where is the honour, your master I, where is the reverence you owe me? Such complaint the Lord of hosts makes, and to whom? To you, priests, that care so little for my renown. Ask you what 7 care was lacking, when the bread you offer at my altar is defiled, ask you what despite you have done me, when you write down the Lord's table a thing of little moment?
8 What, no harm done, when victim you offer in sacrifice is blind? No harm done, when it is lame or diseased? Pray you, says the Lord of hosts, make such a gift to the governor yonder, will he be content? Will he make favourites of you?

9 Ay, says the Lord of hosts, the guilt is yours. To the divine presence betake you, and sue for pardon; which of you finds 10 favour with him? Never a man of you but must be paid to shut door, light altar-fire; no friends of mine, says the Lord of hosts, 11 no gifts will I take from such as you. No corner of the world, from sun's rise to sun's setting, where the renown of me is not heard among the Gentiles, where sacrifice is not done, and pure offering made in my honour; so revered is my name, says the Lord of hosts, there among the Gentiles;¹ and you? That you should hold it so cheap! That you should think to yourselves, The Lord's table is desecrated now; it makes no matter what food lies there, or what fire burns it! Weary work, say you, 12 and dismiss it with a sigh. Beast mangled, beast gone lame, beast that is ailing you present to me, and the bloodless offering with it. And should the Lord of hosts accept the gift you make him?

13 Cursed be the knavery that offers the Lord gelt beast, when vows are a-paying, and all the while there is an entire beast left at home!² Offers it to the Lord of hosts, the great King, no name in all the world so terrible!

2 It is for you, priests, to see that this law of mine is obeyed. Give me
2 neither heed nor hearing, says the Lord of hosts, let my name go unhonoured, and with sore distress I will visit you; falls my curse on all the blessings you enjoy, falls my curse...³ to the punishing of your heedlessness. Arm of yours I will strike 3 motionless, bury your faces in dung, ay, the dung of your own sacrifices, and to the dung-pit you shall go. So you shall learn 4 your lesson; my law I gave you, says the Lord of hosts, in token of my covenant with Levi's family. Live they should and thrive, but the fear of me I enjoined upon 5 them; none but should fear, and hold my name in reverence. Faithfully they handed 6 on tradition, the lie never on their lips; safe and straight was the path they trod at my side, and kept many from wrong-doing.

¹ The applicability of this utterance to the Christian Sacrifice needs no emphasizing. Its applicability to the conditions of the prophet's own time has been the subject of much discussion; can it be supposed that he thought of heathen sacrifices as offered, unwittingly, to the true God? Or did he picture the Dispersion of the Jews, even then, as a world-wide phenomenon? ² 'Gelt', literally, 'spoil'; 'equire', literally, 'male'. Some such contrast is evidently intended; cf. Lev. 22. 24. ³ The repetition, 'falls my curse', is difficult to explain, except on the supposition that a word or two has dropped out in the manuscript.

7 No utterance like a priest's for learning; from no other lips men will expect true guidance; is he not a messenger¹ to them
8 from the Lord of hosts? That path you have forsaken; through your ill teaching, how many a foothold lost! Nay, says the Lord of hosts, you have annulled my covenant with Levi altogether. What wonder if I have made you a laughing-stock, a thing contemptible in all men's sight, priests that so ill kept my command, gave award so partially?

10 Have we not all one Father, did not one God create us all? No room, then, for brother to despise brother, and unmake the covenant by which our fathers lived.²

11 Here is great wrong in Juda, here are foul deeds done by Israel and Jerusalem!³ Juda, that was once content to be set apart for the Lord, has profaned that holy estate, has taken wives that worship a god he 12 knew not. Doer of such a deed, set he or followed the ill example, shall be lost to the dwelling-place of Jacob, for all his offerings made to the Lord of hosts. And anon, weeping and wailing, you drench the Lord's altar with your tears! What marvel if I heed your sacrifices no more, gift of 14 yours is none can appease me? And the reason of it? Because the Lord bears witness to her wrongs, that wife of thy manhood's age, whom now thou spurnest, thy 15 partner, thy covenanted bride! Yet doer of this is the same man as ever, the will of him is unchanged; he asks nothing better, now as before, than to breed a God-fearing race; to that will, men of Juda, keep true. Spurn her not, the wife of thy manhood's 16 age; what though the God of Israel gives thee leave to send her away if she suits thee ill? Garment of her, says the Lord of hosts, is yet stained with the wrong thou didst her. Will of thine forgo not, wife of thine spurn not.⁴

Oh, but the Lord is aware of your doings! And little wonder, when you think so amiss of him; telling yourselves, Foul is fair in the Lord's sight, and wrongdoing well likes him; God that judges us is none.

3 See where I am sending an angel of mine, to make the way ready for my coming! All at once the Lord will visit his temple; that Lord, so longed for, welcome herald of a divine covenant. Ay, says the Lord of hosts, he is coming; but who can bear the thought of that advent? Who will stand with head erect at his appearing? He will put men to a test fierce as the crucible, searching as the lye that fullers use. From his judgement-seat, he will refine that silver of his and cleanse it from dross; like silver or gold, the sons of Levi must be refined in the crucible, ere they can offer the Lord sacrifice duly performed. Then once more the Lord will accept the offerings of Juda and Jerusalem, as he did long since, in the forgotten years. Come I to hold assize, not slow to arraign the sorcerer, the adulterer, the forsworn, all of you that deny hired man his wages, widow and orphan redress, the alien his right, fearing no vengeance from the Lord of hosts.

In me, the Eternal, there is no change, and you, sons of Jacob, are a people still. What though you have refused my claims, left them unhonoured, as your fathers did before you? Nay, says the Lord of hosts, you have but to relent towards me, and I, in my turn, will relent. Would you know the manner of it, bethink you that it is not for man to wrong God, as you wrong me; out of all question you wrong me, over your tithes and first-fruits. Ay, here is sworn conspiracy; ⁵ it is myself you wrong, the whole brood of you! Do but

¹ Here, as often elsewhere, the Latin translates 'angel'.

² This verse does not seem closely connected either with what precedes it or with what follows it. The prophet may have been thinking of other misdemeanours, such as those mentioned in Neh. 5.

³ This difficult passage, verses 11-16, is generally understood as referring to the intermarriage of the Jews with surrounding nations; cf. Esd. 9 and 10. But Malachy's protest is concerned only with foreign brides, not with foreign bridegrooms; and he seems only to envisage those cases in which a Jewish wife has been divorced to make room for a Gentile rival.

⁴ Literally, 'Did not one man do (or, make)? And his spirit is left surviving. And what does one man seek, except the seed of God? Guard therefore your spirits, and do not despise the wife of thy youth. When thou hatest her, dismiss her, says the Lord, the God of Israel; but wrong shall cover her (or, his) garment, says the Lord of hosts. Guard your spirits, and do not despise'. The Hebrew text, which gives 'his (not her) garment', is even more obscure throughout; and numerous explanations have been suggested, without throwing much light on the passage.

⁵ Literally, 'You are cursed with a curse' (the Latin, however, has 'with distress'). The meaning seems to be, not that Juda is under a divine curse (which would destroy the logic of the sentence), but that the Jews have bound themselves under a curse to offer God resistance (cf. Jg. 21. 1 and 18).

carry your tithe into the tithe-barn, for my temple's needs, and see if I do not open the windows of heaven for you, rain down blessing to your hearts' content! Ban of mine shall fall on the locust,¹ and to your crops he shall do no harm; nowhere in all your country-side, I promise you, shall vine cast its fruits; the envy of all nations you shall be, says the Lord of hosts, a land of content.

11 12
13 And now, says the Lord of hosts, your complaints have had their way with me.
14 Complain you did: Who serves God serves him for nothing; what reward is ours for keeping command of his, attending with sad mien the Lord of hosts? Here are proud folk more to be envied than we, ill-doers that yet thrive, abusers of his patience 15 that escape all harm! So they used to talk among themselves, his true worshippers, till at last the Lord gave them heed and hearing; and now he would have a record kept in his presence of all that so worshipped him, all that prized his renown.
16 17 Dear they shall be to me, says the Lord of hosts, when I declare myself at last; never 18 to loyal son was father more gracious; then you shall think better of it, and know them apart, the just that serve God and the sinners that are none of his.

4 Trust me, a day is coming that shall scorch like a furnace; stubble they shall be before it, says the Lord of hosts, all the proud, all the wrong-doers, caught and set alight, and neither root nor branch left them. But to you that honour my name there shall be a sunrise of restoration, swift-winged, bearing redress; light-hearted as frisking calves at stall you shall go out to meet it,² ay, and trample on your godless enemy, ashes, now, to be spurned under foot, on that day when the Lord of hosts declares himself at last.

Yours to keep the law ever in mind, statute and award I gave to assembled Israel through Moses, that was my servant. And before ever that day comes, great day and terrible, I will send Elias to be your prophet; he it is shall reconcile heart of father to son, heart of son to father; else the whole of earth should be forfeit to my vengeance.³

¹ Literally, 'the devourer'. ² Literally, 'But to you that fear my name a sun of justice shall rise, and healing in her wings; and you shall go out, and leap like calves from the stall'. ³ It is not clear what kind of disagreement between the older and the younger generation, or perhaps between the past and the present, is indicated. 'The whole of earth', or perhaps, 'the whole land'.

THE FIRST BOOK OF MACHABEES

NOW turn we to Alexander son of Philip, the Macedonian, that was the first to reign over all Greece. This Alexander marched out from his own land of Cethim, and overcame Darius, king of the Medes and Persians. Battles he waged a many; nor any fortress might hold out against him, nor any king escape with his life; and so he journeyed on to the world's end, spoiling the nations everywhere; at his coming, silence fell on the earth. So great the power of him, so valiant his armies, what wonder if his heart grew proud? All those lands conquered, all those kings his tributaries! Then, all at once, he took to his bed, and the knowledge came to him he must die. Whereupon he summoned the noblest of his courtiers, men that had shared his own upbringing, and to these, while he had life in him yet, divided up his kingdom. So reigned Alexander for twelve years, and so died.

And what of these courtiers turned princes, each with a province of his own? Be sure they put on royal crowns, they and their sons after them, and so the world went from bad to worse. Burgeoned then from the stock of Antiochus a poisoned growth, another Antiochus, he that was called the Illustrious. He had been formerly a hostage at Rome, but now, in the hundred and thirty-seventh year of the Grecian empire, he came into his kingdom.

In his day there were godless talkers abroad in Israel, that did not want for a hearing; Come, said they, let us make terms with the heathen that dwell about us! Ever since we forswore their company, nought but trouble has come our way. What would you? Such talk gained credit, and some were at pains to ask for the royal warrant; whereupon leave was given them, Gentile usages they should follow if they would.

With that, they must have a game-place at Jerusalem, after the Gentile fashion, ay, and go uncircumcised; forgotten, their loyalty to the holy covenant, they must throw in their lot with the heathen, and become the slaves of impiety.

And now that he was firmly established on his throne, Antiochus would be lord of Egypt, and wear two crowns at once. So, with overwhelming force, with chariots and elephants and horsemen and a great array of ships, he marched on Egypt, and levied war against king Ptolemy, that could not hold his ground, but fled away, leaving many fallen. So Antiochus made himself master of all the strongholds in Egypt, and ransacked it for spoil; then, in the hundred and forty-third year, he turned his victorious march against Israel. With all that great army of his he came to Jerusalem and entered the sanctuary in royal state; the golden altar, the lamp-stand with its appurtenances, the table where bread was set out, beaker and goblet and golden bowl, curtain and capital and golden facings of the temple, all alike were stripped. Silver nor gold was spared, nor any ornament of price, nor hoarded treasures could he but find them; and thus laden he went back to his own country, first shedding a deal of blood, and speaking very blasphemously.

Loud mourning there was in Israel, mourning in all the country-side; wept ruler and elder, pined man and maid, and colour fled from woman's cheeks; bridegroom took up the dirge, bride sat in her bower disconsolate; here was a land that trembled for its inhabitants, a whole race covered with confusion.

Two years passed, and then the king sent his chief collector of revenue to visit the cities of Juda. To Jerusalem he came, with a great rabble at his heels, and won credence with idle professions of friendship. Then he fell suddenly on the town and grievously mishandled it, slaying Israelites a many, plundering the city and setting fire to it. Houses and encircling walls of it were thrown down in ruins, women and children carried off into slavery, cattle driven away. And as for David's Keep, they enclosed it with high,

strong walls, and strong towers besides, to 36 serve them for a fortress; garrisoned it with a godless crew of sinners like themselves, and made it fast, storing it with arms and provisions, besides the plunder they had 37 amassed in Jerusalem, which they bestowed there for safety. Alas, what peril of 38 treachery was here, what an ambush laid about the holy place, what devil's work 39 against Israel! What a tide of guiltless 40 blood must flow about the sanctuary, till it was a sanctuary no more! Little wonder if the inhabitants of Jerusalem took to flight, leaving their city to strangers; mother so unnatural her own children must forsake.
 41 Her sanctuary a desert solitude, her feasts all lament, her sabbaths derided, her great-42 ness brought low! Her pride was the measure of that abasement, her glory of that shame.

43 And now came a letter from king An-tiochus to all the subjects of his realm, bidding them leave ancestral custom of this race or that, and become one nation in-44 stead. As for the heathen, they fell in 45 readily enough with the royal will; and in Israel itself there were many that chose slavery, offering sacrifice to false gods and 46 leaving the sabbath unobserved. Both in Jerusalem and in all the cities of Juda the king's envoys published this edict; men must live by the law of the heathen round 47 about, burnt-sacrifice, offering and atone-48 ment in God's temple should be none, nor 49 sabbath kept, nor feast-day. And, for the more profanation of the sanctuary, and of 50 Israel's holy people, altar and shrine and idol must be set up, swine's flesh offered, 51 and all manner of unhallowed meat; children be left uncircumcised, and their innocent lives contaminated with rites unclean, abominable; till the law should be for-52 gotten, and the divine precepts fashioned anew. Durst any neglect the royal bidding, he must die.

53 Through the whole of his dominions the king's writ ran, and commissioners were 54 appointed besides to enforce it; no city of 55 Juda but was ordered to do sacrifice. Many there were, traitors to the divine law, that took their part, and much mischief they 56 did, driving the men of Israel to seek refuge 57 in hiding, where refuge was to be had. It was on the fifteenth of Casleu, in the hundred and forty-fifth year, that king An-tiochus set up an idol to desecrate God's altar;¹ shrines there were in every town-58 ship of Juda, offering of incense and of victims before house doors and in the open street; never a copy of the divine law but 59 was torn up and burned; if any were found 60 that kept the sacred record, or obeyed the Lord's will, his life was forfeit to the king's edict. Month by month such deeds of 61 violence were done, in all townships where men of Israel dwelt, and on the twenty-62 fifth of the month sacrifice was made at the shrine that overshadowed the altar. Death 63 it was for woman to have her child circumcised in defiance of the king; there in her 64 own house she must be hung up, with the child about her neck, and the circumciser, too, must pay for it with his life. Many a 65 son of Israel refused the unclean food, preferring death to defilement; and die 66 they must, because they would not break God's holy law. Grievous, most grievous 67 was the doom that hung then over his people.

2 In those days it was that Mattathias came forward, son of John, son of Simeon, a priest of Joarib's family; he was for Jerusalem no more, but would take up his dwelling on the hill-side at Modin.
 Five sons he had, John, that was also called 2 Gaddis, Simon (or Thasi), Judas (or 3 Machabaeus), Eleazar (or Abaron), and 4 Jonathan (or Apphus) and these saw well 5 what foul things were a-doing in Juda's 6 country and the city of Jerusalem. Alas, 7 what needed it, cried Mattathias, I should have been born into such an age as this?
 To see my people and the holy city alike brought to ruin, to sit by while the enemy overcame her, and in her very sanctuary 8 the alien had his will? Temple of hers like a churl's lot disregarded, rare treasure of 9 hers into exile carried away; young and old, in the open streets of her, put to the sword! Never a race in heathendom but 10 may parcel out her domains, grow rich with the spoil of her! Gone, all her fair 11 adornment; the mistress is turned maid; laid waste, yonder sanctuary, that was our 12 prize and pride, by Gentile feet dis-honoured! And would we live yet?
 13

With that, they tore their garments 14

¹ Cf. Dan. II. 31, Mt. 24. 15.

about them, Mattathias and his sons, and 15 went clad in sackcloth, mourning right bitterly. And now the pursuivants of king Antiochus came to Modin; take refuge there who might, he must do sacrifice none 16 the less, and burn incense, and leave the following of God's law. Out went the folk of Israel to meet them, some complaisantly enough, but Mattathias and his sons firm 17 in their resolve. And they singled out Mattathias from the rest; A man of mark, said they, and a great chieftain thou; bre-18 thren and sons thou hast a many. Wilt thou not be the first to come forward and do the king's bidding, with the whole world, and the men of Juda everywhere, and what is 19 left of Jerusalem? To be the king's friend, thou and thy sons with thee, gold and silver and much else for thy reward! Loud rang the answer of Mattathias: What though king Antiochus have the whole world for his vassals? Obey the edict who will, for-20 saking the custom his fathers lived by, both I and son of mine, both I and clansman of mine, will obey the law handed down to us.
 21 Mercy of God! What needs it we should leave his will undone, his claims un-22 honoured? To deaf ears king Antiochus proclaims the sacrifice; we swerve not from the law's path, right or left.
 23 Before he had done speaking, a Jew came to offer the false gods sacrifice, there in full view of all, before the altar at Modin, 24 as the king bade. Mattathias took fire at the sight of it; one heave of anger his heart gave, and his zeal for the law could contain itself no longer; there on the altar the 25 sacrificer was slain. Nor spared he the pursuivant of king Antiochus that enjoined it; the altar, too, he pulled down.
 26 Not Phinees himself struck a better blow for the law, when he slew Zamri, the son 27 of Salom!¹ And now Mattathias raised a cry in the city, Who loves the law? Who keeps the covenant unbroken? Out with 28 you, and follow me! So fled he with his sons into the hill-country, leaving his possessions behind, there in the city.
 29 Many there were that went out into the desert at this time, for love of truth and 30 right; took children and women-folk and cattle with them, and settled down there, castaways in a flood of misfortune. But 31 news of it reached Jerusalem, and the king's men that were in David's Keep;

 here were rebels lurking in the waste country, and drawing many over to their side.
 So they went out in pursuit, and offered 32 battle; on a sabbath day, as it chanced.² What, still stubborn? cried they. Come 33 out, and yield yourselves to the king's pleasure; your lives shall be spared. But 34 the Jews' answer was, come out and yield to the king's pleasure they might not; law of the sabbath rest forbade it. So the 35 attack began in good earnest; but the Jews made no resistance, never a stone flew, 36 never a hiding-place of theirs was put in a state of defence; Die we all, they said, 37 innocent men, and let heaven and earth bear witness, it was for no fault of ours we died. Thus, because it was a sabbath day 38 when the attack was made, these men perished, and their wives and children and cattle with them; a thousand human lives lost.

Great grief it was to Mattathias and his 39 company when they heard what had befallen them; and now there was high 40 debate raised: Do we as our brethren did, forbear we to give battle for our lives and loyalties, and they will soon make an end of us! Then and there it was resolved, if 41 any should attack them on the sabbath day, to engage him, else they should be put to death all of them, like those brethren of 42 theirs in the covert of the hills. Now it was that the Assidaeans rallied to their side, a party that was of great consequence in Is-43 rael, lovers of the law one and all; and all who would escape from the evils of the time made common cause with them, and came to their assistance. So, mustering 44 their forces, they wrought indignant vengeance upon sinners that were false to the law, till they were fain to take refuge among the heathen; wherever they went, 45 Mattathias and his company, they threw the altars down, and whatever children they found uncircumcised, from one end of Israel to the other, they circumcised by right of conquest.³ Ere long, they drove 46 the tyrant's minions before them, and to such good purpose that Gentile was 48

¹ Cf. Num. 25. 7.

² The words 'as it chanced' are not in the original, but it does not seem to be implied that the king's men purposely chose the sabbath day for making their assault.

³ It is not clear whether we are meant to understand that Gentile as well as Jewish children were circumcised.

none, king though he were, could restrain the law's observance; against their onslaught the powers of evil could not make head.

49 Meanwhile, the life of Mattathias was drawing to an end. And this charge he gave to his sons: Here be days when tyrant and blasphemer have their will, when all is calamity and bitter retribution. The more reason, my sons, why you should be jealous lovers of the law, ready to give your lives for that covenant your fathers knew. 51 Your fathers, what deeds they did in their time! Great glory would you win, and a deathless name, let these be your models. 52 See how Abraham was tested, and how trustfulness of his was counted virtue in him; see how Joseph in ill fortune was true to the commandment still, and came to be ruler of all Egypt. Here was Phinees, our own father, that grew hot in God's cause, and earned the right of priesthood inalienable; and Josue, that for his loyalty was given command of Israel; and Caleb, that spoke out in the assembly, what broad acres were his! David, for the tender heart of him, left a dynasty that fails not; 58 for Elias heaven opened, that was champion of the law; by faith Ananias, Azarias and Misael overcame the furnace, nor Daniel's innocence might ravening lions devour. No generation but proves it; want they never for strength that trust in God. 62 What, would you fear the tyrant's threats? 63 In dung and worms his glory shall end; all royal state to-day, and to-morrow there shall be no news of him; gone back to the dust he came from, and all his designs brought to nothing!

64 Nay, my sons, take courage; in the law's cause rally you, in the law's annals you shall win renown. Here is your brother Simon, trust me, a man of prudence; to him ever give heed, he is your father now. 66 And here is Judas Machabaeus, from boyhood's days a warrior; let him be your leader, and fight Israel's battles. All lovers of the law make free of your fellowship; 68 bring your country redress, and pay the Gentiles what they have earned; yet heed- 69 ing ever what the law enjoins. With that, he gave them his blessing, and became part 70 of his race. He was a hundred and forty-six years old when he died; his sons buried him where his fathers were buried, at Modin, and great lament all Israel made for the loss of him.

3 And now his son Judas, that was called Machabaeus, came forward to succeed him; nor any of Judas' clan, nor any that had taken his father's part, but lent him their aid still; right merrily they fought Israel's battle. Here was one that brought his race renown; as great a warrior as ever donned breastplate, or armed himself for the fight, or drew sword to save his camp from peril; lion-hearted his deeds, not lion itself more relentless in pursuit. Traitors he ever sought out and hunted down, ever with fire-brand the oppressors of his people dislodged, till enemy was none but was daunted by the fear of him, traitor was none but fled in confusion, so well sped he the work of deliverance. Great deeds, that kings rued bitterly, Jacob with exultation heard, posterity holds blessed evermore! From city to city he went, riding Juda of its law-breakers, averting the vengeance guilt of theirs had deserved; no corner of earth but he was renowned there, for one that had been able to rally a doomed people.

How sped Apollonius, that mustered a great force, of Gentiles and Samaritans both, to fight against Israel? No sooner Judas heard of it, than he met and routed and slew him; fell many and fled more, leaving their spoils behind them. The sword of Apollonius Judas himself carried away; and this it was he evermore used in battle.

And next it was Seron, captain of the armies in Syria, heard what a great retinue and faithful following Judas had; and nothing would serve, but he must win renown and high favour at court by crushing Judas, and all other his companions that defied the king's edict. So he made all ready, and marched in with a strong muster of the ungodly at his heels, to be even with the men of Israel. As far as Bethoron pass they reached, and there Judas met them with his company, no better than a handful. These, when they saw such a host facing them, were for counsels of prudence; What, they said to Judas, should we offer battle to foes so many and so strong, faint as we be from a day of hungry marching? Nay, said Judas, nothing forbids great numbers should be at the mercy of small; what matter makes it to the God of heaven, few be his soldiers or many when he grants deliverance? Armed might avails not to win the day; victory is from above. What though they come to meet us in the proud confidence of superior strength, and think it an easy matter to slay us, slay our wives and children, plunder our goods? Life and loyalty at stake, we will offer battle none the less; and he, the Lord, will crush them to earth at our coming; never shall we be afraid. And with that, all unawares, he fell upon Seron and his army, that were crushed, sure enough, by his onslaught; all down the pass of Bethoron he gave them chase, down into the plain, and eight hundred of them had fallen before ever they took refuge in the country of the Philistines.

By this, the neighbouring peoples had begun to take alarm, so formidable did Judas and his brethren appear to them, and the renown of him reached the king's court; all the world was talking of Judas and his victories. An angry man was king Antiochus when the news came to him; he sent word round, and had all his army summoned together, a brave array, be sure of it. The treasury must be opened, to provide the troops with a whole year's pay, and keep them in readiness for every need. Why, what was this? So heavily had Judas suffered, so great the discord he had aroused by the abolishing of its ancient usages, that scant revenue had come in from it, and the treasury was in default! Whence, now, to defray the cost of that largesse he had made so often, and with so lavish a hand? Never was king before him could rival his munificence.

Here was the king in great confusion of mind; and his thought was, to march into Persia and take toll of those countries; great store of money he might there amass. He left Lysias behind, that was a man of high rank and royal blood; he was to administer all the business of the kingdom, from Euphrates down to the Brook of Egypt, and have charge of the young prince Antiochus, until the king's return. Half his army he entrusted to Lysias, and the elephants besides; and he signified all that he would have done, concerning Judas and Jerusalem particularly. A force must be sent to overpower all that fought for Israel, or were yet left in Jerusalem, and make a clean riddance of them; no trace of these must be left; all through the country settlers must be brought in from abroad, and the lands allotted between them. With that, the king left his capital of Antioch, taking the remainder of his army with him; it was the hundred and forty-seventh year of the empire. Soon he was across Euphrates river, and on the march through the high countries.

Three generals Lysias appointed for the task; Ptolemy son of Dorymenes, Nicanor and Gorgias, nobles all that were high in the royal favour; with forty thousand foot and seven thousand horse they were to march on Juda and make an end of it, as the king had ordered. So out they went, with all this army at their back, marched in, and pitched their tents near Emmaus, down in the valley. Be sure the traders all about were apprised of their coming, and made their way into the camp with great sums of silver and gold, and a retinue of servants besides, thinking to buy Israelite slaves; levies, too, from Syria and Philistia made common cause with the invader.

Judas, then, and his brethren found that matters had gone from bad to worse; here were the enemy encamped within their frontiers; they heard, besides, what orders the king had given for the destruction and taking away of their people. And the word went round among them, Now to restore the lost fortunes of our race; now to do battle for people of ours, sanctuary of ours! So a general assembly was called; they must make ready for the fight, and pray besides, to win mercy and pardon. Not at Jerusalem; Jerusalem lay there, no city but a desert waste, nor any of her sons came and went; her sanctuary defiled, her citadel garrisoned by the alien, she was but a haunt of the Gentiles. Sad days for the men of Jacob; pipe nor harp sounded there now. At Maspha, then, they gathered, looking across towards Jerusalem; time was when Maspha, too, had its place of prayer. All that day they fasted, and wore sackcloth, and covered their heads with ashes, and tore their garments about them.

What sights were these? Here, lying open, was a copy of the law, such as the heathen were ever making search for, . . .

49 the counterpart of their own images.¹ Here they had brought priestly vestments, and offering of first-fruits and tithes; here Nazirites were gathered, ripe and ready for the payment of their vows. And a loud cry rose to heaven, What shall we do for these, thy votaries? Whither escort them now? 50 Sanctuary of thine is all profanation and defilement, priesthood of thine all misery and despair. And now, see where the heathen muster their armies to destroy us! Needs not we should tell thee, how murderous their intent. Lord, but for thy aid, how shall we resist their onslaught? 51 Loudly their voices, and loud the trumpets rang.

52 Thereupon Judas chose out who should be their leaders, one with a thousand, one with a hundred, one with fifty, one with ten men to follow him; he sent home, too, all such as the law holds exempt; all that had but just built house, or married wife, or planted vineyard, and whoever had no stomach to the fight.² Then they moved camp, and pitched their tents southward 53 of Emmaus. Now for girded loins, cried Judas, and brave hearts! By to-morrow's light, you must engage yonder heathen, sworn enemies to us, and to the ground we hold sacred. Better die in battle, than live to see our race and our sanctuary over- 54 powered. Be it what it may, heaven's will be done!

4 That night, a detachment of five thousand foot and a thousand picked horsemen left their lines, under the command of Gorgias, thinking to reach the Jewish camp and strike a sudden blow at it; for guides, they had men of the Jerusalem garrison. But Judas had word of it; out he went, and all his valiant company with him, to attack the main body of the king's army at Emmaus, while the defences 5 of the camp were yet scattered. So Gorgias, making his night attack on the camp of Judas, and finding it empty, made no doubt they had given him the slip, and fell to scouring the hill-country for them; 6 meanwhile, came day-break, and there was Judas down in the valley. True, there were but three thousand at his back, for defence and attack very ill arrayed; and here was this army of heathen folk, both strong and well protected, with cavalry circling about them, men bred to war! But Judas cried to his fellows, What, would you be daunted by the numbers of them? Would you give ground before their attack? Bethink you, what a host it was Pharaoh sent in pursuit of our fathers, there by the Red Sea, and they escaped none the less. Now, as then, besiege we heaven with our cries; will not the Lord have mercy? Will he not remember the covenant he had with our fathers, and rout, this day, yonder army at our coming? No doubt shall the world have thenceforward, but there is one claims Israel for his own, and grants her deliverance.

And now the heathen folk caught sight of them as they advanced to the attack, and left their lines to give battle. Thereupon Judas' men sounded with the trumpet, and the two armies met. Routed the Gentiles were, sure enough, and took to their heels across the open country, sword of the pursuer ever catching the hindmost. All the way to Gezeron they were chased, and on into the plains by Idumaea,³ Azotus and Jamnia, with a loss of three thousand men. When Judas and his army came back from the pursuit, Not yours, he told them, to run greedily after the spoils of the camp; there is battle still awaiting us over yonder. Not far away, in the hill-country, lie Gorgias and his army; first meet you and beat you the enemy, and then you shall fall to your pillaging unafraid. Even as he spoke, they were ware of a company that watched them from the hill-side. But by now the camp was on fire, and it needed no more than the smoke of it to warn Gorgias of his defeat; that sight took the heart out of Syria, the more so when it proved that Judas and his army were in the valley, all appointed for battle, and they fled for their lives, down into the plain of Philistia. So to the pillaging of the camp Judas returned; what gold and silver they found there, what garments of blue and sea-purple, what rich treasures! Be sure there was singing of songs on their homeward

¹ As the sentence stands, it can only mean that heathen pursuivants had confiscated the scriptures, as being objects of veneration to the Jews no less than idols were to themselves. But it seems possible that the text is deficient. ² See Deut. 20. 5-8. ³ For 'Idumaea' some Greek manuscripts read 'Judaea'. Neither reading gives a good sense, and it seems possible that the name of Accaron, or some other Philistine town, has been accidentally miswritten.

journey, as they praised God in heaven, God who is gracious, whose mercy endures 25 for ever. Here was a day of signal deliverance for Israel.

26 And what of Lysias? News reached him, through the survivors, of what had be-27 fallen, and he was both sick and sorry at the hearing; his own will crossed, and his 28 master's command ill carried out! So, in the following year, he made a muster of 29 sixty thousand picked men, with five thousand horse, to crush the rebellion; into Judaea they marched, and encamped at Bethoron, where Judas met them with ten 30 thousand.¹ At the sight of their great numbers, this was Judas' prayer: Blessed art thou, Saviour of Israel, who didst make use of thy servant David, a giant's onset to overthrow! Victory thou didst give, over an invading army, to Saul's son Jonathan 31 and the squire that bore him company! So may yonder host, left at Israel's mercy, unlearn its confidence in strength and in speed; strike terror into them, let their manhood melt away, as they tremble at the approach of doom; sword of thy true lovers be their undoing, triumph-song of thy worshippers their dirge! With that, battle was joined, and of Lysias' men, five thousand were left dead on the field. What should he do? Here were his troops fled in disorder, here was Judas in command of brave men, that would as soon have an honourable death as life itself. Back he went to Antioch, and there levied soldiers for a greater expedition yet against Judaea.

36 And now Judas and his brethren had but one thought; the enemy vanquished, they would betake themselves to Jerusalem, to cleanse and restore the sanctuary. So the whole army fell into rank, and they climbed the hill of Sion together. What saw they? The holy place desolate, the altar profaned, charred gates, courts overgrown with brushwood, like forest clearing or mountain glen, the priests' lodging in 39 ruins. Upon this, there was rending of garments, and loud lament; dust they cast on their heads, and fell face to earth; then, as the trumpet's note gave the summons, raised their cries to heaven.

41 And what did Judas? First, he sent a force to engage the citadel's garrison, while the holy place was a-cleansing; then he chose priests, without blot or blemish, and true lovers of the law besides, who thereupon cleansed the sanctuary, nor any stone that was polluted with idolatry but they had it away into a place unclean. And next, he must concern himself with the altar of burnt-sacrifice, that was now all defiled. And it was good counsel they took; the altar must be destroyed, else the day when the Gentiles polluted it should be remembered to their shame. So destroy it they did, and laid up the stones in a place apt for their purpose, there on the temple hill. Here they must remain, until the coming of a prophet that should give sentence, what was to be done with them.

Then they raised a new altar in place of the old, using stones that had never felt the pick, as the law bade;² repaired shrine and inner walls, and rid both temple and temple courts of their defilement. New appurtenances, too, the temple must have, lamp-stand, incense-altar and table be restored to it; incense be put on the altar, lamps kindled to light the holy place, loaves set out on the table, and veils hung up; then at length their task was accomplished. On the twenty-fifth of Casleu, the ninth month, in the hundred and forty-eighth year, they rose before daybreak, and offered sacrifice, as the law bade, on the new altar they had set up. This was the very month, the very day, when it had been polluted by the Gentiles; now, on the same day of the same month, it was dedicated anew, with singing of hymns, and music of harp, zither and cymbals. Thereupon all the people fell down face to earth, to adore and praise, high as heaven, the author of their felicity; and for eight days together they celebrated the altar's renewal, burned victim and brought welcome-offering with glad and grateful hearts.

They decked the front wall of the temple, at this time, with gold crowns and escutcheons, consecrated the gates and the priest's lodging anew, and furnished it with doors; and all the while there was great rejoicing among the people; as for the taunts of the heathen, they were heard no more. No wonder if Judas and his brethren, with the whole assembly of Israel, made a decree that this feast should be kept year by year for eight days together, the feast-day of the altar's dedication.¹ Came that season, from the twenty-fifth day of Casleu onwards, all was to be rejoicing and holiday. At this time, too, they fortified the hill of Sion, with walls and strong towers all about; never more should Gentile feet profane it. Judas put a garrison there, and would have it strong enough to command Bethsura; a bulwark Israel must have against attack from the frontiers of Edom.

¹ For 'Judaea' the Greek manuscripts have 'Idumaea', and for 'Bethoron', 'Bethsura'. Cf. verse 61 below. ² See Ex. 20. 25.

5 Great indignation had the Gentiles that lived round about, when they heard that altar and temple were standing as of old. Their first thought was to rid their own territory of Jacob's breed, and all at once they set about to murder and harry them. So Judas must needs take arms against them, Esau's race in Idumaea, and the men of Acrabathane, that were keeping Israelite folk under strict siege; and signally he defeated them. Nor might he overlook Beán's tribe and the treachery they shewed, ever catching Israel at unawares by laying an ambush in his path. These he chased into their strongholds and besieged them there; laid them under a ban² and burned the strongholds to the ground, with their defenders in them. Then he crossed over into Ammon, where he came upon strong resistance and a great muster of men, that had one Timotheus for their leader; often he engaged them, and as often put them to rout; when he had defeated them, and taken Gazer with its daughter townships, he marched back into Judaea.

9 But by this all the heathen folk in the country of Galaad were making common cause against the Israelites who dwelt there, eager to be rid of them. And these, taking refuge in the stronghold of Dathe-man, sent dispatches to Judas and his brethren. Here be all the neighbours, they wrote, banded together for our destruction. Even now, Timotheus at their head, they are setting about the reduction of this our fortress; come speedily to the rescue; they have taken cruel toll of our lives already. Slain, all those clansmen of ours that had their dwelling in the Tubin country, carried away, their wives, their children, and their goods; nigh upon a thousand warriors then and there have perished.

This letter was still in the reading, when all of a sudden came other envoys from Galilee, their garments rent about them; their message was, Ptolemais, Tyre and Sidon were up in arms together, and all Galilee was overrun with heathen folk, bent on massacre. Grave tidings, these, for Judas and his people; met they in high debate, and took counsel how they might best aid their brethren in peril of assault. And now Judas must share the command with his brother Simon; Pick thy men, said he, and make for Galilee, while Jonathan and I march into Galaad. Part of his army he left to defend Judaea, with Joseph son of Zachary and Azarias for its captains; Here is your charge, said he; and see to it that you do not embroil yourselves with the Gentiles while we are gone. To Simon and to Galilee three thousand men were allotted; to Judas and to Galaad eight thousand. As for Simon, when he reached Galilee, full many a battle he must fight with the Gentiles, that he drove ever before him, till he pursued them at last to the very gates of Ptolemais. Of the enemy, some three thousand fell, and his men had the spoiling of them; the Israelites that dwelt in Galilee and Arbata he took home with him, and their wives and children and all they had; great rejoicing there was when he brought them back safe to Judaea.

Meanwhile Judas Machabaeus and his brother Jonathan had crossed the Jordan, and marched for three days through the desert. There the Nabuthaeans came to meet them, and gave them friendly welcome, and told them of all that had befallen their brethren in the Galaad country; how there were many whom their fellow-citizens had brought to bay in such great fortified cities as Barasa, Bosor, Alima, Casphor, Mageth and Carnaim; besides many others cut off in the rest of the Galaadite towns. And to-morrow, he was told, the heathen mean to occupy these cities with their army, seizing upon the Israelites and making an end of them, all in one day's work. Whereupon Judas and his men suddenly turned aside from their course into the desert of Bosor, and took the city; all its men-folk he put to the sword, and carried off the spoil of it, and 29 burned it to the ground. At night-fall they continued their journey, and reached the Israelite stronghold.¹ What a sight was this that met their eyes, when day broke! A great rabble of men past all counting, that brought up scaling-ladders and engines, as if they would take the stronghold by storm. Here was the battle fairly begun; the cry of them went up to heaven, loud as clarion-call, and a great cry, too, 32 was raised within the city. Now, cried Judas to his men, now to fight for your brethren's deliverance! And hard at the enemy's heels he followed, with three companies of warriors that blew trumpets as they went, and cried aloud in prayer. The name of Machabaeus once heard, how fled 34 Timotheus' army at his approach! How grievous the blow that fell on them, when eight thousand fell in a single day! Once more Judas turned aside, to Maspha; took it by storm, slew men of it, took spoil of it, 36 burned it to the ground; then on to seize Casbon, and Mageth, and Bosor, and the remaining cities of Galaad.²

¹ Cf. Jn. 10. 22.² Cf. Jos. 6. 17, 18 and other passages.

37 Yet, when all was done, Timotheus put another army into the field, and encamped close by Raphon, across the stream. What learned Judas from the scouts he had sent forward? Here were all the neighbouring 39 tribes assembled in great force, with hired support from Arabia besides, camped beyond the stream ready to engage him; so out he marched to offer battle. Wait we, 40 said Timotheus to his captains, till Judas and his army reach yonder stream. Cross he and challenge us, we may not speed; beyond doubt he has the mastery of us.
 41 Fear he the passage, and encamp on the further side, then cross we boldly, the day is ours. But Judas, when he drew near the 42 ravine, had muster-masters in attendance by the stream, that were charged to let none linger behind, but send every man 43 across into battle. So he crossed, challenging them, and all the army at his heels, and sure enough the Gentile host was routed at their coming; threw arms away, and sought refuge in the temple at Carnaim.³ Upon taking the city, he burned its temple to the ground with all that were sheltered in it; so was Carnaim vanquished, and could make head against Juda no more.

And now Judas gathered all the Israelites in the Galaad country, high and low, with their wives and children, a whole army of them, to come back with him to Juda. They journeyed safely as far as Ephron, that was a great city and well fortified, the very gate of Juda; turn to right or left they might not, their road lay through the heart of it. And what must they do, the townspeople, but stand to the defence of it, and barricade the entrance with great boulders! Thereupon Judas made peaceful overtures to them; Grant us leave, said he, to make our way through your country to ours, nor any harm shall befall you; we ask but the right of passage, and on foot. But open the gates they would not; so Judas made a cry through the camp, every man should go to the assault,⁴ there where he stood; and go to the assault they did, the fighting men of his company. All day and all night they attacked the city, and Judas was given the mastery of it. Never a male creature there but was put to the sword; the city was plundered and pulled down; and so he passed on through the streets of it, all paved with dead men. Jordan they must still cross, there by the great plain that faces Bethsan; and to the last Judas went ever to and fro, rallying the stragglers and encouraging the people on their journey, till the land of Juda was reached. Glad and merry were men's hearts as they climbed up Sion mountain, and there offered burnt-sacrifice in thanks for their safe home-coming, with never a life lost.⁵

So fought Judas and Jonathan in Galaad, and their brother Simon in Galilee at ¹ The word 'Israelite' is not in the original; but evidently the stronghold was either that mentioned in verse 11 above, or else one in which the Israelites of Bosor had taken refuge.

² There is some uncertainty about the names here; 'Casbon' is perhaps the 'Casphor' of verse 26, and 'Bosor' should perhaps be identified with the 'Barasa' (in the Greek, Bossora) of the same verse. Bosor has already been destroyed in verse 28.

³ cf. 40-43. It is not clear whether Timotheus was testing the courage of his opponents, or taking an omen from the course of events (cf. I Kg. 14. 9, 10). Perhaps we are not meant to picture the crossing as taking place unopposed.

⁴ 'Go to the assault'; literally, according to the Greek, 'to encamp', but cf. the use of the corresponding Hebrew verb in Jos. 10. 31 and elsewhere.

⁵ Literally, 'Because none of them had fallen until all returned safe and sound', cf. note on Mt. 1. 25.

56 the gates of Ptolemais; meanwhile, what of Joseph son of Zachary, and Azarias, that had charge of the garrison? News came to them of victories gained, and great deeds 57 done, and nothing would serve but they must make a great name for themselves too, by offering battle to the Gentiles 58 round about. So orders went out to the 59 army, to march on Jamnia, where Gorgias and his men came out to meet them. Back 60 fell Joseph and Azarias to the frontiers of Judaea in great disorder, with a loss to Israel of two thousand men; such defeat they 61 brought on our arms, because they would not listen to Judas and his brethren, but 62 must be great warriors like the rest. Not of that race they sprang that should afford Israel deliverance.

63 But as for Judas and his company,¹ they were held high in honour, both among Israelite folk, and wherever the renown of 4 them was heard; all flocked to greet them 5 with cries of acclaim. But still he and his brethren would be on the march, reducing the men of Edom in the south country; on Hebron and its daughter townships the blow fell, neither wall nor tower of it but 6 was burned to the ground. Then he moved camp, to march on Philistia, and would 7 make his way through Samaria.² Priests there were that took up arms and fell in battle that day, rashly desirous of a warrior's renown.³ And now Judas turned 8 aside to Azotus, in the country of the Philistines; altars he pulled down, images of their gods burned to ashes, gave up their cities to plunder, and so came back again to the land of Juda.

6 King Antiochus was still on his journey through the high countries, when he heard tell of a city in Persia called Elymais, renowned for its treasures of silver 2 and gold; here was a temple of great magnificence, that had golden armour in it, breastplate and shield left there by Philip's son, Alexander of Macedon, the first over-3 lord of Greece. Thither he marched, intent on seizing the city and plundering it; but seize it he might not, because the townsfolk

4 had news of his purpose, and came out to offer battle. So he was put to the rout, and must take himself back to Babylon, grievously disappointed.

And here, in the Persian country, a mes-5 senger reached him with tidings from Juda. Fled were his armies, and Lysias, 6 that erstwhile marched out with so brave a retinue, had left the Jews masters of the field. Now they were strong and well-armed, such spoil they had taken from the 7 armies they overthrew; gone was that defiling image he had set up over the altar at Jerusalem; high walls, as of old, protected the sanctuary; nay, they had made shift to 8 fortify his own stronghold of Bethsura.

What news was this! The king was all 9 bewilderment and consternation; he took to his bed, fallen into a decline for very sadness that his hopes had failed him.
Long time he languished under the double burden of his grief, and knew at last he was 10 a-dying. So he called his friends about him, and bade them farewell; Here is sleep quite gone from me, said he; so dazed is this heart of mine with doubt unresolved.
11 Thus runs my thought: How comes it that I have fallen upon such evil times, such a flood of calamity as now engulfs me; I, that in the days of my greatness loved men well, and was well beloved? And now returns 12 the memory of all the havoc I made in Jerusalem, spoil of gold and silver I robbed from it, doom of mine against the townsfolk, and for no fault. Past all doubt, here 13 is the source of all those miseries that have come upon me; look you, how I die consumed of grief, in a strange land! Then he 14 sent for Philip, one of his trusted friends, and gave all the kingdom into his charge;
crown and robe and ring he delivered to 15 him, bidding him seek out prince Antiochus, and bring him up as heir to the throne. Then and there died king Antiochus, in the hundred and forty-ninth year 16 of the Grecian empire. And Lysias, hearing of his death, crowned this same prince Antiochus, that he had brought up from boyhood, giving him the name of Eupator.

18 Meanwhile, what of the Jews that dwelt

¹ 'Judas and his company'; the Latin here has 'the men of Juda', which yields no good sense, 'Juda' and 'Israel' being convertible terms at this period. The Greek has, 'the man Judas and his brethren'.

² 'Samaria' is probably a false reading for Maresa, which lay on the route between Edom and the Philistines.

³ Most of the Greek manuscripts have a different and very curious reading, 'Priests there were that fell in battle that day, because he (Judas?) desired to play the warrior, with which design he went into action unadvisedly'.

about the holy place? Here was the garrison of the citadel hemming them in, seeking ever to do them injury, and to sustain the Gentile cause. So Judas was fain to make an end of it, and summoned the whole people to rally for the siege. Rally they did, and began the siege in the hundred and fiftieth year, with much contriving of catapults and engines. But some of the defenders slipped out; and these, with traitors of Israelite stock to support them, went off to gain the king's audience. Wilt thou never bring redress, they asked, and do our brethren right? Jews are we, that resolved we would be loyal to thy father, his policy furthering, his will obeying. What came of it? Our own fellow Israelites would have no more of our company, slew all they could lay hands on, robbed us of our possessions. Not us only, but all the country about them, their violence threatens; even now they stand arrayed against the citadel of Jerusalem, ready to take it by storm, and have fortified Bethsura. Forestall their plans thou must, and speedily, or they will go further yet, and there will be no holding them.

Angered by these tidings, the king sent for all his trusted friends, for his army captains and his commanders of horse; mercenaries, too, were hired from foreign countries, and from the islands out at sea, till he could put a hundred thousand foot and twenty thousand horse into the field, besides thirty-two elephants, inured to war. Through Edom they marched, and invested Bethsura; long they held it besieged, and built engines to attack it, but these, by a brave sally, the defenders burned to ashes.

Meanwhile, Judas drew away from the citadel, and encamped at Bethzacharam, close to the king's army. Ere dawn broke, the king was astir, and his men marching hot-foot towards Bethzacharam, where the armies made ready for battle, with a great blowing of trumpets. As for the elephants, they were blooded to battle with juice of grape and mulberry, and so divided here and there among the troops. A thousand foot-soldiers were assigned to each, in coat of mail and helmet of bronze; with each went five hundred picked horsemen; these were waiting ready for every beast at its station, and must go wherever it went, never leaving its side. On the back of every beast was a strong protecting tower of wood, cunningly fitted; and thirty-two valiant men were appointed to do battle from this height, over and above the Indian that was the beast's driver.¹ The remainder of the cavalry were stationed on either wing, to daunt the oncoming host with a clamour of trumpets,² and harass them as they stood tight packed in their ranks. Brightly the sun shone down on shield of gold, shield of bronze, till all the mountain-side gave back the glancing rays of them, and dazzled like points of fire. Part of the king's army was drawn up on the heights, part on the level plain; warily they came on and in good order; and ever, as they went, murmur of voices, tramp of feet, and clash of arms daunted the country-side around them, so great yonder army was, and so valiant. But Judas and his men closed with them, and gave battle; and of the king's soldiers, there were six hundred that fell.

What did Eleazar that day, the son of Sauran?³ Here was one of the beasts that went decked in royal trappings, and towered high above the rest; There rides the king, thought he, and with that, he gave his life, to win deliverance for his country, and for himself imperishable renown. Bravely he ran up to it, there in the heart of the press, slaying to right and left of him, men falling on either side, till he could creep in between the very feet of the elephant; crouched there, and dispatched it, and so, crushed by its fall to earth, died where he lay.

But now, finding the royal forces so strong, and so determined in their attack, the Jews withdrew from the encounter. To Jerusalem the king's men followed them, and now here was the king entrenched against Judaea and mount Sion itself. With the defenders of Bethsura he had made terms; yield up the city they must, so ill were they victualled for a siege,

¹ The meaning of the original is, that each elephant carried no less than thirty-two fighting men. The statement is perhaps due to some error in the copying of the Greek manuscripts. ² There is no mention of trumpets in the Greek original. But the text is obscure, and perhaps corrupt. ³ In the Greek, 'Eleazar Sauran', perhaps a corruption of 'Abaron' (2. 5 above).

50 in a year when the land lay fallow;¹ thus Bethsura was in the king's hands, and he 51 put a garrison there. But it was against the holy place itself that he turned his arms, and long he beleaguered it; what catapults
he brought to bear on it, what engines!
Flew fiery darts, flew stone and javelin and arrow from mangonel and arbalest, and the 52 slings took their turn. As for the Jews, they met engine with engine, and fought 53 on day after day; but the seventh year had come round, and what store was left in the city had been eaten up by the new citizens rescued from Gentile countries, so food 54 was none to be had. Only a few defenders were left in the holy place now; the rest, overtaken by famine, had dispersed to their homes.

55 But Lysias could not wait; he had news from Antioch. That same Philip, whom king Antiochus, on his death-bed, had appointed to bring up the young prince as 56 heir to the throne, was now returned at the head of his army from the land of the Medes and Persians, and would fain take 57 charge of the realm. So Lysias must betake himself to the king and his generals, with such words as these: Our plight grows daily worse; scant food is left us, and here is a fortress well defended; all the business 58 of the realm claims our care. What remains, but to make friendly advances, offer terms to the besieged and to all their country-59 men? Give we leave they should follow their own customs as of old, which customs neglecting, we have brought all this ill-will 60 and all this trouble upon us. King and chieftain fell in with his design; offer peace 61 they did, and the offer was accepted. So, upon terms with the king and his generals, 62 the Jews gave up their stronghold; and what must the king do, once he had set foot on mount Zion and discovered the strength of its defences, but break his oath, and have 63 all the walls of it pulled down! Then, with all haste, he took leave of it, and returned to Antioch, where he found Philip in possession, and levied war on him, taking the city by storm.

7 It was now, in the hundred and fifty-first year, that Demetrius, the son of Seleucus, escaped from Rome and landed with a small retinue at one of thesea-ports, where he was proclaimed king. No sooner had he set foot in the palace of his ancestors, than his men laid hold of Antiochus and Lysias, meaning to bring them into his presence. But he was warned of it, 3 and gave it out, sight of them he would have none; so they were dispatched by the 4 troops, and Demetrius established himself on the royal throne.

To him came certain Israelites, enemies 5 of the law and of religion, with Alcimus at their head, a man who coveted the highpriestly office. And thus, in the royal pre-6 sence, they defamed their own people: Here be Judas and his brethren have made away with all thy friends, and driven us out of our country! Do but send some trusted 7 agent to survey the scene of it, the havoc this man has wrought upon our own persons and upon the king's domain; ay, and to punish his partisans, with all who comfort them. The king's choice fell on Bac-8 chides, a courtier that was loyal to him, and had charge now of all the realm east of Euphrates. Of the havoc wrought by 9 Judas he should be judge, and with him went the traitor Alcimus, now confirmed in the high priesthood; thus should the royal vengeance fall on Israel.

So they took the road, and reached the 10 land of Juda with a great army at their heels. Envoys they sent out, to cheat Judas and his brethren with fair promises; but 11 from these they got no hearing; the sight of such armed strength was enough. It was a company of scribes that went out to meet Alcimus and Bacchides, asking for honourable terms; of all Israel, the As-13 sidaeans were foremost in demanding peace; Here is a priest of Aaron's line, said they, in yonder company, fear we no treachery from him. Fair promises he made 15 them, and swore they should take no harm, nor their friends neither; and they took 16 him at his word. And what did he? A full sixty of them he seized and put to death in one day. Not idly the word was written, 17 Bleeding corpses of thy true lovers they have strewn about on every side of Jerusalem, and there was none to bury the 18 dead. After this, all alike dreaded the newcomers and shrank from them; here was neither trust nor troth, when covenant and sworn promise went for nothing. So 19

¹ Cf. Lev. 25. 4.

Bacchides left Jerusalem and pitched his camp at Bethzecha, where he made search and laid hands on many that had deserted from his own army; some of the Jews he massacred besides, and had their bodies 20 thrown into the Great Cistern; then he left the whole country in Alcimus' charge, with troops to maintain him. So off went 21 Bacchides to his master, and Alcimus remained to make the best of his high 22 priesthood. Be sure all the malcontents in Judaea rallied to his side, and took possession of the country, to Israel's great mischief.

23 Little it liked Judas, to see Alcimus and his crew mishandling the men of Israel as never the Gentiles had; from end to end of Juda he passed, executing vengeance on such as had left his cause, till they might 25 take the field no longer. Everywhere Judas and his company had their way, and the sight of it warned Alcimus he was no match for them; so he, too, went back to the king, 26 loud in his complaints. Thereupon the king sent out an army for the people's undoing, with Nicanor at the head of it, that was one of his most notable princes, and had a grudge against Israel to satisfy. This 27 Nicanor, reaching Jerusalem with a great array, made peaceful overtures to Judas and his brethren, but treacherously; Need is none there should be blows given between us, he said. Let me come with a 28 handful of men, and parley we together under safe conduct. Come he did, and the greeting between them was friendly 29 enough, but Judas was like to have been seized, then and there, by the enemy; and when he had proof of Nicanor's treachery, he went in dread of him and would parley with him no longer.

31 Nicanor, then, his plot being now manifestly discovered, would take to the field; it was close to Capharsalama that he engaged Judas; and his army, routed with a loss of five thousand men, must needs take 33 refuge in the Keep of David.¹ It was after this that Nicanor made his way to mount Sion, where some of the priests and elders came out to greet him in friendly fashion, and shew him how burnt-sacrifice was offered there on the king's behalf. But nothing could they get from him but mockery and contempt; he did despite to their sacred persons, and sent them away with threats. In his anger, he swore to them nothing would serve but he should have Judas and Judas' army at his mercy; if not, he would burn the temple down, as soon as ever he returned in safety. So, in high disdain, he left them; and the priests must take themselves back within the walls, where they stood before altar and temple, praying very mournfully. Lord, they said, thou hast chosen this house to be the shrine of thy name; here thy people should offer prayer, and sue for thy favour. Do thou avenge thyself on chieftain and army both; die they at the sword's point! Wouldst thou forget their blasphemy; should they escape with their lives?

After this, Nicanor left Jerusalem, and pitched his camp at Bethoron, where he was met by a fresh army from Syria; Judas, in his camp at Adarsa, had but three thousand men. And this was the prayer Judas prayed: Time was, Lord, when Sennacherib's men were loud in their blasphemy, and thy angel must go out to smite them down, a hundred and eighty thousand of them. This day a new enemy overwhelm with our onslaught, and let all the world know what comes of threatening thy holy place; for his ill-doing, ill requite him!

It was the thirteenth of Adar when the two armies met; sure enough, Nicanor's army was overwhelmed, and himself the first to fall in the encounter; whereupon the rest, seeing their leader gone, cast weapons away and took to their heels. For a whole day the pursuit of them went on, all the way from Adazer to the approaches of Gazara, and ever there were trumpets sounding the hue and cry. Out came Jewish folk from all the villages round about, to head them off,² till at last they turned at bay and fell at the sword's point all of them, never a man left. Spoil of them was plundered where they lay; as for Nicanor, the Jews cut off the head from his body, and that right hand he lifted up so

¹ According to Josephus, who usually follows the sacred narrative closely, it was Judas who was defeated and forced to take refuge in Jerusalem; this would accord better with what follows, and it seems possible that the text has been incorrectly preserved.

² 'To head them off'; the Latin has 'and tossed them with the horn', probably through a misunderstanding of the word used in the Greek text.

defiantly, and took them away, to be hung 48 up in full sight of Jerusalem. Glad men they were that day, and kept high festival, 49 decreeing that never thenceforward should the thirteenth day of Adar go unobserved.
 50 And for a little while the land of Juda had peace.

8 Judas had heard tell of the Romans, and their renown. Here was a powerful nation, that would entertain overtures none the less from such as craved their friendship, plighting their word faithfully.
 2 A powerful nation indeed; what battles they had fought, what exploits achieved yonder among the Galatians, their con-3 quered vassals now! In Spain, too, they had done great feats of arms; and at last, by policy and patient striving, won over the whole country, made themselves mas-4 ters of all the silver and gold that was mined there. Came peoples from far away, kings from the furthest corners of earth, to offer battle, they were overwhelmed and signally defeated; those nearer at hand 5 were content to pay yearly tribute. Had they not crushed and conquered Philip, and Perseus king of the Greeks, and all others that had levied war upon them?
 6 And what of Antiochus the Great, that ruled all Asia, and came against them with a hundred and twenty elephants, with horsemen and chariots, and a great array besides? The Romans overcame him, 7 caught him alive, and demanded both from him and from his heirs rich tribute, and hostages, with other conditions of sur-8 render; took away from him India, Media, and Lydia, that were his most cherished provinces, and gave them to king Eumenes 9 instead. Later, word came that the men of Hellas were for marching in and making an 10 end of them; what was the issue of it? One of the Roman generals was sent out to engage them; fell many in battle, wives and children were carried off into exile, goods plundered, the land conquered, its fortresses destroyed, and they are slaves to this day.

11 So it was with all the kingdoms and islands that defied their will; the Romans crushed them and took their lands away.
 12 But to their friends, that would live at peace with them, they were ever good friends in return. Kingdoms both far and near became their vassals, nor any that heard their name but feared it; helped they 13 any man to a throne, the throne was his;

 their good will lost, his throne was lost too;
 so high was their renown.

Yet, with all this, was never one of them 14 that wore crown, or went clad in purple for his own aggrandizement. A senate-house 15 they would have, where a council of three hundred and twenty met day by day, providing ever for the good estate of the commonalty; and every year they would 16 entrust one man with the rule and governance of their whole country, the rest obeying him, without any debate or contention moved.¹

So now Judas made choice of two en-17 voys, Eupolemus, son of John, son of Jacob, and Jason, son of Eleazar; to Rome they should go, and there make a treaty of good will and alliance. Rome's task it 18 should be to rid them of the Grecian yoke; from the Greeks it was plain they could expect nothing better than grinding sla-19 very. So, after long journeying, to Rome they came, and were admitted to the senate house, where they gave their message as follows: We have been sent to you by 20 Judas Machabaeus and his brethren, and by our countrymen at large, to make a treaty of alliance with you; fain would they be enrolled among your confederates and friends. This proposition liked the Romans 21 well; and they wrote back to the Jews on tablets of bronze, that should be kept in Jerusalem to serve them for a memorial of treaty and alliance made, to this effect:
 Well speed they at all times, the Roman 22 and the Jewish peoples, by sea and land alike; far removed from either be alarm of 23 war, assault of the enemy! Yet if war befall, and threaten the Romans first, or any ally of theirs in any part of their dominions, such aid the Jewish people shall give as the 25 occasion demands, ungrudgingly. For the needs of the enemy they shall nothing find or furnish, be it corn, or arms, or money, or ships, according to the agreement made at Rome; and they shall observe these undertakings with no thought of their own 27 advantage. In like manner, if the Jews be first threatened, it shall be for the Romans to give aid as the occasion demands, most willingly; providing neither corn nor arms, money nor ships, to any that take part against them, according to the agreement made at Rome;¹ and they shall observe these undertakings honourably. Upon these terms the Romans and the Jewish people are agreed; if hereafter it should be the will of both parties² to enlarge or to restrict them, they may do so at their discretion, and such enlargement or restriction shall have force accordingly. As for the wrong done by king Demetrius, we have sent him warning, What meanest thou, to burden with so heavy a yoke the Jewish people, our friends and allies? Let them complain of thee once more, and we will surely give them redress, by land and sea levying war against thee.

¹ These verses record only the impression which had reached Judas; it is not necessarily accurate in all points.

9 While this was afoot, news came to Demetrius that Nicanor and his men had perished in the encounter. But he would still have his way; Bacchides and Alcimus should be sent back to Judaea, and the northern command³ of his army with them. Marching out along the Galgala road, they encamped at Masaloth in Arbella; the town was surprised, and many of its inhabitants massacred. Then, in the first month of the hundred and fifty-second year, they began an attack on Jerusalem, moving their camp to Berea. It was a force of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse; Judas, encamped at Laia, had three thousand picked followers with him, but these were greatly daunted when they saw what heavy odds were against them, and began to desert their lines, till no more than eight hundred of them were left. One by one they slipped away, and raise fresh levies he might not, with the battle so hard upon his heels; what wonder if Judas lost heart, and was unmanned? Yet said he to the remnant that was left him, Up, go we to the attack, and try conclusions with the enemy! In vain they sought to dissuade him; Speed we may not, they said; let us save our skins now, we may yet join hands with our brethren, and do battle hereafter; why, we are but a handful! Nay, said Judas, that may I never do; what, shew them our backs? If our time is come, die we manfully in our brethren's cause, nor suffer any foul blot to fall on our name!

By this, the opposing army had moved forward out of its lines, and stood fronting them; here were the two bodies of horse, the slingers and archers going on before the rest, and the choice troops that would bear the shock of the encounter; here was Bacchides himself, on the right wing. This side and that the phalanx drew nearer, with a great blowing of trumpets, and Judas' men, they raised a great cry on their own part, till the earth rang again with the noise of the two armies. Thus begun, the battle went on from morning till dusk. On the right, where he saw Bacchides' army was strongest, Judas made the attack, and all the most valiant of his men with him; broke their line, and chased them all the way to mount Azotus. But now those on the left, seeing their right wing routed, cut off Judas and his men from the rear; now indeed the battle grew fierce, and there were many fell wounded on either part, till at last Judas fell, and with that, all the rest took to their heels.

As for his body, his brothers Jonathan and Simon recovered it, and so buried him where his fathers were buried, in the city of Modin. Great lament all Israel made over him, and long they mourned him; Here is a great warrior fallen, they said, that once brought his people deliverance! What other battles Judas fought, deeds did, greatness achieved, you shall not find set down here; too long the record of them.

Once Judas was dead, there was no corner in Israel but treason began to shew its face there, and lawlessness to abound; under such leadership the whole country, at this time much distressed by famine, went over to Bacchides. Good care he took to choose out godless men, that should have the governance of his territory; and these raised a hue and cry after Judas' partisans, haling them before Bacchides to be punished and used despitefully; never, since prophecy died out among them, had the men of Israel known such distress. And now all that had loved Judas rallied to Jonathan instead; Since thy brother's death, they told him, none is left to take the field against our enemies as he did, this Bacchides and all else that bear a grudge against our race.¹ There is but one way of it; this day we have chosen thee to be our ruler, our chieftain, to fight our battles for us. So, from that day forward, Jonathan took command, in succession to his brother Judas. Bacchides no sooner heard of it than he marked him down for death; but of this Jonathan had warning, and took refuge, with his brother Simon and all his company, in the desert of Thecuc. It was there, by Asphar pool, they halted; and it was there that Bacchides, well informed of their movements, crossed Jordan at the head of his army and came upon them, one sabbath day.

¹ The Latin has, 'according to the agreement made by the Romans'. ² 'Both parties'; according to the Latin version, 'either party', but such a stipulation would make the whole treaty ineffectual. ³ 'The northern command'; literally, 'the right wing'. Presumably this means the right extremity from Demetrius' point of view.

This was the manner of it. Jonathan had sent his brother John, that was in command of the camp followers, on an errand to his good friends the Nabuthaeans. They had brought a deal of their household stuff with them; would the Nabuthaeans take it into safe keeping? But, as they went, some of Jambri's folk came out from Madaba, seized John and all that he had with him, and went off with them. Afterwards, Jonathan and Simon heard that the men of Jambri had a great wedding toward; they must bring home the bride from Nadabatha,² and with much pomp, because her father was a notable Chanaanite chief. So, to avenge the death of their brother John, they climbed the hill-side and lay in ambush there. What a sight was this met their eyes! All manner of rout and display; the bridegroom, his friends and his brethren, passing on their way to the trysting-place, with beating of drums, and making of music, and all manner of warlike array! Then rose they up from their ambush and laid about them, till many fell wounded, and the rest fled into the hills, leaving all their spoil behind them. So turned they wedding mirth into funeral dirge, to avenge the murder of their brother, and withdrew to the banks of Jordan again.³

Hearing of these alarms, Bacchides marched down to Jordan bank one sabbath day, in great force. Up now! cried Jonathan to his men; engage our enemy we must. Gone is the vantage we had till now; here is armed force confronting us, and all around us is Jordan stream, Jordan banks full of marshes and thickets; escape is none. Cry we rather upon heaven, for deliverance out of the enemy's hand. So the battle was joined; and here was Jonathan exerting all his strength to deal a blow at Bacchides, who declined the encounter! What did Jonathan then? With all his company, he leapt into Jordan. So now, to reach them, the enemy must swim for it across the stream.⁴ A thousand men of his following Bacchides lost that day, and was fain to return to Jerusalem.

After this, they took to fortifying the cities of Judaea with high walls and barred gates, making strongholds at Jericho, Ammaum, Bethoron, Bethel, Thamnata, Phara and Thopo; here garrisons were set, for the harrying of Israel. Bethsura, too, Bacchides fortified, and Gazara, and the Citadel itself, keeping all of them well manned and provisioned; ay, and the great men of all the country round must yield up their children as hostages, to be held in Jerusalem citadel for safe keeping. Then, in the second month of the hundred and fifty-third year, came an order from Alcimus, the dividing wall of the temple's inner court should be dismantled. The Prophets' Building⁵ he had already cleared away, and begun the dismantling, when himself was smitten down, and all his plans interrupted. Dumbstricken and palsied, he never spoke again, even to dispose of his goods, but died there and then, in great torment.

Alcimus dead, Bacchides was for Judaea no longer; away he went to the king's ¹ The meaning of the Greek text is, 'all those of our own race that bear a grudge against us'.

² 'Nadabatha'; the Latin version has 'Madaba', presumably a copyist's error. ³ vv. 35-42. This incident is given by Josephus as if it followed the events described in verses 43-49; but he has probably misunderstood the sequence of the narrative. In verse 35, the Latin version seems to suggest that Jonathan asked the Nabuthaeans for the loan of their equipment, but the account given in the Greek text is more natural.

⁴ Literally, 'and they swam across the Jordan to them'. The Greek text has 'and they did not swim across the Jordan to them'. The meaning, in either case, can only be a matter of conjecture.

⁵ The Prophet's Building (literally, Work) was presumably the name given to some part of Zorobabel's temple; no allusion is made to it elsewhere.

court, and for two years the land was at 58 peace. But ere long there was conspiracy afoot among the godless party; here were Jonathan and his men living secure of their safety; let Bacchides come in again, he might seize them all, and make one night's 59 work of it. To Bacchides, then, they went, 60 and imparted their scheme to him; whereupon he raised a great army for marching on Judaea, but first sent word privately to his partisans there, bidding them seize Jonathan and his company for themselves.
 61 Word went abroad, and the plan miscarried; it was Jonathan¹ seized fifty notables of Judaea, that were the authors of the 62 conspiracy, and put them to death. Then, with Simon and the rest of his following, he removed to Bethbessen, out in the desert, and set about rebuilding it, to make a stronghold for them.

63 Bacchides had news of this; mustering his whole force, and sending word to his 64 Jewish supporters, he marched in and pitched his camp so as to command Beth-bessen. Long time he besieged it, and 65 brought up engines against it; meanwhile, Jonathan had left his brother Simon in command of the city, and was roaming the country-side. When he came back, it was 66 with a band of men at his heels; smote he Odares and his clan, smote he the men of Phaseron where they lay encamped; everywhere laid about him, and still gained 67 strength.² As for Simon and his company, they made a sally out of the town, and set 68 fire to the engines; afterwards they engaged Bacchides himself, and worsted him, so that he must pay dearly for plot 69 and tryst of his that came to nothing. So enraged was he with the malcontents whose counsel had brought him into Judaea, he put many of them to death, and was for marching home again with the rest 70 of his following, when Jonathan, hearing of it, sent envoys to offer peace, and an 71 exchange of prisoners. This offer he gladly accepted, and carried out the terms of it, giving his word he would do Jonathan no 72 more injury as long as he lived, and restoring all the prisoners he had ever taken in the land of Juda. So he took himself back to his own country, and never came that way again. Israel had a respite from 73 fighting at last, and Jonathan took up his dwelling at Machmas, whence he ruled the people thenceforward, ridding the land of godless folk altogether.

10 And now, in the hundred and sixtieth year, came Alexander, a son of Antiochus the Illustrious, and took possession of Ptolemais, where he was received with royal honours. A great force 2 king Demetrius levied, when he heard of it, and went out to give him battle; at the 3 same time, he wrote to Jonathan, in such loving terms as should flatter his dignity.
 No time to be lost, thought he, in making 4 friends with this man, before he takes to comforting Alexander against us; for 5 wrong done to himself, and his brother,
 and all his race, he bears us a grudge yet.
 So he empowered Jonathan to muster an 6 army, and to make weapons of war, as the ally of Syria; the hostages, too, in the citadel were to be given back to him.

When Jonathan came to Jerusalem, and 7 read this letter aloud, not to the townsfolk only, but to the citadel garrison, great was 8 the fear fell on all who listened; here was Jonathan commissioned to levy troops by the king's own order! The hostages were 9 surrendered without more ado, and given back to their parents; and he himself took 10 up his quarters in Jerusalem, where he set about building up the city and repairing it.
 It was the walls needed rebuilding, so he 11 told his workmen; on every side, the hill of Sion must be defended with hewn stone; and punctually they obeyed him. As for 12
 the alien folk that guarded the strongholds Bacchides had left, they fled incontinently;
 what matter if their posts were abandoned? 13 They were for home. Only Bethsura was 14 garrisoned now, and that by traitors to God's law and commandment; it was all the refuge they had.

King Alexander heard of these overtures 15 made by Demetrius; heard, too, the story of Jonathan and his brethren, battles fought, and deeds done, and labours en- 16 dured. Why, said he, this man has not his match anywhere; time it is we should court his friendship and alliance. With that, he 17

¹ The name Jonathan is not given, but it seems the natural one to supply in the context. Josephus, perhaps through a misinterpretation, attributes the massacre to Bacchides. ² vv. 65, 66. The original here is strangely worded, and perhaps corrupt.

wrote him a letter, and these were the 18 terms of it: King Alexander, to Jonathan 19 his brother-prince, greeting! We have heard tell of thee, a man so valiant, and so 20 well worthy of our friendship; in token whereof, we appoint thee high priest of thy own race henceforward, and to have the title of the King's Friend. With that, he sent him a purple robe and a gold crown; Take ever our part, said he, and hold fast the 21 bond of friendship. So, when the seventh month came round, in the hundred and sixtieth year, Jonathan clad himself with the sacred vesture at the feast of Tent-dwelling; an army he levied besides, and made weapons of war in great abundance.

22 Sick and sorry Demetrius was when he 23 heard of these doings; Here is an ill day's work, said he, to let Alexander forestall us in making alliance with the Jews, to his 24 great comfort! From me, too, they shall have a message of entreaty, they shall have honours and gifts; the Jews shall be my 25 good friends yet. And thus he wrote: King Demetrius, to the people of the Jews, 26 greeting! Here is welcome news we have of you; right well you have kept troth with us, honouring the treaty when you might 27 have taken part with our enemies. In that loyal mind continue, and your good offices 28 shall not go unrewarded; much immunity you shall enjoy, much largesse receive.

29 By these presents, I exempt both you and all Jews from the poll-tax; salt-tax and coronation dues I remit and forgo, with my 30 right to a third part of your seed-corn, and half your fruit-crop. From this day forward, now and for ever, I resign all this;
 from Juda and from the three cantons of Samaria and Galilee¹ lately added to it, 31 there shall be no toll taken. For Jerusalem, it shall be a place set apart, a free city with its own confines, mistress of its own tithes 32 and tribute; nor claim I any rights over the citadel there, I make it over to the high 33 priest, to garrison it as he will. All persons of Jewish blood in all my realm that were taken away as prisoners from Juda shall now be set free gratuitously, and no dis-34 traint made on their revenues or cattle.
 Feast-day and new moon and sabbath, and all other such solemnities as are appointed to be observed, with the three days before and after the feast itself, shall be days of immunity and respite for all the Jews in my realm; nor any business done or debate 35 moved to their detriment at such times.

 In the king's army, Jews may be enrolled 36 up to the number of thirty thousand, paid according to the common rate of the royal troops; and the same shall be free to serve in all the fortified towns of our empire.
 Jews may be employed besides in all posi-37 tions of trust, and appointed governors,² yet live still by their own laws, that have royal sanction in the land of Juda. The 38 three cantons taken from Samaria and added to Judaea shall be accounted part of Juda, under a single government, with no allegiance but to the high priest.

Ptolemais, with all the country that lies 39 about it, I hereby convey as a free gift to the temple precincts at Jerusalem, to defray the temple expenses.³ To this gift I 40 add a sum of fifteen thousand silver sicles yearly, out of the royal dues that belong to me. With this sum, arrears shall be made 41 good in payments for the temple building, withheld till now by such as had charge of the matter; and restitution made, to the 42 priests now in office, for the five thousand sicles that were confiscated year by year from the temple treasury.⁴ Debtor to the 43 king, whatever be the charge against him, that takes sanctuary in the temple or its precincts, shall be left at liberty, and no distraint made upon goods of his within these dominions. Payment shall be made 44 besides from the royal treasury for the finishing and repairing of the temple fabric; as also for building up and making 45 strong the walls of Jerusalem, and restoring the fortresses of Judaea.

But in vain were such promises made to 46 Jonathan and the Jewish folk, nor credence found they any nor assent. Could they forget all the mischief Demetrius had done in Israel, all the tyranny they had en-47 dured? Alexander it was had all their good wishes; his was the first offer of terms that reached them, and all the while it was his 48 cause they cherished. By this, Alexander

¹ 'Samaria and Galilee', here evidently treated as a single unit, the three districts concerned had actually been Samaritan (verse 38). ² 'And appointed governors'; according to the Greek text, 'and let their governors be men of their own race'. ³ A fine touch; cf. verse 1. ⁴ vv. 41, 42. The Latin here differs from the Greek text, which is less intelligible.

49 had mustered a great force, and marched against Demetrius. When the two kings met, it was Demetrius' men took to their heels, and Alexander gave chase, pressing them hard; fiercely the battle raged till sun-down, and before the day was over, Demetrius fell.

51 Hereupon Alexander sent an embassy to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, addressing him in these terms following. Take notice I have returned to my kingdom, and sit now on the throne of my fathers, in full possession of my princely rights. Would I regain Syria, needs must I should overthrow 53 Demetrius; overthrow him I did, on field of battle, with all his army, and here I sit in his place. And should we not be upon terms of friendship, thou and I? Let me have thy daughter to wife; a niggardly wooer thou shalt not find me, nor she 54 either. And what answer made king Ptolemy? An auspicious day, said he, this day of thy return to the land and throne of thy fathers! Boon thy letter asks of me thou shalt have; but first meet we together, face to face, yonder at Ptolemais; there will I pledge my word to the articles thou namest. So here was king Ptolemy come from Egypt, with his daughter Cleopatra, all the way to Ptolemais, in the hundred 57 and sixty-second year; and there king Alexander met him and took his daughter Cleopatra to wife, and they held the wedding with great magnificence, as kings will.

59 King Alexander had sent word to Jonathan, he should come and keep tryst with him; so to Ptolemais Jonathan went with great state, and met the two kings there. Gifts a many he made them, of silver and gold and much else, and was high in favour 61 with them. It chanced that certain Israelites, pestilent fellows of the traitorous party, came there to bring charges against him. But to these the king would not 62 listen; he would have Jonathan change his garments, and go clad in purple, and when this was done, a seat he must have beside 63 the king himself. Take him out into the heart of the city, Alexander said to his vassals, and there make proclamation, none may bring charge against him on any pretext, or in any fashion molest him. No thought had his accusers, when they heard such proclamation made, and saw Jonathan there dressed in purple, but to escape, one and all, as best they could; he himself was loaded with honours, enrolled among the king's chief friends, and made a prince, with a share in the governance of the kingdom. So Jonathan made his way back to Jerusalem undisturbed, and well content.

Then, in the hundred and sixty-fifth year, came Demetrius, son of that other Demetrius, from the island of Crete, and landed in his native country; ill hearing indeed for Alexander, who returned at once to Antioch. Demetrius¹ gave command of his army to Apollonius, that was governor of Coelestria, and a great array it was he levied. From Jamnia, where he took up his quarters, this Apollonius sent word to the high priest Jonathan: What, wilt thou defy us, and all alone? Here am I mocked and flouted by the resistance offered me, up yonder in the hills! Nay, if such confidence thou hast in thy own resources, come down and meet us in the plain; try we conclusions there! Trust me, I am master of the field; what I am, what my troops are, thou shalt learn upon a little enquiry; stand thou canst not, they will tell thee, before onslaught of ours. Twice, on their native soil, thy fathers fled in disorder, and wilt thou make head against such an array of horse and foot, here in the plain, where rock is none, nor gravel-bed, to aid thy flight?

Roused by this challenge, Jonathan marched out from Jerusalem with a muster of ten thousand men; his brother Simon joined hands with him; and together they appeared before the gates of Joppe. Enter they might not, for Apollonius had a garrison there, but must needs attack it; whereupon the citizens took alarm, and themselves opened the gates. Thus came Joppe into the power of Jonathan; the news reached Apollonius, and he brought up three thousand horse, with a great array of men besides. To Azotus he marched, as if he meant to pass them by, but all the while he was luring them on into the plain;²

¹ It seems possible that the word 'Demetrius' may have been inserted for the sake of clearness; Josephus treats Apollonius throughout as fighting on the side of Alexander (in spite of verse 88).

² 'All the time he was luring them on into the plain'; this seems to be the meaning of the Greek text, although Joppe and Azotus were both on the sea-board, far away from any hill-country. The Latin has 'immediately he went out into the plain', which yields no satisfactory sense.

in horse lay his strength and his confidence. To Azotus Jonathan followed him, and battle was joined.

79 Apollonius, by a secret feint, had left a thousand horsemen encamped in their rear; so all at once Jonathan found himself cut off by an ambush. Round his army they rode, casting javelins into the ranks, from morning till night-fall; but ever it stood firm, at Jonathan's bidding, till the horses were tired out at last. Then, the force of the cavalry once spent, out came Simon with his troops to attack the main body, which thereupon broke and fled. Scattered over the open country, in vain they rallied at Azotus, and took refuge in the precincts of their god Dagon; both Azotus and all the neighbouring cities Jonathan burnt and plundered, and Dagon's temple, with all that took shelter there, was burnt with the rest. So perished, by sword and fire, some eight thousand men; as for Jonathan, he had no sooner encamped before Ascalon, than the townfolk opened the gates to him, and gave him honourable welcome.

87 So Jonathan came back to Jerusalem, and the army behind him, laden with spoils. More than ever, when he heard of it, did king Alexander heap honours upon him; a buckle of gold he sent him, ever the gift kings make to men of blood royal, and Accaron, with all the country-side about it, granted him for his domain.

11 And now Ptolemy, king of Egypt, levied a great army, countless as sand on the beach, and a fleet besides; to win Alexander's realm his treacherous design was, and add it to his own. To Syria he came, full of fair speeches, and all the towns opened their gates to welcome him; such welcome Alexander himself had prescribed; was not the king of Egypt his father-in-law? And never a town king Ptolemy entered, but he left a guard of soldiers there. When he reached Azotus, here was Dagon's temple burnt, here was the town itself and all its neighbourhood in ruins; the dead lay unburied, where they fell in battle, or in heaps by the road-side. All this they shewed him, and told him, with malicious intent, how it was Jonathan's doing; but no word said king Ptolemy. As for Jonathan, he went to meet the king at Joppe, with a deal of pomp; there they greeted one another, and passed the night, nor would Jonathan return to Jerusalem till he had escorted the king as far as the river called Eleutherus.

All the cities of the sea-coast, as far as maritime Seleucia, king Ptolemy occupied, and with no friendly purpose towards Alexander; it was to Demetrius he sent envoys instead. Come, said he, a pact between us! My daughter thou shalt have in Alexander's place, and therewithal the throne of thy fathers; here is an ill son-in-law I have chosen, that went about but now to kill me! Thus, to find pretext for dethroning his rival, king Ptolemy defamed him; took his daughter away, and gave her to Demetrius. His estrangement from Alexander now came to an open breach, what must he do next but enter the city of Antioch, and there assume the double crown, as ruler of Egypt and Asia both? As for Alexander, that was then in Cilicia, quelling a revolt in those parts, he came out to do battle when the news reached him; but Ptolemy brought up his army, met him with a superior force, and routed him. Thus Egypt had the mastery; and when Alexander fled to Arabia for refuge, Zabdiel, an Arabian, cut off his head and sent it to the conqueror. Three days later, Ptolemy himself lay dead; whereupon the garrisons he had left in the towns were massacred by the citizens, and the royal power passed to Demetrius in this, the hundred and sixty-seventh year.

Now it was that Jonathan mustered the men of Judaea to deliver an attack on the Gentile citadel in Jerusalem; engines a many they brought against it. Nor wanted there Jews of the godless party, traitors to their own race, that went off and told Demetrius it was being attacked; the news greatly angered him, and he hastened to Ptolemais, bidding Jonathan raise the siege and come to meet him in conference without more ado. This message notwithstanding, Jonathan would have the siege go forward; certain elders of Israel, and certain of the priests, he chose out to bear him company, and so put his own life in peril, going off to meet the king at Ptolemais, with gold and silver and garments and other gifts in great number. He was received graciously enough; let his own traitorous fellow-countrymen bring what 26 accusations they would, the king would not be behind his predecessors in making much of Jonathan, for all his courtiers to 27 see. He was confirmed in the high priesthood, and what other high dignities he held aforetime, and declared besides the chief of the king's friends.

28 And now Jonathan had a favour to ask; exemption from tribute for Judaea, and the three cantons, and Samaria with its neighbouring townships; ¹ he promised in return 29 a payment of three hundred talents. To this the king agreed, writing thus to Jona-30 than upon the matter raised: King Demetrius, to his brother prince Jonathan, and 31 to the people of the Jews, greeting. We send you herewith, for your better information, a copy of the instructions we have given to our cousin Lasthenes in your 32 regard. King Demetrius, to Lasthenes, his 33 good father, greeting. Whereas the people of the Jews have ever been trusty friends to us, our pleasure it is to reward them for 34 the loyalty they have shewn us. We therefore confirm them in the possession of all Judaea, the three cities of Ephraim, Lydda and Ramathan, that formerly belonged to Samaria, and all their neighbouring townships. . . to all those who do sacrifice at Jerusalem; instead of the yearly revenues hitherto set apart for the king from harvest 35 and fruit-gathering.² Tithe and tribute that was ours we also remit to them; nor lay any claim to the salt-pits, or the crowns which from time to time were bestowed 36 upon us. Of all this we give them a full discharge, that shall be valid in perpetuity.
 37 See to it that a copy of this decree shall be made, and handed over to Jonathan, who shall set it up in a public place on the holy mountain.

38 Here, then, was the whole realm at peace under Demetrius' rule, nor any rival had he; what must he do but disband all his soldiers and send them home, except the foreign troops he had levied from the islands out at sea? Bitterly they hated him for it, the men who had served under his 39 fathers; and there was one Tryphon that took good note of these discontents in the army. This Tryphon was formerly of Alexander's faction, and now he had recourse to Emalchuel, the Arabian, that had care of Alexander's son Antiochus. Much persuasion he used with him, to let An-tiochus return to his father's throne; much told him of Demetrius, and how the soldiers were disaffected against him.

Time passed, and Tryphon was in Arabia still. Meanwhile, Jonathan was urgent with king Demetrius to withdraw the garrisons from Jerusalem citadel and the other strongholds, where they bore arms yet, and against Israel. Nay answered Demetrius, that I will do and more;
 great honours I have in store, for thee and for thy people both, when the time is ripe for it. For this present, it were well done to send troops for my own protection; here is all my army revolted from me! Three thousand picked men Jonathan dispatched to Antioch, to the king's side, and right glad he was at their coming. What though the citizens, a hundred and twenty thousand strong, were banded together against his royal person, driving him to take refuge within the court, and occupying the city streets in warlike fashion? He had but to call the Jews to his aid, and they rallied at his summons; posted themselves here and there about the streets, and in one day slew a hundred thousand men, setting fire to the town besides. There was spoil enough for the winning, that day when they saved the king's life. The townfolk, when they saw how easily the Jews got the mastery of them, had no more stomach for fighting;
 they were loud in their entreaties: A truce!
 A truce! Havoc enough yonder Jews have made of us and of the city! And so, flinging away their weapons, they came to terms.
 Prince and people both had good proof, by now, of the Jews' valour; back they went to Jerusalem high in repute among the Syrians, and laden with spoils.

Demetrius, now firmly established on the throne, his dominions all at peace, recked little enough of his promises; from Jonathan he was estranged altogether, left his services unrecompensed, and much mischief did him besides. It was now that

¹ 'The three cantons, and Samaria with its neighbouring townships'; some think this is a copyist's error for 'the three cantons which had belonged to Samaria, with their neighbouring townships', cf. verse 34. ² The sentence is obscure, and perhaps the text has been inaccurately transmitted. For 'Ephraim' the Greek has the form 'Aphaerema', which the Latin interprets as a common noun, 'sequestration'.

Tryphon came back, and with him the young prince Antiochus, that took the style of king and had himself crowned; all the disbanded armies of Demetrius rallied to them, and turned upon their former master, who fled routed before them; Tryphon, meanwhile, got possession of the elephants, and Antioch fell into his hands. Thereupon came a letter from the young Antiochus to Jonathan, confirming him in the high priesthood, and in possession both of Judaea and of the three cantons; he was acclaimed as the king's friend, and a present of golden cups sent for his use, with the right to drink out of gold ware, to dress in purple, and to carry the golden buckle. His brother Simon, too, was made lord of the sea-coast, from Tyre to the frontiers of Egypt.

And now Jonathan was on the march, across the river, patrolling the cities everywhere, with all the armies of Syria gathered to aid him. . . . He came to Ascalon, where the townfolk welcomed him with all honour;¹ came to Gaza, where they shut the gates on him, and he must needs undertake the siege of it. But when he had spread fire and rapine through the country-side, the men of Gaza asked for terms, which he gave them, carrying off their sons as hostages to Jerusalem. Then he went on patrolling the country, all the way to Damascus. News reached him that the chiefs of Demetrius' faction were making head at Cades, in Galilee, with a whole army to support them, and their design was to remove him from office. So he went to meet them, leaving his brother Simon in charge of Judaea.

As for Simon, he made an assault upon Bethsura, and kept it for a long while besieged, till at last it obtained terms of surrender; he rid the place of its defenders and took over the command of it, putting in a garrison of his own. Meanwhile, Jonathan was encamped by the waters of Genesar; here, on the plain of Asor, they were on the watch before day-break, when they saw the enemy's force coming to meet them over the level plain. These had an ambush ready for him on the hill-side, and as he advanced to meet the main body, the men in ambush sprang up, and engaged him. At this, all Jonathan's supporters took to their heels; none stood their ground but Mathathias son of Absalom and Judas son of Calphi, that had the marshalling of his men. What marvel if Jonathan tore his garments about him, and strewed earth on his head, and betook himself to prayer? Afterwards, he offered battle afresh, and routed his enemies; as the fight went on, his own men that had deserted their ranks rallied to him, and joined in the pursuit all the way to Cades, where they encamped once more. In that day's fighting, three thousand of the Gentiles fell; and so Jonathan made his way back to Jerusalem.

12 Here was a posture of affairs suited Jonathan well enough; yet would he send delegates to confirm and renew his alliance with the Romans; Lacedaemon, too, and other countries should have letters of the same tenour. To Rome, then, his messengers went, gained audience of the senate, and told how the high priest Jonathan and the Jewish people had sent them to renew their old treaty of friendship; and the Romans gave them such letters of recommendation to this country or that, as should bring them home to Juda under safe conduct.

The message Jonathan sent to the men of Sparta was in these terms following. The high priest Jonathan, with the elders and priests and all the people of the Jews, to their brethren the Spartans, greeting. Long since, your king Arius wrote to our own high priest, Onias, claiming kinship between us, as witness the copy here subjoined; an honourable welcome Onias gave to this messenger of yours, and accepted the proposal of friendly alliance. For ourselves, we have little need of such friendship; seek we comfort, it is in the sacred books committed to our charge. Yet we thought it best to treat with you for the renewal of this brotherly compact, before any estrangement should arise between us; your embassy to us is of long ago. Never feast-day passes, nor day apt for remembrance, but you are remembered, as brothers should be, in sacrifice and prayer we offer; renown of yours is pride of ours still. In wars and calamities much involved of late, powerful kings for our neighbours and our enemies, we would not embroil you, nor other allies of ours, in these quarrels. Now, by the grace of heaven, we are delivered; our enemies lie crushed; delegates of ours, Numenius son of Antiochus and Antipater son of Jason, are on their way to Rome, friendship and alliance of former days to confirm afresh; and should we send them with no errand to you, no greeting, no word from us of brotherhood revived? Pray you, send us fair answer in your turn. And, for Arius' letter to Onias, thus the copy of it ran, Arius, king of the Spartans, to the high priest Onias, greeting. Spartan and Jew, written record shews it, come of one blood, Abraham's. Apprised of this, we would fain know how you do; pray tell us. And take this message in return, Cattle and whatever else is ours, is yours, and yours ours; of that, the bearer of this letter brings you assurance.

¹ It is hardly possible to give any satisfactory account of the text as it stands. Even if we take 'beyond' as referring to the Jewish side of the Euphrates, why should an expedition into Syria bring Jonathan down to Ascalon, some forty miles west of Jerusalem? Conceivably there has been some disturbance in the text, which may have read originally, 'And he (Antiochus) began patrolling the cities across the river, with all the armies of Syria gathered to aid him; and Jonathan marched out and came to Ascalon. . . .'

Then came news to Jonathan that the chiefs of Demetrius' faction were returning to the attack, and in greater force than ever; so out he marched, and met them in the Amathite country; respite he would not give them, to invade his own. Spies of his went out into the enemy's camp, and reported, all was ready for a night attack; so, when the sun was down, Jonathan would have his men keep watch, ready armed all night for battle, and posted sentries round his lines. The enemy, hearing of such preparedness on their part, took alarm and let cowardly counsels prevail; they were at pains to leave watchfires burning in their camp, so that Jonathan and his men, deceived by the glow of light, knew nothing of their plans till morning; and when he gave chase, it was too late to catch them; already they had crossed the river Eleutherus. Thereupon he turned his attack against the Zabadeans, an Arabian tribe, defeating them and taking spoils from them; and so, harnessing his waggon, pressed on to Damascus, patrolling all the country round about. Meanwhile, Simon had marched out to Ascalon and the neighbouring strongholds; thence he turned aside to Joppe, and took possession of it; rumour had reached him, the townsfolk would yield the citadel to Demetrius' party, and he must have a garrison there of his own.

When Jonathan returned, he summoned the elders of the people, and took counsel with them, how best to raise strongholds in Judaea, and build up walls in Jerusalem itself. Height these must have, above all, between the Citadel and the rest of the town; he would have it cut off from the rest, standing by itself, with no opportunity to buy and sell. A great muster there was for the city's rebuilding; and where the wall had tumbled down, over the ravine on the east, he made it good; it is the part called Caphetetha. Meanwhile, Simon rebuilt Adiada in the Sephela and fortified it; bolt and bar it should have thenceforward.

And what of Tryphon? Lordship of all Asia he coveted, and a royal crown; it should be Antiochus' turn next. The danger was, Jonathan would refuse his assent, and resort to arms; Jonathan first he must seize and put to death. So he moved his quarters to Bethsan, where Jonathan came out to meet him with forty thousand men, picked warriors all of them, at his back. Here was a great retinue; and Tryphon, daunted by this show of force, was fain to give him an honourable welcome. He would admit Jonathan among his closest friends, and bestow gifts on him; let Jonathan give orders, and Tryphon's soldiers would obey. Then he asked, What needs it, such a host of men should go campaigning, when threat of war is none? It were better to disband them, and choose out a few for thy own retinue. That done, bear me company to Ptolemais; city and strongholds and troops and officers I will hand over into thy charge and so get me gone home; it was on that errand I came.

What did Jonathan? He fell into the trap, sent his men back to Juda, and kept but three thousand under arms; of these, he left two thousand in Galilee, and took but a thousand in his company. No sooner had he entered Ptolemais than the townsfolk shut the gates behind him, secured his person, and put his retinue to the sword.

¹ 'Let cowardly counsels prevail'; literally, 'were dismayed in their hearts', but the context shews that in fact they beat a retreat.

49 Horse and foot Tryphon sent out to Galilee, to find the rest of his followers in the 50 Great Plain, and make an end of them; but these, hearing that Jonathan and his men had been caught and murdered, resolved to put a bold front on it, and marched in 51 battle array. Finding them ready to sell their lives dearly, their pursuers abandoned the chase, and all reached Juda safe 52 and sound. For Jonathan and his companions they made great dole, and loudly 53 all Israel echoed their lament. Neighbouring people was none but went about to overthrow them, and no wonder; their chieftain, their champion gone, now was the time to fall upon them, and rid earth of their memory.

13 And what did Simon, when he heard that Tryphon had levied a strong force, for Juda's invasion and overthrow? Here was all the people in a great taking of fear; so he made his way to Jerusalem and there gathered them to meet 3 him. And thus, to put heart into them, he spoke: Need is none to tell you what battles we have fought, what dangers endured, I and my brethren and all my father's kin, 4 law and sanctuary to defend. In that cause, and for the love of Israel, my brothers have 5 died, one and all, till I only am left; never be it said of me, in the hour of peril I held 6 life dear, more precious than theirs! Nay, come the whole world against us, to glut its malice with our ruin, race and sanctuary, wives and children of ours shall find 7 me their champion yet. At these words, the spirit of the whole people revived; loud came their answer, Brother of Judas and 9 Jonathan, thine to lead us now! Thine to sustain our cause; and never word of thine shall go unheeded!

10 Thereupon, he summoned all the fighting men together, and pressed on to have the walls of Jerusalem finished, till it was fortified all about; and he sent Jonathan, son of Absalom, to Joppe, at the head of a force newly raised; the garrison was disbanded, and a new captain held it now.
12 Meanwhile, Tryphon had left Ptolemais, with a great army at his heels, marching on Juda; and with him went Jonathan, his prisoner. He found Simon encamped at 13 Addus, that looks out over the plain; here was Jonathan's brother Simon taking his place, and offering battle. Envoys were sent out to make his excuses: Hold we 15 the person of thy brother Jonathan, it is because he is in default to the royal treasury over his dealings with it. Thou hast but to 16 send a hundred talents of silver, and his two sons, to be surety he will not play us false when we release him, and he is a free man. Well Simon knew it was treacherously spoken; yet he gave orders, both money and hostages should be surrendered. A bitter grudge Israel's people would bear him, if they had cause to say, For want of money paid over and surety 18 given, Jonathan must die! Sent they were, the boys and the money both, but all was 19 treachery; Jonathan never came back.

And now Tryphon invaded Juda, bent 20 on its undoing; his troops must fetch a compass by the road that leads round to Ador, and, march they where they would, Simon and his army were at their heels. Word came to Tryphon from the defenders 21 of Jerusalem citadel, he should make his way across the desert without more ado, and bring them supplies; and that same night 22 he had all his cavalry in readiness for the march, but there was a great fall of snow, and come he might not. . . . into the country of Galaad.¹ When he reached Bascaman, 23 then and there he put Jonathan and his sons to death; and with that, he turned 24 about, and went back to his own country.

There lay the bones of Simon's brother 25 Jonathan, till he sent to fetch them, and gave them burial at Modin, the city of his fathers. Loud lament all Israel made for 26 him, and long they bemoaned him. Over the graves of his father and his brethren 27 Simon raised a towering monument, of dressed stone behind and before; then, 28 with father and mother and his four brethren in mind, he built seven pyramids, in rows; and all about were great columns, 29 carved with armour and ships; an abiding memorial, and a land mark to mariners at sea. Such was the tomb he raised at Modin, 30 and it may be seen to this day. Meanwhile, as they were journeying together, 31

¹ It seems clear from the context that some words have dropped out. The Greek text has, 'and come he might not, because of the snow. So he moved camp and went into the country of Galaad'. But the passage may originally have indicated what reasons Tryphon had for abandoning his campaign in Judaea.

32 Tryphon murdered the young king Antiochus by artifice, and succeeded to his throne, wearing the crown of all Asia; great mischief it was he did to his country.

33 All the fortresses of Judaea Simon repaired, building them up with high tower and stout wall, with bolt and bar; and never a garrison but had provisions laid up in store. Then he chose out envoys and sent them to king Demetrius, praying that the land might enjoy immunity after the tyrannous actions of Tryphon.¹ When king Demetrius answered the request, he wrote in these terms following. King Demetrius to the high priest Simon, the friend of kings, and to all the elders and people of the Jews, greeting. Crown of gold and robe of scarlet you sent us were faithfully delivered. Great favour we mean to shew you, by sending word to the king's officers to respect the remissions granted you. The decrees we made concerning you are yet in force; and, for the strongholds you have built, they shall be yours. Fault of yours in the past, witting or unwitting, is condoned; coronation tax you owed, and all other tribute that was due from Jerusalem, is due no longer. Fit be they for such enrolment, Jews shall be enrolled in our armies, and ever between us and you let there be peace!

41 Thus, in the hundred and seventieth year, Israel was free of the Gentile yoke at last; and this style the people began to use, were it private bond or public instrument they indited, In the first year of Simon's high priesthood, chief paramount and governor of the Jews.

43 Then it was that Simon marched on Gaza,² and beleaguered it with his army; built engines, and forced an entry into one of the towers. Out into the streets they sallied, that manned the engine, and there was a fine commotion in the city; here were the townsmen, with their wives and children, mounting the walls with their garments rent about them, and crying aloud, 46 Simon should give them quarter; great were their fault, greater still his clemency! 47 At that, Simon relented; harry them to the death he would not, but he drove them out of the city, and cleansed all the houses where idols had stood; then, with singing of psalms and giving of thanks, he made his entry; and now all defilement must be put away, and such citizens it must have as did what the law commanded. After that, he fortified it, and made his own dwelling there.

And what of the Gentiles that were left in Jerusalem citadel? Enter Jewish territory or leave it they might not, buy or sell they might not, so that they were hard put to it for food, and many died of famine. At last they cried out to Simon, he should give them quarter, and give them quarter he did, but drove them out, and cleansed the citadel of its pollution. On the twenty-third day of the second month, in the hundred and seventy-first year, in came the Jewish folk singing praise and bearing palm-branches, with music of harp, and cymbals, and zither, and chanting of psalms; of such ill neighbours Israel was now rid. Every year, Simon proclaimed, holiday should be kept at this time; and he fortified that part of the temple mountain which was close by the citadel; here he dwelt, and his followers with him. And now here was his son John grown into a brave warrior; him Simon put at the head of the whole army, with his quarters at Gazara.

14 The year following, what must Demetrius do but muster his army and betake himself to Media, where he would raise levies for the war against Tryphon? When Arsaces, king of the Medes and Persians, had news of it, he gave orders to one of his chieftains, the invader must be taken alive and brought into his presence. The order was obeyed; the Syrian king, routed and captured, was brought before Arsaces, who put him safely in prison.

Thus, during Simon's days, the whole land of Juda was at peace. Ever his people's good sought he, and ever by willing hearts was obeyed and honoured. With great state he took possession of Joppe as a harbour,¹ and so found access to the islands out at sea. How wide spread he the frontiers of Israel, how firmly held its possessions, captured how many of its foes! Gazara and Bethsura he won, ay, and the Citadel itself, ridding it of all defilement; there was no resisting his power. In his day, every man farmed his own lands in security, soil of Juda yielded its crops, and the trees their fruit; sat old men in the market-place, busy over the common weal, and young men wore the livery of their glorious campaigning. Never a city but he furnished it with store of provisions; a bulwark each of them should be of sturdy defence. What wonder if the story of his renown was noised to the world's end?

¹ 'After the tyrannous actions of Tryphon'; literally (in the Greek text), 'because all the actions of Tryphon were seizures'. The meaning is perhaps that Simon now recognized all the actions of Tryphon as usurpations of power; it is evident from what follows that he was not sure of his position; had the Jews, by their support of a pretender, forfeited the privileges granted in 11. 33-37? ² Josephus is perhaps right in reading 'Gazara' (less than twenty miles from Jerusalem) instead of 'Gaza'; cf.

14. 7.

Such peaceful times brought he to his country, when all Israel kept high holiday, every man with his own vine and fig-tree for shade, and enemy was none to daunt them; domestic malice undone, foreign tyranny shattered all around! Among his own folk, what comfort he gave the friendless, how scrutinized the law, what short work made of traitor and malcontent; how adorned the sanctuary, how increased the number of its treasures!

To Rome, to Sparta itself, came tidings of Jonathan's death, and was heard right sorrowfully. When they learned that his brother Simon had been made high priest instead, master now of the land and all its cities, they wrote to him on tablets made of bronze, to renew the treaty of friendship they had with his brethren, Judas and Jonathan, before him;² and their letters were read out before the whole assembly at Jerusalem. The Spartans wrote in these words following: The rulers and commonalty of Sparta, to the high priest Simon, the elders and priests and all the people of the Jews, greeting. Welcome news your ambassadors have brought us, of fame and credit and prosperity you enjoy. And their errand stands recorded in our public annals; how Numenius son of Antiochus and Antipater son of Jason came on the Jews' part to renew our old treaty of friendship with you; how the people resolved to give them fair greeting, and to lay up a copy of their report in the public archives, that should preserve the memory of it among the Spartan people; and how an account of all this was sent to the high priest Simon.

Numenius was sent on a further mission to Rome, bearing a great target of gold, a thousand minas in weight, to renew the alliance there. And when all this reached the ears of the people. . . .³

. . . Men began to ask, how they could shew their gratitude to Simon, and to his sons? Here was one that had restored the fortunes of his race, and rid Israel of its foes. So they gave him exemption from public burdens, and inscribed their decree on tablets of bronze, fastened to pillars which were set up on mount Sion.

And thus the inscription ran: On this eighteenth day of Elul, in the hundred and seventy-second year of the Greek empire, the third of Simon's high priesthood, there was a high assembly held at Saramel⁴ of priests and people, clan-chiefs and elders of the whole nation, that had before them these considerations following. All through the long wars of our country, Simon and his brethren, sons of Matathias, of Jarib's clan, put their lives in peril, and fought for law and sanctuary against the common enemy, much glory winning for their own nation. When Jonathan, that had rallied the people and been their high priest, became a part of his race, enemies thought to invade the country and crush the power of it, violate its holy places; and Simon it was withstood them. Champion of his people's cause, much he spent to arm its warriors, and furnish them with pay. Juda's cities he fortified, and others besides; Bethsura on the frontiers, ¹ This is perhaps the best interpretation of a difficult phrase, 'With all his glory he received Joppe to be a harbour'. For the language used, cf. 10. 58, II Mac. 5. 20. Joppe had been captured by Jonathan (10. 76), and remained at least nominally in Jewish possession (12. 33; 13. 11); Simon's achievement, according to verse 34 below, was to fortify it. ² The implication appears to be that both Rome and Sparta sent answers in the manner described. ³ v. 24. It would be natural to assume that the end of this verse refers to the Roman people; and the Clementine Vulgate, without any manuscript authority, actually inserts the word 'Roman'. But the proceedings of verses 25 sqq. are evidently those of the Jewish people. There is a want of sequence in the narrative as it stands, and it seems possible that verses 15-24 of chapter 15 originally stood here, and were accidentally misplaced; if so, 'all this' will refer to the Roman dispatches. ⁴ This name is not found elsewhere, and probably conceals some error in the text.

once a stronghold of the enemy, garrisoned now by Jews, Joppe on the sea-coast, and Gazara in the Azotus region; Gazara, too, once hostile, with Jewish troops manned he, and in each town made provision for repairs to be done.

The people, seeing him so loyal a lover of his country's renown, made him their ruler and high priest; no less was due to such exploits, public service so faithfully done, such constant ambition for his people's honour. In his days it was, and by his means, the land was rid at last of Gentile intruders; not least the garrison of David's own Keep at Jerusalem, that by their sallying out profaned the sacred precincts, and much defiled their purity; a Jewish garrison he set there, to guard both city and country-side, and built Jerusalem walls yet higher. High priesthood of his, king Demetrius must needs acknowledge, bestowing on him the title of king's friend, and loading him with honours. What could he do else? Here was Rome itself greeting the Jewish folk as allies, good friends, and kinsmen, welcoming the envoys of Simon with civic state. Here were the Jews, priests and people both, agreed that he should rule them, granting him the high priesthood¹ by right inalienable, until true prophet they should have once more. Their ruler he should be, and guardian of their temple; appoint officer and magistrate, master of ordnance and captain of garrison, and have charge of the sanctuary besides. Him all must obey, in his name deeds be drawn up, all the country through; of purple and gold should be his vesture. Of the rest, both priests and people, none should retrench these privileges, nor gainsay Simon's will, nor convoke assembly in the country without him; garment of purple, buckle of gold none should wear; nor any man defy or void this edict, but at his peril.

The people's pleasure it was to ennoble Simon after this sort; and Simon, he would not say them nay; high priest, and of priests and people leader, governor and champion, he would be henceforward. So they had the decree inscribed on tablets of bronze, and set up plain to view in the temple precincts; and a copy of it they put by in the treasury, in the safe keeping of Simon and his heirs.²

15 Now turn we to Demetrius' other son, Antiochus.³ He it was directed a letter, from the islands over sea, to Simon, high priest and ruler of the Jews, and to the whole nation; and this was the tenour of it. King Antiochus, to the high priest Simon and to the people of the Jews, greeting. Here is the kingdom of my fathers overrun by ill folk; I mean to challenge them, and bring back the old ways. To this end, I have made a great levy of mercenaries, and built ships of war; passage I needs must have through yonder territory, ere I can take vengeance for lands of mine ravaged, cities of mine laid waste. This grant, then, I make thee; exemption, such as thou hadst, in the name of former kings, from public offerings and all other payment due to me; the right of minting money within thy own borders; for Jerusalem, enjoyment of her sacred liberties; of weapons thou hast made, strongholds thou hast built, the undisturbed possession. Never a claim the king has, or shall have hereafter, on his subjects, but to thee it is remitted; and, when the kingdom is ours, such honours we will bestow as shall make thee, and thy race, and its sanctuary, renowned all the world over.

So, in the hundred and seventy-fourth year, Antiochus returned to his native country, and the armies rallied to him, until Tryphon had but a small following left; all down the sea-coast he fled, with Antiochus at his heels, till he reached Dora; and ever he saw the toils closing round him, now his troops had played him false. With a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, Antiochus came to the gates of Dora and began the siege of it; his ships, too, blockaded the coast, so that it was cut off by land and sea alike; enter it none might, nor leave it. . .

And now here were Numenius and his fellow envoys come back from Rome,⁴ with a copy of despatches sent out to kings and nations everywhere, and this was the tenour of them. Lucius, the Roman consul, to king Ptolemy, greeting. Envoys we have but now received in audience from a friendly country, to wit, Judaea; the people of the Jews, with their high priest Simon, had sent to renew their old treaty of alliance with us, and had made us a present besides, a golden target of a thousand minas weight. Agreed we then to warn kings and nations everywhere, they should not hurt or assault the Jewish people, its cities and country-side, nor comfort its enemies; and for the target of gold, our pleasure was to accept the gift of it. If then there be malcontents from Judaea sheltering among you, our bidding is you should hand them over to the high priest Simon, for such punishment as the Jewish law prescribes. Copies of this decree have been sent to Demetrius, Attalus, Ariarathes and Arsaces, and to these countries following: Lamp-sacus, Sparta, Delos, Myndos, Sicyon, Caria, Samos, Pamphylia, Lycia, Halicarnassus, Coös, Side, Arados, Rhodes, Phaselis, Gortyna, Cnidus, Cyprus and Cyrene. A further copy has been sent to the high priest Simon and to the Jewish people. . .

¹ The Machabean high priesthood seems to have been regarded as an emergency dispensation. For the mention of the prophet, cf. 4. 46. ² vv. 45-49. We should perhaps take these verses as part of the decree itself; otherwise verse 48 seems a needless repetition of verse 26. ³ Antiochus was son to the Demetrius whose death is recorded in 10. 50, brother to the Demetrius first mentioned in 10. 67. ⁴ vv. 15-24. See note on 14. 24.

Once again¹ king Antiochus laid siege to Dora, bringing fresh force to bear, and devising fresh engines; and ever he kept Tryphon hemmed in, so that escape was none. Thereupon Simon despatched two thousand picked men to aid in the siege, with silver and gold and a deal of tackle besides; but accept them the king would not; all his promises were forgot, and Simon a stranger now. Athenobius it was, one of the king's friends, that came to treat with him, and this was the message he bore: Cities of mine you hold, Joppe, and Gazara, and Jerusalem citadel; lands about them you have laid waste, and done Syria much mischief besides, encroaching everywhere on my domain. Needs must you should hand over cities you have occupied, revenues of Gentile lands you have detained, or else five hundred talents of silver in exchange, and five hundred more to compensate for damage done and revenue lost; if not, we will come and overpower you by force of arms.

So came Athenobius, the king's friend, to Jerusalem, where he saw what state Simon kept, much display of gold and silver, and a great throng of attendants, till he was dazzled at the sight. Yet delivered he his errand; to which Simon made this answer: Other men's fief seized we never, nor other men's rights detain; here be lands that were our fathers' once, by enemies of ours for some while wrongfully held; opportunity given us, should we not claim the patrimony we had lost? As for thy talk of Joppe and Gazara, these were cities did much mischief to people and land of ours; for the worth of them, thou shalt have a hundred talents if thou wilt. Never a word said Athenobius, but went back to the king very ill pleased, and told him what answer was given; of Simon's court, too, and of all else he had seen.

Antiochus was in a great taking of anger; here was Tryphon newly escaped by ship to Orthosias! He must needs leave the sea-coast in charge of Cendebaeus, with a strong command both of horse and foot, while himself gave Tryphon chase. This Cendebaeus had orders to advance and threaten Judaea; Gedor² he should fortify, and there make himself fast, the better to levy war on Juda. So he marched away to Jamnia, and set about harassing the Jews; now it was an inroad, with prisoners carried away, now a massacre; and all the while he was fortifying Gedor. Cavalry he quartered there, and other troops besides, to sally out and patrol the roads into Judaea; the king would have it so.

16 It was not long before John came up from Gazara, to tell his father Simon how ill Cendebaeus was using their fellow-countrymen. And at that, Simon must have his two elder sons present, Judas and John both, and made the command over to them. Still young we were, he said, I and my brothers and my father's kin, when we began that war on Israel's enemies which is being fought yet; under our banners once and again came victory, and the day was saved for Israel. I am an old man now, and it is yours to do what I and brother of mine did; march out, fight in our people's cause, and heaven's aid be with you!

¹ Some Greek manuscripts have 'on the second day', instead of 'once again', but this is probably a correction, designed to clear up a difficulty. Nothing has been said which implies that the siege described in verse 14 had come to an end; and it is not easy to account for the mention of a second siege, unless we suppose a gap in the manuscript which has been accidentally filled up by verses 15-24. ² 'Gedor' is 'Cedron' in the Greek text, here and in verse 40 below, to correspond with verse 9 of the following chapter.

20 Twenty thousand warriors John¹ chose out from the rest, and cavalry to support them, and away they went to fight Cendebaeus. That night they spent at Modin, and on the morrow, when they left it for the valley, what a huge array was this, both of horse and foot, encountering them! And a mountain torrent flowed in between.

21 When John brought his army to the opposite bank, and found his men had little stomach for the crossing, he made the passage first, leaving the rest to follow at his heels; then drew them up by companies, with the cavalry in between, so greatly did the enemy's cavalry outnumber them. And now the sacred trumpets sounded the charge; fled Cendebaeus, fled his army at their onslaught, and many were left dead on the field; for the rest, they were fain to take refuge behind their walls again. John went in pursuit, for all his brother Judas had been wounded in the battle, and chased them as far as the walls of Cedron . . . which he had fortified.² Nor might they find shelter in the strongholds of the Azotus territory; he burnt these to the ground; a toll of two thousand men he had taken before he returned victorious to Judaea.

22 Turn we now to Ptolemy, son of Abobus, that was in charge of all Jericho plain, and had a purse well lined with silver and gold; was he not the son-in-law of a high priest?³ But higher still his ambition ran; he would make himself master of the whole country; murder he plotted for Simon and his sons together. It was in Sabbath, the eleventh month, of the hundred and seventy-seventh year, that Simon came down to Jericho, as ever he visited all the cities of Judaea in his great care for them; and his sons Mattathias and Judas went with him. And there, in a castle he had built for himself, Doch is the name of it, the son of Abobus gave them treacherous welcome. A great feast he made, but he had men waiting in readiness, and with these, when Simon and his sons had drunk deep, he took arms, broke into the banquetting-chamber, and slew both father and sons, with certain of their retinue. Never saw Israel so treacherous a deed, or good service so ill rewarded.

News of all this was sent by Ptolemy to the king, and in writing; his plea was, an army should be sent out in support of him, and the country, with all its cities and all the tribute that came from them, given into his charge. Others of his men he despatched to Gazara; John must be put to death, he wrote, and for the captains, they should have silver and gold and good recompense, would they but rally to his side; others again were to take possession of Jerusalem, and of the temple hill. But too late; a messenger had reached John at Gazara, telling him his father and brothers were dead, and himself too marked down for slaughter; whereupon he took alarm in good earnest; their murderous errand known, he seized his executioners and made an end of them.

What else John did, and how fought he, brave deeds done, and strong walls built, and all his history, you may read in the annals of his time, that were kept faithfully since the day when he succeeded his father as high priest.

¹ The name John is not mentioned in the original, either here or in verses 6 and 7 below. But it is plain that either John or Judas is meant, and 13. 54 seems to give the best grounds for a decision.

² v. 9. It is grammatically impossible to make Cendebaeus the subject of the verb 'he had fortified', as the sentence stands. It seems likely that there is some slight error or omission in the manuscripts.

³ 'Of a high priest'; Josephus understands this as referring to Simon himself. But it does not seem likely that the author should have suppressed his name in verse 12, only to mention it in verse 13; nor does he mention the circumstances of affinity as adding to the heinousness of the crime (cf. verse 17). Possibly some other name has dropped out, e.g. that of Alcimus.

THE SECOND BOOK OF MACHABEES

TO their brethren, the Jews of Egypt, those of Jerusalem and Judaea send brotherly greeting and good health.¹ God speed you well, the covenant he made with his true worshippers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, never forgetting; reverent hearts may he give to all of you, brave and generous to perform his will; with law and precept of his enlarge your thoughts, and send you happiness; may he listen to your prayer, and be gracious, and in the hour of peril never forsake you! Take courage, then; we in this land are praying for you. Time was, in the hundred and sixty-ninth year, when Demetrius was a-reigning, we ourselves were writing to you in the midst of suffering and alarms. Much had we to undergo, when Jason would betray his own country, his own people; here was the gateway burnt to the ground, here were innocent lives forfeited. Cried we upon the Lord, and all our prayers were answered; burnt-sacrifice and bloodless offering were made, lamps lighted, and loaves set forth in the temple as of old!

Look to it, then, you make bowers and keep holiday in this month of Casleu.² Written in the hundred and eighty-eighth year.

The common folk of Jerusalem and Judaea,³ their council of elders, and I, Judas, to Aristobulus, of the anointed priestly race, that was master of king Ptolemy, and to the Jews of Egypt, greeting and health. Great thanks we owe to God, that from the extreme of peril has delivered us; ay, though we had such a king for our adversary, as could bring in hordes of men from Persia, both us and our holy city to subdue.⁴

What became of him, think you, the general that marched away into Persia with a countless army at his heels?⁵ He met his end in the temple of Nanea, through guile of the priests that served it. Thither Antiochus had come with his friends, putting it about that he would wed the goddess, and laying claim to a great part of her treasures under the title of dowry. The priests, then, had the money laid out in readiness; into the precincts he came, with a meagre retinue, and they, now that Antiochus was within, shut the temple gates. Thereupon, letting themselves in by their secret door, they killed the general and his company with throwing of stones, cut them limb from limb, and threw them down headless to the populace without. Blessed, upon every account, be this God of ours, that denies protection to the sinner! We, then, on this twenty-fifth day of Casleu, mean to solemnize the purification of the temple, and hold ourselves bound to notify you of it, so that you too may keep holiday, with making of bowers. . . .

. . . And of the fire imparted to us, when Nehemias offered sacrifice at the rebuilding of temple and altar.⁶ Long ago, 19

¹ vv. 1-9. The first, it would seem, of a series of fragments prefixed to the book proper. If the date given at the end belongs to it, it must have been written about the year 125 before Christ, after the death of Simon.

² Here and in verse 18 the feast alluded to is not the feast of Tent-dwelling (Lev. 23. 34), but that of the Dedication (I Mac. 4. 59, Jn. 10. 22) at which it appears that the same ceremonies were used.

³ vv. 10-18. The date mentioned in verse 10 probably belongs to the earlier fragment, since the ancients usually dated their letters at the end, cf. 11. 21, 33, 38 below. If so, this second fragment, undated, will have been written by Judas Machabaeus to Aristobulus, tutor of the Egyptian king Ptolemy Philometor, some forty years earlier than verses 1-9.

⁴ vv. 11, 12. The Latin here seems designed to make sense of a passage untranslatable, and probably corrupt, in the Greek text.

⁵ vv. 13-16. If Antiochus Epiphanes is meant, the description of him as 'the general' is highly suspicious. It seems possible that no name was mentioned in the original, and that the word 'Antiochus' was twice introduced by a copyist, mistakenly anxious to identify the unnamed figure. If so, the fate we are concerned with is that of some general in command of Antiochus's army; his own is described, quite differently, in 9. 5 below.

⁶ The Latin makes a single sentence of the whole verse, but by dint of concealing what is evidently a gap in the Greek text. The end of the second fragment seems to have been lost; and also the beginning of this third fragment, which occupies the rest of the chapter. The when our fathers were being carried off into the Persian country, such priests of the true God as held office in those days took away the fire from the altar, and hid it down in the valley, in a pit both deep and dry, so well guarding their secret that none might know where it was to be found.

10 Years passed, and God's will was that Nehemias should come back, holding the Persian king's warrant. Nehemias it was that had search made for the fire, and by the grandsons of those very priests that hid it; but they made report, fire they could find none, only a puddle of water.¹

21 And what did Nehemias? He would have some of the water drawn and fetched to him; with this water, once the sacrifice was laid on the altar, both the wood and the offerings themselves must be sprinkled.

22 Sprinkled they were, and when the sun shone out, that till now was hidden by a cloud, all at once a great fire blazed up, astonishing the beholders.

23 To prayer fell the priests all around, while sacrifice was done, Jonathan to lead

24 them,² and the rest answering; to prayer fell Nehemias, and this was the manner of his praying: Lord God, that all things madest, the terrible, the strong, the just, the merciful, King gracious as none else;

25 none else so kindly, none else so just, as thou, the almighty, the eternal! Israel from all peril thou deliverest, thou didst make choice of our fathers, and set them

26 apart for thyself. For the whole nation of Israel receive our sacrifice; all are thine; thy 27 own domain keep inviolate. Bring home the exiles; captives of the heathen conquer or set free; to the despised, the outcast grant redress; let the world know what a God is 28 ours! Crush the oppressor, the tyrant that so mishandles us, and to thy own sanctuary, as Moses foretold, thy own people restore!

identity of Nehemias seems doubtful; the well-known governor of that name restored the walls of Jerusalem nearly a century after the rebuilding of the Temple. But a Nehemias is mentioned in I Esd. 2. 2, Neh. 7. 7, among the exiles who returned with Zorobabel. The description 'Nehemias the priest' in verse 21 is probably due to an error in our present Latin text.

¹ The 'fire' hidden in the pit was presumably a smouldering log, such as might be buried away at night to be re-lit in the morning. The 'puddle of water' (literally, 'thick water') found on the site was evidently something different, and there is no reason to think that its properties, natural or supernatural, belonged to the 'fire' originally deposited there. ² Jonathan was not the high priest, but the leader of a course of priests (Neh. 12. 14).

³ vv. 31, 32. The Greek text here is very doubtful, and perhaps indicates, not that the water was poured out on stones, but that stones were used to block up the hidden pool. ⁴ In the Greek text, no mention is made of the priests; the Persian king exchanged gifts with his favourites, by way of celebrating the event (cf. Apoc. 11. 10).

⁵ vv. 1-19. These verses seem to be a continuation of the third fragment preserved in the foregoing chapter. Nothing in the prophecy of Jeremias, as we have it, relates the circumstances here mentioned, although verse 2 is possibly a reference to Bar. 6.

⁶ Some of the actions described by the Hebrew prophets may have taken place only in a vision, not in actual life, cf. e.g. Jer. 13. 1-7. The mountain is no doubt Phasga (Deut. 34).

Then, till the sacrifice was consumed, the priests went on with their singing of hymns; and when all was finished, Nehemias would have them drench great stones with the water that was left. Thereupon, a flame broke out from them, but died away when the altar fires blazed up again over yonder.³ The news travelled, till the Persian king himself was told how water appeared where exiled priests had hidden the fire, how, with this water, Nehemias and his company had bathed the sacrifice. Good heed he gave to the matter, and after due examination fenced the ground in with a shrine, in witness of what befell there. Largesse the priests had, and many were the gifts passed from hand to hand, when the truth of the matter was proved.⁴ As for the place, Nehemias himself called it Nephthar, which means Purification; but the vulgar call it Nephi.

2 You shall also find it set down in the dispositions made by the prophet Jeremias, that he bade the exiles rescue the sacred fire, in the manner aforesaid.⁵ Strict charge he gave them, the Lord's commandments they should keep ever in mind, nor let false gods, all gold and silver and fine array, steal away their hearts; with much else to confirm them in their regard for the law. And here, in this same document, the story was told, how a divine oracle came to Jeremias, and he must needs go out, with tabernacle and ark to bear him company, to the very mountain Moses climbed long ago, when he had sight of God's domain.⁶ A cave Jeremias found there, in which he set down tabernacle and ark and incense-altar, and stopped up the entrance behind him. There were some that followed; no time they lost in coming up to mark the spot, but find it they could not. He, when they told him of it, rebuked their eagerness; Nay, said he, the place must remain ever unknown, till the day when God brings his people together once more, and is reconciled; then, divinely, the secret shall be made manifest. Then once again the Lord's majesty shall be seen, and the cloud that enshrines it; the same vision that was granted to Moses, and to Solomon when he prayed that the great God would have his temple on earth; Solomon, the master of wisdom, that in his wisdom offered sacrifice to hallow the temple he had made.

Prayed Moses, prayed Solomon, and fire came down from heaven to consume the burnt-sacrifice. . . .

. . . Uneaten, Moses said, the victim for fault, and so the fire must consume it. . . .

. . . No other mind had king Solomon, that for eight days would continue his dedication feast.¹

With all this, dispositions Nehemias made, records Nehemias kept, are in full agreement. He it was founded a library, and there collected histories of king and prophet, and of David himself; dispatches, too, the kings had sent, and inventories of gifts made. And now Judas in his turn has recovered all such records as were lost to us through the late wars, and they are here in our keeping; would you be in possession of these, you have but to send and fetch them.

Meanwhile, we notify you by these presents of that cleansing ceremony we mean to perform; do us the courtesy to keep holiday on your part. See what deliverance God has sent to his people, restoring to us our common domain, our sovereignty, our priesthood, our temple's sanctity! Think you not he will fulfil, ere long, the promise made in his law; take pity on us, that are scattered wide as heaven, and on this hallowed soil reunite us? What meant they else, those great perils overcome, that sanctuary purified at last? . . .

Speak we of Judas Machabaeus and his brethren, and how the great temple was purified, and the altar hallowed anew;² the battles they fought against Antiochus, called the Illustrious, and Eupator, that was his son. Speak we of heavenly manifestations, sent to encourage the champions of Jewry, till at last, though so few, they won back their country, and put the hordes of heathendom to flight. Speak we of that temple, the most famous in all the world, by their means recovered, of a city set free, of forgotten laws re-established, and how the Lord, in his great complaisance, shewed them mercy. All this, the argument of five books Jason of Cyrene wrote, we have been at pains to abridge within the compass of a single volume.

What would you? There be books many, and they are hard put to it that would trace the course of history, for the abundance of the matter therein comprised. And my aim was, if a man would read, read he should and with relish; would a man study, without great ado he should be able to commit all to memory; and so I would serve every man's turn. But for me, that undertook the business of abridgement, think you it was light labour? Nay, here was a task all watching and sweat; yet shoulder the burden I would; host that prepares a banquet must work for other men's pleasure, and earn nothing but their thanks. Full information would you have about this or that, I remit you to my author; for myself, I will be true to my own pattern of shortness. When a house is first in building, the architect must needs bestow pains on every part of it; not such the painter's care, he will pick out the surfaces that are most apt for adornment. And so, methinks, it is here; to expatiate to digress, to indulge curiosity on every point, is for the arch-historian; your epitomist will ask leave to study brevity, and let long disquisitions be. And now, to our matter! Here is preface enough; it were ill done to draw out the preamble, and leave our story cramped for room.

¹ vv. 10-12. It is difficult to make any continuous sense out of these verses as they have come down to us, and it seems possible that a considerable portion of the letter has here been lost. The missing part might have explained what was the relevance of this long excursion into past history, which has no immediate bearing on Judas and the re-dedication of the temple.

² vv. 20-33. The book proper begins with this preamble, in which the author is concerned, not to shift the responsibility for his statements on to Jason of Cyrene, but to justify himself in selecting certain incidents for recital, and omitting the rest. The exact sense of the Latin is hard to determine; it is here interpreted in conformity with the Greek text.

3 Time was, the holy city was a home of content; ever the laws of it were well kept; such a high priest they had, Onias, a devout man, and one that hated evil. In those days, king and chieftain held the place much in reverence, and with rich gifts endowed the temple; did not Seleucus, king of Asia, defray all the cost of maintaining its sacrifices? Yet one citizen there was, Simon the Benjamite, the temple governor, that had lawless schemes afoot, do the high priest what he would to gainsay him. And at last, when overcome Onias he might not, what did he? To Apollonius he betook himself, the son of Tharseas, that was then in charge of Coelesyria and Phoenice, and gave him great news indeed; here was the treasury at Jerusalem stocked with treasures innumerable, here was vast public wealth, unclaimed by the needs of the altar, and nothing prevented but it should fall into the king's hands.

7 No sooner did Apollonius find himself in the royal presence than he told the story of the rumoured treasure; and at that, the king sent for Heliodorus, that had charge of his affairs, and despatched him with orders to fetch the said money away. This Heliodorus set out on his journey without more ado, under colour of making a progress through the towns of Coelesyria and Phoenice, but with the king's business still in mind. And when he reached Jerusalem, and there received a gracious welcome from the high priest, he made no secret of the information he possessed, or of his errand, and he would know the truth about these moneys. A plain account the high priest gave him; some were moneys deposited on trust, for the maintenance of widows and orphans; there were some, too, belonging to Hyrcanus son of Tobias, a man of repute. The information was maliciously laid, nor did the whole sum amount to more than four hundred talents of silver, and two hundred of gold. Men had reposed their confidence in a city and a temple renowned throughout the world, for the high opinion they had of its sanctity; and should he play them false? It was not to be thought of. But Heliodorus stood upon the terms of his commission; delivered to the king the money must be, there was no other way of it.

So the appointed day came, when he would visit the temple and take order in the matter; what a stir there was then in the city! Priests, in their sacred vesture, cast themselves down before the altar, and cried out upon heaven; would not he, whose law enjoined safe-keeping, keep property safe for its rightful owners? And for the high priest himself, the very aspect of him was heart-rending; such a change of look and colour betrayed his inward feelings; grief and horror were stamped on his features, and to all that saw him he seemed a broken man. Folk streamed out of their houses in droves, to make public intercession over the affront that should be put on the holy place; sackcloth about their waists, the women thronged the streets, and maids that might not go abroad must yet run to the housetops, or peer out at windows, to see Onias pass. Heavenward they raised their hands, each one of them, in prayer; and pity it was to see how common folk about him were sharing the high priest's agony of suspense.

Here, then, was a whole city praying Almighty God, no loss might befall the men who had trusted them; and here was Heliodorus carrying out his design, already arrived at the treasury with his body-guard in attendance. All at once the spirit of God, the omnipotent, gave signal proof of its presence; daunted by the divine power they trembled and stood irresolute, these ministers of wrong. What saw they? A horse, royally caparisoned, that charged upon Heliodorus and struck him down with its fore-feet; terrible of aspect its rider was, and his armour seemed all of gold. Two other warriors they saw, how strong of limb, how dazzling of mien, how bravely clad! These stood about Heliodorus and fell to scourging him, this side and that, blow after blow, without respite. With the suddenness of his fall to the ground, darkness had closed about him; hastily they caught him up and carried him out in his litter; a helpless burden now, that entered yonder treasury with such a rabble of tipstaves and halberdiers! Here was proof of God's power most manifest. There he lay, by heaven's decree speechless and beyond hope of recovery; and all around men were praising the Lord, for thus vindicating the honour of his sancuary. In the temple, where all had been anxiety and turmoil until heaven showed its almighty power, all was rejoicing and contentment now.

11 It was not long before friends of Heliodorus were entreating Onias to call down mercy from the most High, on one that 12 was now at death's door. This was anxious news for the high priest; what if the king should suspect the Jews of foul play? Offer sacrifice he did for the man's recovery, and with good effect. He was yet at his prayers, when those two warriors, in the same brave attire, stood by Heliodorus again; Thanks thou owest, they said, to the high priest Onias; at his instance, the Lord grants thee life; God's scourge thou hast felt, God's wondrous power be ever on thy lips. And with that, they were seen no more. Be sure this Heliodorus offered God sacrifice; ay, and made vows a many for his preservation, and thanked Onias besides; then he marched his army back to the king.
6 Everywhere he testified how great a God was this, what strange things his own eyes had witnessed; and when the king himself asked what manner of emissary he should 8 next send to Jerusalem, Why, said he, some enemy of thine, some rebel that plots against the kingdom. Escape he with his life, I warrant he will come back to thee soundly beaten. Past doubt, there is some divine influence haunts yonder place; 9 watch and ward he keeps over it, that has his dwelling in heaven, to be the plague and the undoing of all who come that way upon an errand of mischief.
10 Such is the tale of Heliodorus, and of the treasury's preserving.

4 And now, what must Simon do, the same that had drawn men's eyes to his country with stories of treasure, but fall to slandering Onias? Onias it was, by his way of it, had egged Heliodorus on,¹ and been the author of the mischief. So true a patriot, that well loved his race, well guarded the divine law, and he must be branded 3 with the name of traitor! The feud grew worse, till at last there were murders done, and Simon's faction answerable for it. Here was the public peace much endangered; here was Apollonius, the governor of Coelesyria and Phoenice, adding fuel to the flame of Simon's malice;² what marvel if Onias had recourse to the king? Little enough it liked him to bring an ill name on his fellow-citizens; yet common good of the Jewish folk he must needs have in mind; how should quiet times return, or Simon's madness be cooled, unless the king took order in the matter?

But king Seleucus was done with life now, and the throne passed to Antiochus, called the Illustrious. And here was a brother Onias had, called Jason, that coveted the office of high priest. This Jason went to the new king, and made him an offer of three hundred and sixty talents of silver out of its revenue, besides eighty from other incomings. Let leave be granted him to set up a game-place for the training of youth, and enrol the men of Jerusalem as citizens of Antioch, he would give his bond for a hundred and fifty more. To this the king assented; high priest he became, and straightway set about perverting his fellow-countrymen to the Gentile way of living. Till now, the Jews had followed their own customs, by grace of a royal privilege; it was John that won it for them, father of that Eupolemus, who afterwards went in embassy to Rome, to make a treaty of alliance. But Jason would abrogate these customs; common right should be none, and great wrong should find acceptance instead. This game-place of his he did not scruple to set up in the very shadow of the Citadel, and debauch³ all that was noblest of Judaea's youth.

Mischief in the bud, think you, when such alien Gentile ways came in? Nay, here was flower and fruit of it; and all through the unexampled villainy of one man, this Jason, that high priest was none, but rather an arch-traitor. Why, the priests themselves had no more stomach for serving the altar; temple scorned, and

¹ 'Egged Heliodorus on'; some think the word used in the Greek has a quite different meaning from the usual, and that Onias was accused of having attacked Heliodorus with violence (cf. 3. 32).
² v. 4. 'Adding fuel to the flame of Simon's malice'; literally, 'raving to increase Simon's malice', but this curious phrase is probably due to a copyist's mistake.
³ 'Debauch'; the Latin says he exposed them in brothels, but the obscure phrase used in the Greek, 'he brought them under the bat' is usually interpreted as meaning that he encouraged them to wear the broad-brimmed Greek petasus as a symbol of devotion to Hermes, the patron deity of athletics.

sacrifice unheeded, off they went to the wrestling-ground, there to enter their names and win unhallowed prizes, soon as 15 ever the first quoit was thrown! What glory their fathers had handed down to them! And fame such as the Greeks covet 16 was all their ambition now. Alas, here was a perilous contest awaiting them; Greek fashions they would follow, and Greeks would be, that ere long should have Greeks for their enemies, ay, and conquerors.
 17 There is no breaking God's laws without paying the price; time will show that.
 18 When the quinquennial games were being 19 held at Tyre, in the king's presence, this vile Jason it was sent some of his wretches¹ with a gift of three hundred silver pieces to do honour to Hercules. True it is, the bearers of them asked they should not be spent on sacrifice, but on some other need 20 that was more befitting; yet Jason's meaning was, Hercules should have them, and if they went to the building of the fleet, it was thanks to Jason's envoys.

21 Afterwards, Apollonius the son of Menestheus was despatched to Egypt, for the enthroning of king Ptolemy Philometor. Well Antiochus knew that he was disaffected towards the royal policy, and there was his own safety to be considered. . . He passed on to Joppe, and so to Jerusalem,² 22 where Jason and the whole city welcomed him in state, with carrying of torches and great huzzas'ing. And so he led his army back to Phenice.

23 Three years later, Jason would send to the king certain moneys, together with a report on affairs of moment; and for this errand he chose Menelaus, brother to that 24 Simon we have before mentioned. Access thus gained to the king's person, Menelaus was careful to flatter his self-conceit; then, outbidding Jason by three hundred talents of silver, diverted the high-priestly succession to himself. Back he came to Jerusalem, with the royal warrant to maintain 25 him, yet all unworthy, with a tyrant's cruel heart, more wild beast than high priest.

Thus was Jason supplanted, that had supplanted his own brother, and was driven to take refuge in the Ammonite country; as for Menelaus, he got the office he coveted, but never a penny paid the king of all he had promised, however urgent Sostratus might be, that was in command of the citadel. For all exaction of tribute this fellow was answerable; and so it fell out that both of them were summoned to court, Menelaus leaving his high priesthood to his own brother, Lysimachus, and for Sostratus. . . he became governor of Cyprus.³

It befell at this very time that the men of Tharsus and Mallus made an insurrection; so little it liked them that a gift should be made of their cities to Antiochis, the king's paramour. Post-haste the king went off to appease them, leaving one of his courtiers, Andronicus, to be viceroy. Here was Menelaus' opportunity; he had gold ornaments with him, that he had stolen out of the temple, and now, giving some of these as a present to Andronicus, he sold the rest at Tyre and other cities in the neighbourhood. Of these doings, one man had clear proof, and thereupon denounced him: Onias, that had now taken refuge in Daphne sanctuary, close by Antioch. What did Menelaus? He gained the ear of Andronicus and demanded that Onias should pay for it with his life. So the viceroy himself paid Onias a visit, swore friendship and overcame his suspicions; then, when he had left sanctuary, without scruple of conscience put him to death. Here was great matter of indignation, and not among the Jews only; the very heathen took it amiss, so great a man should meet so unworthy an end. No sooner was the king back from Cilicia than the citizens of Antioch, Jew and Gentile both, assailed him with complaints about the murder of an innocent man; whereat Antiochus himself was heartily grieved, ay, and moved to tears of pity, such memories he had of Onias' well-ordered,

¹ 'Wretches'; the word found in our Latin text is probably a copyist's error for 'supplicators', i.e. religious representatives. ² This sentence, in the original, is of unexampled obscurity. It runs, 'And when Apollonius son of Menestheus had been sent to Egypt for the enthroning of king Ptolemy Philometor, Antiochus, realizing that he (who?) was estranged from his (whose?) past deeds, felt anxious for his own safety. And for that reason (what reason? Or perhaps, 'from that place', but what place?) he (who?) came to Joppe, and then rounded up at Jerusalem'. It seems possible that the text has been inaccurately transmitted. ³ According to the Greek text, Sostratus left his own office in charge of Crates, 'who was (afterwards?) over the Cyprians'. The island of Cyprus belonged at this time to Egypt, and only came into the Seleucid empire some years later.

38 honourable life. Anon he fell into a rage, stripped Andronicus of his purple, and would have him led away all through the streets, till he reached the very spot where he had lifted his impious hand against Onias. There the sacrilegious wretch perished, by the divine vengeance worthily requited.

9 Meanwhile, word had gone abroad at Jerusalem, how Lysimachus was ever robbing the temple, by Menelaus' contrivance. Great store of gold was lost already; but now there was a rising of the common folk against Lysimachus, whose numbers and their rage increasing, he was fain to put some three thousand men under arms, with one Tyrannus at their head, that was far gone in years, and no less in folly. Lysimachus it was that first resorted to violence; but the rabble, when they saw what he would be at, caught up stones or stout clubs for the attack, and some of them pelted him with cinders. When they had wounded some of his retinue, and felled others to earth, the rest took to their heels; and there, close beside the treasury, this robber of the temple was done to death.

3 And next, they must implead Menelaus himself on the same charge. Three envoys from the council of elders brought the whole matter before the king, when he visited Tyre, and Menelaus was as good as lost. What did he? With the promise of a great bribe he secured the good word of Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes;¹ Ptolemy it was waylaid the king, as he rested from the heat in a covered walk of his, and put him from his purpose. So now Menelaus, that was at the root of all the mischief, must go scot free, and his unhappy accusers, that might have cleared themselves easily enough before a court of bloodthirsty Scythians,² with their lives must pay for it. Here were men come to plead for their own city, their own people, their own temple treasures, and must they be hurried off to undeserved punishment? Even the Tyrians thought shame of it, and in princely fashion gave them burial. So, through the avarice of the great, throve Menelaus still, and his wickedness went from bad to worse, to his countrymen's undoing.

5 At this time Antiochus was preparing once more for a campaign against Egypt. And all about the city of Jerusalem, by the space of forty days together, there were strange sights appearing. High up in air, horsemen were seen riding this way and that, in vesture of gold, and spears they carried as if they went to battle; now riding in ordered ranks, now engaged in close combat. In long array they moved past, shields and helmeted heads and drawn swords; flew javelin and flashed golden harness, a whole armoury of shining mail. No wonder if the prayer was on all men's lips, good not ill such high visions might portend.

And now a false rumour went abroad, Antiochus had come by his death. Jason's ears it reached, and all at once, with full a thousand men at his back, he delivered an assault upon the city. Let the townfolk man the walls as they would, at last it fell, and Menelaus must take refuge within the citadel. As for Jason, he fell upon his own fellow-countrymen, and that without mercy. His own flesh and blood to vanquish, what was this but shameful defeat? Ay, but to him friend was foe, were there spoil for the winning! Yet high priesthood he got none; disappointed of his scheming, back he must go to the Ammonite country, and there, marked down for death by king Aretas of the Arabians, fled from city to city. An outlaw, hated and shunned by his kind, of a whole land, of a whole race, the common foe, he was driven out into Egypt; and so making his way to Lacedaemon, as if to find refuge there by right of kinship, died miserably. In exile he died, that had brought exile on so many; cast away without dole or tomb, that left so many tombless; in a strange land unburied, that might have rested in his fathers' grave.

Here was news to make the king doubt whether the Jews were loyal to him, and back he came from Egypt in a great taking of rage. He occupied the city, and that by force of arms; then he bade his troops go about killing, with no quarter for any they met; let a man but shew his face on the house-top, he must be slaughtered with the rest. Fell young and old alike; children with their mothers must die, nor maidenhood was spared, nor helpless infancy. By the end of three days, eighty thousand had been massacred, forty thousand held as prisoners, and as many more sold into slavery.

¹ v. 45. The words 'son of Dorymenes' appear in the Greek text, but not in the Latin; they are inserted here to distinguish this Ptolemy (cf. I Mac. 3. 38) from the king of Egypt mentioned in verse 21 above.

² 'Scythians', a barbarous race then inhabiting Russia.

Nor might all this content him; with Menelaus for his guide, that was traitor to faith and folk, what must he do but make his way into God's temple, holier in all the world is none? What, should those sacred ornaments, dedicated by kings and peoples for the more splendour and worthiness of it, be caught up in his impious hands, pawed and defiled by his touch? Surely he had taken leave of his wits, this Antiochus; how should he know that this sanctuary, for once, would lack the divine protection? And only because, for a little, God's anger was provoked by sins of the men that dwelt there! Free had they been from the meshes of such guilt, Antiochus, too, should have been greeted with a drubbing, as Heliodorus was, the man king Seleucus sent to rob the treasury, and should have learned to leave his rash purpose. But what would you? People it was God chose, and city for people's sake; chastisement that fell on the people, city must rue, and anon share its good fortune. He, the omnipotent, the ruler of all, would leave Jerusalem forlorn in his anger, would raise her to heights of glory, his anger once appeased.

Antiochus, then, came away from the temple a thousand and eight hundred talents the richer; and back he went to Antioch, all at reckless speed; he had a mind to sail his fleet over the plain, march his troops across the sea, his heart so swelled with pride in his doings. As for the Jewish folk, he left viceroys of his own to harry them; in Jerusalem Philip, that was a Phrygian born, and outdid his own master in cruelty; at Garizim Andronicus and Menelaus, heaviest burden of all for the folk to bear. But he would do worse by the Jews yet; or why did he send out Apol-lonius, the arch-enemy, and a force of twenty-two thousand, to cut off manhood in its flower, women and children to sell for slaves? This Apollonius, when he reached Jerusalem, was all professions of friendship, and nothing did until the sabbath came round, when the Jews kept holiday. Then he put his men under arms, and butchered all that went out to keep festival; to and fro he went about the streets, with armed fellows at his heels, and made a great massacre.

Meanwhile Judas Machabaeus, and nine others with him, went out into the desert, where they lived like wild beasts on the mountain-side; better lodge there with herbs for food, than be party to the general defilement.

6 Not long after, the king despatched one of the senators at Antioch, with orders he should compel the Jewish people, custom of their fathers and law of their God to forsake. The temple at Jerusalem must be profaned, and dedicated now to Jupiter Olympius; as for the temple on Garizim, the Samaritans were to call it, as well they might,¹ after Jupiter the god of strangers. What a storm of troubles broke then upon the commonwealth, most grievous to be borne! All riot and revelry the temple became, once the Gentiles had it; here was dallying with harlots, and women making their way into the sacred precincts, and bringing in of things abominable; with forbidden meats, to the law's injury, the very altar groaned. Sabbath none would observe, nor keep holiday his fathers kept; even the name of Jew was disclaimed. Instead, they went to sacrifice on the king's birthday, though it were ruefully and under duress; and when the feast of Liber came round, make procession they must in Liber's honour, garlanded with ivy each one. And now, among all the neighbouring cities, a decree went out, wherein the Ptolemies² were the prime movers; all alike should constrain the Jews to do sacrifice, and those that would not fall in with Gentile ways, with their lives must pay for it.

¹ 'As well they might'; literally, 'according as they were'. The author seems to be taunting the Samaritans with their Gentile origin. But the Greek might mean 'according as they gained their request'; Josephus alleges that the Samaritans themselves asked leave of the king to re-dedicate their temple.
² 'The Ptolemies'; the Greek has 'Ptolemy', cf. note on 4. 45.

10 Here were sights to be seen most pitiable. Two mothers there were, denounced for the circumcision of their own sons; what, think you, befell them? Both must be driven through the streets, with the children hung about their breasts, and cast 11 headlong from the battlements! At another time, Philip had information that certain Jews were meeting in caves near at hand, to keep the sabbath there without remark. Not one of these would lift a hand to help himself, so great care they had of the day's observance, and all were burned to death.

12 Reader, by these tales of ill fortune be not too much dismayed; bethink thee, all this came about for the punishment of our race, not for its undoing. A mark of signal favour it is, when the Lord is quick to chastise, nor lets the sinner sin on un-reproved. See how he deals with other nations, waiting patiently to take full toll 13 when the hour comes for judgement! Not so with us; for our guilt he will not delay reckoning, and claim strict vengeance at last. Towards us, his mercy is inalienable; chastise us he will with adversity, but for-sake us never. So much, reader, for thy warning; and now go we back to our history.

18 Here was Eleazar, one of the chief scribes, a man of great age and of noble features, being required to eat swine's flesh; but though they held his mouth open 19 they could not force him to eat. He would rather die gloriously than live defiled; on he went, of his own accord, to the place of 20 torture, scanning every step of the path that lay before him. He must endure all in patience, rather than taste, for love of life, the forbidden meat. Old friends among 21 the bystanders, out of misplaced kindness, took him aside and urged him to let meat of some other kind be brought, which he could taste without scruple; he could pretend to have obeyed the king's will by 22 eating the sacrilegious food, and his life should no longer be forfeit. Such kind 23 offices old friendship claimed; but he thought rather of the reverence that was due to his great age, of his venerable grey hairs, of a life blamelessly lived from childhood onwards. True to the precepts of God's holy law, he answered that they would do better to send him to his grave and have done with it. It does not suit my 24 time of life, said he, to play a part. What of many that stand here, younger than myself, who would think that Eleazar, at the age of ninety, had turned Gentile? To gain 25 a brief hour of this perishable life, shall I play a trick on them, shall I disgrace this hoary head of mine and bring down a curse on it? Man's sentence here I may avoid if 26 I will, but God's almighty hand, living or dead, escape I may not. Let me take leave 27 of life with a good grace, as best suits my years, bequeathing to men younger than 28 myself an example of courage; meeting, with ready resolve, an honourable death, for the sake of laws holy and august as ours are. And so without more ado he was led away to his torturing; his executioners 29 were in a rage, that but now had been gentle with him; pride, they would have it, spoke here. And this was the last sigh he 30 uttered, as he lay there dying under the lash, Lord, in thy holy wisdom this thou well knowest; I might have had life if I would, yet never a cruel pang my body endures, but my soul suffers it gladly for thy reverence. Thus he died, not only to 31 those younger men he spoke of, but to our whole race, leaving the pattern of a brave and honourable death.

7 Seven brothers there were, that lay under arrest, and their mother with them; these two were tortured at the king's command, to see if whip and thong would not make them eat swine's flesh, for all their scruples. And thus spoke out one of them in the name of the rest: Why dost thou put us to the question? What secret wouldst thou learn? Of this be sure, we had rather die than break the divine law given to our fathers. The king, in a rage,
3 would have fire-pan heated, and caldron of bronze; heated they were, and then he passed judgement upon this same spokesman. Tongue of him should be cut out, scalp torn off, hands and feet mutilated, while mother and brethren stood by to see it; then, so maimed, he was for the fire;
5 they should roast him alive in a caldron. Long time he suffered, and there stood the rest with their mother, each heartening other to die bravely; God sees true, said 6 they, and will not allow us to go uncom-forted. Did not Moses prophesy as much, even in his song of remonstrance, He will comfort his servants? ¹

7 So died the first, and now the second must make sport for them. When the hair was torn from his head and the skin with it, they asked, Would he eat, or must his whole body pay for it, limb by limb? And he answered in good round Hebrew, ² eat he would not; whereupon he, in his turn, suffered like the first. Ay, miscreant, he said with his last breath, of this present life it lies in thy power to rob us; but he, who is ruler of the whole world, he, for whose laws we perish, will raise us up again, and to life everlasting. And now they had their will with the third, who was no sooner bidden than he put forth tongue and hands very courageously; Heaven's gift these be, he said, and for God's law I make light account of them, well assured he will give them back to me. Well might they marvel, king and courtiers both, at one so young that recked so little of his sufferings. Such was the manner of his passing; the fourth, too, when with like tortures they assailed him, died with these words on his lips: Man's sentence of death, what matters it, so there be hope in God, that shall raise up the dead? For thee, resurrection to new life shall be none. And when the fifth was put to the question, he looked Antiochus in the face, thus warning him: Mortal, at thy own whim free to govern thy fellow men, think not God has abandoned this race of ours! Wait but a little, and good proof thou shalt have of his sovereign power, such torment thee and thine awaits. So they came to the sixth, and this was his dying utterance: Never flatter thyself with vain hope; speed we amiss, it was our own doing, that sinned against our God. Strange be his dealings with us, yet think not thou to defy God unpunished.

20 And here was the greatest marvel of all, by honest folk ever to be kept in mind, that the mother of seven children should be content to lose them all in one day, for the hope she had in God's mercy. What generosity of mind was this, that could temper her womanly feelings with a man's thoughts! One by one, in the speech of her own country, she put heart into them; Into this womb you came, she told them, who knows how? Not I quickened, not I the breath of life gave you, nor fashioned the bodies of you one by one! Man's birth, and the origin of all things, he devised who is the whole world's Maker; and shall he not mercifully give the breath of life back to you, that for his law's sake hold your lives so cheap?

What should Antiochus do? Here was defiance of his authority, here were tones of remonstrance that liked him little. The youngest son lived yet; for him, what encouragement, what royal assurances of wealth and happiness! Would he but leave the law of his fathers, he should be the king's friend, and have weighty matters entrusted to him. But yield the boy would not; till at last the king beckoned the mother apart; mother of son should be the saviour yet. Much ado he had to win her, but she agreed at last, counsel her son she would. And a fine trick she played on the bloodthirsty tyrant, leaning over her son and counselling him in her own native speech, to this effect: Nine months in the womb I bore thee, three years at the breast fed thee, reared thee to be what thou art; and now, my son, this boon grant me. Look round at heaven and earth and all they contain; bethink thee that all this, and mankind too, God made out of nothing. Of this butcher have thou no fear; claim rightful share among thy brethren in yonder inheritance of death; so shall the divine mercy give me back all my sons at once.

Before ever she had finished speaking, the boy cried out, What dallying is this? To the king's law I own no allegiance; rule I live by is the law we had through Moses. Arch-enemy of the Jewish race, thinkest thou to escape from God's hand? Grievously if we suffer, grievously we have sinned; chides he for a little, the Lord our God, he does but school, does but correct us; to us, his worshippers, he will be reconciled again. But thou, miserable wretch, viler on earth is none, wouldst thou vent thy rage on those worshippers of his, and flatter thyself with vain hopes none the less? Trust me, thou shalt yet abide his judgement, who is God almighty and all-seeing. Brief pains, that under his warrant have seised my brethren of eternal life!

¹ Deut. 32. 36.

² 'In good round Hebrew', that is, in the Aramaic dialect, as if to clinch his attitude of defiance by refusing to address his persecutors in Greek.

And shalt not thou, by his sentence, pay 37 the deserved penalty of thy pride? As my brethren, so I for our country's laws both soul and body forfeit; my prayer is, God will early relent towards this nation, while 38 thou dost learn, under the lash of his torments, that he alone is God. And may the divine anger, that has justly fallen on our race, with me and these others be laid to rest!

39 No wonder if this last, that so baffled the king's rage, was more barbarously used 40 than all the others; yet kept he ever his confidence in the Lord, and made a clean 41 end of it. And at length, when all her sons were gone, it was the mother's turn to die.
 42 Enough! Of idolatrous sacrifice and inhuman cruelty you shall hear no more.

8 Now turn we to Judas Machabaeus and his company. Secretly they made entry into the villages, whence they summoned both kinsman and friend of theirs;
 ay, and rallied many more, that were yet true to the Jewish faith, till they had must-2 tered an army of six thousand men. And ever they besought the Lord, he would look with favour on a race down-trodden, have pity on a temple defiled by the hea-3 then. Their city was like to be razed to the ground; would he watch the ruin of it unmoved? Would he be deaf, while blood-4 shed cried out for vengeance? Cruel murders of innocent childhood, his own honour dragged in the dust, would he not mark all this, and be roused to indignation?

5 By this, the divine anger had given place to clemency; and to all the heathen round about Machabaeus and his company were 6 an infliction past bearing. On village or town of theirs he would fall suddenly, and burn it to the ground; by seizing some point of vantage, once and again he put 7 their forces to the rout; going about these forays at night-time for the most part, till the fame of his valour spread far and wide.
 8 What was to be done? Here was a man that grew ever in strength, and still his enterprises throve. At last Philip was fain to send dispatches, calling on Ptolemy, the 9 governor of Coelesyria and Phoenice, to further the king's business. And he, without more ado, chose one of his best friends,

Nicanor son of Patroclus, and sent him out to exterminate the Jewish race altogether.
 For which purpose, he armed full twenty thousand men, a rabble of all nations; and Gorgias should be at Nicanor's side, a soldier that had much experience in the wars.

Nicanor's purpose it was, to sell the 10
 Jewish people for slaves, and thereby reimburse the king for a tribute of two thousand talents he must needs pay to Rome. So, before aught else was done, he 11 sent word to the towns on the sea-coast, crying a sale of Jewish captives, and offering them at ninety for the talent; so little did he guess what divine vengeance was to overtake him. No sooner did Judas hear 12 of Nicanor's coming, than he gave warning of it to the Jews who bore him company.
 Some of these, cowardly souls that put no trust in God's awarding, took refuge in 13 flight; the rest made shift to sell all the goods they yet had, crying out upon the Lord to deliver them from such an impious wretch as would sell them first, and con-14 quer them after. Themselves if he nothing regarded, let him remember at least the covenant made with their fathers; the renown, too, of that holy name they bore!

As for Machabaeus, he called together 16
 the seven thousand¹ that followed him, and warned them they should make no terms with the enemy, nor be affrighted by a great rabble of men coming against them in so ill a cause. Courage! he said; bethink 17 you of the sanctuary their insults have outraged, of a city wronged and mocked, of immemorial traditions overthrown! What 18 gives them confidence? Weapons of war, and their own daring. Ours to trust in his omnipotence, who with a single nod both these our adversaries and the whole world besides can undo. He put them in mind, 19 moreover, of God's signal mercy shewed to their forefathers; how Sennacherib's army perished, a hundred and eighty-five thousand strong; how they fought the Gala-20 tians at Babylon, with Macedonian allies whose heart failed them at the encounter, and six thousand Jews, alone but for heaven's aid, made havoc of a hundred and twenty thousand men, much to the common advantage.² With such words as these 21

¹ This seems to be a slip in the Latin version; the Greek has 'six thousand' here, as in verse 1 above.
² No other record of this engagement has been preserved to us.

he put heart into them, till they were ready to die for law and country's sake.

- 22 And now he put the several commands of his army in charge of his brethren, Simon, Joseph and Jonathan, entrusting one thousand five hundred men to each;
- 23 Esdras¹ was bidden read aloud from the sacred writings, and the watchword was given, God's Aid. And with that, out went Judas at the head of his army, and engaged the enemy. Such help the Almighty gave them, they cut down more than nine thousand men; and the rest of Nicanor's disabled forces must needs take to their heels.
- 25 All the money that had been paid for their enslaving fell into Jewish hands, and they gave the enemy chase far and wide, only time hindering them; the sabbath was coming on, and pursue further they might not. Arms and spoils of the fallen they gathered in, and so fell to keeping the sabbath, blessing the Lord for the deliverance he had sent that day, the first refreshing dew of his mercy. The sabbath day over, they gave a share of the spoils to crippled folk, orphans and widows; they and theirs should have the rest. And when this was done, they made public intercession, beseeching the Lord, that was so merciful, to be reconciled with his servants for good and all.
- 30 Other invaders they slew, twenty thousand of them and more, under Bacchides and Timotheus; and when they seized their high fortresses, and had spoil to divide in plenty, once more cripples and orphans and widows, and the aged folk too, must have a share to match their own.
- 31 Weapons of war they gathered with all care, and bestowed where they were most needed; it was the rest of the spoil they carried back to Jerusalem. At this time they slew Philarches, that had been of Timotheus' company, a man stained with crime, and many ways a persecutor of the Jewish people. There was Callisthenes, too, that had burnt down the gates of the sanctuary; when all Jerusalem was rejoicing over the victory, he took refuge within doors, and they burnt the place down about his ears; he too was served right for his godless doings. As for Nicanor, that was the arch-villain of all, and would have sold the Jews to a thousand slave-dealers, the very men whose lives he held so cheap had now, by divine aid, humbled him to the dust. Robe of office he must lay by, and slink by country ways all unattended to Antioch. A fine home-coming, this, with the loss of a whole army! Where were the Jewish captives that should have paid off the tribute to Rome? He was fain to confess, now, that the Jews had God himself for their protector, and, would they but keep his laws, there was no conquering them!

9 Antiochus himself, at this time, had a sorry home-coming from Persia. He had made his way into the city they call Persepolis, thinking to plunder its temple and of itself have the mastery; but the common folk ran to arms and routed him. So he was a man defeated and disgraced when he reached Ecbatana, and there news came to him of how Nicanor had fared, and Timotheus. And now, in a great taking of rage, he would make the Jews suffer for the ignominy of his own defeat; on, on his chariot must be driven, and never a halt in the journey, with the divine vengeance ever at his heels. Had he not boasted, Jerusalem was his goal, and he would bury the Jewish race under the ruins of it?

The Lord, Israel's God, how should aught escape his scrutiny? The words were barely uttered, when he smote Antiochus with such a hurt, there was neither remedying nor discovering it. A deadly griping it was that took him, with cruel torment of the bowels; fitting reward for one that had often tortured his fellows, and to the marrow, in unexampled fashion. Even so, he would not leave his wicked purpose; with pride undiminished, still breathing out fiery threats against the Jewish folk, he pressed forward on his errand, till of a sudden, in full career, down fell he from his chariot, and never a limb but was racked grievously by the fall. What a living proof was this of God's power, when he was struck to earth, and must finish his journey by litter, one that boasted, till now, he could rise beyond man's measure, the sea's waves govern, and weigh mountains in the balance! Bred worms at last in that sinful body, and he lived yet, though miserably enough, to see his own flesh rot away, till his own men could not bear the foul stench of him; it was but yesterday the very stars seemed within his reach, and never a man now would carry so foul a burden.

¹ For 'Esdras' the Greek text has 'Eleazar', meaning presumably Judas' brother. If the Latin reading is right, Esdras must be some person not elsewhere mentioned.

11 What marvel, if the swelling pride of him ebbed away, and heaven's judgements brought him to himself? With every moment his anguish grew, and the foul breath of his disease was past his own bearing. Alas, said he, to God all must bow; mortals we are, and god ourselves we may not.

13 Nay, he made suit to the Lord, vile wretch though he were, hoping all in vain to win mercy. Forgotten, his haste to lay Jerusalem in ruins, and make a cemetery of it; a free city it should be thenceforward.

15 Grudge the Jewish folk burial, give their carrion to bird and beast, make an end of them, children and all? Nay, such high privileges they should have as the town-folk of Athens itself. And for that sacred temple he had stripped bare, with choice gifts he would enrich it, furnishing it as never before, and defraying, from his own purse, all the cost of its sacrifices. Stay, he would become a Jew himself, would go the rounds of earth, proclaiming everywhere the divine power!

18 But all to no avail; the vengeance of God, well earned, had overtaken him, and find relief he might not. So now, despairing of that, he wrote to the Jews in very humble fashion, as here follows.¹ To his loyal Jewish subjects Antiochus, their king and general, sends greeting, health, and happiness! Thrive you and yours, and fare prosperously, I am well content. For myself, I am in ill case, yet think ever kindly of you. On my way home from Persia, so grievous a distemper has fallen upon me, needs must I should take order for the public safety. Despair I will not; there is good hope yet of my recovery. But this thought weighs with me; when he went a-campaigning in the high countries, my father gave out who was to succeed him; should aught go amiss, and ill tidings come, every governor in his own province must know his duty without fear of confusion. And here be princes all about, I know it well, waiting upon events and ready to go with the times. Heir to the throne, then, I needs must designate. Again and again, when I set out for the high countries, I entrusted my son Antiochus to the general care. And now this written commission I have sent him. . . . As you love me, then, bethink you of those benefits you have received, both publicly and in private; keep faith, each and all of you, with me and with my son. I doubt not he will shew himself his father's true heir, ever courteous, and kindly, and easy of approach.

So died he, wretchedly enough, the murderer, the blasphemous, out in the hill-country far away from home. Cruel the blow that struck him down, as he had ever been cruel in his dealings. His body was brought home again; Philip, his foster-brother, came back with it, and then took refuge in Egypt with Ptolemy Philometor, so little he trusted the young prince Antiochus.

10 Meanwhile, God aiding, Machabaeus and his followers had recovered both temple and city. Down came the altars Gentile folk had set up in the open streets, down came the shrines, and the temple was purged of its defilement. They made a fresh altar, struck fire from flint, and offered sacrifice again after two years' intermission; rose incense, burned lamp, loaves were set out on the sacred table once more. Then, bowing down to earth, they made petition to the Lord, never again such calamity might overtake them; sin if they did, himself in his great mercy should chastise them, not hand them over into the cruel power of blasphemous enemies. It so fell out, that the temple was purified on the twenty-fifth day of Casleu, the very time of its profanation by the Gentiles. Eight days of rejoicing they kept, with such ceremonies as belong to the feast of Tent-dwelling; it was a feast of tent-dwelling indeed they had kept a while back, when they lodged like beasts among the hill-side caverns! Now that God had made the way clear for his temple's cleansing, what wonder if they set up in his honour branches, and green boughs,

¹ ev. 18-27. It seems probable that this proclamation was sent to all Antiochus' subjects, the Jews receiving it among others. The document referred to at the end of verse 25 is no longer extant.

8 and arbours of palm? What wonder if a decree was passed, by common consent, all Jewry should keep the festival year by year?

9 Now the story is told, how Antiochus 10 called the Illustrious came by his end, turn to be his son, Antiochus Eupator, that was born of a very ill father;¹ record we in brief the history of his reign, and the 11 hazards of war that went with it. Upon his accession, this king entrusted all the business of the realm to one Lysias, commander of the forces in Phoenice and 12 Coelesyria. With Ptolemy, that was called Macer, we are concerned no more; fain would he have made amends to the Jews for the wrong done them, and kept their 13 friendship, but for that very reason he was denounced to Eupator by his courtiers.
He was a traitor, they said, twice over, false to his trust, when Philometor left him in charge of Cyprus, and now weary of his new allegiance to Antiochus the Illustrious! Whereupon he put an end to his 14 own life by poison. When Gorgias was given command of the district, he was for ever making war on the Jews, with mercenaries to aid him; and there were natives of the country besides,² well entrenched in their strongholds, that gave welcome to deserters from Jerusalem, and so fanned the flames of enmity.

15 And now the followers of Machabaeus, after prayer made for the divine assistance, delivered an attack upon the Edomite 16 strongholds. These, by a very courageous assault, they occupied, and cut down all they met, putting not less than twenty 17 thousand men to the sword; but there were two fortresses yet remaining, into which the survivors threw themselves, well provided with means of defence.
18 Machabaeus himself went off to fight other battles of greater moment, leaving Simon, Joseph and Zacchaeus, with a strong force under their command, to carry on the 19 siege. And here the avarice of Simon's men was their undoing; for a bribe of seventy thousand silver pieces, they allowed some of the defenders to escape.
20 Machabaeus no sooner heard of it, than he summoned the leaders of the people, and arraigned the guilty men in their presence;

what, would they sell their brethren's lives, by letting the enemies of their race go free? So he put these traitors to death; 21 and for the strongholds, he conquered both of them at a blow, so carrying all before him by force of arms, that more than twenty thousand of the defenders perished.

But Timotheus could not be content 22 with one defeat at the hands of the Jews;
he would bring in hordes of foreign soldiery, and cavalry from Asia, threatening Judaea with slavery. At his coming, the 23 party of Machabaeus fell to prayer; earth on their heads, sackcloth about their loins, they lay prostrate at the altar's foot, entreating the Lord he would espouse their quarrel, and their foes should be his; the law had promised it. Then, this supplica-24 tion made, they took up arms and marched out, leaving the city far away in their rear, nor ever halted till they were close to the enemy's lines. Soon as the dawn broke, 25 they engaged; on the one side, all trust in the Lord, valour's best pledge of victory and fairer times; on the other, naught but human eagerness to inspire courage. Hard 26 went the day, and, so it seemed to the enemy, heaven itself took part. Five horsemen came riding, with splendid trappings of gold, to lead the Jews onward; and two of these served Machabaeus for escort, covering him with their shields to keep all hurt away from him. With shaft of theirs, lightning of theirs, dazzled and dismayed,
the enemy fell to earth; twenty thousand 27 and five hundred of them perished that day, besides six hundred of the cavalry.

As for Timotheus, he took refuge in 28 Gazara, a strong fortress that was under the command of Chaereas. Four days to-29 gether, Machabaeus and his men eagerly pressed on the siege of it; but the defenders were confident in its strength; loud their defiance was, and very blasphemous the words they uttered. Stung by these taunts, 30 twenty warriors of Machabaeus' company made a bold attack on the wall as the fifth day was dawning, and, by the fierceness of their onslaught, made shift to climb it; 31 others, following at their heels, fell to

¹ The Greek word 'Eupator' means 'born of a noble father'. ² 'Natives of the country'; literally, in the Latin version, 'Jews'; but this is probably a copyist's mistake for 'Edomites', the reading found in the Greek text.

burning tower and gateway alike, and made a bonfire of the blasphemers. For two whole days they ransacked the fort, and at last came upon Timotheus¹ in his hiding-place; so they made an end of him, his brother Chaereas and Apollophanes perishing with him. When all was over, they sang hymns of praise and gave thanks to the Lord, that had done marvellous things for Israel, and granted them victory.

11 It was but a short respite they had; Lysias, a kinsman of Antiochus that was regent and managed his affairs for him, was not a little concerned over these happenings, and he marched on Judaea at the head of eighty thousand men, with all the cavalry he could muster. Here was a city worth the capture, for Gentile folk to dwell in; here was a temple that would yield a fine spoil, as temples did everywhere; a priesthood, too, that might be put up for sale year after year. Of all this he bethought him, never of God's avenging power; blindly he trusted in his foot-soldiers by the ten thousand, his horsemen by the thousand, in his elephants that numbered four score. Upon marching into Judaea he first reached Bethsura, that stood in a narrow pass five furlongs away from Jerusalem,² and laid siege to the citadel of it.

What did Machabaeus and his fellows, when they learned that the siege of the fortress was already begun? Most piteously they besought the Lord, amid the tears of a whole populace, a gracious angel he would send out for Israel's deliverance. Then they armed for battle, Machabaeus himself the first of all, as he summoned the rest to share with him the hour of danger, for the relief of their brethren. So, in good heart, they set out together, and before they left Jerusalem a vision came to them; of a rider that went before them in white array, with armour of gold, brandishing his spear. How they blessed God's mercy, all of them, at the sight! How their courage rose, a match for all it should encounter, men or wild beast or walls of iron! They marched on, ready for battle, sure now of a heavenly champion, and of the Lord's favour; and when they charged the enemy, 11 they were very lions for valour. At their onslaught, fell eleven thousand of the foot, fell a thousand and six hundred of the horse; and the whole army took to its 12 heels, for the most part wounded and disarmed; Lysias himself, ingloriously enough, turned and fled.

Yet good sense he lacked not; great loss 13 he had sustained, and, let the Hebrews continue to rely for aid upon divine Omnipotence, he saw there was no conquering them. So he wrote, offering to conclude 14 honourable terms with them, and secure them the king's friendship. As for Macha- 15 baeus, he consented to what Lysias asked, having no thought but for the common good; and the written terms he proposed to Lysias in the Jewish people's name received the royal assent.

The letter sent to the Jews by Lysias was 16 after this manner: Lysias, to the people of the Jews, all health! Your envoys, John 17 and Abesalom, handed me a written petition, and desired that I would give effect to the terms of it. All that needed to be 18 known, I have made clear to the king's grace, and he has granted what grant he could. Doubt not I will be a good suitor 19 in your cause hereafter, so you abide loyal to the king's interest. Meanwhile I have 20 given a verbal message to your envoys and mine, which they will impart to you. Fare- 21 well. Given on this twenty-fourth day of Dioscorus, in the hundred and forty-eighth year.

And of the king's own letter, the tenour 22 was this: King Antiochus, to his good cousin Lysias, all health! Now that our 23 father has found his place among the gods, it is for us to see that our subjects live at peace, and go quietly about their business. But of one nation, the Jews, we hear that 24 they resisted our father's will, who would have had them conform to the Greek way of living; to their own tradition they hold fast, and their plea is, we should grant them the enjoyment of their rights in the matter. And whereas we would have this 25 nation live peaceably like the rest, we enact and decree that their temple should be restored to them, and that they should

¹ If the text here is sound, the Timotheus mentioned in 12. 2 is a different person. ² A more probable reading in the Greek makes the distance not five furlongs, but about twenty miles, which would be a just estimate.

26 follow the custom of their forefathers. Do us the kindness, then, to send word and give them assurance of this; our will made known, let them take heart, and order their own affairs contentedly.

27 To the Jews themselves the king wrote as follows: King Antiochus, to the elders and people of the Jews, all health! Thrive you as well as ourselves, we are well content. Menelaus has brought us word, you would fain have free intercourse with the men of your race who dwell in these parts;¹ and we hereby grant safe conduct to all of you that would travel here, up to the thirtieth day of Xanthicus. . . . That the Jewish folk may eat what food they will, use what laws they will, according to their ancient custom; and if aught has been done amiss through inadvertence, none of them, for that cause, shall be molested. We are sending Menelaus besides, to give a charge to you. Farewell. Given on the fifteenth day of Xanthicus, in the hundred and forty-eighth year.

34 The Romans, too, wrote to them after the manner following; Quintus Memmius and Titus Manlius, envoys of Rome, to the Jewish people, all health! The privileges Lysias has granted you in the name of his royal cousin, we hereby ratify. Other matters he has remitted to the king's decision; take counsel among yourselves, and let us know at once what your mind is, if you would have us order all to your liking. Even now we are on the road to Antioch; write speedily, to let us know how you are minded. Farewell. Given on the twenty-fifth day of Xanthicus, in the hundred and forty-eighth year.

12 So all was agreed upon; Lysias was for the court again, and the Jewish folk went back to their farms. But neither rest nor respite might they have while Timotheus² and Apollonius, son of Gennaëus, were left at their posts; Hieronymus, too, and Demophon, and Nicanor that ruled in Cyprus.

3 This was a very foul deed done by the men of Joppe; they fitted out certain ves-

